IF Brother Paul were preaching now, he would give Sister Willard half his time whenever he spoke, even if it were on Mars Hill. Paul was too smart a man to reject the help of the women of our day from the pulpit. The only trouble with Paul was that Gamaliel did not keep a "mixed" school. With such a job of work to do as to convert 1,500,000,000 people—more than half of them men, too—Paul would take all the help he could get.—Senator Blair.

THE Golden Rule gives this receipt for a minister. It is as good in the pews as in the pulpit.

PRESIDENT CARTER, of Williams College, is a very practical Prohibitionist. The town authorized the granting of two liquor licenses, but time passed on and no places for the sale of liquor were opened. Investigation showed that President Carter had quietly bought the two licenses and thus prevented the legal sale of liquor in the town.

THE Empress of Germany, like other European ladies of position, dresses with extreme plainness for church. She wears, usually, a wool walking dress, wool jacket or ulster, a simple round hat and dark gloves, and is so inconspicuous a person that but for her place in the royal pew of the great Domkirche she would be supposed to be some young country matron on a visit to the city, rather than the wife of the Emperor.

MRS. THEODORE IRVING, the founder of the original "Order of the King's Daughters," is the widow of a nephew of Washington Irving. The order was instituted seventeen years ago in Dr. Irving's school in Canada, the badge being a little silver cross, and the motto "In His Name." The present membership is reckoned by hundreds of thousands.

THE Chinese government has recently indemnified the Presbyterian Board of Missions to the extent of over $1.000 for property destroyed by a mob in 1885, in the Province of Kwong Sai, China.

A FEW days before his assassination, Abraham Lincoln, in a letter to a friend, said: "It has indeed been a trying hour for the republic, but I see in the near future a crisis arising which unnerves me, and causes me to tremble for the future of my country. As the result of the war, corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high place will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands, and the republic is destroyed. I feel at this time more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before—even in the midst of the war. God grant that my fears may prove groundless."

MISS SARAH AMELIA SCULL, who went to Greece to study archeology, made her own photographs and is going out to lecture on classical subjects, was so successful in her photograph work that all her Delphi views and the Apollo sets have been purchased by Professor Charles Eliot Norton for the art department of Harvard University.

THE True Light, a paper published at Lahore, India, says: "A remarkable woman is Miss Joanna Baker, who has just succeeded her father in the chair of the Greek language and literature at Simpson College, Iowa. We are informed that she was only four years old when she began the study of Greek, and that at eight she could read Xenophon with great ease, while at fourteen she compiled a lexicon of the Œdipus Tyrannus, and at sixteen was a college tutor of Greek. Add to this the facts that Mrs. Butler, who is so widely known throughout England as Miss Agneta Ramsay, is editing Herodotus, and Miss J. Harrison is preparing annotations upon Pausanias, and it would seem as if women have a peculiar aptitude in the acquisition of language. It is generally admitted that women are quick in picking up a foreign tongue when urged by the necessity of foreign travel, but the facts cited would seem to prove that they have powers second to none in mastering all the niceties of a dead language as well."

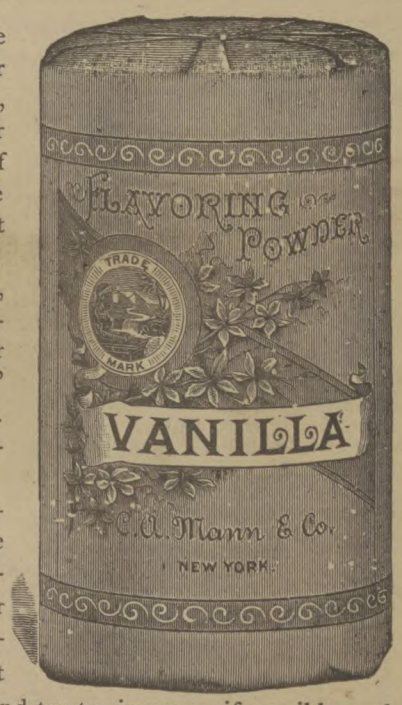
Flavoring Powders.



This month we're going to write about Constancy or Faithfulness. Queer subject for Flavoring Powders, you say, but keep right on reading, and find our meaning. We're forcibly reminded of our subject every time we take up the SIGNAL and see "Mention this paper" at the bottom of the page.

Day after day, week succeeding week, and month following month, with the orders for our Powders, we read, "Saw your advertisement in THE UNION SIGNAL."

Hardly ever an order without it. Here's faithfulness which is very gratifying to an advertiser.

It shows a solid, careful class of readers, who don't go blundering through the world as too many do. But the faithfulness don t end here. It extends to our laboratory. We're just as particular today in making our Powders as when first made,—look out for every little detail, and try to improve, if possible, and we are being rewarded. Now, reader, you can't appreciate what we're writing about if you've never seen the article, and if such is the case, don't wait any longer, but buy a bottle from your grocer. If he can't supply you, send us 50 cents, and receive by mail a 1-ounce bottle each of Lemon and Vanilla to try. The Holidays are swiftly coming. Some gifts for the dear ones are already in your mind. A little extra money is never unwelcome; send for our circular. "Attention, Workers," and learn how a tidy sum can easily be made.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Dr. George B. Cheever died Wednesday at Englewood, N. J.

George Bancroft, the historian, celebrated his ninetieth birthday last Friday.

The first Episcopal Training School for Deaconesses was opened in New York last week.

A $5,000,000 tin plate factory is to be built in Baltimore and one almost as large in Chicago.

Miss Mildred Lee, appointed one of the lady managers of the Columbian Exposition, from Virginia, has declined.

The decrease in the bonded debt of the government for September was $43,316,240, said to be the greatest monthly decrease ever made.

Nearly $8,000,000 in duties were paid at the New York custom house last week, on goods rushed in to escape the higher duties of the new tariff.

Joseph Cook and Mrs. Cook visited this office on their way to the meeting of the American Board at Minneapolis, whence they go to Oregon.

More than $60,000 of the $100,000 needed to establish a Woman's Medical College in connection with Johns Hopkins University has been raised

October 2 a fire broke out at Sydney, New South Wales, and spread so rapidly that over $6,000,000 damage was done before the flames were subdued.

A memorial bust of Alexander Lyman Holly, the distinguished metallurgist was unveiled at the British Iron and Steel Institute, New York, last week.

President Harrison attended the reunion of his old brigade at Galesburg, Ill., Wednesday, and while there laid the corner-stone of Alumni Hall, Knox College.

The Manitou cog railway to the top of Pike's Peak is completed; its length is nine miles, with a total ascent of 7,500 feet, the height reached is 14,200 feet above sea level.

In recognition of her work for social purity, the International Purity Conference, held at Stockholm, Sweden, last month, appointed Miss Willard a member of its executive committee.

Leading colleges and universities have opened unusually full; Harvard and Yale each welcomed a freshman class of four hundred, and Michigan University received the largest freshman class in its history.

The Wisconsin Grand Lodge of Good Templars, in session at Madison last week, showed an increase of 2,188 members in subordinate lodges, and 5,008 more members in juvenile societies during the last four years.

Hon. Frederick Billings, of Woodstock, Vt., died Wednesday. During the past summer he has given $50,000 to Amherst, and the same amount to the University of Vermont and to Mr. Moody's Northfield school. He also built the library of Vermont University at a cost of $200,000.

Lorado Taft, the sculptor who has been chosen to make the bust of Susan B. Anthony for the Exposition, was married October 4, to Miss Carrie La Scales, of Evanson. Mr. Taft is the sculptor of the Grant statue at Fort Leavenworth, the Colfax statue at Indianapolis, and the La Fayette statue at La Fayette, Indiana.

A SUBSCRIBER writes approving the suggestion made of securing pledges from persons not to send exhibits or attend the Columbian Exposition if it be kept open on the Sabbath, and suggests that a similar course be pursued to secure the prohibition of liquor selling on the grounds. An excellent suggestion.

THE Indiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in session on Monday September 29, passed the following resolution, unanimously:

Resolved, That we indorse and congratulate the Woman's Christian Temperance Union on its Christian character, its arduous labors, its marvelous success in manufacturing temperance sentiment, and in the crowning blessing of the Lord that rests upon it.

ELZABETH COMSTOCK, the Quaker preacher, now in old age, living at Union Springs, N. Y., has in her lifetime visited 122,000 prisoners, 195,000 sick and wounded soldiers, 85,000 inmates of poor-houses and almshouses, on both sides of the water. For thirty years she toiled in this field, and during the last years has been one of the most beloved members of the W. C. T. U. She was in attendance at the Friends' Yearly Meeting at Richmond, Ind., last week, and spoke repeatedly with her old-time vigor and wisdom.

THE W. C. T. U. of East Washington, always alive to the best interests of the work, is utilizing the Northwestern Industrial Exposition being held this month in Spokane Falls. The ladies have secured space there and ordered from this office fifty dollars' worth of temperance literature, which is being distributed continually. We are sure that a rich harvest will result from this generous seed-sowing. No better soil can be found than that of this vigorous young state; our friends do well to thus preëmpt it for "God and Home and Humanity."

A TRUSTWORTHY correspondent in Ogden, Utah, writes thus of the situation, and it is disgraceful if these words are true: "Ogden has passed from under Mormon rule. Whatever may be our gain from the change to Gentile government, temperance and morality seem to be of the least consideration in the opinion of our city fathers. Saloons and houses of infamy are multiplied on every hand. Burglars and footpads work industriously. Our prominent citizens are absorbed in money making." This last sentence tells the whole story, and will be the historian's explanation should the republic prove a failure.

MRS. J. C. BATEHAM desires especial attention called to the petitions being circulated through her department, for the closing of the Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath. This work was commenced a year ago and has been vigorously prosecuted. In a late issue of THE UNION SIGNAL Mrs. Bateham called in these petitions, and will be in this city soon to present them. All petitions should be sent at once to National Headquarters, care of Esther Pugh, 161 La Salle street, Chicago, Ill. Any who have not received the form of petition, but wish to sign it, can send their names direct to Miss Pugh.

JUDGE H. B. MOULTON is a candidate for Congress on the Prohibition ticket in the sixth district, Maryland, with a good fighting chance for success. He is a firm friend of the W C. T. U., giving legal advice gratuitously to the Washington unions whenever desired, and in other practical ways showing his friendship. He is the author of the famous Platt bill for the District of Columbia, and single-handed and alone has fought many temperance battles in the courts. He is president of the Prohibition union, of the Guardian League, and of the Washington Grove camp-meeting near his Maryland home. He is also at the head of another organization whose object is to secure temperance legislation in Congress. Prohibitionists of Maryland will do well to concentrate effort on Mr. Moulton and elect him. Such a man in Congress will be a power.

HENRY B. BLACKWELL, Rev. Olympia Brown, Rev. Anna Shaw, Mrs. Laura Johns, Mrs. Alice Pickler, Dr. Nettie Hall, and others are hard at work in South Dakota in the campaign whose only issue is the ballot for women. The brave Dakotans certainly believe in the do-everything policy. A single envelope contains directions for press work through the newly formed press department; equal suffrage; oratorical contests; mottoes for banners; sending out of German and Scandinavian literature; appointments of speakers; a call for women to be at the polls election day; children's parades on that day; house to house visitations; singing suffrage; suffrage lunches; suffrage Bible readings, and prayer meetings.

ALL remember how unmercifully Miss Willard was criticized for alluding to the taking out of a bar-room license for the Shoreham by Vice-President Morton, and the loud denials made by leading newspapers, that he had ever done any such thing. A leading Republican daily which was most loud in its denunciations of the W. C. T. U. for mentioning this well-known fact, lately had this paragraph: "Vice-President Morton visiting Washington last week, and stopping at his hotel, the Shoreham, resolved that there should be no more retail liquor selling in that house. Nothing less than a bottle can now be served there." If there never had been any retail liquor selling there, how could he resolve that there should be no more of it? Evidently, either General Nettleton's telegram to the National W. C. T. U. was a mistake, or the Shoreham has been selling liquor without a license.

THE Nebraska fight waxes hot and hopeful. Every report from the state expresses growing conviction that the amendment will carry, unless there shall be some scandalous "counting out" at the close, as was the case in Ohio. An urgent appeal is made to all white-ribboners and other temperance women to be at the polls November 4, as their presence and influence there will greatly increase the amendment vote. Great care must be taken to have the ballot accurate in form, as the situation is a peculiar one. This form has been adopted by the campaign committee, and should be printed at the foot of the regular ticket, as only one ballot box is used. Note that you need to vote both for the prohibitory amendment and against the license amendment. Do not let one vote be lost through carelessness in printing the ticket.

FOR proposed Amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture, sale and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage.

AGAINST said proposed Amendment to the Constitution that the manufacture, sale and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage shall be licensed and regulated by law.

FOR the proposed Amendment to the Constitution relating to the number of supreme judges.

FOR the proposed Amendment to the Constitution relating to the salary of judges of the Supreme and district courts.

MR. H. C. BITTENBENDER writes from Lincoln that the work of Miss Willard in Nebraska has helped forward the amendment battle immensely. Crowded houses met her at every point. She made votes as no other could. It was a labor of love, for the effort to reach so many points on time, traveling so many miles was very trying. He adds: "Nebraska is very proud of Miss Willard and will do its level best to win the fight for "God and Home and Native Land. The outlook is bright for us, but the opposition is fighting as never before." An editorial in the Lincoln Daily Call emphasizes the last statement; Ex-Governor Larrabee, who has worked so nobly and effectively in the Nebraska campaign, was egged by whisky cranks while delivering a prohibition speech at Columbus. Such treatment of such a grand man will prove the worst boomerang the whiskyites ever used; every egg thrown at him will hatch out a hundred prohibition votes. At another place Rev. Jordan was attacked with a club and Rev. Power was sandbagged while working for the amendment. Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap made us a call on her way to Nebraska for a month's work in the campaign, to deal the liquor traffic there some of her sledgehammer blows. While in Chicago she addressed a large audience in the Eighth Presbyterian Church and spoke for a few moments in the monthly meeting of the Central union, where she received most hearty greeting. That union, as well as those all over the country, will observe October 27 as a day of prayer for Nebraska, and asks all pastors to make it the subject of that Wednesday night prayer meeting.

"THE BEST-LAID SCHEMES—GANG AFT AGLEY."

BY REV. J. W. GUERNSEY.

[After Lord Byron.]

[At the Supreme Court "Original Package" Decision.]

The rumsellers rushed like a wolf on the fold,
And their wagons were loaded with barrels untold;
And their "packages" glistened like stars on the sea,
And thus they invaded the land of the free.

[On the passage of the Relief Act by Congress.]

Like the trees of the forest when summer is green,
The sellers and drinkers at sunrise were seen;
Like the trees of the forest when autumn has blown,
The rumshops at sunset were empty and lone.

For the voice of the freeman had spoken the word,
So loud that the members of Congress had heard,
Declaring the rumseller never should come
To beggar his children and ruin his home.

And there lay the barrels, their bungs opened wide,
And the grass was all dead where their contents had dried;
And there lay the "packages," broken, alas!
And shattered and shivered were bottle and glass.

There were tippler and toper, with lips thin and pale,
And sadly they sighed for their whisky and ale;
No popping of corks and no whizzing of beer,
No rum and no brandy their spirits to cheer.

And the streets are all quiet—the rum-rabble's gone,
And brawling and fighting no longer are known;
And the rumsellers join in a common lament
For the time and the money they vainly have spent.

Distillers and brewers and grogsellers, all
See a hand that is writing their doom on the wall.
'Tis the hand of the freemen uplifted ; might
To crush out the wrong and establish the right.

And the tipplers and topers are loud in their wail,
As they see, one by one, their devices all fail.
For the might of the rum-power shall all be o'erthrown,
The people have spoken, the thing shall be done.

HEPSY AT THE STATE CONVENTION.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

Hepsy has just come back from the state convention of that there white ribbin s'ciety she belongs to. I was dretful put out about her goin', but she was firm, an', as she usually doos, she carried the day. Not that Hepsy ever reely neglecks her housework on 'count o' sech things—no, I'll say that much in Hepsy's favor—she don't. But a host o' fried cakes, 'n' pies, 'n' bread, 'n' baked beans, 'n' sech like can't quite come up to Hepsy herself, a-settin' here darnin' my socks while I read the paper.

I says to Hepsy, says I, before she went off to Serrycuse to that convention—"Hepsy," says I—"how do you know but what I'll take to drinkin', with my pardner goin' off 'n' leavin' me alone exposed to temptation 'n' what not?" Hepsy she laughed 'n' put her two hands onto my shoulders, "Pshaw, Adoniram," says she, "how everlastin' silly you kin be when you set out!" An' then she up 'n' give me a sassy kiss right on the tip end o' my nose, 'n' that made me grin so after that they wa'n't no use o' sayin' anything more. So Hepsy she packed her portmanty 'n' put on her new brown alpacky dress 'n' her new bunnit, 'n' I hitched up the old mare 'n' druv her to the depot, meek's a lamb.

Jest as the train for Serrycuse hove in sight I says to Hepsy, says I—"Now, Hepsy, for pity sake do keep your place to that there convention! Don't forgit you're a woman 'n' disgrace me by airin' none o' your strong-minded notions before strangers. For the love o' heaven, Hepsy," says I eloquently—"don't—don't make a speech!"

Hepsy's cheeks got red 'n' her black eyes looked dangerous, but the train came puffin' in 'n' she didn't say nothin' except "Good-bye, Adoniram, 'n' don't forgit to wind the clock!" 'n' then she was gone. I had a sort o' oneasy feelin' that mebby Hepsy would git kind o' excited 'n' forgit that it wa'n't a Methodis' class-meetin' 'n' speak her sentiments right out.

I was a-joggin' along towards home when all to once I riz right up off'n the seat 'n' hollered. The old mare pricked up her ears 'n' give a jump 'n' I sot down ag'in purty onexpectedly. Mebby 'twas an inspiration I had come to me, but 'tany rate something seemed to say, "Adoniram Peabody, you go to that there convention yourself, an' see what the women do do!"

I might 'a' been knocked down with a feather, I was that took back, but the more I thought of it the more I made up my mind to go to Serrycuse,—go in disguise so Hepsy wouldn't know me if she happened to see me. I was allus o' ruther a romantic turn o' mind 'n' that plan jest tickled my fancy. Thinks's I, "I'll do it—I will; I'll see for myself what kind o' meetin's Hepsy takes sech pains to go to."

So home I hurried 'n' put on my b'iled shirt, 'n' spruced up consid'able, 'n' raked up an old pair o' green goggles 'n' a cane o' gran'f'r's, 'n' took out my false teeth. I declare I didn't hardly know myself in the lookin'-glass when I was all fixed. I had spoke to Dave Skillings on the way home to kind o' look after the house a few days 'n' see't the mare didn't git out o' the pastur' 'cause I'd got business that called me away sudden, 'n' then I was ready to go.

I didn't put on my disguise till I got on the afternoon train to go to Serrycuse. They was consid'able many women aboard with white ribbins on like Hepsy's, 'n' I made up my mind to foller 'em, 'n' find out where the meetin' was to be. I done so, 'n' found out the place—one o' the biggest meetin' houses in the hull town—'n' then I went to a hotel 'n' registered as Samuel Ellis from Smithville Switch.

In the evenin' I took gran'f'r's cane 'n' hobbled over to the meetin'-house, 'n' sot down back by the door. Purty soon in come Hepsy with a big crowd o' women 'n' went up in front. They was good-lookin' women, most of 'em, but to my eyes Hepsy was the best lookin' of 'em all. Mebby I'm partial to Hepsy—guess I be.

Wal, a woman-lecturer lectured that night, 'n' I'm bound to confess I never heerd nothin' like it in my life. There I sot with my red bandanner a-wipin' away the tears from behind my green goggles 'n' sayin' "amen" more'n once. Sech arguments! sech good, sound reasonin'! sech pathetick stories—I never heerd patheticker! I was dumbfounded. I hadn't never seen a woman like her! It was wonderful how convincin' she did talk. I found out afterwards that it was Miss Willard, 'n' I vow I don't wonder Hepsy's in earnest 'bout this temp-'rance business, with such a leader as that woman!

Next mornin' I was on hand early. I wan't a-goin' to miss none o' the doin's. They was quite a lot o' other men for which I was thankful. Mostly ministers, I guess. Mebby they thought I was a superannuated one myself. 'Tany rate, Hepsy didn't know me though she see me herself. She jest glanced at me as she went by, but I was foolin' with my bandanner around my blue goggles an' bent over like an old man, which to tell the truth, I ain't.

They called on Hepsy for the openin' prayer, 'n' Hepsy prayed. Good land! what a eloquent prayer that was! I never heerd one in class-meetin' like it, not even in old Uncle Peter White's day, 'n' he was a master hand at prayin'. I begun to feel proud o' Hepsy. Then there was business, 'n' receivin,' 'n' readin,' 'n' answerin' telegrams, 'n' so forth, 'n' then they was a question-box, 'n' all sorts o' things that I'll own was reely interestin'. Hepsy was active 'nough, but as lady-like as anybody need to be.

In the afternoon amongst others, Hepsy made a speech. Hepsy—my wife—the companion of my bosom in the pulpit of the meetin' house! The cold sweat come out on my brow when I see her go up the steps 'n' lay her handkercher on the pulpit desk. "Good land 'o Goshen!" I thought, "why was I let to live to see this day!"

But the cold sweat evaporated in a hurry when I begun to warm up under Hepsy's solid common sense 'n' earnestness. I declare for't it seemed jest as if she was dischargin' her volley full at me settin' there in disguise on the back seat. I see some o' the men kind o' wince when she p'inted out some o' the failin's and inconsistencies o' Christians in regard to the temp'rance cause. Mebby I done a little wincin' myself, for I've ben a perfesser for more'n thirty year. I wonder if Hepsy took me for her text? I 'spose I'll never know. But I felt proud o' Hepsy. I jest wanted to raise right up, put in my false teeth, take off my goggles, wave gran'f'r's cane an' holler, "That's my wife, gentlemen, that's Hepsy up there, a-layin' down the law to us in that convincin' way!" But I didn't. Good land—what if I had! Why, I wouldn't have Hepsy know I was to that convention, for the world!

Next day I come home 'n' wound the clock, 'n' et up what vittals I could so's Hepsy wouldn't suspect nothin'—'n' druv to the depot to meet her when she come from Serrycuse. I declare for't, she looked a good ten year younger, 'n' was han'somer than ever.

"Wal, Hepsy," says I, innocent as a lamb, "what fer time did you have to the convention?"

"O, Adoniram," says she, " 'twas jest splendid! O, I do feel so roused up sence I heerd Miss Willard speak," says she—" 'n' I'm a-goin' to put my shoulder to the wheel 'n' help more'n ever!"

"Did you make a speech, Hepsy?" says I, innocenter than ever.

"Yes, I did, Adoniram," says she—"the Lord put some words into my mouth, 'n' I said 'em!" says she. " 'Twan't much of a speech—nothin' to speak of, mebby, but like's not it done a little mite o' good to somebody."

"Like enough it did, Hepsy," says I—"I wouldn't be a mite surprised if it did."

She looked kind o' 'stonished at that, but I only said 'giddap' to the mare 'n' held my peace. An' I guess I'll continue to hold it, for as I said before, I wouldn't have Hepsy know about my bein' to that convention for the world.

SOME HEATHEN TESTIMONY CONCERNING INTEMPERANCE.

BY REV. GEORGE H. SMITH.

Living as we do in an age of characteristic progress, we are slow to recognize that any good act or sentiment can proceed from remote and heathen nations. Very much are we like the Greeks of old, self-opinionated and self-satisfied, who called all others but themselves, barbarians, although many of these so-called barbaric peoples could have taught the proud Greek lessons in art, morals and culture. It was only a characteristic prayer of the man who said: "I thank God I was born a man and not a brute, a Greek and not a barbarian," as if "brute" and "barbarian" were synonomous terms; so are we astonished sometimes to hear of morals and manners from any age but our own. What a surprise of late years to realize that heathen China had known the use of steam ages before George Stephenson was born; that the art of printing was practiced in that country centuries before Guttenburg or Faust discovered it to us, and that years ago the Chinese had established astronomical facts new to a Galileo or a Newton.

The modern theory of temperance and the principle of prohibition was taught and even legislated upon long before the dawn of Christianity. Anacharsis, the Scythian, said: "Wine bringeth forth three grapes, the first of pleasure, the second of drunkenness, and the third of sorrow." Demosthenes, the renowned Greek orator, declared that: "To drink well is a property meet for a sponge, but not for a man." Seneca, the Roman moralist and philosopher, who lived about the time of Christ, taught that to suppose it possible for a man to take much wine and retain a right frame of mind is as bad as to argue that he may take poison and not die, or the juice of the poppy and not sleep. Pliny, the younger, who lived during the apostolic period, and who bore such powerful testimony for Christianity, though unintentionally, in his letters to the Emperor Trajan, tells of King Antiochus, who forced his minions to drink wine, and they killed him. From this he draws the lesson that if we tempt others into error, the consequences will fall upon ourselves. This tenet is paralleled by that teaching of Socrates in his last defense when accused of corrupting the Athenian youth.

It was the custom in early times for the cup-bearer, before presenting wine to the king and in the royal presence, first to pour a few drops of wine into the left hand and drink it in attestation of the fact that no poison had been put in the drink. History tells of young Cyrus, the cup-bearer of his grandfather, King Astyages, who upon one occasion approached the royal personage; his athletic form pleased the king as Cyrus presented the golden cup poised on three fingers as he well knew how. The king commended the act, "but," said he, "you have forgotten to taste the wine yourself." "No," replied Cyrus, "it was not through forgetfulness that I omitted that ceremony." "Why, then," said Astyages, "for what reason did you not do it?" "Because I apprehended there was poison in the liquor." "Poison, child! how could you think so?" "Yes, poison, father, for not long ago at an entertainment you gave to the lords of your court, after the guests had drank a little of that liquor, I perceived all their heads were turned; they sang, made a noise, and talked, they did not know what; you, yourself seemed to have forgotten that you were king, and they, that they were subjects; and when you would have danced, you could not stand upon your legs." "Why," said Astyages, "have you never seen the same thing happen to your father?" "No, never," said Cyrus. "What, then? How is it with him when he drinks?" "Why, when he has drunk his thirst is quenched, and that is all."

Lycurgus, the Spartan law-giver, who did so much to make the Spartans stalwart men and brave and daring soldiers, strictly prohibited the use of strong drink, and drunkenness was unknown to that nation. So with the early Romans and Britons, when wine was taken at all it was greatly reduced by water; and where have we a record of a healthier, or sturdier race than our early ancestors? Augustine, that wild and vicious young pagan, who was converted to Christianity through the prayers of a pious mother, and who afterwards became Bishop of Hippo, and one of the soundest theologians of the early church, speaking of wine, says: "It is the mother of all mischief, the root of all crimes, the spring of vices, the whirlwind of the brain, the overthrow of the sense, the tempest of the tongue, the ruin of the body, the wreck of chastity, a loss of time, the stain of honesty and the plague and corruption of the soul." As early as 959 A. D., when but a nominal Christianity was feebly felt in England, King Edgar ordered a row of pins to be attached to the mouth of the drinking cup, that only the merest quantity of wine might be taken at one draught.

And yet when we look back into the darkness of paganism to be confronted by such witnesses should we not cry, "Shame! thrice shame upon us," who boast of our modern culture and civilization and at the same time tolerate the manufacture and sale of strong drink. How can we attempt to convert the heathen in obedience to Christ's command? "Preach the gospel to every creature," and in the face of such gross inconsistencies at home? The Chinese government, perceiving the terrible result of the opium habit, took measures to prohibit the importation of that drug. English merchants who were reaping immense gain from this pernicious traffic persisted even at the cost of the souls and bodies of their fellow-men. England waged war with China, and in 1842 the Chinese were defeated and forced to open their markets to the opium trade. And yet England is a professedly Christian nation. As long as the English language lasts, as long as history has an utterance, there will be a stain on the escutcheon of England which no words can obliterate, no time efface. The greatest hindrances to the Christian missions of to-day are the inconsistencies of professedly Christian people. Traders in the Northwest territories have told us that so long as an Indian cannot speak English you may place in him the most implicit trust, but as soon as he has come in contact with civilized people and learned the English language, he has learned also the vices and deceits of those people. It was the inconsistencies of professedly Christian people that caused the death of the heroic and zealous Bishop Pattison. As he was nearing the savage shores in an open boat, the poisoned dart accomplished its deadly work, and Bishop Pattison died, a martyr of the nineteenth century. On being asked the cause, the savages replied that they had mistaken his ship for a slaving ship, and seeing that he was a white man, they had mistaken him for a slave dealer, but when told of the noble mission he had purposed, of preaching a gospel of peace and love, they expressed the greatest sorrow.

Let us be consistent. If we preach a gospel of love, let us love. If we preach temperance, let us be temperate. And if we preach truth, let us be truthful.

"Thou must be true thyself
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
Another's soul wouldst reach;
It needs the overflow of soul
To give the lips full speech."

THE IDEAL CHURCH.

BY W. HOWATT GARDNER.

It is the church that seeks to apply the principles of Christian truth to the practical questions of the day, that our political, industrial, social and spiritual life may be elevated. There is considerable of the belief that the church life should be carefully kept from contact with politics, or any of the great movements in the direction of temperance, labor and social reform, lest it should become smirched thereby. This comes through the prevalent idea that the work of the church, and even of Christianity, must be carried on in an individual line, and if wrong institutions are changed, it must be by an indirect, passive attitude, rather than by an aggressive, direct attack. How unlike is this to the example of the Lord Jesus who was crucified, not so much because He taught certain truths, as that He opposed the wrong institutions of His day. He proposed a change to the people of that time, and they did not like it.

This one-sided idea of the work of the church has come through the pressure upon the "rank and file" exerted by ecclesiastical opinions, decrees, councils. What this class has held during former centuries regarding the proper attitude of the church has to a great degree been jealously guarded and rigidly maintained. But, however, the church exists for humanity, and not for the perpetuation of the decrees of ecclesiasticism. As an organization the church has been solely intent upon the reclamation of the individual, the subjective side of gospel work providing, as it were, a sort of golden ladder for him, by which to climb into heaven, regardless of institutions, the heritage of pagan days, which are constantly modifying, and tending to counteract the inward, spiritual life of the individual.

In view of the great truth which is rapidly forcing itself upon the minds and hearts of humanity, "the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man," the church is beginning to consider the long neglected objective side of gospel work. Sociology is being placed beside theology. The relation of men to men, that "we are members one of another," is to be more practically regarded, as well as the relation of the individual to God. In this transitional period, men outside, as well as in the church, are beginning to see the absurdity of settling moral questions according to the pagan rule that "might makes right." In the proposed substitution of arbitration for war, it is seen how silly it is to attempt to adjust national rights by blowing out one another's brains. An effort is being made to establish the relations of the human family upon an ethical basis instead of upon the barbarous idea of physical superiority.

The ideal church, while pursuing its primary work of changing the individual heart, and building character, will recognize the trend of civilization, and will also seek to change the institutions which repress and oppress man in the highest development of his individuality. It will be foremost in every humanitarian movement, by embracing them all in the line of Christian work. It would be absurd to tell the house-wife, who has become sick because of neglect to keep her sink-drain clean, that her essential need is a change of heart. The practical thing to do is obvious. Henceforth, she should have a care that the sink-drain does not become a breeder of disease. So, in this great house in which humanity lives, political, social and industrial sink-drains need renovating; corruption must be removed in order to make this earth a healthful habitation. The churches of New York City are, therefore, to be commended, not condemned, for their determination to enter the field of politics and rid the city of corruption.

Has the church, as a united organization, nothing to say concerning the liquor, social purity, and labor questions? Will it not say whether the license principle is right or wrong? One denomination, the largest, has in strongest terms denounced the traffic, but where are the others? Will the church not further say whether the brothel has a right to exist as a necessity to civilization, or whether it is right to "oppress the hireling in his wages"? The church teaches as a cardinal fact that humanity is exceedingly precious. If so, can it refrain from calling loudly for the prohibition of a traffic that is destroying so many members of humanity? Can it then shut its eyes to the degradation of the brothel, or look squarely at it, and yet fail to denounce it? Can it ignore the cry of the laborer for his right to the product of his labor? Can it aid in keeping woman from her rightful place as co-equal with man, and participator in human privileges? No. The ideal church will be the friend of every oppressed class, practically perpetuating the work of our Master, who came "to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised."

The individual Christian, if he thoroughly believes that humanity is so precious as to require the sacrifice of the Son of God, to be consistent, must employ every means, prayer, influence, money, and the ballot to save his fellowmen. The Christian sentiment of this land is sufficient to do this, if true to the spirit of Christ, and organized as an objective social factor working in and through humanity for its elevation. The nearest approach to the ideal church, though not a church organization, is the W. C. T. U. Its departments of humanitarian work are varied and far reaching, yet it is in no wise partisan, sectarian, or bound by any spirit of ecclesiasticism, but is influenced by Christian motives and a love for humanity. But this is a woman's organization! With some people to say this is to condemn it. No good thing can come out of Nazareth, of course. Yet, is it not true that woman, who has been so long remanded to silence, and taught that her "proper sphere" is to passively acquiesce in all that man may dictate, and even to call him lord, because Sarah thus addressed Abraham—is it not true that she has some truth to bring before this age, which is her age? To show to us the proper scope of Christian work? One great denomination of the Christian church will soon express itself on the right of woman to participate equally with man in religious privileges and work, or, if not equally, approximately. Reference is made to the M. E. Church in regard to its proposed settlement of the question of the admission of women delegates to the General Conference. That woman has the right to such participation is a self-evident truth, if we admit that every human being has the right to exercise and develop to the fullest every God-given faculty, and to enter any line of work for which there is ability. These premises are rational, and Christian, for Christ spoke nothing that would repress the development and exercise of the faculties of any human being. Yet already the ecclesiastical press is issuing its periodical number of articles, based on a few misunderstood passages relating to the conditions of civilization eighteen hundred years ago, with the purpose of showing that woman is not eligible to any higher privileges in the nineteenth century than her sisters of the first century were forced to, or at least any higher than men deem it fitting and wise to give to her. This is the trend of the argument.

"It was involved in the divine idea," says a noted church historian, that the new kingdom should not extirpate, but ennoble the normal activities of human nature." This, indeed, portrays what Christianity is doing for humanity, but not necessarily ecclesiasticism which often acts as a clog to the wheels of progress. Christianity runs far ahead of "Churchianity," and by its predominance, the right and duty of woman, as well as other reforms prominent in the land, will be reached notwithstanding the opposition, or indifference, of ecclesiastical systems.

The times demand that the pulpit deal less in "glittering generalities" and more in particulars; that every preacher plant himself squarely on the side of right and justice, and against wrong and oppression; that the church battle against the evil in our institutions and customs, as well as against original sin; that it expose and brand the Pilates of the nineteenth century, as well as the Pilate of the first; that it seek to protect the homes of our land above all things, by calling for legislation in their interest, instead of allowing it all to be in the interest of corporations. The great truth of the "Progressive Perfectibility of the Race" is becoming more and more apparent. In the order of human development, the liquor traffic will be abolished, woman enthroned as co-equal with man, arbitration substituted for war, labor accorded the product of its toil, and even the earth will have removed from it the blight placed upon it by sin, and "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree: the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them: and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as a rose; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree."

SHOULD WOMEN SPEAK IN MIXED PUBLIC ASSEMBLIES?

BY REV. GEO. P. HAYS, D. D.

Under the above title the Baptist Book Concern, of Louisville, Ky., publish a tract written by Dr. John A. Broadus, D. D., LL.D., of the Baptist Theological Seminary, in Louisville. It is presumably as good an argument as can be made against women addressing public assemblies. The author, Dr. Broadus, is a well-known scholar of decided ability, and enjoys the reputation of being a very liberal Baptist minister. Those who desire to see his side of the question re-stated will do well to purchase the tract. Those who read this, and the tract published by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association on "May Women Speak?" will have both sides of the question fairly before them.

Remembering Dr. Broadus' reputation for a charitable spirit, one would scarcely expect to find him endeavoring to prejudice his Baptist readers by pleading that the habit of allowing women to speak in public belongs to disbelievers in the inspiration of the Bible, such as Universalists, Quakers and the Methodists of the Northwest (page 13). Elsewhere (page 15) he appeals to prejudice by attacking those who believe in infant baptism, and invokes the discussion of the controversies between Calvinism and Armenianism. Surely such questions have no bearing on the particular topic in hand, and even partisans must be hard pressed when resort is had to such arguments.

The tract, however, omits some points heretofore presented by those taking his side of the question, and their absence is quite noticeable. Being a scholar, Dr. Broadus is compelled to abandon every assertion that the women of Corinth and elsewhere in Greece were not exceptionally and conspicuously bad. It is noticeable, also, that he makes no effort to show that under the former dispensation women did not take active part. I was disappointed, also, in finding that it did not undertake to show why the regulation with reference to women speaking was different from the regulation with reference to washing the feet and kissing as a method of salutation. On the last page, his courage of consistency seems to recover itself, when he intimates that the habit of women teaching mature Bible classes ought hereafter, in Baptist churches, to be discontinued.

The only point in his tract which seems to need reply, is his effort to evade the arguments about "prophesying" in the New Testament by maintaining that "prophesy" in the New Testament refers exclusively to divinely inspired utterances. He concedes that I Corinthians, 11:5, authorizes women to "prophesy"; but that they were only to speak when they were divinely inspired. It would seem difficult to maintain this interpretation of that word "prophesy." How would the people learn to prophesy if they were to be divinely inspired? And what would be the meaning of the "sons of the Prophets"? (See II Kings 2:3, 5, 15, 16; 4:1; 9:1.) These have always been supposed to be disciples or pupils, but were they learning to be inspired? It is precisely this same interpretation of prophesying that led to the disorders mentioned in the church of Corinth. If they were inspired by divine power, how could the "spirit of the prophets be subject to the prophets"? The spirit of Balaam was not subject to Balaam, nor that of Jonah to Jonah. Jonah objected to saving Nineveh.

But conceding that New Testament "prophecy" is this speaking under immediate divine inspiration, we at once meet another difficulty. It is admitted that in New Testament times women so prophesied, and that special directions were given to instruct them as to proper behavior. Was the proper behavior which they were exhorted to maintain when thus inspired a sin when they were not thus inspired? Prophecy, under divine inspiration, is a higher office under God than to speak without such special message. Did God then direct women by His divine spirit to do that which was a crime otherwise? Would He send them forth under His immediate divine inspiration so to behave as would be a crime under any other circumstance? That is precisely the defense made by the Mohammedans and the Mormons for the crimes they commit. They plead that they act under divine inspiration. Moreover, this application of I Cor. 11:5, is distinctively negatived by the connection in which the word prophesy occurs. It there occurs in connection with praying. Will it be argued that praying is only to be performed when under divine inspiration? The instructions for modest demeanor apply to both. This shows that the direction was a universal one, and not limited merely to the duty of prophesying.

The author indicates that the grounding of the Apostle's argument on the subsequent creation of woman, and her tempting of man in the fall, is conclusive that she ought not to "teach man." She may teach her own sex, but she must not teach the men. If the author has here proved his point, he has not only proved that, but far more than that point. In modern times more "teaching" is done from the printing press than by the platform. If a woman may not speak to instruct where men are present, surely she may not print and publish where men are liable to read. A very considerable portion of the excellent Sunday-School Helps of the Baptist Church are prepared by a woman. We shall now expect to see the Baptist Church make an arrangement by which those Lesson Helps may be so published that no man may have access to them to read them.

MISS WILLARD IN NEBRASKA.

DEAR EDITOR:—Among all the states in which Anna Gordon and I have been campaigning for constitutional prohibition, none has revealed a more complex situation than Nebraska. Friends are here where one might not have looked for them and the foes are oftentimes of one's own household. For instance: In a German home a noble young man said to us: "I am amazed by the apathy of the Americans. Here I have come to this new land where the Christian people have always been leaders of reform; where Anglo-Saxons, mellowed by the gospel, are working out on the great blackboard of this continent, the problems of free government and human happiness. But are we who come here seeking a better country, to have the sorrow of beholding this country Europeanized? I tell you the Germans mean to rule; American men are in such a scramble after the almighty dollar that they do not even notice this and they are so afraid of losing custom that they, would not antagonize if they did. But these same men are for prohibition away down in their hearts, and but for business would be staunch and true. It is my deliberate conviction that American women must save this country from the saloon if it is saved at all. The men are willing to let them do it, and that's a great comfort. Otherwise we are to see Europe triumph once more with its outworn social theories, and strong drink drown the rising civilization that some of us Germans had sought with so much hope."

Not after this fashion spoke a Lutheran minister who was reported to me. He does not think so highly of the W. C. T. U. This was his comment on the woman question: "Look at Africa; there the female is at the foot; look at Europe; there she is in her proper place of subjection; look at America—here in this hot-bed of isms you have inverted nature's order and your woman question is at the top of everything, an excrescence and a laughing stock."

The liquor men have better hopes here, because of the large foreign element, but the German Methodists are solidly with us, and the Scandinavians have tent workers in the field for prohibition. It is the Lutherans who solidly oppose. Who had ever supposed that the great name of the reformer would be applied to a movement for the dethronement of the Bible from our public schools, and the enthronement of the beer mug in our homes! At Creighton we found that a saloon-keeper had been made president of the county fair whereupon the W. C. T. U. declined to exhibit or attend, and I was glad to learn that a majority of the church people took a similar position.

The liquor forces have formed a so-called "League of Bankers and Business Men" which has terrorized Americans in the towns largely inhabited by Germans. But in spite of this, sixty-four per cent of the bankers of Nebraska have come out openly for prohibition. One thousand business men have put their names to a petition against prohibition, and three thousand to one in its favor.

J. A. Buckstaff, one of the heaviest contractors in Lincoln, stated to a correspondent of the Amendment News Bureau, that his pay roll amounted to about $30,000 a month. "I pay by checks every week," said Mr. Buckstaff, "and from thirty to forty per cent of the checks come back to me every month having been deposited by saloon-keepers in the various banks." This is a declaration worth passing along. The fact is that the business man who thinks saloons help him to make money is about as wise in his generation as the man who sat on the branch of a tree and sawed it off between himself and the trunk.

An editor named Rosewater—of all names the most uproariously misplaced—and whose paper, the Omaha Bee is the chief Republican organ of the state, has associated with himself a Mr. Webster (who is an Omaha lawyer), and the two go about in a so-called "debate," in which good ex-Governor Larrabee, of Iowa, and Attorney-General Bradford of Kansas, take the other side. Then the liquor champions make the pyramid of temperance to stand upon its apex and spin like a top, as the whole issue is removed from the plane of ethics to one of dollars and cents. They show by "figgers" (equal to Artemus Ward's great show of "moral wax-works") that Kansas towns are not "on a boom," and they skip mentioning Kansas City just across the river, beer-bloated and whisky-wallowing which, notwithstanding its great alcoholic advantages, is minus a boom these days at a most dreadful rate. They say that "prohibition don't prohibit," and yet point to the Germans leaving Kansas in droves because they can get no beer; they hold up Omaha—a city that fairly rivals Chicago in wickedness—as the Arcadia of civilization with its high license paying all the school expenses, and try by every sort of verbal necromancy to get the people's eyes off the moral and religious aspects of the question. As I heard a Republican anti-amendment man say, "The temperance folks go in for 'God and humanity,' but Rosewater, he gives us the facts!" There lies in a nutshell the fallacy that is blinding the business men of Nebraska. "God and Humanity" become of small account when fancied business interests or political preferment stand in the way; high license thus blinds men to the everlasting fact that in the long run God and Humanity always come out ahead, and the Devil, with his running mate, the dollar, fetch up the rear. I was never in my life more impressed than by this utterance, with the truth that only on the firm, broad basis of Christ and brotherhood can the pyramid of temperance be surely built.

One significant peculiarity of these debates is that they are a Republican family difficulty, the four men being all of that political faith. There is great ill-nature in some quarters because the Prohibition (would it were called the Reform) party, put a ticket in the field. But the Republican Convention was "whist as a mouse" on the constitutional amendment issue, and "our folks" felt that some party must speak out. At the debate in Grand Island, September 19, Hon. S. B. Bradford, ex-Attorney General of Kansas, closed with these words: "The only salvation of the Republican party lies in its adoption of prohibition. The Republican party, in national convention assembled in 1892, will declare unequivocally in favor of prohibition, or failing to do so, will write its own death warrant." Alas! the party faces both ways, as the debate illustrates, and this will prove its ruin.

That was a touching little episode at Central City where white-ribboners' and children of the Loyal Temperance Legion gathered on the platform of the railway station to wave their welcome, hand us pretty posies and sing, "God be with you till we meet again." As I read the card on my bouquet, these words deeply touched my heart: "From a mother to a friend of boys." Our audiences are full of mothers with their little ones, and as we go out when the meeting is over some sweet-faced woman will point to the baby asleep upon her arm and gently whisper, looking down into the dear little face, "We named baby for you." The pathos of these women, working so hard but held back from the authoritative expression of opinion; so eager to help but weaponless; praying for the protection of the homes for which they have given "the last full measure of devotion," yet powerless to work out their salvation, is something that can but give to any who perceive the situation, "thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears." Yet in the churches good men who pray for everything besides forget to pray for temperance, and nice, homelike husbands and fathers smile at "the enthusiasm of the women" and freely own that they dare not vote for the amendment. But the Irish expressman who carried our trunks in one of these towns, when Anna asked how he should vote said, "For prohibition, Miss, and I think y're goin' to carry it."

The audiences are immense, patient and liberal in the "vote by dimes" (our services being gratuitous in this campaign, I generally ask for the collection, calling it "a vote.") The general opinion is one of good cheer, the farmers are almost solidly with us, but Omaha with its beer, its padded census and its recent declination to admit any Prohibitionists at the registry, looms like a cloud of bellowing buffaloes on the banks of the "Big Muddy."

The president of the W. C. T. U. at Grand Island made a good point that I wish our locals would notice. She said, "Some say the W. C. T. U. is not doing much in this headquarters of beer, but I would remind them that no fort is thought to have surrendered so long as its colors are flying, and ours were never brighter. Don't stand off and criticise, but come and help us."

I have just been out visiting the wonderful machinery by which beets are made into sugar here—six hundred thousand dollars invested and mechanical and chemical power utilized to the utmost. I could but think as the ungainly beets are washed, bruised, pulverized, chemicalized, sifted and shaken up until they emerge in as fine white sugar as was ever seen, so God deals with our souls; He is after their best; He would have us yield up all our sweetness, and His intricate machinery of life is all to this purpose and end.

No mortal can tell how this great fight will go, but white-ribbon women of Nebraska, whether you win or not you will deserve success, and that is, after all, the main point.

I tell the voters that if we fail we shall not know it, but shall begin right over again next day. Paul Jones, when the British ships had riddled his own with bullets, and his leg was shot away, heard the British captain calling, "Are you not now ready to surrender?" "No," cried Paul Jones in his cheery bass, "we've only just begun to fight!" This splendid courage of their leader called out the last, decisive ounce of power in his men, and fifteen minutes later the red, white and blue floated at the mast-head of the enemy's ships, and the plucky young Yankee had won.

Yours for courage born of God,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

En route on railroad train, Sept. 28.

THIRD INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS AGAINST THE ABUSE OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Without any doubt this is one of a series of most important meetings. Two hundred and six names were entered as delegates, beforehand, but many of these failed to appear. The countries represented were, America, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, England, Finland, France, Germany, Holland, Norway, Russia, Switzerland and Sweden. The United States were represented by Prof. Wilhelm Petterson, of Augsburg Seminary, Minneapolis, and Mr. James Henry Kellogg, of Rochester, N. Y. The latter was not present, or if he was, he was a silent member of the Congress. Thus the representative of the W. C. T. U. was the only native born American present. Professor Petterson was, however, an excellent exponent of our sentiments. Mrs. Selmer, of Copenhagen, and I were the only ladies on the the program, but the Countess Ida Wedel-Jarlsberg, Miss Welhanen, Mrs. Andersson-Meijerhelm and Miss Dixon also took part in the discussions.

All arrangements were excellent. One large room served as bureau or office, a second as book room and for the display of temperance drinks. English books, charts, pictures, etc., were there in large display, while we had only catalogues, our newspapers, a few leaflets and tracts. All the tracts were taken, most of the catalogues, and about sixty of each of the papers.

The sessions of the Congress were attended by members only; I should have been very glad to have seen the gallery filled by students of the University within whose walls we met. The auditorium is semi-circular and arranged like an amphitheater, has a high, narrow pulpit on the straight side, several high windows above the gallery, heavily draped by handsome red curtains. This hall was beautifully decorated with growing shrubs and plants, including many from the tropics. It may not be out of the way to say here, that I saw our Indian corn in Christiania growing in foliage clumps in gardens and on lawns, and most effectively. A large, handsome leather-covered table stood in front of the pulpit. The central chair was occupied by the president, at his right sat Miss Gray, at his left, Dr. Bentzen, the circle being completed by about eight or ten reporters, among whom Mrs. Selmer and Miss Trygg had places. To Dr. Bentzen and Miss Gray belong chiefly the credit of the excellent arrangements.

All the proceedings were in German, consequently I could not understand unless I asked some lady near me for a translation. I did, however, learn that Dr. Ford, a staunch, but recent, convert to prohibition, is doubtful if it continues in the United States, and that another gentleman reading in the German, though I think French his native tongue, had some very curious "statistics," showing that prohibition has wrought much harm in Maine and Vermont. I tried to make the points clear.

At the close of the first session a member said to me, "This ought to be called, 'A Congress to devise means to continue the use of alcoholic drinks.'" The remark was just at that moment, but afterwards from English and Americans, Dr. Ford and others, strong, fundamental utterances upon total abstinence and prohibition were made, and always warmly applauded, much more so than others. At one time Mr. Gustafson said, "I am willing to speak in a Congress bearing the title this does, but I must define one word for myself. It is an abuse of alcohol whenever it is taken into the human system." Mr. Gustafson told me that when this journey is completed, he returns to America to live, to work and to die there. The more I study temperance affairs all over the world, the more I am convinced that the greatest help we can give the nations upon this question, not all the help by any means, is to concentrate effort and carry prohibition in our own country so as to afford a great object lesson to all others.

But the sessions of the Congress went on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday morning, embracing about forty speeches and papers, covering many phases of work in many countries. I gave two addresses upon "Drink and the Native Races," and "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union." In one discussion I refuted the errors about prohibition that had been brought forward, and in another told them about our educational work in its threefold aspect, social, intellectual and religious, grouping under these heads Kindergartens, Kitchengardens, Bands of Hope, Common Schools, Higher Schools and Colleges, Sunday Schools and Sermons as direct education, and Young Crusader, illuminated cards, books, etc., and instructed parents, as indirect.

I heard some sharp criticism upon the rule that forbids passing resolutions, or making a final utterance, or indeed voting at all. Before the Congress I thought this a great mistake, now I think it wise. With this arrangement people come and listen, who would not be seen again, were such measures taken, and as all are absolutely free to express their utmost thought, these persons hear all; and at every Congress influential persons are converted. I hope more of our leading gentlemen and ladies will be present at the next Congress, to be held in 1892, probably in Holland. It is invited to Amsterdam, but if it can be received in a German city, it is thought more good will be done.

I am not discouraged about the final triumph of the temperance cause on the continent of Europe, but I have been grieved to find that much that has been supposed to be total abstinence is not quite that. The Good Templars in Denmark take the Danish weak beer, which, though weak, has enough alcohol in it to awaken an old appetite, and to form one. Many of the leaders are total abstainers, and among them Dr. and Mrs. Selmer. It is expected the question may come up in Grand Lodge in Scotland next year, and if the Danish Good Templars are forbidden to drink the weak beer, it is supposed three-quarters of them will leave the order.

The Blue Cross Society started some twelve or thirteen years ago in Switzerland, and which has several thousand adherents in several countries, exacts total abstinence of all its members, declares in its constitution that it is not necessary for all to become total abstainers; also that they are not trying to hinder the manufacture and sale of pure wine and beer. Almost everybody believes the reform necessary for the lower classes only, and pass it by with quiet contempt. There are a few however, earnest, brave, and consecrated souls who are on the full, broad platform upon which we stand, and since they and we are in the right we must succeed, but the end will be farther off than I thought before these few months here on the continent. WOMEN IN THE GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Mrs. La Fetra, the popular president of the District of Columbia's W. C. T. U., is enthusiastic on more subjects than temperance. Just at present her interest is greatest in the question which comes up before the Methodist church this fall, of the admission of women, by popular vote, to the General Conference. Her enthusiasm in the subject brought about a most delightful, as well as unique entertainment the other evening in the parlors of her pleasant hotel, The Fredonia. There were present, by card invitation, representative Methodists from each of the churches of Washington.

The following program shows the character of this rare entertainment: Discussion, "Shall Women be Admitted to the General Conference?" Affirmative, Rev. Dr. Henry Baker, pastor Twelfth Street Methodist Church; Major J. A. Pickler, of South Dakota; Mrs. Mary E. Griffith, National organizer of the Woman's Home Missionary Society; Miss Ruth Marie Sites, Appointee Missionary to China. Negative, Dr. C. H. Stowell, of the Foundry Church; Judge H. B. Moulton, of the Hamlin Church; A. B. Duvall, Esq., of the Metropolitan Church; Mr. F. D. Fletcher, of the Epworth League. Refreshments. Music.

The parlors were filled with bright, intelligent people heartily in sympathy with any progressive move in Methodism; yet constantly on the alert, fearing such moves may detract from the strength of the church. Dr. La Fetra, who is well known to be thoroughly interested in all progressive work, especially the advance of women in the church, presided. The speeches were unusually able and interesting, Mrs. Griffith's being well worth publishing in full. It was historic, beginning with the garden of Eden. "God's ideal home," she said, "was planned in Eden. One man, one woman—co-equal sovereigns there. God blessed them, not Adam alone, but He gave them blessings and dominions. . . . What reform was ever carried to completion without woman's words and work. The abolition movement had its Harriet Beecher Stowe—the temperance its Frances Willard. Back of John Wesley and of Methodism was Barbara Heck, else it might not have reached America.

"It seems to me," she said, "a fact patent to all that God's way is to have the mother principle, the mother love running through all the relations of life. In home and church and state. In Methodism, as in sister churches, the women form the great majority, two-thirds of all the membership. Is there any law of justice which gives minorities the right to rule?"

The hit of the evening, however, was on the negative side of the question. The first two speakers presented the subject in such a ridiculous light as to keep the audience convulsed with laughter. They attempted to argue in all soberness, that women knew too much to go to General Conference; that the men could not afford to divide the honors with them, that the men went to General Conference to have a good time, and finally that the men did not want the women there.

The discussion, together with the refreshments and the social time following, lasted till the wee small hours of the morning.

This meeting has been followed by some happy results, for each of the churches are thoroughly aroused, and already there is planned a public discussion of the question in the Metropolitan church. LOUISE REED STOWELL.

Our Book Table.

In a thoughtful article on "Women as Literary Workers," in the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Edward Bok, the editor, says: "It is an indisputable truth that the best literary work to-day is being done by women, and the most conclusive evidence of this lies in the fact that of the fifteen most successful books published within the past two years, eleven were written by women. And I believe that this percentage, high as it is already, will be still greater at the end of the next two years. To find the reason for this, one need not search very far. It is a trite, but very truthful saying, that women are advancing, and outside the domestic and social circles, this is nowhere so apparent as in literature. For woman is peculiarly adapted for the pen. The life of every woman is in itself a story bright or sad, and with many it is a romance of reality stranger, indeed, than any tale of fiction. She writes, therefore, from experience, from what she sees and feels in her own life and nature. True, all women do not by far possess this gift; and it is, perhaps, fortunate for us men that this is so. Women, therefore, I believe, have a natural advantage over men, as authors." He proves his faith in woman by having so large a proportion of women writers on the HOME JOURNAL, whose phenomenal success is the wonder of journalism.

The CHAUTAUQUAN for October contains in full the address of Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer delivered at Chautauqua on recognition day.

Among periodicals coming for the first time to our desk, is To-DAY, published by J. Morrison Fuller, 3 Beacon street, Boston. Its principal work seems to be promulgating the principles of Herbert Spencer, and combating the Nationalist idea. It carries a free lance, and slashes into friend and foe alike. In speaking of the article in Wyoming's Declaration of Rights, which forbids the employment of any boy under fourteen and any girl or woman, in coal, iron or other dangerous mines, it says: "It would be difficult to exaggerate the stupidity of the writers and signers of this document"; then for a page or two expresses its astonishment at the curtailment of "personal rights." It then goes on to show that this "absurdity," as well as laws restraining gambling, prostitution and Sabbath-breaking are the result of woman's ballot, and closes in this fashion:

"This being the state of the case, the presumption is that women are themselves the authors of the restrictions on their liberty in the new constitution. Persons so careless of their own rights and liberty will not make good custodians of the rights and liberties of others. The case of these Wyoming women takes much of the wind out of the sails of the woman suffrage movement. No sooner have they a chance than they impose those very restrictions on their own liberty which men have been so justly abused for imposing in the past. The concurrence of the women is far from justifying the imposition; but it takes the edge off many of the criticisms of the action of the men of past generations."

Such being its principles, this journal should have been named YESTERDAY, rather than To-DAY, for it certainly is behind the times.

THE CANADIAN METHODIST QUARTERLY, of Toronto, Ontario, also comes to us for the first time. It contains ten able, thoughtful papers. From one of them, "The Power of Cultured Minds," by Rev. J. S. Ross, we give this quotation:

"Philosophy, though it bakes no bread, is yet the balm of earth. It saves this world from becoming a gigantic workshop; it rescues man from the groveling grasp of the almighty dollar, and saves mankind from becoming mere beasts of burden. As knowledge is power, an increase of knowledge consequently means an increase of power. A little knowledge gives the Indian his paddle, but more knowledge gives the white man his steamboat; a little knowledge gives the navvy his pickaxe, but an increase gives the machinist his steam-drill. Thus the calculations of the mathematician, the researches of the physiologist, the discoveries of the chemist, all tend to alleviate the ills of life and advance the onward march of civilization. The university educates masses to whom it gives no diploma, and what strikes a blow at the university would in course of time blow up the school-house, and doom us all to semi-barbarism."

DEMOREST'S FAMILY MAGAZINE, New York, continues its Washington sketches by an illustrated paper on "The Residence of Senator Hearst, of California." Mrs. Burlingame, of Rhode Island, represents the W. C. T. U. in the portrait gallery.

The October COSMOPOLITAN is distinguished by its large number of illustrations; one for nearly every page. These include portraits of Secretaries Blaine, Windom and Proctor in their offices, with views in the National treasury, views illustrating Miss Bisland's flying trip round the world; glimpses of Gautamala, and the twin cities of the Northwest, which, we presume, stopped fighting long enough to have their pictures taken.

VICK'S Magazine, Rochester, N. Y., gives good suggestions for winter gardening. A pot of daisies will keep a window bright all winter; it does not mind a nip from Jack Frost, for seemingly it has all seasons for its own and all temperatures; it will flower freely with little sunshine, and the lasting qualities of its blossoms and their long and graceful stems render it one of the best of flowers for cutting. Jasminum grandiflora and the abutilon, or flowering maple, are also highly recommended, as is amaryllis Johnsonii.

THE BIBLE STANDARD and GOSPEL RECORD, Wesleyan Methodist Publishing House, Syracuse, N. Y,, is devoted to missionary intelligence, especially news from Africa, and applied Christianity everywhere.

THE HOME MAGAZINE, Brodix Publishing Company, 705 Eighth street, Washington, D. C., price fifty cents a year, is a continued marvel—how the publishers can afford so much for the money would be beyond comprehension were it not for the advertising pages sandwiched in all through. Two of our contributors, Mrs. Hester M. Poole, of New York, and Margaret Spencer, of Washington, conduct departments in it. Mrs. Poole's is the House Beautiful; in its September number she treats of "My Lady's Chamber." Here are some of the good things she says: "Every woman who has the means to gratify her taste, and possesses ever so little refinement, ought to have a withdrawing room as her own seclusive property. Here she treasures her secret hopes and wishes. Here she examines her compass, and determines whether she is drifting or sailing. Here she brings all that is dearest and most sacred, and gathers strength for those emergencies which, at one time or another, all must meet. Here she reads her favorite volumes and writes her letters, and prepares mementoes for the absent and the loved. Yes! I would have a den of my own—a spot which none could enter without my bidding—if it were no more than an attic closet with only one window, and that looking skyward." The first chapter of Mrs. John A. Logan's "Reminiscences," appears in the October number.

We miss the WOMAN'S CYCLE this month and are sorry to have it merged into the HOME MAKER, even though Jenny June does edit the united journals. The CYCLE had a field distinctively its own, which will be difficult to fill by any other paper.

Among other magazines received are THE HOMILETIC REVIEW from Funk & Wagnalls, New York City. CURRENT COMMENT and LEGAL MISCELLANY, published by the D. B. Canfield Company, Limited, Philadelphia; THE AMERICAN GARDEN, New York and London; HOME, SCHOOL and NATION, edited by Bishop Fallows and Rev. M. L. Williston, published by the Clarenden Publishing Company, 93 Adams street, Chicago. THE JOURNAL OF INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION, Chicago; THE PUBLIC SCHOOL, Bloomington, Ill. THE HOME MAKER, 44 East 14th street, Union Square, New York; THE NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE, Boston, in which every one will read the articles, "Mark Hopkins," "Some Canadian Writers of To-day," and "Moses in Massachusetts," a better "looking backward" than Bellamy's, for it doesn't indorse his tobacco and wine; THE QUERIES MAGAZINE, and the bright bevy of children's magazines which Lothrop sends out each month.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let all friends of the Temple send at once a two cent stamp for a mite-box, Temple bulletin and descriptive card. Address Mrs. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago. All unions and Loyal Temperance Legions that have not yet been supplied with autograph lists to place under the corner-stone should secure them at once, as there are but three weeks left in which to gather in names. Remember November 1st is the day on which the corner-stone is to be laid. Let all superintendents also send to Mrs. Carse, at National Headquarters, 161 La Salle street, any documents pertaining to their department which they would like to have placed in the corner-stone.

We are sorry that our able, eloquent and staunch friend of the W. C. T. U., Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, cannot be among the honored guests at the laying of the corner-stone. He writes: "I very keenly regret I must be in Oregon on a long lecture tour in November, and so can not possibly accept your kind invitation to speak at the laying of the corner-stone of the Temple, November 1. My whole heart is with your enterprise. The building will be a lighthouse for many generations on the coast of a stormy sea, over which no doubt, Christ yet will walk, and to whose waves He can effectively say, 'Peace, be still.' I have written Miss Willard a public letter which you can use on the occasion."

Hon. Thomas W. Palmer, of Detroit, Mich., the president of the Columbian Exposition, has accepted the invitation tendered him to be present and make an address at the laying of the corner-stone. He is an ardent suffragist, and believes that the only sure method to secure prohibition is through woman's ballot. It is therefore eminently fitting that at the laying of the corner-stone of the Temple which means more to women than any building that has ever yet been erected, such a man should stand side by side with our peerless Frances Willard as one of the principal orators on the occasion.

Mr. Palmer is a stockholder in the Temple, and has recently been elected a member of the board of directors.

The following persons have sent $1 each toward the Thompson Memorial during the past week: Mrs. I. C. M. Rogers, Central Village, Conn.; Mrs. C. Throckmorton, Long Branch, N. J.; Miss Louise E. Hollister, Duluth, Minn.; Miss Hattie Murphy, Chicago, Ill. The following unions have each sent $1: Sioux Falls, S. Dakota, W. C. T. U.; the W. C. T. U. of Danby, N. Y.; the Frances E. Willard W. C. T. U. of Helena, Montana; Battle Creek, Michigan, W. C. T. U., and the W. C. T. U. of Lakeport, California, send $2. Little Ethel Stout, of the Midget, Delaware, Ohio, desires that the $5 sent by the Midget go towards a tablet for Mother Stewart in Willard Hall. She writes, "The Midget hopes to raise $100 for a Memorial for Mother Stewart." We trust she may. Mother Stewart richly deserves to have her name engraved in Willard Hall.

The unions are responding bravely to the call for money for the building fund. Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, president of the fifth district of Michigan, who has been successful in raising so much money for the Temple, and who has sent $100, to have a tablet for her district engraved in Willard Hall, now sends another $100 for Allegan county, and pledges $100 for each county in the fifth district. We wish more district presidents would follow this noble example. Mrs. Buckthorpe, Jacksonville, Ill., sends $40 on a pledge of $100 for the union; Delavan, Ill., W. C. T. U. by Mrs. Culver, sends $30 on their $100 pledge; Mrs. M. L. Almouth for the Brookfield, Mo., union, sends $19.12; several payments have already been made on their pledge of $100. Our space now will not allow us to give the names of the three persons in a union who have the largest amount in their mite-boxes at the mite-box social. We hope our friends will excuse us for breaking our promise in regard to this matter, but it is simply impossible, as we have to pass over hundreds of letters each week that we would like to mention but have not the space.

The W. C. T. U. of Union, Maine, sends a second installment of $25, on a pledge of $100. The W. C. T. U. of St. Augustine, Fla., sends $14.75; they are trying, although a very small union, to send $100. Mrs. Rainey writes that they feel they must have the oldest city in the country represented at the dedication. The W. C. T. U. of Dowagiac, Mich., sends $25, with a pledge to make it $100. The Santa Barbara, Cal., W. C. T. U. send $14 more on their pledge of $100. They have sent in all $70; $10 of this was raised by the Loyal Temperance Legion. The London, Ohio, W. C. T. U., send a check for $27.93, their first installment on a pledge of $100. The Uniontown, Pa., W. C. T. U. send $34.24, their first payment on a pledge of $100. This money was the result of their first six months of mite-boxes. The Seattle, Wash., W. C. T. U. send $10, their first payment on a pledge of $100.

How we wish we had room to te.. of the many loving devices the children resort to to raise money for the Temple. Little Gracie English, of Pittsfield, Ill., could not get enough money to put in her mite-box, so she planted some radish seed; when they were ready for market she sold them and sent the proceeds to the Temple fund. Mrs. Chapin, president of the Euclid, Minn., W. C. T. U., tells of two little girls ten years old belonging to the Loyal Temperance Legion, who are raising money for the Temple in the following manner: "They live on the prairie, and gather beautiful wild flowers in abundance and make them into bouquets. They give them to the train men once a week; after they are supplied, they distribute them to the passengers and then pass their mite-boxes around, receiving what persons choose to give." They have kept this up faithfully all summer.

THE BROKEN BOTTLE.

A Kindergarten Prohibition Story.

BY LU SEMANS HADLEY.

In a town of Colorado, famed for Prohibition rule,
Played a group of tiny prattlers, from a kindergarten school.
Dancing in the morning sunshine, blithe as birds upon the wing,
Flitting here and there in gladness, like the harbingers of spring.

Locks of brown and black and golden, floating on the summer breeze,
Fairy forms, with airy footsteps, flitting neath the waving trees.
Voices full of joyous laughter, ringing gaily through the air,
Tell of hearts unknown to sorrow, faces all unmasked by care.

But, what means this sudden stillness! What hath checked their joyous mirth,
Planting there, like tiny statues, forms which seemed too bright for earth?
And whence comes that look of horror, creeping o'er each baby face?
As they stand with hands uplifted, each seems rooted to his place.

As I gazed in silent wonder, viewing anxiously my flock,
Seeking hidden wolf or demon, which hath caused this sudden shock;
Lo! I spied upon the side-walk, that which filled their hearts with fear,
Lying there—a broken bottle—which had once been filled with beer.

Only this—but little Nena entertained my baby band,
With the tale of wondrous horror which is floating o'er our land!
Learned from lips of aged grand-sire, who for Prohibition strives,
Tale of homeless, wretched children; tale of wrecked and ruined lives.

Tenderly I clasp my darlings, as they question, "Is it so?"
Silently I pray the Father, "More than this, ne'er let them know!

A QUEER KIND OF TEMPERANCE.

BY MABEL GIFFORD.

CHAPTER I.

Between the two imposing rows of granite blocks on H—— street, in the city of N——, a stout-bodied little fellow with his hands in his pockets, was striding with a very manly and important air towards the lower part of the city, where he evidently belonged. His clothes were tattered, and he had grown well out of them. His face and feet were weather-browned. The crownless hat suggested a sun-proof pate; the rim tipped at just the approved angle, and a carefully-adjusted necktie, were two hopeful indications of the boy's character—observation and imitation. Besides, he was clean, and the thick, brown hair exposed by the crownless hat was smooth and orderly. A month ago this could not have been said, and the shrewd, blue eyes and over-bold face would have presented a reckless, don't-care assertiveness so painful to behold in these prematurely old and hardened faces of "street Arabs."

A wholesome influence had been at work in this darkened quarter of the city, and like a star in a murky sky, a neat, cheery spot glowed brightly from this darkness, and loving, tender hearts ministered there, caring for the Master's children.

Pepper might be conceited and over-bold, but he had a good-natured mouth, and the shrewd blue eyes were fun-loving.

"Halloa!" There was a sudden halt squarely in front of a tall, bright-faced youth who was thus brought to a stand-still, unless he chose to step off the narrow side-walk of the dark alley-way into the black mud, or over the stout-bodied figure disputing the right of way.

"Oh, yer skin! I know yer! I heerd all 'bout w'at yer said, how I wa'n't no kind uv a temp'rance feller.

"Now jus' look a-here, yer never was so mistook in yer life. I signed th' pledge fair an' square, and look er this," turning back a flapping tatter and showing a bright, new badge, "I'm a Crusader snug an' tight, an' yer jes' bet yer boots I'm a-goin' ter stay one. Now w'at yer got ter say?"

The outraged urchin looked threateningly into the handsome face of the tall youth, whose noble bearing and fine appearance were a marked contrast to the tattered figure beside him.

"Just what I said before," was the calm answer.

For a few seconds the bold, blue eyes stared into the serious gray ones, then the blue eyes waxed wrathful and the brown face turned a dull red. Out of the pockets came two hard fists. "By jimminey!"

Then followed heated, angry words. "I know yer; yer Chaplin Noble, one uv them Hatton College swells. I know th' whole lot uv yer. Yer thinks 'cause yer can dress fine an' study big books up there on th' hill that yer made uv better stuff than th' rest uv th' world, an' fellers like us hain't half good 'nough fer yer ter walk over." Pepper paused, breathless with his vehemence.

"You are very much mistaken," said Chaplin Noble as calmly as before, though his mouth twitched as he repressed the smile called out by the little fellow's fury.

"Great guns! W'at's the row, then?"

"I saw your badge. I knew you professed to be a temperance fellow, and you were in a violent passion because Sam Bates would not give up your marbles."

"W'at's that got ter do with it?"

"You have an intemperate temper. I never saw a person so intoxicated with temper as you were yesterday. You are raging now, and would be pounding me with those hard fists of yours if you were my size. A temperate man does not fly into a passion and call folks vile names every time he is displeased."

There was blank amazement on Pepper's face as he listened; this was followed by a puzzled, incredulous look that merged into a broad smile as the fists relaxed, and a good-humored voice exclaimed, "Get out!" Pepper at the same time turning on his heel, and striding away with more than his usual bravado.

"He thinks I was chaffing," said Noble, watching the ludicrous little figure disappear down the alley. He would have been greatly surprised could he have been a listener a few moments later near a group of boys in that same alley, who were as rough and as ragged, but not as clean as Pepper.

Their day's work was done. One had a basket on his shoulder, one, a few papers under his arm, another a boot-black's kit. Several stood with hands in their pockets jingling their day's earnings. Pepper stood in the center of the group, his head thrown back, and looking as important as possible.

"I say, fellers, we hain't got th' whole uv th' pledge yet; we must have a codicil or somethin' or nuther put to it. We hain't a-goin' ter let them Hatton chaps git ahead uv us nohow."

"They tole us that pledge was jus' like w'at everybody had," said one little Crusader, standing on his toes to look over Pepper's arm at the precious paper which the latter had produced from somewhere beneath his tatters.

"Well, they cheated, then," answered Pepper, darkly. "There hain't nothin' 'bout swearin' in it. It's got ter be put in, or I hain't a Crusader no more."

"No, sir-r-e!" seconded Pepper's right-hand man, who was as tall and thin as the other was short and stout. "We'll have th' whole, or we won't have nothin.' "

There was surprise, amazement and thanksgiving at the headquarters of the Crusaders when the next meeting was held, and the petition laboriously scrawled by Pepper, handed to Mrs. Leon, the superintendent of the rooms.

"Ples ter put in that 'bout Swearin', it hain't on the Pledge. PEPPER, President."

How they thanked the unknown friend who was forwarding their work, those brave women who labored to make a little clean, bright spot in this dark place!

A FAITHFUL DOG.

A touching incident which happened not long ago in a Maine village, illustrates once more the fidelity of a good dog. A workingman had a handsome Newfoundland which he had reared from a puppy, and to which he was much attached. The dog returned his owner's affection, and was extremely fond of following him to his day's work. The master did not encourage this, but sometimes the Newfoundland would creep along stealthily in the rear until he was too far from home to be sent back, and then would come to the front with every sign of delight in his own cleverness.

One morning he had followed in this way to a house where his master was at work upon the roof. To keep the dog from straying away, the man put down his coat and his dinner-pail and said:

"There, old fellow, you followed me without leave, and now you may stay and watch my things."

The dog lay down as he was directed, and the master went to his work. In the course of the forenoon the man fell from a scaffold and was killed. His body was carried to his home, where his wife was lying ill, but no one could induce the dog to leave his post beside the coat and dinner-pail. For two days he remained, refusing to eat, and showing his teeth whenever any attempt was made to remove the things of which he had been left in charge.

At the end of that time, the wife of the dead man, herself too ill to leave her bed, suggested that the dog would perhaps obey her little son, a boy of two years and a half, just old enough to talk plainly.

The boy was taken to the place, and moved by the loss of his father and the excitement of the moment, ran to the dog, put his arms about his shaggy neck, and burst into tears.

The dog seemed to understand that this was no ordinary fit of weeping. He licked the child's hair soothingly, and when the boy took up his father's coat and pail, the faithful creature followed submissively at his heels as if he recognized the little one now as his master.

TRUTH.

Truth is beautiful as well as safe and mighty. In the incident related below a boy twelve years old, with only truth as a weapon, conquered a smart and shrewd lawyer who was fighting for a bad cause.

"Truth is the highest thing that man may keep," and the noblest child or man is he who keeps the truth ever between his lips.

Walter was the important witness in a lawsuit. One of the lawyers, after cross-questioning him severely, said:

"Your father has been talking to you and telling you how to testify, hasn't he?"

"Yes," said the boy.

"Now," said the lawyer, "just tell us how your father told you to testify."

"Well," said the boy, modestly, "father told me that the lawyers would try and tangle me in my testimony; but, if I would just be careful and tell the truth, I could tell the same thing every time."

The lawyer didn't try to tangle up that boy any more.

THE FLAG ON THE SCHOOL-HOUSE.

"A school-house on every hill-top, and no saloon in the valley," was the glad song to which the children of Iowa and Kansas kept step as they marched to the victory which drove old King Alcohol out of their states. A grand song it is, too, barring the fact that we like better to have the school-house nestling in the valley where the brook sings and the violets grow, than to have it perched up on the hill-top where the sun can beat down upon it in summer and the wind can shake it in winter; but the sentiment is such a good one we wish all the little feet in the country were keeping step to it.

Now we have schools because we have a country to support them for us. The state in which I live takes a round million of dollars out of its treasury every year and gives to its schools, and each district gives its own school ever so much more money. Besides this, the great Nation, the mother of all the states, has given to the schools more land than would make countries as big as all of France, Belgium, Holland, and a good part of Germany.

So, ought not our schools, and that means every scholar in them, to love the Mother-Nation? One good way to make you remember this is to have a flag on every school-house, for the flag talks to us all the time of the Nation, and how we should love it. Now this flag has often been put to a bad use; saloon-keepers, who are doing all they can to destroy the nation, would put it over their doors; tobacconists painted the advertisement of their vile cigarettes on it, and other wicked people did the same, till there was great danger that children could not know what the flag really meant, so the women of the W. C. T. U. determined to rescue the dear flag and to teach the children what it really does mean. One of them, Mrs. Moffatt, devised a way of doing this, and it was to put a flag on every school-house and have your teachers tell you what it means, and teach you, through it, to love your country. She was a good friend of the Grand Army men, and interested them in the matter, and men and women worked so well together, that thousands of flags have been put on thousands of school-houses, making an hundred thousand children love the dear old flag as they never did before.

It is called the "flag of the free," and that it may be this really and truly, every body over whom it floats must be free from King Alcohol and Prince Nicotine. Remember this every time you look at the flag. Now I wonder how many of you know just exactly how to make an American flag? Of course you know that it is made of stars and stripes, and that it is red, white and blue; but how many stripes, and why? Does it commence with a red stripe or a white one? How many stripes wide is the blue field, how many stars are on it, and why just that number? Will it have any more next Fourth of July if there are no more states admitted before that day comes? These are good questions for your Quiz. Sometime we will have a little talk about how the flag came to be made just as it is.

CONTENT.

BY GUY E. ETHERTON.

I read of kings and queens; their glitt'ring splendor,
I walk through palaces, sublime and grand.
I wonder at the homage mortals render,
To those who wield the scepter of a land.

'Tis theirs to guide the footsteps of a nation;
To keep the people in the bonds of law.
'Tis theirs to know a world-wide reputation,
And move the simple to the sense of awe.

And what am I? How lowly is my cottage
Beside this grandeur and magnificence!
And what my meager fare of simple pottage,
To that maintained by royal opulence?

My lot I feel is scarcely worth the living;
Dame Providence to me has been unkind,
'Tis mine to live by hardy daily striving
Within the limits Fortune has assigned.

I read again of men defiled by pleasure;
Of human hearts through plenitude grown cold;
Of souls dishonored by the crown and treasure,
And stained with crimson in their greed for gold.

And knowing this I kneel in meek submission,
And to my gracious Father and the Lamb,
I send the heart-felt words with deep contrition;
"I thank Thee, Lord, that I am what I am."

WORDS TO THE WISE.—WHY NOT THE FATHERS?

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

"Why not the fathers, Aunt Phemie?" asked young [illegible]r Marion, gazing thoughtfully at her one-year-old boy. "Much is said about the duties of mothers and the responsibilities of mothers; why so little about the duties and responsibilities of fathers?"

"A reason can be found, no doubt," said Aunt Phemie. "Humanity, you know, is made up of two parts; this (woman) half and the other half. Now, in viewing the past, we see that the other half has always done the talking so far as marking out lines of duty is concerned. Very likely in times past there have been women sharp-sighted enough to discern fatherly duties but they had no chance to proclaim them, for the other half held all the pulpits and lecture platforms, and carried on all the newspapers, and entertained the idea that they ought to see that our half did as it should do. I think the reason so little has been said of the duties of fathers is because that half has done all the saying."

"Suppose this half were to talk, Aunt Phemie; suppose you yourself were, what would you say are the duties of fathers?"

"Well, Marion, let me think. The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. Why, then, it follows that a father's duty is to be an upright, true-hearted, pure-minded man. If he is not all that, then he has no right to marry. But I doubt if this question of fitness often comes up. Then in the family the father is a kind of head-center. He is deferred to and referred to. On this account a great deal depends upon the kind of man he is; on his disposition, his conversation, his plane of thought, his habits, his manner and his manners."

"But would you not lay down some direct duties for a father as well as for a mother?"

"Certainly, why not? His duty as well as hers is to feel responsible for the kind of men and women their children will become. If he does not know how to train them, how to influence them for good, it is his duty to be conscious of his ignorance and make the matter a subject of serious thought, and to seek light, and get it, and use it. Would he not do this if he were to take charge of poultry, or sheep, or of any kinds of young animals? or even of young plants? Then, as to manner, it has often seemed to me that fathers do not keep close enough to their children, or interest themselves in their occupations; keep up a companionship. Some even show harshness and ill temper. Of course a father must help rule the child, but he need not rule by brute force. He ought to know how to gain an influence, how to draw forth the good and suppress the bad. It is his business to know how to rule by a look or a quiet word, spoken kindly. A child, or anybody, ruled by force, is not really ruled."

"While you are talking, Aunt Phemie, I wish you would speak of a way some fathers have of setting their own dictum, or opinion, over the mother's, as to what a child should or should not do, the child being present."

"Yes, Marion, I have often noticed that, and have silently wondered. It is their duty to refrain, for it weakens the mother's authority, and often thwarts her painstaken plans for the children's advantage. I should say that a father and mother ought never to disagree on such matters in the presence of their children. They should hold council by themselves and each learn the other's views and plans and reasons, and thus come to some kind of an agreement. There is another matter altogether too little considered—the effect on the child of pre-natal influences. Of these it is well known that whatever affects the mother affects the child. It would be well if fathers could be awakened to a sense of their responsibility in this direction."

"Aunt Phemie, I think that to be just the right kind of father requires just the right kind of qualities. A man might be very learned, or highly cultured, a profound scholar, very smart, elegant, well-mannered and good, and still not know how to be the right kind of father."

"True, Marion. For with all these advantages he might not know how to touch the springs of character, and might not feel the responsibility he assumed in becoming a father. Fatherly duties are special duties, and need special preparation—need what we spoke of just now, fitness; fitness in the way of character, of morals, of manners, of habits. But as things are now this question of fatherly fitness is not always considered even by women who enter into marriage relations. As things are now women are too ready and willing. As things are now they are almost compelled to be ready and willing. Suppose we talk this over another time."

LOVERS IN THE FAMILY.

BY MARGARET SPENCER.

"'He is lover and friend and son all in one,' said a friend the other day, telling me of her boy," writes Helen Hunt to mothers in the long ago. "And a wise, sweet mother that boy had!"

This same wise mother was once asked by Charles Sumner in Washington, to write a book on boys and their mothers, "How to teach women the way to make manly, honest boys like your own four." The little woman flushed away down to her white throat and answered, "Mr. Sumner, you are flattering me; for really my boys bring themselves up!" Mr. Sumner laughed, but said, "You can never make an old bachelor like me believe that."

One of her first principles, even in their childish days, was to require nothing of her children because she was their mother. Not the principle of helplessness in the hands of power! "How rare and tender all her methods were," says "H. H." as for twenty years she labored alone for these four sons, of whom the world said, "They are lovers and friends and sons, all in one."

Every father and mother has it within reach to become the intimate friend of the child, "closest, sweetest, holiest tie of blood to underlie the bond of the soul." Such comradeship, the blessedness of which no words can measure. We win love by loving, we win respect by being honorable; and gratitude is earned by our willing helpfulness. Our children are trustworthy, as we trust them; capable as we believe in their capacities; honest as we are honest to them. I've seen little ones tease for pennies, and tired mothers climb up stairs to find them, "because children cannot be trusted with the pocket-book."

Oh, what a pitiful thing! If my boy or yours couldn't go to his mother's portemonnaie for one or one hundred cents, and tell her the simple truth about it, why, I should wish that boy had never been given to me! Let them be free agents; intelligent, trustworthy agents, and at ten years old they may be so sensible, so gentle and considerate, as to make the common, hateful "must not," or "must" unnecessary and absurd!

Our children must be obedient, but pounding, yelling, getting in a rage with them for all their little failures, will bring about only obedience through fear, and not love. The heavy, impatient hand on the little child! Oh, that a miracle might give the baby equal chance and power! A mother writes: "We owe to them; not the obligation is on their side. All we can do to make them wise and good and sweet, to spare them pain and evil, is all too little! The joys of parenthood are ours, the sacred, holy, blessed joy of these little souls; the greatness of calling them ours." How immeasurably dear and close is the child to us!

One of the White House family told me during the Hayes administration, that nothing could be more beautiful than the peculiar intimacy that existed between Mrs. Hayes and her children. Up and down the corridors, or the big East room, with their arms around their mother's waist, the two boys would walk beside her chatting, laughing like school children together; sometimes they had games in the Red room, and the handsome mother would be "caught" by the boys, who hugged and kissed her by way of the forfeit.

"Lovers in the family" there will be when mothers and fathers are reasonable and wise. Do as we would be done by? Yes, as near as possible. "Now Jack, be generous; give Joe half of that cake," papa says. If Jack refuses, he (says Gail Hamilton) is buried under a ton of Sunday-school literature and punishments. Very well! Now when Jack's papa's uncle dies and leaves Jack's papa ten thousand dollars, does he turn about and instantly give his brother half?

Let us "make out" in the little children as little sin as possible; assume all the good we can. Instead of commands let us have reason and "love, love, love, it makes the world go round."

The Still Hour.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 22: 24-38; Isaiah 19-24.)

Sunday, 19; Luke 22: 24-38. Verse 24, Worldliness does not show itself most in the church by the practice of great and disgraceful sins; but by that self-seeking, which kills the spirit of true service in any soul. Verse 26, No one can be a Christian without humility; and humility is the opposite of pride and self-seeking, and is that grace which leads one to feel that everything in him and about him is to be used to bless and help others. Beware lest you are deceived into a false idea of the nature of humility. Verse 31, A chief way by which Satan gets hold of professedly religious people, is by leading them, by their mean feelings, to think that they have humility; when they do not have it, because they have not the spirit of true service.

Monday, 20; Isa. 19. Verse 1, When Assyria threatened the Jews, it was common to plan an alliance with Egypt against Assyria. Now the prophet announces the decline of that great heathen power, in which Israel was so disposed to trust. We shall be disappointed if we trust in men, where we ought to trust in God. Verse 18, The judgments of God sometimes do, and always should lead men to repentance.

Tuesday, 21; Isa. 20. Verse 1, This was a later prophecy than that in chap. xix, against Egypt and Ethiopia. Verse 3, The minister's conduct and habits ought to be a living commentary and exemplification of that which he preaches. He ought not to be afraid to be singular, and should cultivate simplicity of manners as well as true humility of heart.

Wednesday, 22; Isa. 21. Verse 1, This chapter was an alarming presentation of troubles that would come to neighboring nations, as well as to the Jews. Verse 9, The sudden capture of Babylon, on the night of a feast, and when everybody thought the city to be perfectly safe, represents the utter want of preparation which many shall have at the time when our Lord shall come.

Thursday, 23; Isa. 22. Verse 1, Jerusalem was the "valley of vision," or the seat of divine revelations. In this chapter is described the conduct of her people in a siege. The people are warned as to the outcome of their infidelity. Verse 15, Shebna is singled out and spoken against, because he was the leader of those that set at naught the prophet's warnings. Verse 25, Shebna and all his dependents were cut down. The doom of Jerusalem describes what shall befall those who talk about their spiritual privileges and yet go on sinning against God.

Friday, 24; Isa. 23. Verse 1, Tyre was the great commercial city of the prophet's time. Commerce is a basis of prosperity: but when the people become wicked and the Lord is against a nation, the revenue of commerce is no safeguard against national ruin. Verse 18, The true and only safe use of wealth consists in the dedication of it to the glory of God, in advancing the kingdom of Christ and giving temporal and spiritual relief to our fellow men.

Saturday, 25; Isa. 24. Verse 1, The prophecies of this chapter relate to Judah in particular and to the world in general. Verse 2, Judgments hang over the professedly Christian world on account of its unfaithfulness to God.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(How to study the Bible. II Tim. 3: 16, 17.)

1. It is not enough to read the Bible; it must be studied. It is impossible for the Scriptures to be useful for all the ends indicated in the text unless their teaching is well understood and sincerely received. Many people make it their business to keep posted in the newspapers, but they know little of the Bible.

2. The aimless way that many read the Bible makes it uninteresting to them, and they receive but little profit.

3. The Bible will not fail to interest and profit one, if he will take a topic, on which he desires light, and by the help of a Concordance gather the passages of Scripture that relate to that topic. We cannot really know God's truth, unless we have a sincere purpose to be guided by it as fast as it comes to us. We should pray to God for light and guidance in our study. THE TARIFF BILL.

After weeks of wrangling and debate the McKinley Tariff Bill is passed, and Congress has adjourned. From conflicting accounts, or rather guesses, given by different partisan papers, it is hard to arrive at any reliable opinion concerning its effects. As it is distinctively a Republican measure, Republican papers stand by it, and prophesy only good from its workings; most of them score the three Republicans who had the courage of their conviction sufficiently to vote against it. On the other hand, Democratic journals find nothing good in it, and look for financial ruin from its workings.

The best that can be said of it is, that it is a compromise measure from beginning to end, and, to a woman outside of politics, it seems like a compromise which will bear very heavily upon the poor. It increases the duties on woolen goods, tin ware, hardware and other necessities of life, gives the farmers only half what they asked in the way of free binding twine, and makes up for "free sugar" (only that below No. 16 Dutch standards being free) by giving a bounty of one and three-fourths cents per pound on all sugars produced in the United States, so that consumers will probably pay no less than formerly for this commodity. The duty on imported tobacco and tobacco products is much increased, as is that on "special wines." Already a conflict between the Treasury Department and the New York Custom House has arisen concerning the Spaardam's cargo of tobacco, as to whether it should pay the new two dollar a pound duty, or be admitted under the old lower rate.

The increase of tariff on tin plate roofing to two dollars and fifty cents a box will advance the cost of the roof over many heads, but the manufacturers of Wales will make a good thing out of it. All sorts of glass ware will go up with a bound, on many kinds in common use, the duty having been increased from forty-five per cent to over two hundred per cent, and on common student lamp chimneys to four hundred and fifty per cent; dishes, also, from white English earthenware to decorated Bohemian china are made to cost more by increased duties.

The item which most vexes me, is the comparatively small one of sugar of milk, which is used in the preparation of the various kinds of food for infants, and for this purpose there is no substitute so wholesome. Not a pound of sugar of milk is manufactured in this country, yet so heavily is it taxed by the McKinley bill that a leading pharmacist of this city says the cost of the amount that he uses yearly, in the preparation of infants' food, will be increased six hundred dollars by the new tariff. Something cheaper will have to be substituted or the price of the food increased, thus all babies are to be taxed heavily or must run the risk of adulterations in their food. But —diamonds are placed on the free list, and they are "articles of necessity"—to millionaire Congressmen.

Ex-President Hayes is reported as saying: "I cannot find words to express my regret at the passage of this measure. It is ruinous to all our best interests, and it will do an infinite amount of harm." He was asked:

"What do you think of the letters written against it by Mr. Blaine?"

"I second every word Mr. Blaine wrote in the matter. I cannot understand how public men can be so blind to the interests of the country at large as to pass such a bill. It is annihilating to the Republican party. It is the most terrible blow that has been struck at that party during its existence. I can only say that I hope such a policy will die out, surely and soon; but I cannot shut my eyes to the evil that will be done before such protection as this finds a grave."

The measure can scarcely fail to have an injurious effect upon the Columbian Exposition, as foreign manufacturers will not be very anxious to bring exhibits into a country which seeks to exclude the products of their factories by high tariff.

To us the most important question is, What effect will this "tariff reform" have upon wages? The great plea for high tariff is that it tends to increase them, but we cannot forget the instances in which increase of tariff on certain manufactures has been almost immediately followed by a cut in the wages of female operatives employed in making them, sometimes to the extent of fifty per cent. Whether this result will follow the present movement, or whether the "advance in wages," which played such a prominent part in campaign speeches, will result from the passage of the law, remains to be seen.

But, "passing this bill keeps the party pledge." Yes, but what about the party's sympathy with all well directed temperance efforts? How has that been crystallized by the late Congress?

Now that this Congress has gone into history, we are willing to give it credit for all the good things it has done. Prominent among them is the passage of the Anti-lottery Bill, whose good results are already felt. Then comes the Wilson Original Package Bill, though the test case just decided in the Kansas courts seems to indicate that this work was not very thoroughly done. The Columbian Exposition legislation has been wise, and appointments under it judicious. The new code of rules does away with an absurdity and helps to expedite legislation. Among the minor bills passed by the House, was one to prevent the desecration of the American flag by printing advertisements thereon. This failed in the Senate, and ill-natured gossip says that the reason is that the National Republican Committee had tons of literature all ready to send out, which, as it made free with the stars and stripes, could not have gone out if this bill had become a law. A grand thing done by this Congress is the admission of Wyoming with its really universal suffrage. For this we thank Congress and forgive many of its shortcomings.

It is also to be thanked for the many bills it did not pass. The number offered to it was about seventeen thousand, only about a thousand of which became laws; let us be thankful that we are spared the burden of the sixteen thousand.

INTERNATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONGRESS.

This gathering, held in Christiania, Sweden, was attended by two hundred and twelve delegates, about half of whom were from countries outside of Sweden. Dr. Dahl, of Christiania, presided. Like other Continental Temperance Congresses, this was attended by both total abstainers and those who drink wine but abstain from distilled liquor. Mr. Williams, representing the National Temperance League, and Mr. Wakely, representing the United Kingdom Band of Hope, read strong papers on the physiological aspects of the temperance question.

Rev. J. Grant Mills aroused much interest by his paper on "The Demoralization of Native Races by the Liquor Traffic."

Speaking of the work of the United Committee in regard to liquor in Africa he said of the committee's proposal that it was drawn up after careful deliberation and consultation with gentlemen who know Africa well, and that it considers the three kinds of territory for which legislation is desired:

1. Those territories into which the European liquor traffic had not yet penetrated. These territories were fitly, but with unconscious irony, designated, "uncontaminated areas."

2. Those territories in which the traffic had existed, but in which, at the earnest request of the chiefs themselves, it had subsequently been prohibited.

3. Those coast territories in which the European liquor traffic does exist.

The committee's proposal was contained in one word—prohibition—prohibition, not only of the importation into Africa, but also of the manufacture there, as an article of sale or barter to natives, of intoxicating liquors. They called attention to the fact that the natives of a vast portion of the continent are at present practically without European drinks; that over a large area it is one of the tenets of their religion to abstain from intoxicating liquors; and that, in other cases, African native chiefs and tribes, although living outside the pale of Mohammedanism, are equally earnest in their opposition to the importation. The proposal was expressed in the following terms: The committee express their earnest hope that the Conference will agree to the following suggestion, viz: that, with reference to all native territories, the laws and customs of which prohibit the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors, any European government, which assumes the administration or protectorate of the territory, shall take all due steps to maintain and strengthen laws so beneficial, and that in native countries where such laws have not obtained, prohibition should be introduced as speedily as possible. The committee quoted, as a precedent, the international action successfully taken a few years ago by the Powers, for putting a stop to the liquor traffic amongst the fishermen in the North Sea.

The grounds upon which their proposal was made were stated in the memorial to the Conference to be "in the interests of humanity, of the progress of religion, and of legitimate commerce."

Mrs. Leavitt was present at the Congress and spoke from personal experience concerning the evils of the drink traffic in Africa.

Another discussion arousing much interest was the Gothenburg system of licensing. The fact that it did so, proves how much continental ideas of temperance differ from ours. That it is a license system shows its fatal defeat. One feature of the system is that licenses are granted to a company formed for the purpose of conducting the sale of liquors "in the public interest." The shareholders are not allowed any profit beyond five per cent on the paid up capital, the surplus profit going into the municipal treasury, thus becoming a bribe, as is the case with license money in this country.

The Scottish League Journal in speaking of the apparent decrease of drunkenness under the Gothenburg system says that it is largely due to the prohibition of the sale of liquor on Saturdays, and on the eve of feast days after five o'clock, whilst on Sundays and festivals it is entirely prohibited. It stands to reason, however, that there is a temptation to the ratepayers to favor the sale of spirits when their own personal taxation is lessened thereby. Professed desire to diminish drunkenness by this method is open to suspicion, and the Norwegians indeed looked upon this as a blot on the Gothenburg system of their neighbors, the Swedes. They therefore devised a system which, while retaining the main features of the Gothenburg system, devoted the surplus, not to the reduction of the public burdens, but as grants to deserving charities and philanthropic institutions, or other objects of public utility and benefit which are dependent for their existence on the voluntary support of the public. But this amendment is not much of an improvement. Fancy temperance associations being supported by profits from the liquor trade, and, worse still, private acts of beneficence supplanted by grants extracted from a system of social demoralization! When the Gothenburg system was discussed at the International Congress, even the Swedish delegates were divided in opinion as to its usefulness. The German delegates spoke in favor, but the English in condemnation of it. The latter declared that they would strongly oppose it if ever it should be brought forward in the British Parliament. In Sweden, too, more especially among the rural population, the demand for entire prohibition is gaining strength. In some districts even a bottle of whisky cannot be procured within fifty miles, and the people desire that wine and beer be also prohibited in their neighborhood. The temperance movement is thus gradually, though it may be slowly, advancing.

TRAINING GAMBLERS.

No other term so well describes the result of many popular practices, such as progressive euchre, and the thousand and one similar devices for social amusement among people who possess not enough resources within themselves to spend an evening pleasantly, and at the same time sensibly together. Just now there is a great rage for guessing contests; your grocer offers a big pumpkin to the one who comes nearest guessing the number of seeds it contains; your tailor offers a prize for guessing the number of buttons in a box, and so on, ad infinitum ad nauseam.

The most extensive, and therefore, most pernicious practice of this kind is carried on by newspapers; you can scarcely pick up a big daily that does not offer some scheme of this sort.

Proprietors of many papers issue advertisements announcing that the one who guesses most correctly the winning base ball team, or race horse, the number of beans in a bottle, or some other thing of just about as much importance, shall receive a prize, ranging in value from five to five hundred dollars, provided his name and his guess be written out on a coupon cut from the paper and returned to the publisher by a certain date. Of course a paper must be purchased for each guess, and the primary object of the scheme is to increase the sale of the paper. In this object there is nothing wrong, provided it is attained by legitimate means; for example; the circulation of the Woman's Penny Paper was, we trust, largely increased by voting for the two most popular school-teachers; and further good resulted from the successful candidates being given a trip on the Continent. This was legitimate, and in no wise objectionable. There was no element of chance in the voting as there is in the guessing; it was simply the statement of an opinion supposably based upon knowledge.

These guessing schemes are in sharp contrast to this; they are "games of chance" pure and simple; newspaper lotteries, nothing more nor less. They contain exactly the elements which make the Louisiana lottery so dangerous, and are its most prolific feeders, training people up, or down, to gambling in lotteries through the easy process of gambling through newspaper guessing. The young man who has won ten dollars on a fortunate newspaper guess, thereby has his ambition fired to win a thousand dollars in a lottery. Yet so little do some newspapers realize this connection, that the same paper will contain strong editorials condemning the Louisiana lottery and advertisments of some guessing scheme, involving the same principle. If this sort of education by the newspapers continues, the Louisiana lottery will not long remain "dead"; it or its like will spring into vigorous life all over the country.

Our good friend, Josiah M. Leeds, of Philadelphia, always on the alert in service for purity and morality, is a most practical man, who puts into action what exists only as conviction in other people's minds. All our readers remember the valiant service he and his wife have rendered the cause of purity in literature and art; he now takes up the gauntlet against this newspaper gambling. Last month he addressed a letter to George S. Graham, district attorney of the city of Philadelphia, in which he described these various gambling devices, and asked a decision as to whether they did or did not come under the meaning of the law against gambling. He also included the following statement of action taken by the English government:

"A very important step in the direction of putting down gambling has been taken by the government. For some time the newspapers in their advertising columns have offered prizes for competitions. These competitions, in which the public has been invited to take part, have not been literary, or in any way educational. They have been of the nature of lotteries; they have not depended on the skill of the competitors, but on sheer chance; and they have undoubtedly fostered the spirit of gambling, which has been rapidly spreading among all classes. Such competitions are now declared to be illegal, and a strong blow has been struck at what threatened to be a very grave evil."

In reply he received the following communication:

MR. JOSIAH W. LEEDS, Dear Sir:—Your communication received. Section 52, of the Criminal Code, provides that "all lotteries," whether public or private, for moneys, goods, wares or merchandise, chattels, lands, tenements, hereditaments, or other matters or things whatsoever, are hereby declared to be common nuisances." Do the facts stated by you come within this prohibition? Judge Paxson said, in Commonwealth vs. Manderfield, "That the term lottery must be understood to be used in the Act in its general and known signification. Webster defines it to be a 'scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance, or the distribution thereof.' Johnson speaks of a lottery as 'a distribution of prizes by chance.' . . . 'the drawing of prizes by chance is the very life and soul of a lottery.'"

Also, in Commonwealth vs. Flint Peaslee, the same Judge said, "Briefly stated, it may be said to be the distribution of prizes by chance. Whatever amounts to this, no matter how ingeniously the object of it may be concealed, is a lottery." In this case the sale of candy which contained prizes in some of the packages was held to be a lottery.

You can thus see how broad this definition is, and how comprehensive. The facts which you state, in my opinion, come within this definition.

But, in view of the character of the parties involved, and, also, in view of that which I am sure every one will concede, the absence of any intention to violate the law on their part, I would advise that you call their attention to the law before doing anything of an overt nature. I am sure that they will abate the wrong. You are at liberty to use this opinion as you please.

Yours very truly,

GEO. S. GRAHAM, District Attorney.

We are glad to believe, with the district attorney, that this violation of law has been unintentional on the part of newspapers, and that all that is needed to prevent its repetition is knowledge of the facts in the case.

THE National Prison Association, in discussing Police Reform, brought out the leading thought of our last week's symposium. One of the strongest papers presented was that entitled, "A Protest against political intermeddling with the police force, and a plea for greater efforts for the prevention of crime." Speaking of the Chief of Police, it says: "He should be head of the department in fact, needing neither direction nor orders from the man who, or the board which, appointed him. Nor should he neglect his duty because the appointing power desires him to do so." Commenting on this the Inter Ocean remarks: "This is self-evident. But it follows that in order to get a chief capable and resolute to act thus his appointment must not be for political effect, and his removal must be for causes upon which politics do not act. He should be appointed because he has gained experience in the lower grades of the service, and has won promotion by his zeal, integrity and prudence. He must be removable solely because of incompetency, negligence, insubordination or corruption."

Special Difficulties.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

QUERIES.

"Please tell us what are the W. C. T. U. days, the different ones, I mean, and also on what days they occur, for instance, Membership Crusade Day, Miss Cassedy's birthday, prayer and thanksgiving days, etc?" Most W. C. T. U. days are movable feasts, that is to say, there is no fixed order for their recurrence. Those fixed are, Flower Mission Day, June 9, Miss Cassedy's birthday; the Loyal Temperance Legions observe Miss Willard's birthday, September 28, as Harvest Home; the anniversary of the beginning of the Crusade, December 23, is Crusade day. Somebody writes asking if we cannot change this date, as it comes too near Christmas, but as yet, we have found no way of moving the date of an anniversary round to suit convenience.

Each year, before the National Convention, a day of prayer is appointed for the outpouring of God's Spirit upon that and the various State conventions. This year, this day is October 29. Other days of prayer and thanksgiving are appointed by the general officers when occasion demands them, as, a day of prayer for success of amendment campaign in Nebraska, and we hope to have the privilege of a day of thanksgiving for its success. Superintendents of departments sometimes call for especial days of prayer for success in specific lines of work, as, for example, for Sabbath Observance.

QUERY.—Should W. C. T. U. women wear mourning?

ANSWER.—This is a question which each must settle for herself. I have always worn it when dear friends went before, but have decided never to put it on again. The reasons for wearing it are that it is a protection; tear-dimmed eyes are hid by a crape vail, and often this is a great relief. It excuses us from going to places where it is very hard to go with a heavy heart, and saves us the pain of refusing kindly invitations which will not be extended to those in mourning. On the other hand, and it is the realization of this which decided me never again to wear it, it seems like a denial of our faith in a blessed immortality. We say that our friends who die in the Lord are infinitely better off in the many mansions He has prepared for them, that soon we are to be reunited with them to enjoy a blissful eternity together, that the sorrow of parting is immeasurably outweighed by the "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory" wrought out by these afflictions. Above all, we profess that our friends who are gone, and we also are the Lord's, and in His keeping whether in life or death. He is love, and His wisdom never mistakes. If He sees best to separate us from our friends for a little time, it seems like questioning both His wisdom and His love to shroud ourselves in black, as though there were no resurrection.

QUERY.—Why do you place Bellamy's "Looking Backward" in list of Recommended Readings when he advocates the use of wine and cigars?

ANSWER.—It should not have been so included, for that reason, and I have stricken it off all the lists sent out since the receipt of this query.

QUERY.—I have been taking a certain magazine, and like it fairly well, excepting that in the cooking department the recipes contain cider, wine, brandy, etc. The August number contained three such recipes. Now I have written this magazine a kind protest in the name of our temperance club for the magazine, and, being ignored, I write to ask our National organ. Should a band of white-ribboners, unitedly or severally, support a periodical advocating the use of intoxicating liquors?

ANSWER.—No. I have written to the editor of that magazine, protesting against the practice complained of, but to no effect, and so feel that it ought not to be patronized by temperance people.

The Watch-Tower.

It gives one a sense of the all round-ness of the W. C. T. U. to take up The Woman's Journal, of Ottawa, Canada, and find it filled to the brim with items that show the whole world is akin in this work. Names known and loved each side the border, and on both sides the sea, mingle in pleasant companionship. Grand Mrs. Gordon, of Winnipeg, and Mary Woodbridge stand side by side in the Manitoba convention. Jessie B. Archibald, of Nova Scotia, writes appreciatively of Mrs. Leavitt's work at the antipodes; an item concerning the Tokio union stands in pleasing juxtaposition with one concerning Pansy's Sunday-school temperance teaching, and so on through all the round world. The Journal makes many extracts from THE UNION SIGNAL, and never forgets to credit them. With September it entered on its seventh year, and stands a pleasing proof of the energy and talent of its publisher, Miss Mary Scott.

The sympathies of all true-hearted women are with Jessie Benton Fremont, in her bereavement, and this sympathy brings a warm welcome to her last book, "Far West Sketches." Bright and cheery as these sketches are, there sounds through them at times echoes of sadness like this: "Deep down in the silent depths of the heart of most women who have had the life of uprooting and transplanting that goes to make the new life of far countries, must lie the Scotch wail:

"'Oh, it's hame! hame! I fain would be,
Hame again to my ain countree.'

"Often and often have I met this. Though it was but a passing phase with me, yet the chances of separation add to its pain."

The Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association has established a reputation for getting up unique and charming entertainments. This year, Oct. 28, it is to present ten scenes forming "The History of Marriage." The first is "Primitive Marriage by Capture," then follows "Marriage by Purchase," illustrated by a marriage market in Babylon, where once each year, every marriageable girl must be sold at auction. A Roman, a Hebrew, a Russian, a Dutch and a Japanese marriage bring out, with brilliant effect, the wedding customs of these various peoples. Then Pocahontas is duly wedded to John Rolfe, and a Gretna Green marriage comes in as a bit of comedy. A Christian marriage in Westminster completes the beautiful series. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore is to be the historian of the occasion.

The Countess of Tolstoi is a tall, beautiful woman, and very fond of society. She was in London lately as a delegate to the Liberal Woman's Federation.

A distinguished woman, Miss Sarah Amelia Scull, author of "Greek Mythology and Literature on Greek Art," writes thus of another distinguished woman: "Alice Freeman Palmer, at Chautauqua, was great in purity, in majesty and tenderness. These are the powers that draw all the world in reverence toward salvation. As we listened to her presentation of the glorious principle of all true living as being, first, Love, then LOVE, the eager listeners understood better than ever before how it was that He, who was one with the Father, could come to the earth to seek us lost ones; how He, to whom legions of angels hasten in joyous ministration, could gird Himself with a towel and wash the feet of His disciples; how the Conqueror of Satan could take little children in His arms and bless them; it was Love, then Love. So we came away with a new belief that no love need be commonplace or barren, for to us the "rod of God" in the hand of Moses was made a scepter of love; in the hand of the humblest it works out miracles of helpfulness and healing under all varieties of human circumstance. God's blessing will surely attend the ministrations of that grand woman, whether made on the rostrum, or in the home; in the school-room or in the social world."

"I would like your autograph." So wrote a young man to James Russell Lowell, receiving an answer after this manner: "Dear Sir, I should like it if you would not say 'would,' but 'should.' If you would, why don't you go along and do it; but if you should, then say so.

"Yours sincerely, JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL."

That other printing offices as well as that of the W. T. P. A. are blessed with nice lady compositors is shown by the fact that the wife of Governor Miller, of North Dakota, was a compositor in a newspapar office at Dryden, N. Y. Here her husband met, courted and married her. While on a late visit East she dropped into that office and set up a couple of "stickfuls" to show she had not forgotten her old trade. ON DUTY.

MRS. MARY H. HUNT, whom Joseph Cook calls the female Stanley of the Dark Continent of Intemperance, because of her achievements in securing scientific temperance instruction for the pupils of the public schools, is again in the lecture field, from which she has been kept for two years or more by her gratuitous work on the revision of temperance text-books, and by other demands in the interests of her great work which could best be met by pen and press. Mrs. Hunt is now accepting some of the numerous calls to give instruction at Teachers' Institutes which are continually coming to her, but which she has heretofore been obliged to refuse.

News from the Field.

MINNESOTA.

STATE CONVENTION.

"I would like to know what is going on in that church," said a man whose place of business is opposite the Hennepin Avenue M. E. Church of Minneapolis. "The women have just poured in and out there for the last three days. I didn't know there were so many women in North America."

No wonder he was curious; 510 delegates to the state convention, besides a host of interested visitors, were certainly enough to attract the attention of even the least observant. Last year our basis of representation was one for every twenty-five paying members, and we rejoiced in a delegation of between 200 and 300, saying, "It is the largest we have ever had," and raised the basis of representation to one for every fifty paying members; but lo! this year we had over 500 delegates.

The convention opened on the afternoon of Tuesday, September 16, with the president, Mrs. Hobart, in the chair. Mrs. Ruth M. Rowell, of Winona, led the devotional half hour. The delegation was then seated by districts, committees appointed, credentials given in and badges distributed. The badges were of white ribbon, bearing the printed inscription "W. C. T. U. Delegate," so that the delegates were easily discerned from all parts of the house. Reports of several districts were given by the presidents. The superintendents of the departments of peace and arbitration and narcotics reviewed the work of the year along those lines.

Tuesday evening the address of welcome by Mrs. O. C. Gregg, and response by Miss Carrie Holbrook, of St. Paul, were given, after which the Y's occupied the evening with reports and recitations, interspersed with music by the choir, led by Prof. T. T. Drill, of this city, who also favored the audience with a fine solo. Miss Carrie Estey, our popular young organizer, made a short, stirring address, which was greeted with applause.

Wednesday morning was occupied chiefly with reports of the districts, all of which showed much practical work done, as well as a general increase of membership. District Number 2 had more than doubled its membership during the year, while Number 6 had increased eighty-nine per cent, and was awarded the district banner at the distribution of banners.

Mrs. C. R. Newcomb, state organizer, presented her report. She had organized twenty-five unions during the year, also ten Loyal Temperance Legions, and had made 115 addresses. She related an instance of a "faith convention" in Freeborn county: When asked to call a county convention there was but one union in the county, "but we will have more by that time," they assured her. Admiring their faith she issued the call, and when convention time came nine unions were represented. The second night the skating rink of Albert Lea, where the convention was held, was crowded.

The superintendent of franchise made a good report. This department had offered a prize of $5 for the best essay on "Why Women Should Vote," which was awarded to Mrs. Ellen M. Winship, of Winnebago City. Mrs. Winship was called to the platform and given the Chautauqua salute.

The superintendent of the work among lumbermen reported no camp preachers sent out for want of funds, but Princeton union had succeeded in holding many brief prayer meetings in one lumber camp led by three of the lumbermen themselves. Much literature had been distributed, the Adams Express Company forwarding all packages of reading matter to the pineries free of charge. Many signed pledges had been received from the men in the woods. One man wrote, "I thank you for the papers sent. It is the first time any one has manifested any interest in my welfare since I left home many years ago. I am trying to live better."

Mrs. E. S. Wright, state corresponding secretary reported the membership of the juvenile bands in the state as 6,000. There were 294 medal contests held during the year; 565 gospel temperance meetings, and 736 addresses delivered, or more than two a day. This bountiful sowing of seed, under our Father's blessing, cannot fail to bear a rich harvest.

Mrs. M. A. Warner reported on prison and jail work, speaking more especially on the work in St. Paul, where a matron has been appointed for the jail. Non-alcoholics in medicine was presented by Mrs. C. W. Lovell, and Miss Anna Long gave a talk upon the Delsarte system of physical culture. Mrs. C. B. Sheldon spoke on child training. A memorial meeting for our sisters and friends gone before was conducted by Mrs. J. A. Clifford, of Northfield. The first name read was General Clinton B. Fisk, to which Mrs. Hobart made an eloquent response.

The event of the convention was Dr. Kate Bushnell's address on Wednesday evening. The size of the audience was limited only by the capacity of the church, which was crowded beyond comfort. Dr. Bushnell has spent some time in Minnesota, and was well known to many of those present, while the rest took her "on trust" the moment they looked into her kindly, earnest face. Her talk on social purity was very searching; no womanly woman there but must have gone home feeling "I am my sister's keeper," and many resolving to strive more earnestly in the future for the elevation of repentant fallen humanity.

Thursday was the only day of unpleasant weather during the convention; but the lowering clouds and swift-falling rain could not dampen the earnestness or enthusiasm of the delegates, although it somewhat lessened the attendance of visitors. Mrs. H. A. Terwilliger, superintendent of the department of social purity, gave a comprehensive report of the work done in that department, and of that needing to be done in the future.

The Temperance Temple next received attention, a large picture of the building, as it will look when completed, being displayed, and the object of the work fully explained. Mrs. Hoover, of Duluth, reported the work of Sabbath observance, and Mrs. Thompson, of Winona, gave a short address on the education of girls.

Mrs. Hobart then delivered her annual address, an earnest, thoughtful, comprehensive message to her white-ribboners, and touching briefly but sharply upon the liquor traffic and those who uphold it. Frequent applause interrupted her remarks, and at the close she was given the Chautauqua salute.

The election of officers followed, and resulted in the reëlection of all the state officers, as follows: President, Mrs. H. A. Hobart, Red Wing; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. S. Wright, Red Wing; recording secretary, Mrs. E. L. Condit, St. Paul; treasurer, Miss A. M. Henderson, Minneapolis. Mrs. S. P. Bradish, of Minneapolis, was elected vice-president.

Thursday afternoon was devoted to the reports of the superintendents of press work, evangelistic department, scientific temperance instruction, Scandinavian work, and health and hygiene. Miss A. M. Choate, of Minneapolis, read a paper on "Certain Improvements Needed," and Mrs. W. M. Roberts, of Duluth, one on "Unrest." Delegates to the National Convention were elected, eight in number, including some of our best and brightest women.

There was to have been a gold medal contest on Thursday evening, but only five of the necessary eight contestants were present, owing, no doubt, to the rain; so there were speeches by the delegates, and the presentation of the prize banners. The Rochester union, having an increase in membership of 316⅔ per cent, took the banner offered the unions. The Dover Y's increase 283 per cent, carried off the handsome Y banner. The district banner went to District Number 6, increase eighty-nine per cent, and the Scandinavian union at Herman took the banner offered for the union of that nationality which should show the largest increase.

Friday morning came the closing session. Mrs. McCurdy, of Minneapolis, read a paper on jail work, dwelling particularly upon the need of a matron for the jail in this city, to attend to the female prisoners, and the condition of the room where the insane are confined, which has only a skylight about one foot square to admit light and air.

The resolutions were next read, and adopted with comparatively little change or discussion. These embraced nearly every department of our work, urging their importance; denounced the practice of our state in furnishing tobacco to state's prisoners, and the managers of the recent state fair for allowing an exhibit by liquor dealers of their wares; pledged our loyalty to the National union; endorsed our own state paper, the White Ribboner, and THE UNION SIGNAL; reiterated the resolutions of past years by endorsing and pledging our influence for that political party by whatever name called, that is to us the best embodiment of prohibition principles, and that favors the enfranchisement of women.

A few moments were given to announcements and last words, and then, the delegates standing, Mrs. Hobart offered a brief, earnest prayer, we sang "God be with you till we meet again," after which Rev. Geo. F. Wells pronounced the benediction, and Minnesota's fourth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. was a thing of the past.

CONVENTION NOTES.

Lunch was served in the basement of Centenary M. E. Church, five blocks from Hennepin Ave. Church, giving the delegates a short walk in the fresh September air.

The city press gave full and excellent reports of the convention. The Minneapolis Tribune had not a word to say editorially, although it had full reports, but the Evening Journal, of Friday, contained the following editorial: "These noble women (of the W. C. T. U.) not only talk, they act. And they are fortunate in the possession of the courage of deep convictions. Their movement throughout the country is a powerful enginery for good. He who would disparage such work has little appreciation of the true object of life. To the purely selfish, the work of the union is incomprehensible." And Saturday's Journal had also an editorial in the same kindly spirit. The Minneapolis Times, of Saturday morning, also had a half column editorial, which I would like to copy in full, were that possible, but must be content with the following: "No thoughtful person who noticed the proceedings of the convention can fail to be impressed with the zeal and courage and aggressive spirit of this noble band of workers. They were not out on dress parade, but were met for earnest consideration of practical ways and means for promoting temperance and social purity." "The organization has become a brave, ennobling and wholesome force in the state and a power in social progress." The Pioneer Press, of St. Paul, also gives appreciative words.

The literature table in the hall was loaded with books and pamphlets bearing upon the work of the W. C. T. U., and was well patronized. Our women evidently desire to be intelligent workers, with a knowledge of, as well as a zeal for the work. Dr. Kate Bushnell held a mothers' meeting in Hennepin Avenue Church on Friday afternoon, which was well attended.

The managers of the Minneapolis Industrial Exposition extended a cordial invitation to the convention to visit the exposition in a body on Friday afternoon, which many of the delegates accepted, but some were obliged to leave for home, and others staid to hear Dr. Bushnell.

Mrs. Hobart's patience, attention to details, and readiness to listen to every one, were matters of kindly comment among the delegates.

ETCHINGS.

I am going to begin to-day with the twelfth district, whose very full call to annual convention is before me; Mrs. A. S. Benjamin is to be the speaker; county presidents and district superintendents are to report and give suggestions for the coming year. A banner is to be given the county having the largest per cent of increase in membership. This district holds the state Y banner. The closing word of Mrs. Campbell, the president, is: "Pray for the success of the convention in all your meetings and when alone with God."

In Mrs. Loveless' report of the Muskegon monthly gospel temperance meeting, August 31, is a memorial service for General Fisk. Medal contests and Loyal Temperance Legions are doing good work. If any body wants to know how to make Loyal Temperance Legions self-supporting, buy our "State Minutes" and read the article by this gifted, successful woman.

From Kalamazoo, Mrs. Pittee writes: "A large public meeting, fine collection for Temperance Temple, a splendid Y organized."

Girard, in the third district, is also working for the Temperance Temple, and just sent $9.50; has organized a Loyal Temperance Legion, and is now preparing for a medal contest, in which only members can take part. The W. C. T. U., wide awake, as usual, has succeeded in closing up a drinking place in this vicinity. A number of copies of THE UNION SIGNAL are taken.

California, in the same district, tells of a prosperous union of forty paying members. "We have duplicated fourteen of the departments of work. In November of last year we took up medal contest work; since then have won twelve silver and one gold medal. What local union of our numbers has a better medal record? At our last contest the decorations were very fine, consisting largely of evergreen and golden rod, and the class motto in gold and silver letters. We have found the speaking of these pieces an excellent way to bring prohibition before the people, and adding to our treasury for more work, this one alone bringing in $32."

The sixth and eighth districts are, I know, putting much energy these days into local fairs. I have asked for a "Fair Letter," and hope to report later.

The district W. C. T. Unions are a host. The Central union had a tent at the Exposition, and on their president's birthday gave her an elegantly-framed picture of the National President.

Lastly, I must speak of our president, Mrs. Lathrap, who has been giving thirty days to Michigan, in conjunction with Governor St. John, preceding sometimes, again following, and the people said, "Just as logical, just as brainy, if she is a woman."

Our September Leaflet, edited by Mrs. Wheeler, is out, with reports from district presidents and superintendents. From the former I will quote from Mrs. Benjamin, because her words are helpful "all over": "The regular meeting of the local union is shorn of half its strength because there is too little method. First of all promptitude. The meeting should begin on the moment. Then sing with the spirit and the understanding. Read the Bible as though the members enjoyed searching after the truth, as they do. Every union should take the Monthly Readings. These should be read, then the leader go over the topic catechism fashion. The members will be astonished to see how carefully they read. After the questions and answers, discuss the subject, say fifteen or twenty minutes. This for one meeting of the month; for the remaining meetings, THE UNION SIGNAL, the state and district reports furnish enough desirable matter for twelve times twelve meetings, all of which every white-ribboner should be familiar with, and with these helps alone—UNION SIGNAL, State and District Reports each year, a woman may acquire a liberal education."

In her opening letter under the head of "Be Faithful," our leader, Mary T. Lathrap, says (and with her words I close this letter): "We have reason to be thankful for our unity and success, and our watchword should be 'Forward.' Let not the W. C. T. U. lose its prophetic vision, its Christly courage, or its spiritual power. Our mission is not yet accomplished, and our place is still at the front. Some behind us cry 'Return, you are too far out.' Some before cry, 'Come on, you are too far to the rear.' We like the voice that is farthest up the heights—the whole army will come on in time. Let us trust God, take courage and dare the bravest position for the right."

FORT COLLINS NEWS.

We have had a pleasant visit from Miss Ida Clothier, recently. On Sunday morning she spoke in the Methodist Church to a large audience. The subject was "Complicity," and the speaker was able to show conclusively that all who are not protesting are in complicity with the rum traffic either through silence, indifference, or a desire not to work.

In the evening Miss Clothier spoke in the Presbyterian Church, making many good suggestions as to the best ways of carrying on the various lines of work in the Society of Christian Endeavor. Of course she recommended a committee upon temperance topics, and also asked for a "book and paper" committee among the many others. Their duty should be to collect from the various members suitable books and papers, and keep them upon a convenient table in the church, where those persons unable to subscribe for themselves might carry them home, read, and return. Also that they should send papers to outlying districts and states unable to procure them in any other way.

PENNSYLVANIA.

MC KEAN COUNTY CONVENTION.

Port Allegany entertained the fifteenth semi-annual gathering of this county, September 18, 19.

The sessions were held in the Presbyterian Church and were all largely attended. This county has had a large increase of membership during the year; is well organized, having twenty-four live unions, and still calls are coming to our organizer, Mrs. D. R. Stewart, from other parts, to which this earnest woman will not be slow in responding.

Miss Henrietta Moore, one of the brilliant stars in the galaxy of National lecturers, shed her luster upon us, making us all exclaim, "I'm glad I'm in this army," honored with following the white banner, borne aloft by such leaders. A parliamentary drill was conducted by Miss Moore, which bore fruit in all the after work of the convention.

"Busy women of the W. C. T. U.!" Yes, truly, one must so exclaim who looks in upon a convention of earnest women, where the time is all too short for the amount of work to be done. Our conventions are growing so large they are becoming almost unwieldy; yet, the "great hearts" in our little oil towns always have for them a royal welcome.

Mrs. Harriet E. Chambers was the unanimous choice for president of the loyal women who prize and devotedly follow her wise leading. She now enters upon her sixth presidential term, and all hearts fervently pray, "Long live our beloved president."

MILWAUKEE COUNTY CONVENTION.

This gathering was held in the Grand Ave. M. E. Church, September 4, and was the best ever known in the district. After the usual devotional half hour, the president, Mrs. Herr, made a few remarks, and the business of the afternoon was taken up. Interesting reports were given by the superintendents of departments: Juvenile work, Mrs. Bradbury; foreign work, Mrs. Millard; Sunday-schools, Mrs. Gilbert; evangelistic, Mrs. Russell. An excellent paper, "The Temperance Temple," by Mrs. Schoonmaker, and a few incidents relating to "Rescue Work" in Milwaukee, by Mrs. Hibbard, completed the afternoon program.

In the evening the convention listened to an able address on "Social Purity," given by Mrs. Davis, of Milwaukee. A resolution was passed in the afternoon session indorsing compulsory education, and it was also recommended that special effort be made to organize a W. C. T. U. among the Germans.

NEW YORK.

LIVINGSTON COUNTY CONVENTION.

A church full of smiling faces greeted the seventh annual convention of Livingston county, at York, September 3 and 4. Nearly every name responded to roll-call, there being the largest delegation yet known in our convention annals.

As we entered the audience room our eyes rested on the handsome new county banner, its pure white center bearing the name of the union, while on the old gold panels we read strength and utility in the grasses, "I surmount all difficulties" in the mistletoe; these being the county emblems.

It is not well to be always pulling ourselves up by the roots to see how much we have grown, but a knowledge of the progress we have made, learned from comparison, is not only pleasant but aids in future growth. Thus the reports of work done in our different departments were listened to with much interest and showed our union's strength and zeal unabating. Three new Y's have been organized during the year, each with a good membership. Much literature has been distributed at jails and other places, and much was planned for county fairs.

In the evening the Y's very creditably conducted a "Willard Hour," after which Mrs. Ella A. Boole, state corresponding secretary, held the large audience intensely interested for over an hour by her able and animated address on "Woman's Mission, and God's Commission." Her arguments were conclusive and would certainly "strike home" to every one.

The election of officers the following day resulted in Mrs. H. M. Freeman, of Lima, president; Miss Minerva Davis, of Livonia, corresponding secretary, and an able corps of supporters. Mrs. Boole was present during the entire session, and gave much aid with parliamentary drill and timely talks, while a pleasing feature was a fine chapter of "Mosaics," into which were woven the bright and the helpful sayings of the convention.

One shadow hung over our pleasant meeting, and that was parting with our efficient president, Mrs. L. P. Davies. While we shall greatly miss her smiling face, which for six years has brooded over our deliberations, we remember her words of cheer, "Grand as has been the past there are brighter days yet to come." The people of York were hearty and generous in their entertainment. The Rev. Mr. Divoll, pastor of the Baptist Church, in which the convention was held, in his welcome on behalf of the clergy of the place, said he found no conflict in the temperance work and that of Christ's cause, and believed all churches should feel themselves highly honored by welcoming such an organization to its sacred precincts.

ELISABETH E. FREEMAN,
Supt. Young Woman's Work.

REPORT OF ERIE COUNTY.

On the morning of September 3, the fifth annual convention of this county was called to order by its president, Mrs. Caroline Morse Hawthorne. We had a large, enthusiastic gathering from all parts of the county.

The opening session was full of interest, reports of several superintendents of departments being added to the usual exercises. A talk was called out from the corresponding secretary of scenes and experiences she passed through during the exciting times of the "Original Package" reign in Kansas, and something of what she had seen in Nebraska, for whose aid she made an urgent appeal. She also spoke of her recent visit to the Chicago Headquarters, of its unique and marvelous growth, and exhibited chips of granite she had brought from the massive foundations of our grand National Temperance Temple, whose corner-stone is to be laid November 1.

In the afternoon, Miss Mary F. Baker, president of the local union, gave us a cordial, genial welcome, and was followed by Rev. Mr. Williamson, of Evans, and Rev. Mr. Robinson, of Orchard Park. Mrs. Dr. Purdy, of Tonawanda, made response for the convention most gracefully and fittingly. A paper on "Social Purity," by Mrs. R. D. Miller, was listened to with marked attention and interest. Mrs. A. B. Wilson followed with a paper taking up an entirely different line of the same topic. The remaining time was filled with reports of departments.

Fine music by the young people opened the evening meeting. Devotional service, led by Mrs. R. D. Miller, in her earnest, impressive way, lifted all hearts and brought calm to all troubled spirits.

Mrs. R. A. Emmons, secretary of the Woman's Lecture

Bureau, in Chicago, came to fill the place of Miss Henrietta G. Moore. Mrs. Emmons' gentle, womanly, yet logical and entertaining address was listened to with quiet, earnest attention, and frequently applauded.

Thursday morning came the annual report of corresponding secretary, and a paper on "Heredity and Narcotics," by Mrs. Palmer. Election of officers gave unanimous choice to Mrs. Hawthorne for president, Mrs. Otis was reëlected first vice-president, but positively declined a third term, and Mrs. A. A. Shaw was elected in her stead. The corresponding secretary was reëlected for a sixth year, Miss Flora M. Harris was made recording secretary, Mrs. Mary Umpleby, treasurer. Mrs. Dr. Morris gave an interesting, instructive talk on "Health, Hygiene and Food." Mr. Frank Addison Abbott, a recent graduate of Cornell, favored us with his oration, "The Quaker as a Reformer," that had won him the $100 prize at Cornell. Of course it was excellent and greatly enjoyed.

The resolutions were adopted as a whole. Most hearty thanks were given the citizens of Orchard Park for their courtesy, hospitality and thoughtful consideration, providing conveyances to and from trains, furnishing warm dinners and excellent teas to throngs of guests, and beautifully decorating their church to receive us. To the young people for their aid in various matters, as well as their music; to the orators, for their grand words; to the pastor for his untiring efforts and interest, helping in all ways the success of the work.

Charming solos were given by Mrs. Dr. Purdy, Miss Edith Hazen and Miss Sprague. Other excellent music was interspersed through the exercises. The whole convention was enthusiastic and most encouraging, although some of our best things had to be left out of the program for lack of time. Superintendents were appointed for twenty departments—two new ones, "Work among the Indians," and "W. C. T. U. Rallies."

We adjourned to meet in Buffalo in December.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

The last convention of the Western Washington W. C. T. U. was held June 3-6, in Tacoma. The next will be held in June, 1891, in Centralia.

Mrs. Annie M. Palmer has recently made a temporary stay in Oberlin, Ohio, to place in the university a niece. She will, after a few days of needed rest, go on with evangelistic temperance work in Ohio, for a season. Her permanent address is Boone, Iowa.

There have been four Demorest medal contests held in Hillsdale county, Mich., within a month. The successful contestants are Dora Duyer, Bankers; Minnie Finch and Lena Brush, Hillsdale, and Ralph Warrick, Mosherville, a gold medal.

In Springfield, Colorado, Mrs. R. B. Johnston organized a Loyal Temperance Legion and inaugurated the Demorest contest work some time since. Nine silver medals have been secured. The Union Signal and Challenge are being taken. The union has an excellent corps of officers, and has held numerous public meetings. A good temperance library is started, and thousands of leaflets have been distributed.

The first Demorest medal contest was held in Woodhull, Ill., on September 2. The M. E. Church was crowded, and the entertainment proved to be one of the most interesting ever given in the town. Everybody was delighted, and called for another one soon. Miss Myrtle Cook carried off the medal on reciting "Two Fires."

At a public meeting of the W. C. T. U. of South Albany, Vt., on August 22d, Mrs. M. E. Bell, state superintendent of prison, jail and almshouse work, gave a very interesting address, in relation to her work, to an appreciative audience. Although Mrs. Bell does not profess to be a public speaker, yet for nearly an hour she so presented the claims of the tempted and fallen as to greatly interest and instruct her listeners.

Miss M. E. Craise, a Loyal Temperance Legion worker and teacher of Denver, Col., paid a pleasant visit to Headquarters last week. Miss Craise, for many years a teacher and Y. worker in Kansas, has long looked forward to a call at 161 La Salle street, and her visit, although occasioned by ill health, has more than fulfilled all her expectations. Renewed health will be even more earnestly used for the great temperance cause.

The Prohibitionists of St. Clair county, Ill., in their convention in Belleville, on the 5th ult., nominated Miss Hattie Mills, president of the Lebanon Y's, for Superintendent of Public Instruction. She will receive a large vote, say those who know.

Mrs. Jane A. Johnson, ex-president of the W. C. T. U. of West Virginia, is just home from the Black Hills of Dakota, where she went last June. She is much improved in health. We trust that while West Virginia could not hold her longer as president, the W. C. T. U. of that state is not to lose her, although it would be a gain to Dakota.

New Mexico W. C. T. U. has lately made a change in its territorial officers; the roster now stands: President, Mrs. M. J. Borden, Las Vegas; corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. N. Higgins, East Las Vegas; recording secretary, Mrs. M. M. Watson, Socorro; treasurer, Mrs. Ella Lucas, Silver City.

One of our earnest women in Connecticut urges all of the leaders as well as the soldiers of the rank and file to wear the white ribbon at all times. She speaks of a famous speaker who does not wear the badge, and says, "I wear one in my kitchen, afternoon and Sunday dresses, respectfully and respectively."

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, of Elmira, N. Y., has recently closed a week of successful service for the W. C. T. U. in York county. She visited and lectured in seven towns, adding everywhere to the membership, and gaining friends for the cause. On Sept. 22 she spoke in one of the largest churches in the city to an immense and enthusiastic audience. Her treatment of the subject, "Our Dangerous Inheritance," is earnest, forcible, convincing; her manner persuasive, gentle and womanly; her spirit sincere and kind. On that evening, twenty-seven active, and seven honorary members were enrolled, and the collection was the largest one taken by her in the state. The afternoon meeting for women only was well attended, and the heart-to-heart service there held will be long remembered by the York W. C. T. U.

At the conclusion of an address at Enon, Ohio, by Joe Hess, the noted prohibition speaker of Clarendon, N. Y., a score of boys and girls, members of the Band of Hope, surrounded him, presenting beautiful bouquets as a tribute of their love and appreciation for the grand work he is doing. One of Jennie Casseday's text cards and a tiny Band of Hope badge were attached to each cluster of flowers. This floral ovation was so unexpected, and, withal, so touching, that while attempting to express his thanks, the strong man broke down and wept like a child. Many other eyes were wet as the audience rose and joined in singing "God be with you till we meet again."

U., has kindly promised to donate the money to be obtained from 500 subscriptions, or $500, towards defraying the expenses of the National Convention. The same paper proposes to give the delegates and their friends a complimentary excursion to the Indian Springs, a noted Southern watering place and health resort, sixty-five miles from Augusta, at which place it is proposed to establish an Inebriate Asylum, and place it under the charge of the W. C. T. U., of Georgia. So good a friend of the W. C. T. U. and so brave an advocate of prohibition should meet with liberal patronage, and we trust that friends will subscribe to this paper.

Supt. Hygiene and Heredity.

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGIONS, ATTENTION!

Saturday, November 1, has been set apart for the laying of the corner-stone of the great Temperance Temple in Chicago, and we desire to make it a Temple day for our children all over the land. Send at once to Mrs. T. B. Carse, 161 La Salle street, Chicago, for mite-boxes, unless you already have these in circulation, and for the Loyal Temperance Legion Temple Exercise. On November 1 let this exercise be given as a whole or in part, with brief addresses in regard to the Temple and its relation to the work of our W. C. T. U.; also let the mite-boxes be opened, or a special offering be made in some other way. Let all our boys and girls have the joy of an ownership in this grand structure.

The children of Chicago and vicinity are to have a part in the ceremonies of the eventful day. They will meet at Battery D and march through the streets to the Temple, headed by the Ravenswood Prohibition Drum Corps. There they will sing Miss Willard's new song, "Saloons, Saloons, Saloons must go," and Mrs. Henry's song, "Rise, Temple, Rise;" both of these selections are from Miss Gordon's new book, "Marching Songs No. 2." All leaders of Legions within a reasonable distance of Chicago are earnestly requested to arrange for their children to participate in these ceremonies. Mrs. Carse will supply those who notify her of their intention to do this with copies of the songs for rehearsals, and with all needed information.

Let us unite to make this a memorable day.

Helen G. Rice, Nat. Supt.
Anna Gordon. Asst. Supt.

"HANG OUT YOUR BANNERS ON THE OUTER WALL."

To the White-Ribboners:—The corner-stone laying of the Temperance Temple is fixed for November 1st. There will be a procession carrying banners. It will be an occasion of historic interest, and any department of the W. C. T. U., state or local union, will be glad to remember that its banner was borne aloft in the long line that moved through the streets when this corner-stone was set. Let those who wish to have their banners thus employed send them at once to Miss Esther Pugh, Treasurer National W. C. T. U., 161 La Salle street, Chicago, who will see that they are sent on to the National W. C. T. U. in Atlanta, Nov. 14–18, if desired. National superintendents of departments of work are hereby notified that their reports for 1890 will be deposited in the corner-stone if received in time.

Yours for the Jubilee,

Frances E. Willard.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

The annual meeting of the National Temperance Hospital Association will be held at the Hospital, 3411 Cottage Grove avenue, Chicago, Monday, Oct. 27, 1890, commencing promptly at 11 o'clock a. m. Fifteen directors are to be elected and such other business transacted as may come before the association. All members are urged to attend; if this is impossible, send your proxies to the secretary at the Hospital by Oct. 20.

THE CALL TO PRAYER.

The annual meeting of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, in the city of Atlanta, Georgia, from Friday, November 14 to 18 inclusive. In view of the custom to hold a day of consecration and prayer, previous to the Convention, the superintendent of the evangelistic department would summon all unions to set apart Wednesday, October 29, the day designated by our National President and secretary for this purpose.

The continued blessings of the past year; the extension of our borders, and the increase of our activities, may well lead us to tune our voices to thanksgiving, while our profound sense of weakness and dependence should lead us to bow low in concession and earnest prayer for the fresh anointing of the Spirit.

Believing that the multiplication of hours and subjects, and the frequent change of leaders wearies the audience and lessens the power for good in such a day, the following program provides for but three divisions and leaders. If, by careful advertising, each local union gathers strength and numbers about these three services, the day will leave a sense of helpfulness and joy, impossible where meetings are more prolonged and varied.

"This alone is certain: there is nothing certain." This is especially true in medicine. There is no honest physician who will warrant a cure, or say with certainty, "I can heal you." All that he can do is to use the means in his power and "spare no pains." Still, if any remedy has proved efficacious in many cases, curing obstinate and chronic ailments, one is justified in giving encouragement and recommending its use. Such a remedy is Compound Oxygen. The result of years of labor and study, it has proved eminently successful, and is recommended, not only by patients, but by many physicians who use it in their practice, and also in their own families. One of our patients writes: "I need not attempt to describe the state of one who suffers from insomnia. It is enough to say, I know by experience. For many months I did not sleep more than three or four hours out of the twenty-four, could not work, and lost forty pounds in weight. Now I no longer lose flesh, can work, and best of all, can sleep. I not only say, "Blessed is the man that invented sleep, but blest be the man that invented Compound Oxygen." DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—"I used your Compound Oxygen Treatment for very serious trouble with my throat and lungs. At the end of five months I found myself a well man." WILLIAM PENN NIXON.

Mr. Nixon is widely known as the editor of the Chicago Inter-Ocean. We can furnish you with hundreds of testimonials. Write us and we will send, free, our brochure of 200 pages, containing abundant evidence, a history of Compound Oxygen, records of cases, and a great deal of valuable and interesting reading. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter St., San Francisco, Cal.

Here Is Something

For you to consider. It's a new idea. A new channel for temperance endeavor. Some folks don't care to hear about new ways to work—the old ways are good enough for them, for they have learned well how not to do anything in the old ways! Not so the W. C. T. U! Here then is the idea. The great system of public schools—why not attempt to utilize their power to crystallize the present teachings of temperance? It can be done, but not by gazing at the suggestion.

Somebody must take an interest in the matter. Are you somebody? Yes? Well, then, dear Somebody, know that The Young Crusader, has exceptionally good Grammar Grade Readings, Christmas, Fourth of July, Harvest Home, etc., exercises, Lessons on Government, and teachings on Loyalty, Kindness, Courage and Temperance. The regular price is 50 cents per year, but for this educational purpose

We Cut that in two!

That is

The special price for public schools only, in quantities of five or more to one address, each 26 cents per annum! To secure this special reduction, you must state when ordering the papers, that they are for use in school, and give the name of the teacher. This offer holds good to January 1, 1891.

Be not weary in well doing. It's easy to go down hill, but a climb up means growth, health, and exercise. Let's climb the hill to the schoolhouse! Come, what does Somebody say? To accomplish this, send for sample copies of The Young Crusader of October 3. Show them to the public school teachers (of grades where ages run from nine to sixteen) gently but firmly insist on their sympathy and attention till you get a promise to present the whole matter before the school. The subscription can be taken for six months, if desired, at the 13 cent rate for each subscription, a marvel of cheapness and goodness combined? The idea is a new one, but it calls for the same generous self-denying-ness you have shown before—and will again?

A Nice, Brotherly Letter.

I feel moved to tell you how much I like THE UNION SIGNAL. It comes Saturday evening, and I read the first and last pages, keeping the rest for Sunday afternoon. I desire to testify that it does me much good, makes me more in love with my fellowmen, and brings me nearer to God. I am trying to increase its list of readers by speaking a good word for it on every occasion. When reading Miss Willard's article, "A Chief in Tennessee," I thought, what if God wills the mantle of our beloved Fisk to fall on the shoulders of this noble brother, could it fall on braver shoulders? Wishing you much success in your grand undertakings, I remain, yours truly,

W. L. O.

"The Coming Brotherhood"

Is an address to the Knights of Labor in Miss Willard's own town of Evanston, stenographically reported by Jerome H. Raymond. It is in an off-hand, conversational style, and we believe it would be an excellent thing for each local W. C. T. U. to order a hundred copies and distribute them among the workingmen's societies of their own town or village. This would help to show the points of mutual interest between the labor and the temperance movements. If there is a live question in our country, this is the one, especially just now; and we hope to see large orders. Price, per hundred, 90 cents

From a Letter to Miss Willard.

"I have sent in twenty names for THE UNION SIGNAL, all outside our union. My mark is set for twenty more before Oct. 1st. May God bless the reading of it to the making of votes for the protection of home."

The romantic, the picturesque have not been excluded, but find a place with the historical and statistical, and the book is one which will have a value and an interest in every home.

OUR EARLY PRESIDENTS, THEIR WIVES AND CHILDREN. From Washington to Jackson. By Mrs. HARRIET TAYLOR UPTON. With 150 portraits, pictures and autograph letters. Quarto, gold cloth, $4.00.

The only work of the kind in which any attempt has been made to trace the history of the descendants of the American Presidents, or to give any picture of the fireside life in the White House. The six presidents in the present volume are known as the "historic Presidents," and were those concerned in the early making of our Republic; the book therefore covers a most exciting and interesting period of our existence as a nation. It also forms into a great museum of historical portraits, and in nearly every instance they have been reproduced direct from the family canvases and miniatures.

An Ennobling Paper.

THE UNION SIGNAL is by far the best and most wholesome family paper I have ever known. Its scope is far reaching, as a paper for the public needs. Its versatility of thought and purity of expression, its "malice toward none, charity for all," is unequaled; and as one who has been a reader of its columns ever since its incipiency, I can say, it grows better and more ennobling every year. Its Bible Reading given each week, is worth the price of the paper to the true Christian. The correspondence from "Our Round-the-World Missionaries," is of great valuable power to our cause. A constant reader,

The Convention Daily.

We have not made the usual announcements regarding the Convention Daily because of the difficulty experienced in getting the proper facilities away from our own plant to print so large a paper in so short a time. We have decided, however, on the following plan: A daily will be issued at Atlanta (five issues) subscription, fifteen cents, or five cents per copy. It will be entirely a written-up report and not, as heretofore, a stenographic one. The place, the people, the convention, church, the programs, personnel of the speakers, etc., etc., will make up the paper. There will be no premium, and we will not attempt to mail each day's paper by itself, but all mail orders will be sent after the convention has closed, and as soon as possible after the fifth session is over. In addition to this paper we will print an exact stenographic report of all the proceedings within a week or ten days after the close of the convention (providing we get 1,000 orders for the same) at 25 cents each. We prefer that orders be sent for the stenographic report rather than for the dailies, but if any wish to order both they can remit 40 cents, and if the 1,000 orders are not reached for the stenographic report we will return the 25 cents. After four years' hilly experience in running a daily at the conventions we have evolved the above plan as being the most satisfactory to all concerned. This announcement is to appear in each issue of THE UNION SIGNAL until November 6. We recapitulate the offers to make them as plain as possible.

The Convention Daily.

Five issues to be mailed in one package on November 18 or 19, $ .15.

The Stenographic Report to be issued, if 1,000 copies are ordered, as soon as possible after the convention, $ .25.

No premiums or commissions can be allowed at these prices, except that in clubs of five or more the cost of sending the money can be deducted. The regular convention number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be dated November 27.

Another Bargain Offer.

Publications at Half Price.

We have the below named goods slightly damaged. Have been sent out to Conventions, assemblies, etc., but are well worth more than we ask for them. We will mail any of the below named goods at one-half the regular price if you ask for Bargain Publications. We also have some 1,500 Loyal Temperance Legion Lesson Manuals on hand that have been damaged a very little. If you order $1.00 worth of Bargain Publications, you can have from 10 to 50 of them free of cost. All we ask is that you use them to help on juvenile temperance instruction. They are identical with the regular numbers of these admirable manuals of which we have sold over half a million copies.

THE ABOVE CUT ILLUSTRATES OUR MAGNETIC Belt. One of the grandest appliances ever made for Lame Back, Weakness of Spine and any diseases of the Kidneys. This belt will give relief in Five Minutes, and has never failed to cure Lame Back! It has no equal for Kidney Disease. It is nature's own power concentrated and will do more good in one hour than all other remedies will do in one week. It is the crowning triumph of the nineteenth century! Whole families are often cured by wearing one Belt in turn. It gives off LIFE and WARMTH the moment it touches the body. We can refer to one thousand people now wearing this Belt. Never since Galileo has there been given to the world such a potential power for curing diseases as DR. THACHER'S MAGNETIC SHIELDS. We challenge the civilized world to produce the equal of this Magnetic Belt for curing disease. If every reader of THE UNION SIGNAL will send for our book the law of magnetic impartation will be explained to them. Every lady in the land should wear this belt, as it is a perfect protection against pain and sickness at all periods of life. Write us for information of vital interest to you.

Signal Notes.

LORD SHAFTESBURY states in reference to the male criminals of London, that nearly all had fallen into a course of crime between the ages of eight and sixteen years, and that if a young man lived an honest life up to the time he was twenty years of age, there were forty-nine chances in his favor, and only one against him, of living an honorable life thereafter.

THE official returns of liquor consumed in the seven Canadian Provinces, furnish a good illustration of the result of prohibition by the Scott Act. In Prince Edward Island, entirely under the act, the per capita consumption of liquor is three-fourths of a gallon. In New Brunswick, where nine out of fifteen counties are prohibition, it is one and a half gallons; in Nova Scotia with eleven out of eighteen counties, the per capita is one and three-fourths gallons; and so the ratio goes on increasing in inverse ratio to the number of counties under prohibition, till in British Columbia, which is entirely under license, the consumption is ten gallons per capita.

THE Flag Festival, by Mary B. Ingham, of Cleveland, has had a rapid sale. She has just issued the third edition, as a four hundredth anniversary program and writes that she believes it equal to the occasion. W. T. Harris, commissioner of education, and other noted men and women agree with her in this opinion.

UNDER the last census Boston is entitled to 113 additional liquor licenses, and although they were charged for the full year, of which but seven months remain, takers were quickly found for them all! Wonder if the commissioners would have been as prompt in canceling existing licenses if the population had been found less than they estimated it when the licenses were granted!

THREE locomotives were recently shipped from this country to Jaffa, the ancient Joppa, to be used on the railroad now under construction from that city to Jerusalem. This road is the first one ever constructed in Palestine, and is being built by a French company for the Ottoman government. It is the first of a series to be built through Palestine and Asia Minor. The engines are of the largest size, to meet the demands that will be made by the heavy grades, and are named Jerusalem, Jaffa and Ramleh.

A COLORED preacher of Kentucky has suggested a solution of the race problem. He says that the only things necessary are three books—the spelling book, to banish ignorance, the Bible, to make known the way of salvation, and the pocket-book, to furnish means to break through southern prejudices.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES has been said to have "an entire want of reverence for everything which is not naturally and rationally worthy of reverence." And it has been added, "This tendency sometimes makes him strike too-heavy blows at the narrow creeds of men." His exact position is best defined by words from his own lips: "I may speak slightingly of creeds, but no one ever heard me speak lightly of the Master."

FIFTY thousand dollars were contributed in England last year to sustain missionary operations on the North Sea among English deep-sea fishermen. Ten fully-equipped evangelizing vessels, three of which are hospital ships, are employed in the work.

GENERAL VON MOLTKE is credited with these sentiments: "I, myself abstain altogether from alcohol. I do not consider it necessary or helpful, except, perhaps, after fatiguing work, when the principal thing is to revive one's strength at once. Certainly one of the greatest enemies of Germany is the misuse of alcohol. A healthy man needs no such stimulant, and to give it to children, which is often done, is absolutely wicked."

THE Southern Star of Atlanta invites the National W. C. T. U. Convention to an excursion to Indian Springs, Ga. The Constitution says there is a project on foot to establish a great Inebriate Asylum at those springs whose waters are said to possess the peculiar property of making it impossible to drink them and whisky at the same time. A writer in the Constitution says: "No matter how strong a hold the whisky habit has on a man, let him but commence to drink this Indian Springs water, and the desire for whisky is gone. And so, I say, this is pre-eminently the place for a great home for inebriates, and the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is, of course, the one body that can make such an institution a success."

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

At Topeka 80,000 people welcomed President Harrison.

The Tribune estimates that there are 5,600 saloons in Chicago.

The British iron and steel men were received in Chicago Tuesday.

The Mississippi Constitutional convention has rejected the temperance section.

All special laws for the suppression of socialists in Germany were abrogated the first of this month.

Dillon and O'Brien escaped from Tipperary jail, and it is believed they are on their way to America.

The report of the Committee on Classification for the Columbian Exposition provides for twelve departments.

Mr. Trow Ahok, a prosperous merchant of Foo Chow, has just given $10,000 to found an Anglo-Chinese college in that city.

President Palmer refuses to take the $12,000 salary voted him by the Columbian Commission, and will accept only his expenses.

President Green's report shows that the profits of the Western Union Telegraph Company for the year ending June 30, are $7,312,725.

Engineer Murphy—frightfully injured by the explosion of his locomotive—crawled back with his lantern in his hand, to flag an approaching passenger train.

Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular lately published a six-column list of saloon mortgages, held in New York state, mostly by millionaire brewers and distillers.

The committee to revise the Westminster Confession of Faith, appointed by the last General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, is now in session at the Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa.

A meteorological observatory has just been established at Tanamarivo, Madagascar, and a large number of branches to it are to be opened, which will form an important meteorological system.

Dr. John Bascom is nominated for Congress in the twelfth district of Massachusetts. No better man could be sent there, and all foes of the saloon and friends of good government should unite to send him.

An original package house has been opened in Waterloo, Iowa, the proprietors claiming that to be effective, the prohibitory law must be reënacted. Similar claims have been made in Dakota. A test case will be brought before the courts.

A very large delegation of the International Iron and Steel Institute, including Sir Lowthian Bell, president of the British Institute, Arthur Keen, the greatest bolt and nut manufacturer in England, and many others are visiting this country to ascertain its material resources, especially those of the South, and whether it offers a good field for investing money.

MRS. CAROLINE B. BUELL makes this request: Will all newly elected state presidents send their full name and post office address to me that they may appear correctly on the program of the National Convention?

WE call special attention of all state secretaries to the notice of Miss Stokes on page twelve concerning delegates expecting to attend the Atlanta convention. It will greatly facilitate the work of the local committee to have the names sent in immediately.

MISS ANNIE HOWARD, of New Orleans, in planning a a memorial to her father, Charles S. Howard, has chosen to build a library and dedicate it to the women of New Orleans. It is a beautiful building, in Roman style, costing $100,000, contains 12,000 volumes, and has an endowment fund of $200,000; its librarians are women.

MRS. MARY E. BEEDY is repeating her lectures given at Chautauqua, New York, on "England of To-day" in Chicago, on successive Mondays at three o'clock, at Unity Church parlors, corner Dearborn avenue and Walton Place. Last Monday her topics were, House of Commons, Gladstone, Chamberlain, The Blind Postmaster General. All who heard her desire to hear her again, so vivid are her portraitures and so deep the interest she arouses.

A PROVIDENCE, R. I., jury brought in a verdict which virtually declares that it is no crime to steal rum in a prohibition state. The decision is based on the fact that the prohibitory law being in force in the state at the time the rum was kept in violation of law; it is an old aw that no one can have legal protection for any act done, or property used in violation of law, hence it was not a crime to take and carry away this rum which the man had no right to hold, as he did hold it, for sale.

THE Postmaster-General's report for the year ending June 30, 1889, shows that the quantity of newspapers mailed at Chicago exceeds by 139,379 pounds, the combined amounts mailed at St. Louis, San Francisco, Louisville, Baltimore, Nashville, New Orleans, Indianapolis, Brooklyn, Albany, Buffalo, Savannah, Wheeling, Wilmington, Del., and Mobile, Ala., and 210,746 pounds more than was mailed at Boston, St. Louis, Brooklyn, Mobile, Wilmington, Del., Savannah and Wheeling combined.

THIS from the Chicago Champion, shows what the liquor men think of the importance of the fight in Nebraska: "No matter how many men it takes, no matter how much it will cost. If it costs the liquor trade one hundred thousand, nay, two hundred thousand dollars to fight this battle successfully, the victory will be worth to Nebraska, it will be worth to the United States ten times more than it will cost, and the National Protective Association should come forward liberally and magnanimously."

THE National Reform Association has started a "Citizens' and Business Men's Protest," and requests all citizens, especially those engaged in active business, to write to the Columbian Exposition Committee, Chicago, using preferably their own printed letter heads, and saying simply, "I join," or "This firm joins, in the protest against the proposed opening of the World's Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath." There are few towns where judicious effort will not secure such brief letters of concurrence from a great majority of the citizens.

THE Chicago Tribune propounded this question:

The north wind doth blow,
And we shall have snow,
And what will the lottery do then, poor thing?

It drew out the following reply from the New Orleans New Delta:

It will breathe a deep sigh,
And crawl off and die,
And that's what the lottery'll do then, poor thing.

THE Illinois Universalist Convention, in session last week at Englewood, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we as Universalists recognize that the day for platitudes on the temperance question is past, and we declare ourselves as in favor of total abstinence for the individual, and prohibition for the state and Nation.

Resolved, That we view with indignation all acts in opposition to our system of popular education, and that we hold all those engaged in such acts as the enemies of liberty and the friends of despotism, insisting now and always that our common schools shall be preserved from all sectarian influence; that no church, sect, or denomination should be allowed to use any part of the money set apart for school purposes; and that compulsory education is one of the best means and methods for the growth of our moral and religious institutions.

Resolved, That we stand for the integrity of American ideas, customs and institutions, and for the preservation of them—that all branches should be taught in the English language.

CHICAGO air is humming with preparations for laying the corner stone of the Temple, November 1. The sound of the workman's hammer and pick comes to us unceasingly, and the foundation walls rise apace. "The children are afield," and are being trained to sing by Professor Tomlins, while banners and flags are coming in from all quarters. We venture to predict that the marching of these thousands of children through Chicago streets will be such a beautiful sight as the city never saw before. THE UNION SIGNAL of November 6 will be a Temple number, giving a full account of the ceremonies. The Young Crusader will also write it up for the boys and girls.

ILLINOIS made temperance teaching the prominent topic in her state convention. Beside the report of the state superintendent, and that of her gifted associate, Mrs. Clara Combs, who makes a specialty of introducing this teaching into primary grades, Mrs. Leiter, of Ohio, was present and gave a stirring address. At its conclusion she was surrounded by a bevy of bright women desirous of securing her services for their unions. She spoke at Ashton Sabbath evening and has a number of other engagements in the state. By the way a dainty little brochure has come to our table bearing the name Majoritié, being Mrs. Leiter's tribute to her daughter's eighteenth birthday.

LAST week there was picked up on the streets of Chicago, and brought to this office, an old, torn leaf out of a grocer's account book. On one side the entries run, coffee, sugar, "cabadge," potatoes, soap, lard, butter, and the like, and at the end of each of the two months it represented was the entry, "Paid in full." On the other side the account was with another man and runs in this fashion: "Drinks, $2.50 (lent him a dollar); loaf of bread, .07; crackers, .17; drinks, .35; drinks .20; 1 gal. beer, .30; drinks, $1.00; crackers and cheese, .20; and so on in about that proportion, there being twenty entries of "drinks" and "beer" and eight of family necessities. The result is that twice during the two months the buyer borrowed money and at the end came out in debt to the seller.

A GENTLEMAN in Nebraska suggests as a potent campaign document, an appeal to voters from widows, wives and children of drunkards, also from drunkards themselves, to have the saloons closed. A good suggestion; for no stronger, more pathetic appeal could be made than would come from these whose very heart's blood is being sucked up by the vampire liquor traffic. Let a canvass be made of every town in Nebraska, and these, the greatest sufferers, be allowed to make their protest against the curse of their lives. We feel sure many would gladly do this. When the prohibition conflict was on in Dakota, the scale was turned in many precincts by the vote of drunkards who realized that in prohibition was their only safety. Let a special effort to rally such men at the polls be made in Nebraska, and let the appeal of wives and children of drunkards be presented at every polling place. Here is good work for women at the polls.

OCTOBER 10, was the centenary of the death of Father Matthew, the temperance apostle, and as such was celebrated throughout the world. His crusade against strong drink commenced in 1838, and ended only with his life. It is said he revolutionized Ireland; in a single year he administered 200,000 total abstinence pledges to people kneeling in their churches; a pledge card and medal was given to each signer, and Father Matthew always added, "May God sustain you in keeping this pledge." He came to America and here enrolled 600,000. A loyal Catholic always, he was slighted by the Pope; when the Bishop of Cork died, the Catholic clergy of the diocese presented Father Matthew's name as the one most worthy to succeed him, but it was summarily set aside, for "diplomatic reasons." Patrick was canonized for freeing Ireland from snakes, Father Matthew certainly deserves equal honor for his services against a worse foe. But he needs not empty honor from man; his reward is on high and his memory will live in a million grateful hearts.

A HARVEST ANNIVERSARY HYMN.

BY HELEN G. RICE.

When, a year ago, we brought
From the fields our offerings,
Earnestly God's grace we sought,
That these fair but fading things

Might the type and promise be
Of another harvest-home,
When our longing eyes should see
Willing hearts to Jesus come;

And our prayers were not in vain,
For God touched our earth-dimmed sight
To behold the bending grain,
And the fields for harvest white.

Not to us alone the toil
Garnered in these human flowers;
Seeds of truth were in the soil,
Sown by other hands than ours.

One shall sow, another reap,
Both together shall rejoice;
Both the harvest-home shall keep,
And shall hear the Master's voice,

"Well done, blessed of the Lord!
To my kingdom enter in;
Full and sure is your reward;
Faithful has your toiling been."

Hearing thus the Lord's "Well done,"
Small shall seem all toil and loss;
Conflict ended, Heaven begun,
Perfect joy shall crown the cross.

CANADIAN SILHOUETTES.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

A trip to the Maritime Provinces had long been in the plans of Anna Gordon and myself. In the early days we had visited the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; later on we were the pioneers in British Columbia, forming the first union ever organized there, in the charming English city of Victoria, on Puget Sound, in 1883; and in 1888 we went to Manitoba, holding the first convention of that province in the go-ahead city of Winnepeg. After much preliminary arrangement, dating from the Dominion W. C. T. U. convention in Toronto, 1889, we crossed the border, May, 24, 1890, and held meetings in Hamilton on Sunday and Monday. In some respects, this is perhaps the banner W. C. T. U. of Canada.

Kingston was next on our program, a stony old town, remarkable for its solidity, reminding one of a European, rather than an American city. Montreal came next; that stately and almost regal city, a most surprising product of our side of the sea. Here the Dominion W. C. T. U. held its second annual convention, and the most stately and beautiful churches were open for us, night after night. Women were gathered from almost all the provinces, and went on with their work like veterans. Mrs. Judge Foster, of Knowlton, Quebec, is a remarkable woman. She has the accurate mind that comes of having been a teacher. She has exceptional elocutionary abilities, and is well heard in the largest auditorium, her voice being round and musical. She is an excellent parliamentarian, and has that kind, considerate spirit that makes the wheels go round with the least friction. Mrs. Foster is a member of the Episcopal Church. Her nature, nurture and environments have been of the best, and she had much riches to lay upon the altar of our great cause; riches in character and in conduct, no less than of the motherly kind, concerning which we hear so much in these days. It is a thing to be regretted that she could not keep the presidency of the Dominion W. C. T. U., because with the experience gained in this first year, she would have had momentum for the next; but loyalty to home, its cares and duties, was the explanation given, and is certainly the best that any woman could offer for being mustered out. We earnestly hope, however, this will be only a furlough. Mrs. Fawcett, who seemed a favorite with her sisters, and was elected in Mrs. Foster's place, is the wife of a leading Methodist minister, an earnest-hearted and most kindly woman, of motherly presence, who will undoubtedly conduct affairs so as to carry the Dominion union far on in the years to come. Canadian women are so cordial that we felt just as much at home among them as we would have done in the Illinois convention. They were sisters, indeed, and my sense of their generous consideration, and of the unparalleled magnanimity of Mrs. Foster, who, by rights, would have been president of the World's W. C. T. U. from 1890 to 1892, I have not attempted to express, because it seemed to me I had already upon other subjects exhausted all the choice words befitting such an act as hers. It has shed a lustre on their movement even beyond what the honor could have given, and will never be forgotten, I am sure, by their American sisters, whose grateful recognition will be felt all along the years. If statesmen and politicians could show the spirit in bringing about closer relations between Canada and the United States, that these women have manifested, what a blessing would come upon the people in the interchange of the brotherly good-will which so ennobles nations sitting side by side. I am proud for womanhood that this example has been given of the heights to which the grace of God can conduct us in the practical application of that golden rule, talked about so much, practiced so little.

Our dear friends, Mr. and Mrs. John Finley and family, entertained us in their stately home, and we had good talk of English friends in reformatory and religious work.

Our next meetings were in Quebec, a city which for beauty of situation is the glory of this continent. A more refreshing experience than one has who mounts its characteristic cabriolet, and jaunts up and down its narrow streets, with their serrated skyline, can not be enjoyed this side the water. I remember that one of the first songs I ever heard was from my mother, about "Brave Wolfe drew out his men in a line most pretty,

On the Plains of Abraham before the city,
While Montcalm and brave Wolfe, like brothers talking,
So lovingly between their armies walking."

I cannot speak with enthusiasm of the poetic merits of this old snatch of song, but its rendition sufficed to put up "brave Wolfe" as a first-class hero in my childhood thoughts; and standing on the place where he by giving up his life, purchased this continent for the Anglo-Saxon rather than the Gaul, nd reading his epitaph, "Here Wolfe victorious fell," I realized that of which I had so often dreamed, the power of a great life to hold its spell over us through all the years from earliest childhood to serenest prime.

Nearly one in every five persons in Quebec is a Protestant, and the fight between the two religions, Protestant and Catholic, is a perpetual one. "Our folks" could not think of having the temperance meeting on Sunday evening. Good people over there have not yet learned that to do so is, in no wise, profane, but they gathered into the large opera house after their evening meetings in their respective churches, and it was good to see their honest and sturdy faces, reminding one of earnest Christians in more sanguinary fights. However, I felt it was for me to speak to them as one equally friendly to both divisions of the great army, and I dwelt upon the Catholic total abstinence society of the United States, its noble work, and the unmatched advantage of fraternity. I could not tell what they thought about it; perhaps they did not like it, but it was what I had to say.

We now entered on territory hitherto unknown to us, coming directly to Moncton; the fields cultivated by French Canadians, where the fences were so close, and wood so abundant that as one looked across the country, the different fences of the farms seemed like rows of shingles on a barn roof, and it was quite possible to fix one's eye at such an angle as not to see the ground at all. I thought about the pity of it, the needlessness of it, and the symbol that I feared it was of the separated condition of the people. Give me a wide-open landscape without fences and a wide-open humanity without mystery. This town of Moncton is modern, in all respects a thriving, commercial place, with a surprisingly fine church seated on the amphitheater plan, and the good people had gathered in to hear, so that there was no empty space. A sturdy, square-headed race is this; an idea once got is firmly held, so one enjoys speaking one's mind within ear-shot of theirs.

Amherst was the first town we reached in Nova Scotia, and here we passed a delightful Sabbath day in the home of Mr. McKeen, president of the Bank of Nova Scotia and of the Y. M. C. A. There was something poetic to us in breathing the air of Nova Scotia, interfused as it is with the genius of our own poet laureate, Longfellow. I have referred elsewhere to our visit to Grand Pré, which was, in one sense, the culmination of our trip to the beautiful Maritime Provinces; a country that makes up in the freshness and charm of its brief summer season, the hearty character and courage of its people, and the heroism of its historic annals, for some disadvantages in geographic location, though Nova Scotia, that lovely peninsula stretching out into the sea, has a notable mildness of climate, and a high social charm, at least, in its large cities. Taken for all in all, our visit was one of the most delightful we have ever made, and we felt grateful to God and the people that the hopes and expectations we had cherished so long, were realized at last.

Truro, a misty, moisty sort of town, reminded me of Holland, by its long stretches of level meadows, long, level lines of green trees, and any amount of level headedness in the people to match. We were entertained in the home of a thorough-going evangelist, whose vocation it is to stir about among the people in church, school-houses, or wherever it may be. As I noted his fine physique and great earnestness I could but recall the words of Peter Cartwright, who said to a certain recalcitrant sinner: "I will pound the gospel into your unbelieving soul if I cannot get it there any other way." Truro is a famous name in geography, and this town is called after one in the county of Cornwall, England, the early inhabitants, or some of them, having migrated from that more favored locality. The church in which I spoke, was built in 1768. Women helped to build it. After the deportation of the Acadians, devout English families came in and lived on the lands once belonging to this banished people. They went into the woods, hewed down the giants of the forest, and prepared to build a Protestant church, the women saying: "We cannot live here without the public worship of God." When they came to rear the edifice, the men were not strong enough to lift the timbers, so the women turned out en masse, and their power, added to that of their husbands and sons, sufficed to put the beams in place. This is to my mind a figure of the fashion in which the final temple of liberty and government is to be completed.

In due course of time we went to Halifax, laughingly thinking that this is just where the liquor dealers would like to have us stay, and have sent us many a time. The best thing we heard about this city is that the ministers change works; I say this inasmuch as ministers are the most oppressed laboring people of whom I have any knowledge, being obliged to grind out two sermons a week the year around. I was delighted to learn that here they have had enough of the spirit of co-operation to exchange pulpits on Sunday evening, by which very simple method they avoid the preparation of the second sermon. There are several other good objects subserved by this invaluable method. The people of the different churches become more united. The auditors get a greater variety of pulpit oratory and information, and perhaps a better opportunity for spiritual uplifting, as not only the wisdom of the many, but the Christian experience of the many is better than that of the one. It seems to me they ought to take out a patent on this method, and I greatly wondered that the inventive Yankee had been behind them in a consummation so devoutly to be wished. The word, "Halifax" means "holy hair," and relates to a young woman martyred long ago.

Mrs. McClelland, wife of the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, attended our meetings there, and is greatly honored by the W. C. T. U., for she will not have wine dispensed at any of her entertainments. In this she is strongly seconded by her husband.

The W. C. T. U. of Halifax is one ot the most earnest that I have seen. It has a notice like this in the paper: "We are prepared to receive girls from the country desiring employment. All such will be cared for at the W. C. T. U. building until suitable places are obtained. There have been not a few sad instances of the downfall of girls here, through ignorance of the nature of the houses to which they have been directed by supposed friends. It is, therefore, respectfully urged that all good people will send girls coming to Halifax to the W. C. T. U. building." "Mother's Meetings are held on alternate Fridays; Loyal Temperance Legion, fortnightly. The coffee room is open from 7:30 a. m. to 10 p. m., Sundays excepted."

The women of this city have the courage of their convictions. A Mr. Macasy was the license inspector. He did precisely as he should not have done. The W. C. T. U. bravely took up the case. They were determined his malfeasance should be a matter of public record, "but," said the lawyer to them, "you must personally prefer charges, and you must prove them." Whereupon they secured fourteen witnesses, and Mrs. Bell, one of the loveliest women possible to imagine, spoke for three hours before the court, and seventy of our women supported her by their presence, each of them wearing a white ribbon conspicuously. They handled the rum power without gloves, and were hissed and groaned at, but did not mind it. The conncil balloted as to whether they would dismiss him, and then "inflooence" came in for its share. The vote was a tie, and, naturally enough, the mayor stood by the "inflooence," but all the same the women fought for their altars and their fires, God and their native land. We doubt if anything in the crusaders' records exceeds this episode.

Windsor is an aristocratic and beautiful old town, where the Church of England has its most noted Canadian college. What interested me most was a fountain for man and beast, erected by the W. C. T. U. in the Jubilee year, 1888. In every town of the Dominion and the Republic, there ought to be such a fountain erected by our society. I am confident the people would warmly appreciate such an endeavor, and help us to the necessary funds. It is a prime consideration, perhaps too little heeded by us, that whatever we do in our own home locality, to better and brighten, is appreciated and helps the general cause to which, alas! the average man and woman is not so much attached, because its benefits are perhaps not so keenly appreciated, now, as they will be twenty years hence.

The only reversible river that I have ever seen is at Windsor. There the tide flows in one direction a part of the day, and turns itself about in due course, but the worst of it is that during many hours the channel is left utterly dry and looks like a vast red mud heap. At St. John a cataract is reversible so that one has to reconsider his ideas of geography or else he would feel, indeed the error of imagining that under no circumstances will water run up hill.

Mrs. Trenholm, of Handsport, Nova Scotia, is a character. She is at the head of the work for sailors, and says that when she is obliged to be out at her evangelistic meetings at night, if she needs anybody to stand by her, she looks for sailors, not landsmen, when she needs to ask for a direction. They are reckless, to be sure, living on the sea eleven out of every twelve months in the year, badly fed and lodged and treated, aud they are led off when they land by traps laid for them by their brother men. They are lawless in their talk and actions, but they are men of noble and chivalric hearts, far less selfish than the average landsman. By the efforts of this lady and her white ribboners, a home, called "The Rest" has been established in St. John. It seems to me we should separate our National department of sailors' work from that of the soldiers. The two are entirely different in method and spirit; at least, so think our Canadian sisters.

In Fredericton we were invited to speak before a conference of Methodist ministers, Rev. Dr. Carmon presiding. He has been general superintendent for twelve years. He is a mild old gentleman, greatly beloved, strong of spirit and a stalwart on the temperance and woman's questions. When he introduced me, it was in words indicating the most progressive spirit, and as all those dignified brethren arose en masse, I said to them: "You cannot understand the significance that I see in your attitude in view of what you are. It is but lately that a conference of clergymen would welcome a woman to their platform and rise in token of respect at her presence. It means the better time when the daughters of God are perceived to be first of all and above all, individuals, and are honored as such." These men cheered when I spoke about the action of our general conference in 1876, in taking the word "obey" out of the marriage service, because our Methodist ministers had too much respect to ask any woman to obey any being except God, so greatly had Christianity constrained their sense of force, and enriched their sense of justice. I told them, also, that our church had admitted women to every position within its gift, except to be ordained as preachers, and to be delegates to the general conference. We felt confident that the latter would soon be open to us, and the former is only a question of time. I asked them, as they are now arranging to have John Wesley's birthday celebrated by the young people's societies, to make a point of observing Lady Huntingdon's birthday, or Susannah Wesley's. They seemed to think that this was a good plan, inasmuch as we desire to put noble and helpful examples before the young women as well as the young men. There is great power in these observances.

Mrs. Edith Archibald, of the Island of Cape Breton, is one of the salient characters in the Dominion work. She is the daughter of Sir Edward Archibald, who was knighted and had conferred on him the Order of the Bath in 1881, and was a British consul in New York City through the war. He was the friend of Lincoln and Grant, and sent telegrams to his government urging them to favor the Union cause. He had a letter from the Queen asking him to remain as long as possible in the office to which she had appointed him, and which he wished to leave after some years had passed. He went to Washington after the Geneva Arbitration, carrying nineteen millions of dollars in his pocket. At a dinner at Delmonico's, William M. Evarts spoke in the highest terms of Sir Edward. His daughter was reared in New York City, and was a society woman there, but she married a noble young man, whose work it is to superintend the immense mines on the Island of Cape Breton. Living there in comparative solitude, she has had years in which to think and study and grow mellow-hearted toward God and humanity. She has worked with a will for the miners, and is greatly beloved by them. Her children are leaders in the Loyal Temperance Legion, and the white ribbon spirit is perhaps as well known in that distant locality as in the headquarters of Chicago or London.

Perhaps the greatest wonder in the Maritime Provinces is the work of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, crossing the isthmus of that name in a straight line seventeen miles in length, by means of which ships are to be trundled overland, thus avoiding five hundred miles of sea, and greatly forwarding the commerce of that region. If it succeeds, and there seems to be no doubt upon that point, this will set the example for ship railways to cross isthmuses everywhere. Upwards of ten millions of tonnage entered and cleared at the ports of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the Bay of Fundy in 1888. It is believed this enterprise will have immediate effect in stimulating and developing commerce between Canada and the United States.

The back-door step of the North American continent is Prince Edward Island. Beyond it icebergs have it all their own way. It is named in compliment to the Duke of Kent, the father of Queen Victoria, who was at one time commander of the British forces in Halifax, and was then called Prince Edward. The Island is one hundred and fifty miles long, and varies from four to thirty miles in width. It has a population of something over one hundred thousand. The people can not get out save in the brief warm season, except by means of an ice boat. As one trundles along over the bright country to Charlottetown, the capital, the question is, why they should ever wish to get away from such a quiet pleasant place, and when one views the handsome portico of the judicial building, and other imposing structures that surround the public square, it is impressed upon him once again that civilization has got around to all. We were entertained in the home of Judge Hensley, a cultivated gentleman of the old school, who has been the judge in these parts, time out of mind. His father was an officer in the British army and belonged to the company that guarded the emperor Napoleon on the Island of St. Helena. Mrs. Hensley is one of the leaders in our movement, and it was refreshing to talk with this most interesting pair, concerning the history of the island, its products, its politics, and general outlook. I do not know that I have found a local union whose spirit pleased me better. We had a rousing meeting in the largest church on the Island, the chair being taken by the Methodist minister, the mayor occupying the platform with Judge Hensley, and, on my instance, a group of ladies sitting with me. Anna had her usual meeting with the Loyal Temperance Legion. The only reason why a person is provincial is because he remains in the province all his days. No one can possibly travel about without learning that the tides of civilization seek an equilibrium with as much persistency as do the tides of the sea. Brain finds its level, invention speeds on the wings of the morning to work its beneficences in the uttermost parts of the earth. "At a certain depth all hearts communicate" and the reason has been best declared in those sweet words of Holy Writ: "He fashioneth their hearts alike."

THE NEEDS OF SELF-SUPPORTING WOMEN.

BY MISS CLARE DE GRAFFENRIED.

(Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.)

Within a generation the heroic working girl has been transformed in character. Emerging from a simple life with few wants, to a complex and artificial existence, the burden of social disadvantage weighs upon her, and she becomes more alive to her importance as a social power. She refuses to starve; she will strike, she will sin. As Gunton points out in Wealth and Progress, wider opportunities for the masses must precede the formation of higher social desires and character. Shorter hours of labor, signifying more leisure and less exhaustion of the faculties, would soon create new wants, establish better habits, incite to friendly intercourse, to reading, travel, all those intellectual enjoyments which are the measure of civilization. Wherever man's social opportunities have been most limited, industrial and political progress has been slowest. Wherever women and children are condemned to excessive toil, wherever "the fatal industrial policy prevails of sacrificing human lives to produce and accumulate wealth, instead of the broad and humane policy of using wealth to save and improve human lives," there the homes are always most miserable, there reign illiteracy, pauperism and vice. Each reduction in the hours of work, from sixteen to fourteen, from fourteen to twelve, from twelve to ten, has occasioned immediate and enormous improvement in the condition of the laboring classes. Shorter hours tend not only to provide occupation for millions of unemployed, but they will stimulate production and widen our markets by multiplying wants; they will make education possible, and conduce to a higher social and moral development in the home.

To all earnest minds interested in economic and ethical problems, the absorbing question is how to give our toiling sisters wider opportunities for self-development? Why, despite the good which the Women's Christian Associations and kindred societies accomplish, do they often fail to benefit the most needy and meritorious? Evidently one stumbling block in the way of usefulness is the de haut en bas tone which pervades all efforts at conciliation and help. We meet our industrial friends in a false spirit. The "lady," however conscientious and charitable, who at the working-girl's club scorns to treat shop women and seamstresses as equals, proclaims by her manner as well as by her words: "God made the lower classes different and they are different; why tell them otherwise?" Until these flaunting airs of superiority, this latent phariseeism and aggressive patronage are exterminated, the trials and sufferings of our self-supporting women will never be laid bare, and practical relief will never be administered.

The wants of the ordinary female worker must be comprehended within the narrow average of $5 a week for food, raiment, and the satisfaction of the intellectual and spiritual nature. To some of us who know the personal sacrifices and resolute self-denials of these noble, humble lives, it seems almost mockery to preach from the stand-point of our ampler incomes and habitual self-indulgence, the wisdom of small economies and more ideal desires. Yet nobler wants may be created in the breast of the roughest, most untaught creature, and along with these wants, greater efficiency may be gained for the first essential with every toiler—self-maintenance. For, until she is equipped with self-supporting arts, the higher nature is in abeyance. Until her home is neat, wholesome and well-ordered, it is useless to expect any lasting elevation of character or morals. The best stitcher, the best type-writer ought also to be shown how to become the thriftiest housekeeper, most helpful wife and wisest mother.

Patient observers who have watched the life of the laboring classes, and studied their needs, emphatically urge industrial training in schools, clubs, guilds and societies, as one remedy nearest at hand for social ills.

Encourage the working-girl to cut and make her own dresses and relieve her over-burdened parent. By practical examples, teach upholstery, bed-making, laundrying, house-cleaning, nursing the sick, the care of sleeping apartments. Fit up lecture and class-rooms as a model tenement, and give amusing, instructive demonstrations in economizing space, utilizing window-seats and lounges for clothes-presses, ventilating rooms, setting tables and turning simple decorations to effective account. Adopt a baby—nothing would delight young girls so much. Show them how to sew its little garment, to arrange its cradle, to feed and tend it, above all, how to leave it sometimes in repose. Thus would be saved the precious lives of thousands of the future offspring of our industrial community. Instruct the novices in housekeeping, how to buy and to market. Make them understand that wastefulness in the home is as reprehensible as drunkenness, and that to throw away money on bad material and short weight is as sinful as to burn greenbacks in the stove. Let a new gospel obtain. Instead of loving their neighbors as themselves and gadding too much, they must love the family as themselves, and help father, sister and brother. Aid self-supporting women to re-create their households, to do away with the filth and misery which beget those morbid physical conditions that only alcoholic poisons can appease. Induce the mothers to choose poor living with longer schooling for the girls and boys, instead of comforts bought with the unhallowed earnings of over-worked and ruined little ones, and thus abate the parent's sinful share in the fearful abuse of child labor. In fact, all educational effort for workers should aim at practical training and enlarged opportunities, social, intellectual and moral.

The minutest instruction, the personal example of wiser women alone can bring about radical change in the methods of untaught girls or mothers. Not many members of charitable associations, however, with absorbing home duties, committees and visiting list, can cope with the tremendous crises occuring in the every day industrial life of the subjects of their care. Their wealth nevertheless will command the services and enlist for the cause the heart, soul and brain of clear-headed, earnest officials. With a tact which is nothing more than common sense sanctified, such appointees would devote all their energies to the needs of workers. Not amateurs any longer, but professionals are reqired to take these important interests out of the realm of mere sentiment and philanthropy into that of the economic and practical. The magnificent executive corps whom the "silent partners" have placed at the head of these great benevolent enterprises in the largest cities, deal with the tragedies, with the inexperienced, the disappointed, the imperiled, better than any mere periodical visitor, however willing, however kind. Particularly in outlying districts where modern scientific methods of managing charities and reforms have not penetrated, specialists are indispensable. One does not call in a plumber to tie up an artery, or a butcher to model a bust.

Immediate improvement and extension of the homes supported by the Christian Associations, must answer the objection of gratuitous critics, that superior accommodations at cheap rates encourage low wages, entice young women from the country and react for evil on the large body of toilers unable to share such bounty. The charges of opponents hold good wherever sympathy and generosity surround these boarding homes with comforts which the hard cash of the inmates could not buy. False standards are thus created and the beneficiaries are so demoralized that in every relation of life they expect to get more than they give. To abolish the useful homes, however, while inflicting hardship on the deserving woman who seeks their roof less for cheap board than for respectability, would neither raise wages nor tie the country girl to the worn-out farm. Retain the boarding homes, but make them go to the root of the worker's need. They must be multiplied, cheapened, located in quarters teeming with homeless girls. Have them plain enough and big enough and cordial enough for the tobacco stripper, the lint-covered cotton operative, the under-paid sewing drudge starving in a garret, while the slop-shops fatten on her life blood.

Some self-supporting girls have inaugurated a great reform which it would be possible to operate for the benefit of thousands. Five newly landed Irish flax mill operatives club together, hire a tenement, furnish it plainly in common, and, while one keeps house, four work in the factory. They share all expenses, plan, economize, save, and in their warm bed-rooms and humble little parlor, get not only real domestic life unshadowed by the eclipsing "institution," but a splendid education in adaptiveness, versatility and self-control.

Scores of young women are already solving thus the domestic problem, which for them is also complicated by sharpest want. Might not Associations besides multiplying, cheapening and brightening the boarding homes, engage in the noble enterprise in every industrial center of helping mill employés, cigar-makers, clerks, teachers, all the friendless and solitary, to found small coöperative households? The inmates would group according to convenience, occupation or congeniality, one of the participants being maintained as supervisor, or some suitable head being found among the hundreds of genteel unemployed everywhere clamoring for work. Colonize thus in the lowliest tenement ten girls who can pay but two dollars a week, yet would like to "have a say" about their food and the outlay of their funds. They would feel that what physical comfort they could get by good judgment and close management out of twenty dollars a week would be theirs, and not an iota more. By a sense of responsibility the young housekeepers would be stimulated to realize that the abode is their own, their castle, their haven, where they are not fleeced by a landlady, nor disciplined by a committee, but are themselves the architects of its well-being. The attributes of domesticity and the highest elements of independence and moral accountability would thus be developed.

Grade such co-operative colonies by the resources of the projectors. Let the inmates vote who shall be received and how their home-life shall be conducted. The great benevolent organizations should bestow upon these undertakings the benefit of their superior opportunities with landlords for securing cheap and sanitary quarters. Each little settlement might be kept under the oversight of one member of the Associations or official staff, to whom the occupants could appeal when in trouble. With the countenance of such advisers the girls should see their young men friends on Sunday. If denied this privilege on their only leisure day, how tempting and how perilously easy it is for them to go to the rooms of their male acquaintances under disreputable auspices. Sympathy with youth and youth's indiscretions and yearnings would naturally avoid hide-bound regulations and foster individuality, while broad catholicity respects religious prejudices and shelters the worthy, however diverse their creeds.

Not alone the poorest demand help and a broader field. Well-to-do working women with good homes, of whom all our large cities boast an increasingly numerous and prosperous element, need uplifting from the deadening automatic routine or the depressing influences of sordid authority, frivolous companionship, inane gossip and jests and petty jealousies. The utter poverty of resources, the shy, awkward unresponsiveness of the home-staying must be combated by wisely selected recreations and healthful activities. Around the hearthstone the best girls are often the dullest and saddest, burdens to themselves, useless to the family, incapable of interesting the children, or brightening the home-coming of the father, their ideas petrified at the source. To these, priceless would be the increased social opportunities that guilds, societies and clubs can afford—change of scene, wider acquaintance, lectures, games, question clubs, collections of flowers, insects and stones, wonders of natural life—all the pretty information which filters through the fortunate high school student to the uneducated parents and juveniles, but which the fireside of the worker never enjoys.

The rough, the ignorant, the unhappy and lonely, who under genial influences would flower into gentle and beautiful womanhood, too often elude the present methods of Christian Associations. There is in science no classification of man into lower and higher orders. Without meaning to be autocratic or carping, it behooves me to say as as the messenger of nearly 12,000 self-supporting girls whom I have personally interviewed, that the most deserving are barred out by the class distinctions which mark almost every phase of philanthrophy. In shops and factories the needy cases are well known. The forewomen reach them, the companions in toil know the dilapidated dwelling to which little comforts often find their way, and even money, saved from the meagre earnings of unselfish friendship. Were prominent young women in the tobacco, underwear, and box factories, the mills and rope walks of great cities, members of charitable associations, entitled to dispense their privileges, not mere subjects for experiment, they could point out many a lonely sufferer, bring many outcasts into the fold, besides greatly enlarging their own sphere of usefulness. But we are wont to seek even the stoically reticent, the heroic, the martyred as patron to beneficiary, as proud to the humble, as rich to the lowly, not as friend to friend. So long as Christian work keeps up the hollow mockery of the "lady" succoring the working woman, so long will the working woman resent or hold aloof from such beneficence, so long will reforms languish.

In the industrial centres as well as in the handsome streets, rooms should be open for the social intercourse and physical and mental refreshment of the laborer's household. If first made comfortable, then one is more easily made good. Beguile there the children, the girls, above all, the overburdened mothers. Work upon the family as a unit, instead of alienating the daughter from her home. Strengthen domestic ties, weld natural relationship. Talk more about ethics sometimes, even if less about religion. To interest mothers and daughters concerning the care of infancy, the discipline of children, would check the reprehensible indulgence that often riots in the homes of the poor. Around many firesides, it is true, hover marvelous patience, almost angelic self-forgetfulness, shaming the best tempered women of leisure whose petty annoyances dwindle beside the wearing trials of the house-mother who is drudge, seamstress, nurse, pack-horse, from 5 a. m. till 11 p. m., yet kisses her fifteenth baby with all the passion of first maternity. Often, however, the gravest offenses go unpunished, or trifling faults incur a volley of vituperation. The object most commonly seen in my rounds was a heavy leathern strap, three inches broad, cut at one end into ribbons, the more effectually to sting. Children, big and little, are beaten by their parents with this unholy implement, and wee sisters of ten and eleven left in charge of infants and toddlers ply it vigorously on each offender. This is a type of the low civilization with which modern philanthropy must deal.

In every manufacturing town, North, West and South, thoughtful and educated women, as missionaries and practical teachers, have a more useful field than the valley of the Ganges or the Yang-tse-Kiang. The neglected cotton operatives of my own state, Georgia, the tobacco workers, shirt and overall makers, and mill employés of many magnificent cities need deliverance from ignorance and preventable misery no more imperiously than the unhappy dwellers in the numerous wretched tenements, which in the most flourishing New England towns flank the public libraries and the grand and spacious schools.

The sin of leaving our fellow beings in unsanitary, fever-breeding homes, huddling in degrading crowds, in mental darkness and moral irresponsibility and vice, is one which each intelligent, earnest woman must bring home to herself and answer for to her own conscience. Rescue the children, at least; ward off from future generations an inherited curse. Clear our cities and manufacturing towns of the tenement plague spots, by a personal crusade against their hideous influences. Elevate their inmates by personal visits, personal help, the ministry of the hand, palm to palm, as woman to woman, not as patron to beneficiary. Prove the truth of Tolstoi's words, that in order to do a man good, one must be on friendly terms with him.

Nor must effort cease when through religious conviction or fellowship in high ideals our working sisters are first uplifted. The real needs just formulate themselves as the new life begins. The girl who could not read does not by a change of heart learn all the mysteries of erudition. As a Christian woman with a future before her, more than ever does she require to spell or write or cipher better, to be taught the amenities of a politer sphere. The work she could do as a worldling may be now forbidden by her conscience, and she must be helped to a higher individuality. When she turns from the worn and easy path of ignorance, frivolty and self-indulgence to the discipline of new purposes, this is her hour of greatest peril—the hour in which she pleads, inarticulately but earnestly and eloquently, not to be set adrift in the frail strength of untried resolutions, but to be given the higher education, the better industrial, social and moral opportunities that alone can meet all the needs of self-supporting women.

KENTUCKY CONVENTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I am writing in the Kentucky convention which is in session at Richmond. The committee on credentials reported forty-six delegates present, representing twenty-six local unions. I arrived from Chicago Tuesday evening. All along the way from Covington, ladies wearing the white ribbon, boarded the train, till on arrival at our destination there was quite a company of enthusiastic white-ribboners, ready for the work of the convention. I was assigned to a lovely home with Mr. and Mrs. Barnham.

Mrs. Somers, the mother of my hostess, is president of the local union here. I have seen little of the city, but enough to know that Richmond is a beautiful city in the very midst of the "Blue Grass" region.

The convention opened on Wednesday, October 1, with Mrs. Munnell, of Louisville, president of the state, in the chair. Mrs. Munnell is a very graceful presiding officer, and shows a familiarity with parliamentary rules, preserving excellent order, and carrying the business forward with despatch.

The recording secretary not being present, Mrs. Clayton, of Georgetown, was elected secretary pro tem, and fills the office admirably. The reports have been of great interest, and show faithful and efficient work, The corresponding secretary read a well prepared report giving an excellent showing of the work done by the local unions and not reported by the several superintendents. The treasurer's report given by Mrs. Bryan, the state treasurer, showed $767.22 received; $509.47 expended, with a balance in the treasury of $257.75.

The first and second evenings I occupied the platform and I never spoke to more attentive audiences. Both evenings the house was filled with most intelligent audiences showing the interest of the people in the temperance reform.

In my experience in different state conventions I have never seen a proportionately larger number of gifted women. The election of officers is to take place this afternoon, and probably the old officers will be elected. Mrs. Munnell, while not calling herself a speaker, is a leader of the women. I have never heard a better treasurer's report, and Mrs. Bryan is evidently the right woman in the right place. This is true regarding the corresponding secretary, and if the convention should put Mrs. Clayton, the secretary pro tem. into the recording secretary's office, it would be a good thing for the work, I feel sure, and Kentucky would have a list of general officers second to none.

The president's address, given yesterday, was finely written and intensely interesting. I am obliged to leave early in the afternoon, but I do so reluctantly, desiring very much to remain to the close, for the committee on resolutions will not report till about the last thing before final adjournment. This evening Mrs. Moore, of Owensboro, Ky., is to address the convention, and it would be a pleasure to listen to her.

Mrs. Moore has been for three years working for the Good Templars but has also done good work for the W. C. T. U., and will continue to do so. She goes to the far west this fall on account of the health of her only daughter, and this will be her field for the coming winter.

The Kentucky W. C. T. U. is in a prosperous condition. The secretary's report gave 1,448 as the total membership, but I think this did not include the new members secured on membership crusade day.

With so good a convention as a close for the present year's work and a "send off" for that just beginning we may expect to hear of a great increase of membership next year and a corresponding increase of work accomplished.

The people of the city have been most cordial, and altogether this is one of the pleasantest conventions I have ever attended. Sincerely, CAROLINE B. BUELL.

LATER—The old officers, with the exception of recording secretary, were all reëlected on the informal ballot, as was Mrs. Hubbell, of Lancaster, who fills the office of recording secretary. Mrs. Clayton was made vice-president-at-large.

TO THE WOMEN OF NEBRASKA.

Valiant Comrades in the Fight:

We know "your work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope." Soon you will come even unto the last, when the ounce of power will tell beyond tons of power that have been expended hitherto. The Brewers' Journal commenting upon the great decision just before you, says: "If the second amendment is carried, local option will be wiped out for it will make prohibition in the state unconstitutional." Nothing we are sure has spurred you onward like this consideration. No canvass has ever been made under such pressure, for in none has the alternative been so distressing. But on the other hand, if you succeed, you will have such promise of enforcement as has never been enjoyed, for your state will be practically surrounded by prohibition territory. To our minds the crucial question of this campaign is, "Will the women go to the polls?" Good and true men from all parts of the country are urging us to urge you to take upon you this final, and as you think, heaviest cross. Go with prayer and song, with pledge and temperance literature, with coffee and sandwiches and ballots. Establish yourselves as near the polls as practicable. Embellish your headquarters with whatever can suggest the appearance of a Christian home. Furnish, when you can, a buttonhole bouquet to each of those who vote for "God and Home and Native Land." Bring out the children in battle-array with songs and banners. Sometimes they have been conveyed in wagons from one polling place to another, singing such songs as,

"Dare to do right, dare to be true;
You have a work that no other can do."

Two or three days before the voting, fit out every child in Sunday-school and public school with an amendment ballot, asking them to see that somebody votes it for their sake. This has been a method of great value in past campaigns. The young ladies have helped us greatly in arranging for the crusade by the children. Let the older women assemble for prayer in the church, on the principle of old women for council, young women for war, and let the bells be rung every hour when the leaders are changed in the prayer-meeting. Sometimes the bells have been rung every seven minutes, as this is the interval of the passing knell of ruined lives because of drink. Let us encourage you by the statement, that having been at the polls many times, we never found any such lions in the way as the imagination had previously contrived. Men in America, in masses at least, always treat women with courtesy. Their morale is excellent in this regard. A dignified and womanly bearing furnishes the best credentials. Read the accounts in "Woman and Temperance" of how women went to the polls in different states, and see what a high day it was in Zion by reason of their presence. Even the conservative women of the South, now, in several of the states, are habitually present when the local option fight is on. The ministers are there illustrating applied Christianity all day long in their efforts to win votes for the home as against the saloon, and many a time when victory turned on Zion's side, the good pastor has led the victorious group of work-a-day Christians in singing the doxology, and lifted up his faithful hands in blessing as the day's work ended. So may it be in many a hamlet, village and town throughout the great young commonwealth, whose destiny is to be decided on next November 4th, and whether you win or lose, God will defend the right.

NATIONAL INTERSTATE PROHIBITION.

To the Local W. C. T. Unions of the United States:

On the 12th of September, the Hon. Henry W. Blair introduced in the Senate, and the Hon. J. D. Taylor, of Ohio, in the House of Representatives, a bill "to prohibit the importation, exportation and interstate transportation of alcoholic beverages." In the Senate the bill was referred to the committee on education and labor, of which Senator Blair is chairman; and in the House, to the committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic, of which the Hon. Mr. Taylor is chairman. The bill was prepared for the National W. C. T. U. by its attorney and superintendent of legislation and petitions, Mrs. Bittenbender. In drafting the bill, the law, prohibiting the importation of obscene literature, certain drugs, and other articles for immoral use, was followed. The bill reads:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons are prohibited from transporting from one state or territory of the United States, or the district of Columbia, to any other state or territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from any place in the United States to any foreign country, any alcoholic liquors as a beverage. All alcoholic liquors as a beverage, in the course of importation, exportation, or interstate transportation, shall be detained by the officer of customs, or other proper officer, and proceedings taken against the same as prescribed in the following section: Provided, That any alcoholic liquor, when not put up as a beverage, is excepted from the operation of this section.

SEC. 2. That whoever, being an officer, agent, or employee of the government of the United States, or a resident in the United States, shall violate, or knowingly aid or abet any person to violate any of the provisions of law prohibiting importing, exporting or interstate transporting of alcoholic liquors as a beverage, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall for every offense be punishable by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars, nor less than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than ten years nor less than ninety days, or both fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 3. That any judge of any district or circuit court of the United States, within the proper district, before whom complaint in writing of any violation of the two preceding sections is made, to the satisfaction of such judge, and founded on knowledge or belief, and, if upon belief, setting forth the grounds of such belief, and supported by oath or affirmation of the complainant, may issue, conformably to the Constitution, a warrant directed to the marshal, or any deputy marshal, in the proper district, directing him to search for, seize, and take possession of any such alcoholic liquors, and to make due and immediate return thereof to the end that the same may be condemned and destroyed by proceedings, which shall be conducted in the same manner as other proceedings in the case of municipal seizure, and with the same right of appeal or writ of error."

HOW AND WHEN TO PETITION FOR ITS PASSAGE.

Thousands of petitions, asking for passage of the bill, ought to be ready for presenting on convening of Congress in December. This petition work can well go hand in hand with that for passage of our bill "providing for a commission on the subject of the social vice."

It is likewise asked, then, as in that case: That the local Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of the United States, circulate petitions, in the subjoined forms, during October and November, and send them on the first Monday in December to Mrs. Ada M. Bittenbender, Washington, D. C. Mrs. Bittenbender will have them properly indorsed and then handed to the senators or members of the House of Representatives from the respective states from which the petitions came.

All signatures are desired on two petitions—one for the Senate, the other for the House of Representatives. One will not do for both bodies, as petitions are permanently retained when presented in either body. Do not copy names. It is against the rules of Congress to receive memorials or petitions containing copied names. Secure the adoption of the resolution embraced in the "form of representative petitions" by every temperance society; also, when possible, by every association, or convention, of clergymen, teachers, physicians, labor organizations, Sabbath-schools, Christian Endeavor societies, etc., which shall meet during these months. Be sure to properly fill all blank places in the forms.

(Form of Popular Petitions.)

PETITION FOR PROHIBITION OF THE IMPORTATION, EXPORTATION AND INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES.

(Circulated by the W. C. T. U. of———.)

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of———, county of———, State (or Territory) of———, respectfully petition for the passage of the bill providing that "all persons are prohibited from transporting from one state or territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other state or territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country to any place in the United States, or from any place in the United States to any foreign country, any alcoholic liquors as a beverage.

VOTERS.	ADULT NON-VOTERS.

(Form of Representative Petitions.)

PETITION FOR PROHIBITION OF THE IMPORTATION, EXPORTATION AND INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES.

(Procured by the W. C. T. U. of———.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The.....in..... assembled, held in....., on the .....day of....., 1890, numbering (or representing).....members, adopted the following resolution and directed the presiding officer and secretary to sign and transmit it to Congress, viz.:

Resolved, That we respectfully petition Congress to pass the bill providing that "all persons are prohibited, etc." (Follow "form of popular petitions" from here on, and have the two copies signed by the presiding officer and secretary.)

The enactment of such a law would enclose the traffic in alcoholic beverages within the respective states and territories where it still is permitted to be carried on. Each state, or territory, favoring the infamous business, would be forced to manufacture the poisonous drinks for consumption within her borders. But she could import, export and transport alcoholic liquors for all other uses, as now.

The pending Amendment to the Constitution of the United States includes also the manufacture and sale in its prohibition. The state traffic can be reached only through an amendment of the Federal Constitution. Let us, then, work with all our might for both of these measures. If the bill should be enacted first, great, indeed, would be the relief. If the Constitution should be amended first, it would do away with the necessity for the other measure by bringing entire relief through absolute prohibition.

The reduction in the revenue for support of the General Government, which either measure, if enacted, would cause, may be replaced in several ways. One way, which is being largely advocated, is a tax upon wealthy people, called an "income tax." Such a tax was levied and collected during the civil war, and for several years afterwards. Senator Gibson, of Louisiana, introduced in the Senate, September 1, a bill to provide for an "income tax." Is it not better to tax wealth rather than the vices of men?

BOSTON BARS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—There is a certain rum humor in the looks of a Boston saloon under the new "restriction" which forbids an "open bar."

Little tables are placed about the room, with chairs, tipplers and other furniture. On one side is a lunch counter, and on the other the bar, not open, but shut in by iron or steel rods fixed in the counter and extending up variously—according to "public sentiment"—from three feet to six in height. Back of this grating are the "members of the bar." It looks like a rehearsal by a party getting ready to go to jail, and trying to get used to it. To see a jolly bartender mixing drinks behind an iron grating would be grotesque if it were not so natural, and looking at a Boston saloon for the first time a stranger feels confused for an instant, as to whether it is a penitentiary or a "protected industry."

Orders are taken by waiters who go sadly, like the supernumeraries in a theater, and cry through the grate "Two whiskies"! or whatever the "long felt want" is—and presently receive and serve it. "The man in the iron mask" hardly looks up but doggedly works on like a man with a life sentence trying to close it out like a commodity at ten cents a breath under the name of "personal liberty,"

And the consumers?
Oh! they are the same everywhere,
The drunkard, a tippler italicized.
The sot, a gay youth brutalized.
A wink, a swagger,
A leer, a stagger,
A crime, a dagger,
A fall, a pall.
That's all,
And for all,
Some woman will wear——
—— That is another affair.

Boston, Oct. 8.

A CALL FROM SOUTH DAKOTA.

WOMEN OF SOUTH DAKOTA:—The men who were "on the Heights" during our fight for home protection last year, sent word all along the line,—"Have the women at the polls and we will carry the day." The result proved the wisdom of that rallying cry,

The battle to-day, my sisters, means more to us than that of last October. It means that our girls shall stand an equal chance with our boys in life's battles. It means that the mother love of South Dakota shall breathe upon the laws of our state. It means that 70,000 women shall have a fair swing at life as well as on the scaffold. While our brothers have not been unmindful of the political needs and demands of all other classes and conditions of the people of our state, even to the dusky inhabitants of the wigwam who were lately voted the courtesy of the floor in one of our political conventions, they have left us outside the fold as political orphans. With these facts staring us in the face, we fully realize that we women, and we alone, must fight it out on this line, and everything hinges on the work of the women on election day.

In every voting precinct, appoint a committee to make a house to house canvass, and get the women out to a meeting. At this meeting appoint a number to look after refreshments. The young women can make this a success. Detail others to solicit votes, and arrange to hold a prayer meeting before the polls open. Have the bells rung every hour to encourage those at the front.

Where possible, have the children out on parade three times during the day, out of school hours, with their flags, banners, mottoes and suffrage songs. If there are only a few children in the precinct, let them use the button-hole bouquets, as last year. Send to Will F. Bailey, Huron, S. D., for song books; also for copies of mottoes which you can get your local talent to print, paint, or draw on muslin, and place on the walls of every polling place.

In the country places, have a picnic at or near the polling places, with your basket dinners and suffrage songs making it a general jubilee. Everywhere serve lunch to all, if nothing more than hot coffee and sandwiches. But first of all, before election day, secure tickets of all the different parties, and see that they are printed according to the legal form, and then as far as possible, hold the judges of election to the count of the tickets according to the law on this form.

For an account of an old time women's rights rally, and for your own encouragement, I refer you to the first seven verses of the twenty-seventh chapter of Numbers. Read it, and then with a heart trusting in the same God, and with all womanly modesty and dignity, go up before the congregation of the Princes of South Dakota and present your just cause, and that same God will give us the victory.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let no friends of the Temple, old or young, be without a mite-box in which to gather their own pennies and those of their friends. Remember every two cents you send pays for a brick in the great structure. A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, Temple bulletin, and descriptive card. There are only two weeks more in which to secure names for the corner-stone; let the unions be actively at work obtaining autographs of members. We again urge all unions and Loyal Temperance Legions who have handsome silk banners to loan them to us to be used during the ceremony of laying the corner-stone. Please forward them at once to Miss Esther Pugh, 161 La Salle street, Chicago. She will see that they are safely returned. All express companies will carry them free of charge. Please write on the outside of the package, "For the corner-stone ceremony of the Temple."

Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, is not only one of the most eloquent and logical speakers of this or any country, but she is also a poetess of very high order. She is to be present at the laying of the cornerstone and will read a poem, she has written for the occasion.

A letter has also been received from dear mother Thompson. She is much better and gives us hope that she will be present at the great ceremony. We have put her down on the program for the reading of the Crusade Psalm. Mrs. Thompson writes: "I do wish I could say just what I think and feel about this wonderful Temple; but I can say—that I believe it is of the Lord, and that you have been marvellously helped, and my earnest prayer to Almighty God, is, that "engines may be invented by cunning men (and women) to be on the towers and on the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones" (of truth) at the monster evil, to humanity, against which we battle, in the name of the God of Jacob."

The following railroads will carry all persons who desire to attend the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the Temple at one and one-third railroad rates: Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé railroad; Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern railroad; Burlington & Missouri River railroad; Chicago & Alton railroad; Chicago & Northwestern railroad; Chicago, Burlington & Northern railroad; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific railroad; Chicago, St. Paul, Minnesota & Omaha railroad; Chicago, St. Paul & Kansas City railroad; Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad; Kansas City, St. Joseph & Council Bluffs railroad; Illinois Central railroad; Iowa Central railroad; Milwaukee, Lake Shore & Western railroad; Milwaukee & Northern railroad; Minneapolis & St. Louis railroad; Missouri Pacific railroad; Rock Island & Peoria railroad; Sioux City & Pacific railroad; St. Joseph & Grand Island railroad; St. Louis, Keokuk & Northwestern railroad; Union Pacific railroad; Wabash railroad and Wisconsin central lines. Miss Helen L. Hood, 161 La Salle street has charge of railroad rates for the corner stone ceremony. Let all who desire any further information on this point address her

The Hillsboro, Ohio W. C. T. U. sends $5 to the Thompson Memorial fund. Mrs. Gregg, the secretary, writes: "Although somewhat tardy about it, Hillsboro W. C. T. U. is none the less anxious to pay honor to the noble woman whom to know is to love." One dollar comes from "a friend" Winneconne, Wis. The Moscow, Pa. W. C. T. U., the Leominster, Mass. W. C. T. U., Chester, Ill. W. C. T. U., each send $1 to the fund.

Mrs. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Mass. (wife of Boston's eminent divine, Dr. A. J. Gordon), sends a check for $66, her first instalment on a pledge of $100. She writes: "I congratulate you on the growing prosperity of your enterprise on behalf of the National W. C. T. U." Mrs. John Drake, Corning, N. Y., sends a check for $50 as her first instalment on a pledge of $100. Her little orphan niece who lives with her, and is eleven years old, writes a nice letter and sends $2.50 from her mite-box. Mrs. Harriet Mason, of Attica, New York, sends $10, her second instalment on a pledge of $100. All cannot send large gifts like our three sisters already mentioned, but small gifts of which we receive so many, sent amidst self-denial and poverty, for His beautiful Temple, will be written in letters of gold in His book of remembrance. A dear sister from Idana, Kan., writes: "The inclosed $3 is the contents of John Cook's mite-box, I had hoped we could have done a little in our union, but the drought has so destroyed our crops that we can hardly live comfortably." Mrs. W. Ellsworth, Mazo Manie, Wis., sends $1 she earned for the Temple by quilting.

There are no gifts received for the Temple which come with more touching pathos than those given in memoriam. Some of the following are, indeed, very sacred gifts. Our own dear editor, Miss Mary Allen West, gives $100, in memory of her mother, Mrs. Catherine Neely West, Galesburg, Ill. A loving sister, Mrs. M. M. Robertson, East Jordan, Mich., sends $3 in memory of her brother, Edward J Kerhn, a noble Prohibitionist; the money was found in his pocket-book after his death. Mrs. A. S. D. Bates, Fabius, N. Y., sends $1; the money is very precious, having belonged to a sister who died forty years ago, two of the silver pieces having closed the eyes of her sister and also her mother, after death. Mrs. C. A. Van Warmer, Grand Forks, N. Dakota, sends $5 in memory of her uncle, Mr. B. R. Lyons, Montrose, Pa., a devoted Prohibitionist; he died August 19, aged eighty-eight years. Minnie E. Kenyon, Maitland, Mo., sends $2 in memory of her grandfather and grandmother, who died respectively at the age of eighty-six and eighty-four years; both were devoted to temperance.

THE LITTLE OLD WOMAN.

BY A. J. WATERHOUSE.

There's a little old woman lives down the street,
Old and wrinkled and worn is she;
The shoes are shabby upon her feet,
And her clothes are worn—though mended and neat,
And I used to smile when I chanced to meet
This little old woman, you see.

And I said, "What a homely old woman is this!
Shabby and wrinkled and worn and gray;
With clothes very plain and a comical phiz,
What a homely old woman it certainly is,
Were there ever a plainer my guess I shall miss."
And I smiled as I went on my way.

But one day I saw, as I passed down the street,
A wee, little waif, all alone;
Her way she had lost 'mid the hurrying feet,
Where the tides of humanity gather and meet;
'Though wet with great tears was the little face sweet,
None heeded her pitiful moan.

But the little old woman had noted her woe,
And she gathered the child to her there,
While her face was alight with a wonderful glow,
And I said to myself, "There was never, I know,
A more beautiful face, I am sure it is so;
Than this little old woman does bear."

I have written this story, dear children, for you,
And I think that you all will agree
A beautiful face must be loving and true,
And the eyes speak the heart—I am sure that they do—
No face can be plain with love shining through,
Like the little old woman's, you see.

A QUEER KIND OF TEMPERANCE.

BY MABEL GIFFORD.

CHAPTER II.

The next week an exultant voice shouted after Chaplin Noble as he crossed the upper end of H street, "Say you, look ahere, we're temp'rance fellows out 'n' out now. We've got an annex ter our pledge. We're all straight on swearin'."

Noble gave Pepper a hearty greeting. "Glad to hear it. All stopped swearing for good, right off, did you?"

"Jimminey crackey! I guess not; but we've got it in th' pledge, an' Pounce, that's the tall feller w'at shadders me, we 'pointed him cop, an' he 'rests every chap that's caught swearin' or that owns up ter it. Every feller w'ats 'rested 's shut up one night no matter w'ats in th' wind. Pretty tough sometimes when we're off fer larks or goin' ter th' theater."

Noble listened much amused, and he was a great deal more than amused.

"I don't suppose you were arrested," he remarked, immediately noting the dull red color burn through Pepper's tanned cheeks.

"I was th' first one," he confessed with a lugubrious smile, "an' I'm president."

"President?"

"Yes sir-r-ee! Didn't know that, did yer? I ben president ever sence th' Crusaders started. Them chaps couldn't git along 'thout me."

"What were you doing yesterday on the corner of A street, about five o'clock p. m.?"

Pepper threw up his head. "Peltin' Case Atkins. He's a reg'lar sneak thief. He insulted Pounce, 'n I owed him a thrashin' on my own account. He'll keep mum fer a spell."

"Temperance men don't fight," said Noble impressively.

"Bet yer life they do! That book w'at tells 'bout th' tribes an' gen'rations, the—w'at yer call it?—th' Bible; well that's full uv yarns 'bout fightin! It's a bang up book, jolliest book out, 'n all th' best fellers fight. I s'pose th' best fellers was temp'rance men, 'n th' Lord tole 'em ter fight 'n they always come out top uv th' heap."

"Did th' Lord tell you to beat Case?"

Pepper began to shift from one foot to the other, uneasily. "N-n-n-no, not zactly, but I had a ichin' ter git hole uv him, an' I knowed he needed it."

"Well, if you will notice when you read those stories, the Israelites conquered only when they fought under and according to the Lord's commands. They were so wicked and cruel they could not understand much except fighting. If the Lord had commanded them to stop fighting they could not have done it or understood it, but they could understand that they must fight in a different way, and as the Lord directed them. That was the beginning. In the Gospels we find them fighting not men, but sins. Sins are the real enemies. That is the kind of fighting you and I have to do."

"Well, I'll be snagged!" exclaimed Pepper, then, still ruminating over Noble's words, "I thought I was all solid on fightin'."

"This temperance business," said Pepper at the next meeting of the Crusaders, "This temperance business is blamed queer. I thought when we signed off on alcohol an' terbaccer we was all right; but there's a good deal more to it. I s'pose them temp'rance folks jus' started us on alcohol, like th' Lord did th' Israelites on fightin'.

"Now, fellers, I'd a blamed sight rather fight a boy than a sin. Yer can't cuff a sin when it comes interferin' aroun'. But them Hatton cranks haint a goin' ter beat us in this 'ere business."

A few days later Pepper halted in his usual abrupt way before Chaplin Noble.

"I say, you; fightin' sins takes a heap more pluck than fightin' chaps."

"You're right there," replied Noble earnestly, "It takes a smart man and a good soldier to fight sin."

Pepper strode on with his head high in air. "I'm president, I won't cave. I guess we can stan' it as long as th' other chaps. He's a brick; he knows how 'tis hisself."

The next greeting from Pepper was—"We fellers gives yer an invite ter our meetin'. Will yer come?"

Noble answered with a hearty affirmative, and there was considerable excitement at the next gathering of the Crusaders, but the expected guest failed to make his appearance. The second and third club night passed and still no visitor.

"Ho!" exclaimed Pounce, the tall shadow, "them fellers is all talk. Wa't do they care 'bout us chaps? It's easy 'nough ter preach; they wouldn't turn their hands ter give us a lift."

"Shet up!" commanded the president in a dangerous voice. "Don't you 'spose he has nothin' ter do but run after street gamin?"

But it was very evident from Pepper's voice and temper that he was greatly disappointed, though determined not to acknowledge it. Chaplin Noble had sown good seed, but the tender plants springing from it were nearly blasted by his neglect. The ladies in charge of the rooms where the boys met, overheard most of the conversation among the members of the Crusaders, and after that third night of disappointment, a note was sent to Chaplin Noble that resulted in his prompt appearance at the next meeting.

Some practical advice, and a fine speech, added to apologies, completely restored him to favor, and the respect of the Crusaders for the "Hatton chap" was rather increased when he pleaded "important business" as an excuse for his absence. He set the seal to their good opinion of him by concluding with an invitation to the president to meet with the Hatton club.

Noble was really an earnest, Christian worker, and he learned a lesson that night, that he never forgot. He was careful thereafter not to permit "important business" to interfere with the keeping of his promises, and heeded well the warning that a grain of thoughtlessness would undo a great deal of good work.

"He hain't a swell," said Pounce decidedly, "but blest ef he don't look like one."

Pepper was present at the next meeting of the Hatton's and his ambitious heart was filled with pride at the honor conferred. His keen eyes and ears took in everything, and he made practical application of his observations among his own subjects. And as Chaplin Noble came to realize his power for good or ill over Pepper and his followers, so the Hatton Club learned through Pepper's unflagging efforts to model the Crusaders after them, what an influence they were and what a power they might become.

There were more interchanges, and at last not only one or two members but the entire clubs united. The ladies declared that the "Noble Crusaders"—as they called themselves—did more missionary work than all the ministers and teachers combined. But the ministers and teachers and the Hattons were the big wheels of the engine of reform, that set the little wheels in motion, and they were also the faithful hands that guided the work so well begun. Pepper is still president; the Crusaders will have no other. He is still short and stout, not so bold of face, more dignified and manly and has taken to studying books. He often remarks, "Boys, there's a good deal to this temp'rance business. It's a responserble position we're in. It takes a plucky man an' a good soldier ter fight sin."

There is no honor esteemed greater among the boys, than membership in the "Noble Crusader's Club."

WHAT DO YOU DO WITH YOUR SENSES?

Not your "common sense," though it has much to do with what I wish to find out about, but your five senses that dwell in the tips of your fingers, and the tip of your tongue, in your nose, your ears and your eyes. God gave them to you so that you might learn about the world around you; and how much you know, and how well you know it, depends upon how well you use your senses. Each one of your senses can be cultivated so as to give you an immense amount of knowledge, or if you are a heedless chap, you can go through life gaining very little knowledge through your senses. Now is the time to cultivate them; let us see whether or not you have done so.

Can you calculate the weight of a book or a ball, by holding it in your hand, by "hefting it," as the old folks say?

Can you "measure by your eye" and tell within two inches the length of your school desk or of the bureau in your bedroom? Try it, and if you cannot, keep on looking and measuring until you can. When you can tell the length of horizontal measurements, try those that are perpendicular, like the length of a door, or the height of a room. Are you good at "matching colors"? Ever so many pretty plays can be devised, which cultivate the power to distinguish colors, and this power is a very useful one, whether you wish to become dressmakers, or artists, salesmen, or trainmen. Some people are color-blind, that is, they cannot tell one color from another. Many railroad accidents have occurred through color-blindness in the trainmen; they could not tell the difference between the red signal light and the green one. Because of this, most railroads now examine applicants, and if they are color blind, will not employ them. Very many more men than women are color blind, and I have heard wise men say it was because of their using tobacco and liquor. This certainly has much to do with it, for the perfection of our senses depends upon the healthfulness of our nerves, and tobacco and liquor are the worst enemies the nerves have. Yet I think that much depends upon the cultivation of the senses, when we are little.

When you have learned to match colors accurately when they are side by side, practice "carrying colors and shades in your eye," so that you can go to a store without the sample and match a color from memory. I remember that when I was a child there was a story in our Third Reader about a Scotch tailor who was blind, yet could match the colors in the tartan plaids by the sense of touch. I did not quite believe the story then, for I could not understand how any one could see with his fingers; but now I do believe it, for I have seen blind children do just as wonderful things. We do not wish to become blind to learn to educate our sense of touch, but from the blind we can learn what this sense can do. Test your own touch and find out how much it can tell you. Does it tell you which material is silk, which linen, which cotton or which woolen?

Then how delicate is your sense of taste! Can you tell whether it is beef or veal or mutton in the nice roast you eat for dinner? Can you decide what flavor is used in your ice cream or soda water? Let me tell you a secret; people who smoke cigarettes or use tobacco in any form, drink liquor or eat much pepper or mustard never have such a delicate sense of taste as those who do not, and so cannot enjoy the delicate flavoring of their food as well as those who do not; I think this is one reason why many men think their mother's cooking was better than their wives' is; when they ate their mother's cooking their sense of taste had not been spoiled by all sorts of stuff.

Right above your mouth is your nose; taste and smell are near neighbors so they can help each other. How keen is your sense of smell? Can you tell by smelling with your eyes shut, the difference between a rose leaf and one from the maple tree? Can you distinguish the different flowers in a bouquet in the same way? Or tell whether a piece of paper is blank, or has printing on it?

Now, what about your ears? Can you tell by the sound whether the carriage coming is drawn by one horse or two? Or whether a single horse is trotting, cantering or galloping? By the way, do you know how the horse's feet come down in trotting and in galloping? If you live in the city near a double track street railroad, can you tell by the sound which direction the cars are going? If near a river, can you tell by its whistle where the steamboat is? There are ever so many more tests for your sense of hearing you can think up for yourselves; try them, they will cultivate your hearing.

Here are some tests for a variety of senses, some of them include the test for two or three senses at the same time: Can you walk among trees in the dark without hitting them, or can you keep to the path in the dark? What sense or senses will enable you to do this? Can you go to your room in the dark and walk straight to your match safe without stumbling over the furniture, or can you go out of the room and take hold of the knob of the door without fumbling? If you are in a strange forest, can you tell which way is north and which is south by examining the bark on the tree trunks? Here are ever so many more questions for your Quizz classes.

BIRTHDAY SONNET TO FRANCES E. WILLARD.

BY MARY A. RIPLEY.

Ah, dear and mild Madonna! Calm and pure
Thou shinest down from that serener height
Whereon thou standest in thy royal right,
To watch the field and make the triumph sure.
Thy simple speech shall be the charm to lure
The captive from the dragon-dens of night,
And bring to thy fair realm of morning-light,
And be a grace divine for perfect cure.
I see the glory gather while I look;
It grows and glows about the chastened brow;
I seek the babe upon the mother heart,
And, lo! I find a Cause, forlorn, forsook;
Erstwhile in bands of death, but conquering now;
And my grand picture shames all Raphael' art.

ON THE BRIDGE OF SIGHS.

BY ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS.

It chanceth once to every soul,
Within a narrow hour of doubt and dole,

Upon life's bridge of sighs to stand,
A palace and a prison on each hand.

O, palace of the rose heart's hue!
How like a flower the warm light falls from you!

O, prison with the hollow eyes!
Beneath your stony stare no flowers arise!

O, palace of the rose-sweet sin!
How safe the heart that does not enter in!

O, blessed prison walls! how true
The freedom of the soul that chooseth you!

SELF HELP FOR YOUNG MEN.

BY EVA KINNEY GRIFFITH.

I do not believe in entertaining young men to make them good, any more than I believe in giving children candy to induce them to mind. Nor am I in full accord with the many preachers and writers, who are always pitying young men, and in reality excusing them for not being good, because their homes are unpleasant, or boarding houses dreary.

Granted that these latter things make one liable to temptation, yet do we ever hear these same preachers and writers excusing women for being bad, or expecting them to go to saloons because their abiding places happen to be unattractive? Oh, no, young women are expected to be good any how, whether their surroundings are pleasant or not. And if young men were held to the same high standard, many of them would set their wits to working to improve their surroundings, rather than to rush out upon the street in search of a pleasant place some one else had fixed up for them. As antidotes to saloons, reading-rooms, coffee-houses and parlor entertainments have not proved to be successful in proportion to the effort and money expended in keeping them up.

There are four things which the young man who has been at work at some steady employment during the day, is in search of when evening and release from work come to him; these are physical relaxation, unrestrained social intercourse, noise and something exciting.

The healthy young man is overflowing with physical vitality. After a day's work in which he has used but one set of muscles, the rest of the muscles are just aching to be used. The reading room furnishes no opportunity for physical exercise, while in the saloon, out of sight of people of propriety, he can run, jump, laugh or shout as much as he pleases. He longs for social intercourse, but he does not want to sit up in a parlor and be decorously entertained by people who keep him at such a distance. He wants to laugh, chat, change his position, stretch out his limbs, throw off his coat, dance a jig, and a hundred other things, innocent in themselves, which would not be proper in a lady's parlor. All of these things he is at perfect liberty to do in the house of "the strange woman," or in the saloon. His favorite noise is music; not classic music—he may learn to like that after a while—but in his unformed years, he is attracted by quick music, comic songs, love ballads and the like, in which he, himself can take a part.

No young man of pride cares to sing "Down went McGinty" or "Johnny, get your gun," in a lady's parlor before company. No, he must get off with the boys to sing such songs as those, and yet he wants to sing them. The young man, in common with all the rest of humanity, loves excitement, and after a day of quiet in the workshop or office, he feels that he must have it. He goes out in search of it, and the theaters or the gambling hall takes him in.

Now if we would save young men from these temptations, one of two things must be done. Either the young man's nature must be changed, or some method of enjoying these things innocently must be found. I believe something can be done along both lines. Education and circumstances do tone the young man down until his muscles, accustomed to regular work, do not require so much exercise; a home of his own, and business friendships, furnish the unrestrained social intercourse; his taste for music is educated until he prefers the classic to the comic; and his love of excitement finds its legitimate channel in ambitious business enterprises and great philanthropic schemes.

But all this takes time, and meanwhile many a young man is caught in the tangle of conflicting temptations and ensnared to his ruin. What shall we do about it?

First of all, every mother who has boys growing up, should seek to teach them that they have a responsibility in making home pleasant. It should not be mother and sisters making home pleasant for father and the boys, but father, mother, boys and girls, all uniting to make home pleasant for each other. Boys as well as girls should be taught to select pictures, carpets and decorations for their own rooms, and consulted as to the rest of the house. In a hundred different ways, boys can be taught to make their own rooms homelike; then, when they go out in the world and find themselves abiding in a bare room at some hotel or boarding house, they will have the taste and skill to fix up their rooms until they shall seem homelike, instead of being driven out upon the street by the bareness inside.

Every home should have a time and place in which the young men of the family can invite in their acquaintances, and laugh, sing songs, dance jigs and even wrestle if so disposed. The parlor should have its unconventional home manners, and all stiffness and undue formality should be banished. It is not necessary that unlicensed rudeness should be tolerated, but laughter, muscular exercise and easy familiarity should have a place in every home.

Next, let us turn our attention to the boarding house. There is no question but that boarding in professional boarding houses is one of the evils of American life. Cannot this evil be softened by philanthropists giving some attention to this institution? No boarding house should be tolerated that does not have a common parlor, free to all boarders, where music and games of an innocent character are allowed. Large boarding houses should have a gymnasium attached, open to all at certain hours, where young men and women, who are engaged in sedentary employment during the day, can have an opportunity for needed exercise in a legitimate way.

But most of all, encourage young men to help themselves. In Minneapolis, four young men became tired of boarding house life, rented a furnished flat of five rooms and set up housekeeping, hiring a woman in the same building to cook for them. The experiment was a success. At the end of the month they found that their expenses had been hardly as large as their combined board bill would have been, and they had had the comfort of having their own parlor where they could do as they pleased.

These four young men happened to be musicians, and they sawed their fiddles, twanged the piano and played the banjo to their hearts' content, without disturbing any one. Other young men might do the same if they only thought of it.

Young men everywhere should be encouraged to invent harmless amusements for themselves, and ways to get the exercise and excitement they crave without going to the saloon, the gambling hall, or the low theater. If one-half the money some young men spend on cigars and drink, were spent in hiring rooms, in groups of fours and sixes, and furnishing them to their own tastes, they would have places to spend their evenings where they could have just as much fun as in the saloon, and that, too, in a perfectly harmless way.

I do not encourage the club, because the club is a crowd, and the club room loses its home feeling. Four young men of congenial tastes can have a better time together than twenty-five young men, a part of whom are uncongenial, possibly can.

Last, not least, appeal to the heroic in young men. Do not for a moment insinuate that they are so weak that they cannot help going to saloons simply because they have no pleasant place to spend their evenings. Every young man is capable of moral heroism, and that heroism once aroused will carry him through the most scorching temptations, no matter how unpleasant his surroundings may be.

Self-trust is the essence of heroism.—Emerson.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING OCTOBER 26. 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

Sunday, 26; Luke 22: 39-53. Verse 39, The example of Jesus shows us that we should have a place and times for meditation and prayer; and that we should resort to prayer at every important turn and crisis in life. Verse 40, The sore trials and prayers of our Lord did not hinder Him from showing interest in His disciples. We should look to Him for strength in every time of temptation. Verse 53, There are times when Satan seems to have everything his own way; but dreadful as our experiences at these times may be, we should imitate the calmness of our Lord, when now the powers of darkness seemed to triumph over Him. God will deliver us from our great adversary.

Monday, 27; Isa. 25. Verse 1, This chapter opens with thanksgiving to God for the destruction of Babylon and the deliverance of the Jews. Verse 6, The church of Christ, or Mt. Zion, which is for all the people of God, both Jews and Gentiles, was opened up at Jerusalem. Its work is to go on, and Christ will dispel from the world the darkness of ignorance and sorrow. Verse 10, Moab was an inveterate enemy of Israel, and is used here to represent the enemies of the church in general, all of whom shall be destroyed.

Tuesday, 28; Isa. 26. Verse 1, After the deliverance, foretold in former chapters, Israel is to sing this song of praise and thanksgiving. We are safe if we have the presence of God with us. Verse 3, Though storms of trial rage without, the mind that is stayed on Christ may have perfect peace. Verse 21, Christians should not become impatient at the slow progress of the kingdom, and complain; but they should calmly and confidently await the issue of things.

Wednesday, 29; Isa. 27. Verse 1, This chapter continues the account of Israel's chastisements, and God's judgments on all the enemies of Himself and the church. Verse 7, The wicked are destroyed by God's judgments; but his people are punished that they may be purified and saved from destruction.

Thursday, 30; Isa. 28. Verse 1, "The crown of pride" was the city of Samaria, which was the capital of Ephraim, by which we are to understand the kingdom of the ten tribes of Israel. Samaria had a vicious, drunken population. The moral and spiritual consequences of drunkenness are such that it always brings the wrath of God down on a people. Verse 16, Christ is the precious corner-stone upon which we can all safely build. I Pet. 2: 6.

Friday, 31; Isa. 29. Verse 1, "Ariel" means "lion of God," and stands for the city of Jerusalem. Verse 6, By the wars waged by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, and afterwards by Rome, the ancient church would seemingly be destroyed. Verse 10, God only shuts the eyes of those who will not see. Verse 17, The reproduction of the old church in a new and far more glorious form, will reclaim those whose hearts have been like a moral desert, and lead them to bear the fruits of righteousness.

Saturday, 1; Isa. 30. Verse 1, It was the sin and folly of Israel to seek foreign aid against their enemies, and neglect God and the help He alone could give. There is too much trust now in money, talents, position, and worldly favor. Verse 10, The truth of God's word should be our creed, and our practice should be molded by that. Woe is to those who preach soft to the people.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(The Bible our Rule of Faith and Practice. Isa. 8: 19: 20.)

1. Some have tried to find a rule in human reason, unaided by the Bible; but their unhappy drifting from one opinion to another, and the darkness that settled over their last days, in nearly all the cases we have known of this class, convince us that we want a better rule as our guide.

2. The text refers to the strange delusion of those who have tried to find a rule in spiritism. There are hearts that have been doomed to sadness to the day of their death, by the errors and sins into which they were led while they looked to this demoniacal influence as a guide.

3. Those who have honestly, and sincerely, and fully taken God's Word as a rule of faith and practice, have never been disappointed in the outcome. In their case it is not true that there is "no light in them;" for with advancing years their lives become more and more profitable to the world, and hope for the future world grows brighter and brighter. Practical experience positively demonstrates that the effect of the Bible, truly received as a guide in life, is always good. II. Tim. 3: 16.

SOME ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Its immense cost is a powerful argument against it; though by no means the strongest. The annual drink bill, enormous as it is, is a trivial consideration compared with the souls destroyed, the homes wrecked, the hearts broken by the liquor traffic. The misery and moral ruin involved seem to be quite forgotten by that class of careless and indifferent thinkers who say that we should "tax our vices," and since manufacturers and vendors make large profits, they should pay a high license fee for the privilege. But it is not merely the privilege to make exceptional gains that the license gives; it is to ply a trade that debauches citizens, unfits them for the proper performance of their duties as such, and so, threatens the stability of government. The legitimate objections of political economy to this traffic apply to the whole cost, and not merely to that part of it which is represented by dollars and cents. Ignorance, misery, pauperism and crime are economic evils, and the most amazing fact of the times is that there are men who claim to have some knowledge of ethics and respect for its requiremunts, but insist that it is right to license a business which produces such horrible results.

The truth is that the men who advocate license are influenced only by selfishness, which in this as in other cases is always shortsighted. They talk about making the traffic pay what it costs, but forget that they themselves are compelled to foot a very large part of that bill. Indeed they do not seem to have anything like an adequate conception of how great those costs are to the nation and to themselves.

The liquor traffic withdraws from useful production and commerce, a vast army of men;—millions who for a considerable part of the time are incapacitated for work by drink, and millions who are engaged in the business. It is said that every twentieth man in the country is a producer or vendor of drink. As to the producers or manufacturers, their product is useless (and worse) and all the labor entering into it is taken away from useful production. If fifty more men could be added to every 950 making cloth, the effect would be to cheapen cloth in proportion. We all pay more for cloth, and have less of it, because the fifty men are making whisky and beer.

In the 300,000 or more wholesale and retail liquor establishments of the country there are probably twice as many men employed. We all pay more for cloth, grain, and other necessaries of life, and have less of them, because these five or six hundred thousand men are withdrawn from this production to sell drink. Add to the millions who are employed in making drunkards, the much larger army of their victims who produce little or nothing and we may have some idea of the enormous cost to the people of this first item. An immensely larger matter is the fact that money paid by drinkers for whisky and beer cannot be paid by them for the necessaries of life. The rags on the backs of drunkards and their families advertise the fact that the cotton and woolen mills of the country have been cheated out of custom by producers and vendors of drink.

Then comes the cost to the people at large of supporting the drunkards, paupers, insane and criminals made by drink. Every one of the army of policemen, magistrates, physicians, wardens and nurses in asylums and prisons and out of them who are employed in caring for the victims of drink or in protecting society from their depradations, are engaged in non-productive work and withdrawn from the productive industries of the country. Everything we eat, drink and wear or use in any way costs more on this account. Besides, these men have to be paid for their services. Who pays them? Not the liquor dealers and drinkers. They pay only about one thirtieth of this bill of costs; and the temperance men who vote for license in order to "make the traffic pay its costs, "pay the other twenty-nine thirtieths.

It is time that men who can be reached only by arguments which appeal to their selfishness, who vote to license the saloon on the corner which destroys their children, in order to lessen their taxes for schools, streets, sidewalks or the like, whose hearts are so hard that they cannot be touched with pity or moved to indignation by the sufferings of the drunkard's wife and children,—time that their eyes were opened and they were made to see what fools they are in a strictly business point of view.

They should see that it is a general law of economic society as well as a fundamental truth of Christianity, that "an injury to one is the concern of all," for selfish as well as for humanitarian reasons; because if one suffer all must suffer. The bleeding of the poor by the drink traffic, bleeds also the rich and temperate. The high-license temperance man contributes to the drink bill every time he buys a loaf of bread or a suit of clothes. Everybody of whom they buy has to charge a little more because the drink business has reduced his custom or increased the cost of his goods. We are all paying the vast liquor bill of the nation, and we ought to, so long as we tolerate the business. The only persons who should be exempt from these taxes are those who are fighting the traffic to the death, and have no faith in any proposed remedy except prohibition. They are mulcted enough in the thousand and one ways which the majority have of punishing "fanatics." Z.

THE NECESSITY FOR CONSCIENTIOUS RULERS.

[As this valuable contribution to the Symposium of Oct. 2, was received too late for mention then, we give it place now.]

W. Jennings Demorest:

The multifarious character and magnitude of the interests that grow out of the demands of a large community for protection from appointed guardians, make the obligations and selection of these guardians a matter of the greatest possible importance.

As the highest good and welfare of the people can only be secured when the wisest, best, and most conscientious men are selected to guard and direct the affairs of a large community, to put the lives and properties of the people in the hands of unscrupulous men, especially men whose education, instincts and interests are associated with the vilest dens in the community, is to invite crime, jeopardize every home, and degrade every department of the people's interests.

Thie is too evident to need any argument; yet we find our country is, in all its political aspects, now under the dominion and control of the liquor dealers, a class of men whose very business has become a synonym for the most abject degradation, a business that not only demoralizes the whole people, but has not one redeeming feature of a moral character; a business that blights and blasts the whole community with the mildew of crime, pauperism and debauchery.

What wonder that we have vice and corruption pervading the whole field of politics, that chicanery and plunder in public office is the rule, and not the exception?

What wonder that 8,000 dens of vice and crime are legalized in the city of New York, and in like proportion in other cities all over the land? What wonder that labor elements are everywhere disturbed, that anarchy, distrust, trainwrecking, murders, and other high crimes are so prevalent all over the world?

But why these terrible scenes in so-called civilized communities? The answer comes back with fearful truth: Alcoholic poisoning, justified by law, is responsible. The whole country is in a state of unrest, property is jeopardized, lives endangered, communities flooded with crime, misery, and pauperism, and all to gratify a vicious, degraded appetite, and in subserviency to the most dastardly and wicked selfishness.

There is but one remedy: ABSOLUTE PROHIBITION.

BRAVE DR. CHEEVER.

This was the title given to the author of "Deacon Giles' Distillery" by his classmate, Longfellow. The death of Dr. Cheever brings out many reminiscences of him. Horace Greeley was wont to call him "the man that made sinners miserable." A very Boanerges he was when attacking sin; rose-water methods of reform were too slow for him, and impersonal dealing with iniquity was a thing to make him frantic. Yet this son of thunder was the lovingest of men, tender and pitiful when dealing with the penitent sinner, as he was firm in denunciation of organized sin. He was a pioneer temperance worker, his vision of "Deacon Giles' Distillery" having been one of the first bombshells dropped into the enemies' camp. An old gentleman lately gave me a copy of this book, one of the first edition, with its quaint pictures. showing the deacon's distillery with the casks labelled, not "Rum," "Brandy," "Gin," but "Destruction," "Poverty," "Ruin," "Death." It is hard for us to realize the great commotion this harmless-looking pamphlet caused. Its immediate result was a riot and mobbing of Dr. Cheever in the streets of Salem, and his arrest for "libelling one of his church members," for Deacon Giles was a deacon in his own church. He was prosecuted, convicted and imprisoned for thirty days in Salem jail; that imprisonment made his Dream immortal. It had an immense circulation in this country and in Great Britain, was translated and largely circulated in the language of France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, Norway and Sweden.

Not long before his death Dr. Cheever related an instance of strange fruitage from this early seed-sowing. He had preached in Boston, and as he came down the aisle from the pulpit was accosted by a middle-aged, well-dressed stranger who introduced himself as Mr. Giles, the son of Deacon Giles, owner of the famous Salem distillery. "I stopped you, Dr. Cheever," he said, "to thank you for writing that Dream. It was the means of making me think of the evil effects of distilling intoxicating liquors, and determined me to give up distilling; further reflection under the influence of the Holy Spirit, led me to see that I was a lost and guilty sinner, and brought me to confess and renounce my sins and accept the offer of salvation through Jesus Christ." Dr. Cheever was very much touched by the incident.

Slavery as well as intemperance felt the weight of his blows; there was no evil which he did not denounce fearlessly. Nor was his work altogether polemic, he was a poet and philosopher as well as a brave fighter, and as the smoke of battle drifts away, posterity will love him for his poetry as we now venerate him for his fearless denunciation of wrong.

FORM OF RESOLUTION.

The autumn conventions are being held, and often letters come to us for counsel as to the best form of resolution on political questions. Perhaps nothing better can be suggested than the one adopted at our last National Convention in Chicago, 1889, which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That while we decline to go back on our record, and place tests of membership in our Constitution that might cause some of our members to feel as unwelcome as Prohibition party women now know themselves to be under the "non-partisan" clause introduced into the Constitution of Iowa W. C. T. U., we still declare that we are not now, and never have been, either sectarian or a partisan body, inasmuch as our organic law touches neither of these questions; but that this does not prevent us from expressing through our resolutions in the annual Convention, our approval of any and all national parties that shall incorporate prohibition into their platforms, embody the principles of prohibition in their candidates, and enforce prohibition with all their executive power."

As the political press has not ceased trying to make out that the National W. C. T. U. is self-contradictory concerning the words "partisan" and "non-partisan," we quote what was said at Chicago on that subject in the last annual address of the President of the union:

"We object to the misleading prefix or affix "non-partisan" by means of which the dissenting minority seeks to attach to us the stigma of "partisan." We have always been willing to call ourselves "partisan" until that term has been construed to mean that we were shut up to the recognition of a single political organization, and such a definition we will not accept. We have the partisanship that in Illinois makes us lend our influence to the Prohibition party; in South Dakota to the Republican and nationally to the Prohibition party. But so far as being pledged, everlastingly, to any one political organization is concerned, we are "strictly non-partisan." As has been said a thousand times, we have never added to the tests of membership in the National W. C. T. U., which were, at the beginning, total abstinence and the payment of constitutional dues. Nor has any state added to these tests save Iowa, which has so narrowed the broad basis of the National W. C. T. U., that a woman who sympathizes with the Prohibition party is practically disfellowshiped, while in this convention are Republicans and Democrats, Prohibitionists and Union Labor party members, united in our departments of work, and only disagreeing as to the political method by which the liquor system shall be outlawed. For several years it has been our custom to adopt a resolution in the National W. C. T. U. convention and in most of the states, to the effect that our good word, good-will, and prayers (inasmuch as we have neither money nor votes to give) shall be with the party that puts forward prohibition as its primary issue; and since the Prohibition party is, in most of the states, and nationally, the only one that does this, we have for five years included its name in our resolutions. But we would just as readily include that of the Republican, Democratic, or any other party that would make a declaration similar to this, which all our acts and words as a society have for so many years declared, namely, that the saloon must go.

THE FIRST NATIONAL CONVENTION.

As the meeting of the National W. C. T. U. approaches, everything connected with its history is of interest. In looking over some treasured clippings we found the report made in a Chicago daily of the first meeting of the National W. C. T. U., the meeting at which the body was organized, held in Cleveland sixteen years ago. The report says that the convention was in session three days and transacted a large amount of business; it expresses great faith in the movement, because it says, "we have great faith both in woman and in God." It gives the constitution and the resolutions adopted; we quote the latter in full, because of their historic interest and because they foreshadow many of our present lines of work. In the last resolution we recognize a sentiment that has now gained a hearing all round the globe.

WHEREAS, Much of the evil by which this country is cursed comes from the fact that the men in power whose duty it is to make and administer the laws are either themselves intemperate men or controlled largely by the liquor power; therefore

Resolved, That the women of the United States, in this convention represented, do hereby express their unqualified disapprobation of the custom so prevalent in political parties of placing intemperate men in office.

Resolved, That we respectfully ask the President of the United States, senators, representatives in Congress, governors of states, and all public men, with their wives and daughters, to give the temperance cause the strength of their conspicuous example by banishing all wines and other intoxicating liquors from their banquets and their private tables.

Resolved, That we will appeal to the House of Representatives, by petition, for their concurrence with the Senate bill providing a commission of inquiry into the effects and results of the liquor-traffic in this country.

Resolved, That all good temperance women, without regard to sect or nationality, are cordially invited to unite with us in our great battle against the wrong and for the right.

Resolved, That in the conflict of moral ideas we look to the pulpit and the press as our strongest earthly allies, and that we will by our influence as Christian women, and by our prayers strive to increase the interest in our cause already manifested by their powerful instrumentalities, gratefully recognized by us.

Resolved, That we will pray and labor for a general revival of religion throughout our land, knowing that only through the action of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of the church and the world will they be warmed to a vital interest in the temperance cause.

Resolved, That we endeavor to secure the co-operation of great manufacturing firms in our effort to pledge their employees to total abstinence, and that we ask these firms to consider the advantages to sobriety of paying their men on Monday rather than on Saturday evening.

Resolved, That we respectfully request the physicians to exercise extreme and conscientious care in administering intoxicating liquors as a medicine.

Resolved, That recognizing the fact that our cause is and will be combated by mighty, determined, and relentless forces, we will, trusting in Him who is the Prince of Peace, meet argument with argument, misjudgment with patience, denunciation with kindness, and all our difficulties and dangers with prayer.

Mrs. Annie Wittenmeyer, of Philadelphia, Pa., was elected president of the society; Miss Frances E. Willard, of Chicago, Ill., corresponding secretary; Mrs. Mary E. Johnson, of Brooklyn, N. Y., recording secretary; and Mrs. W. A. Ingham, of Cleveland, Ohio, treasurer.

THE YEAR'S FEASTS OF INGATHERINGS.

Within the past two weeks several state conventions have been held, and the record of the year's work has been closed. Great advance all along the line is noticeable, especially the line of thorough, systematic work in the departments. As yet we have only telegraphic reports from New York, but those indicate a grand convention. New Hampshire gathered her forces at Dover, September 30, and marshalled in line her twenty-four departments which have done solid work during the year; she enters upon the new year joyous and hopeful, under the leadership of her tried commanders.

Illinois was one of the states which the seceders notified us were to be their principal points of attack. It has been so, but this attack has only served to draw the Old Guard nearer to each other, and to bring an unprecedentedly great increase in membership. The report of the state secretary, Helen L. Hood, was a masterly showing of grand work accomplished, and the reports of superintendents of departments emphasize the fact that never in its history had the state made such a year's progress. In membership the increase is nearly one thousand, counting up to 14,500; the evangelistic department reports at least fifty per cent more work done than in any previous year; approved text-books for temperance teaching have been introduced into over a thousand schools, through the work of the W. C. T. U.; these are but samples of reports in all departments. The greatest harmony pervaded the convention, and Mrs. Rounds was reëlected president, with practical unanimity. Thursday night Miss Willard spoke to an audience of two thousand people, and nearly as many listened to Mrs. Rounds' annual address the night before. Not one discordant note broke the grand harmony which swelled from thousands of hearts as the year's work stood out before us, and our deepest feelings found voice in "What hath God wrought."

SUNDAY CLOSING.

THE combat deepens over opening the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. The Chicago Evening Post opens its columns to the discussion, pro and con, and is receiving votes on the question. Thus far the "Yes" votes are in advance of the "No's," though each day the "No's" seem to gain a little. Friends of the Sabbath will do well to wake up and send in their votes, that they may count on the right side when the result is reported to the commission. With the votes many send in reasons for or against Sunday closing. One gentleman impartially gives both sides thus: Pro—Because we do not recognize a divine law; we are too selfish to sacrifice a little worldly pleasure for the soul's good; we never carry our belief to that degree which necessitates any material sacrifice; we either cannot distinguish between right and wrong or are purposely blind to a distinction. Con—For the moral effect it will have upon the community; the credit it will bear our people; the good it will do our city by setting an example; the love and respect we bear our Creator. Professor Swing thinks that the horticultural exhibits, the art department and such exhibits as relate to the progress of education should be kept open, but would have no roar of machinery; there should be devotional music and addresses in the morning, and other music in the afternoon. He recommends having a great tabernacle on the grounds where non-sectarian religious services can be held. Victor Lawson, of the Daily News votes and argues for Sabbath closing; he takes the ground that while the Sunday question is, in some of its aspects, one for the individual conscience, in others it becomes a matter of national conscience, crystalized into a national institution, and protected by law. The Exposition being held in America should be controlled by the American idea rather than by an alien idea. Wherever the English language dominates a certain type of Sabbath observance prevails, varying in minor aspects, but alike in general character; that kind of Sabbath observance should govern the Exposition.

THE National Civil Service Reform League, at its late meeting in Boston, reëlected George William Curtis, president, and passed some sensible resolutions. It congratulated the country that the efforts to nullify the reform law during the late session of Congress were defeated in the House, being defended by leading members of both political parties; recognized the fact that 32,000 places in the public service are now filled up on fair and free competition by merit alone, while Commissioner Roosevelt gives assurances that ninety-two per cent of the clerks so appointed under the late administration have been retained. It recalls with satisfaction the action of the attorney-general sustaining the civil-service commission; the revocation of appointments made in defiance of reform law, and the indictment of persons for receiving political contributions. It commends the explanation of the civil-service commission before the House investigating committee, and congratulates the country upon the choice of civil-service commissioners of the present administration. Nevertheless it finds it necessary to remind the country that all the civil-service reform pledges made by the dominant party before election, have not been redeemed. These pledges were: First, that reform of the civil-service already auspiciously begun should be completed by the further extension of the reform system to all grades of the service. Second, that the spirit and purpose of reform should be observed in all executive departments. Third, that all laws at variance with the subject of existing reform legislation should be repealed. These pledges have been disregarded. The reform system has not been extended. Not only have not the spirit and purpose of reform been observed in all executive departments, but they have been often violated. The laws at variance with reform legislation have not been repealed, nor has there been any proposition for repeal. Against this practical contempt of pledges the league records its unqualified protest.

AMONG the many books issued from our printing press for outside parties, few have so soon found their place in popular favor as BIBLE TEMPERANCE STUDIES, by M. Josephine Griffiths, Professor of Bible and Ethics in Cook Academy, New York. The book is what its name indicates, studies in Bible temperance. Its matter is well selected and well put, with no packing, but in the condensed form workers must have. Dean Wright is already using it in his correspondence classes, and Bishop Vincent, after examining it, recommends it to be put into the Temperance Seal Course of Chautauqua readings. We have but one fault to find with it, and that is the calling of alcoholics, stimulants, as is done in the preface. However, this is but a small fly in the ointment. Copies may be ordered of the author, Fairport, New York; paper bound, forty cents apiece; cloth, sixty cents.

'The Watch-Tower.

Ella F. Gibson, of Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts, county superintendent of literature, reported this novel way of distributing it. One lady reaches the extremely poor through the ash barrel; into a discarded pair of boots are stuffed UNION SIGNALS, Message, Safeguard, or some other gospel reading and temperance tracts, or anti-tobacco leaflet. Tied in a strong paper they are sure to find their way into some poor child's basket. Big rolls of paper rags are treated in the same way; literally casting bread on the city's dump-heap instead of on the water. No city ordinance forbids, as yet, the dump carts distributing the gospel.

The W. C. T. U. of Michigan has been honored in having a member of its executive committee, Mrs. Jane M. Kinney, appointed president of the State Industrial School for Girls, at Adrian. The W. C. T. U. planned and worked for the establishment of this institution, and it is fitting that one of its prominent members should be called to this responsible position. Mrs. Kinney is eminently qualified to fill the office, and we are confident that the interests of the young girls who are there will be carefully looked after.

Mrs. General Booth, after years of excruciating suffering from cancer, has found rest in one of the many mansions prepared by her Father. The end came suddenly. Her husband writes: "Perhaps the dear Lord saw that we had already had so long and ample notice that we needed no further warning, and it was quite true, for did we not sit for hours, hand in hand, talking over this sad parting and every detail in connection with it in those wonderful Christmas days, and did we not embrace each other and then say farewell in the most deliberate manner? So, perhaps, it may be the Master thought He would spare my beloved the pain of another good-by and take her away, as it were, by stealth. As well as she was able she joined us in singing the old song, 'I Will Love Thee in Life, I Will Love Thee in Death,' and then she kissed me and slipped away."

Miss Ann Frances Piercy, who has won triple first-class honors—in anatomy, in materia medica and pharmaceutical chemistry, and in physiology and histology—with two gold medals and an exhibition, at the London Intermediate Medicine Examination, is the daughter of Rev. George Piercy, of the London Chinese Mission, and is training for Wesleyan medical mission work in China.

Mrs. Thompson, Colorado's president, has been called to go through very deep waters during the past few months; three members of her family have died. The sudden death of a brother just before the state convention so prostrated her that she was not able to attend, and she did not feel well enough to accept the presidency another year. The recording secretary of that state is also "passing under the rod," and both have the loving sympathy of their white ribbon sisters.

Miss Ida Clothier attended the Illinois and the Indiana state conventions, and won golden opinions. At Rockford in her address to the Y's she gave very practical directions for temperance work among young people, especially societies of Christian Endeavor. Her bright presentation of the subject charmed all her hearers.

Mrs. Judge Merrick, of New Orleans, writes in a private letter: Margaret Haughrey, the bread woman of New Orleans fame, otherwise known as Margaret the Good, was loved by everybody for her noble, disinterested, lavish benevolence, which was poured forth like the sunshine regardless of country, race or religion. She could not write her name, but put the sign of the cross on all her documents. "By this sign conquer" might well be said of her, for if ever there was a Christian she was one. She never owned a silk dress or wore a glove but went about in her calico gown and old fashioned sun-bonnet, when we had the awful overflows of our great river, and gave loaves of bread to the hungry. I cannot tell how much money she made or how much she gave away; but she worked hard, and was prosperous, all the time giving unceasingly, so that she did not leave a very large fortune—I should think about $160,000. Doubtless she gave away over half a million in her lifetime, as has been somewhere stated. Margaret was first a milk-woman and afterward a bread-woman. She had a large steam manufactory of bread, crackers, etc. She was a Catholic, but at her funeral the leading Presbyterian minister of the city officiated, as well as the priest, something unparalleled in the annals of Protestant and Catholic.

ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

NEBRASKA.

WOMEN IN COUNCIL.

The date of this meeting was September 23 to 25. The place, Seward, a beautiful city some twenty-five miles northwest of Lincoln. The mayor in his address of welcome interpreted the name, "Sleeping Beauty on the Blue."

To say there never was an annual gathering of the Nebraska division of the white ribbon army that bore any comparison to this convocation, for deep intensity, is but to voice the sentiment of every heart present.

The convention was formally opened by the president on the evening of the 23. Greetings were extended to us on the part of the citizens by the mayor and were responded to by Rev. C. H. Bentley, chairman of the Non-partisan Amendment League of the state; Mrs. Woodward welcomed us in the name of the Seward union, and Mrs. C. H. Walker, of Surprise, responded, the annual address of the president, occupying the remainder of the evening.

The first day was spent in a general review of our work with Mrs. M. A. Hitchcock in the chair. The district presidents from twelve districts reported advance. All report active campaign work. Amendment meetings have been held in school-houses, groves, tents, tabernacles, churches and in the streets. Mrs. C. M. Woodward, general organizer, has held steadily to her work, and has "cried aloud and spared not," through summer heat or winter blasts, that victory may be ours.

Mrs. M. M. Lantry, our treasurer, reported generous contributions of platform help, money and literature from abroad to aid us during this our, aye! the Nation's supreme moment, for which the convention, as well as all those interested in this desperate struggle are returning thanks to the God of battles. For ourselves we are not sufficient for this unequal conflict, but are trusting that our friends will not withhold from us any needed help until the victory is ours.

Mrs. Jennie F. Holmes has prepared a history of the W. C. T. U. in Nebraska, showing that in this state as in others, the W. C. T. U. is the outgrowth of the Crusade. The first union was organized by Mrs. Angie F. Newman in June, 1874, in Plattsmouth. The first annual meeting was held in Lincoln, in the autumn of 1875, there being three delegates from abroad present, viz: Mrs. Hitchcock and Mrs. Crowel from Blair, and the writer, from Plattsmouth, who was also Nebraska's first delegate to the National executive meeting held in Cincinnati in 1875, while to-day we have in convention assembled, over 153 delegates, and as many more visitors coming from the uttermost parts of the state.

Mrs. Alma Fitch, corresponding secretary, reported 165 unions and 3,886 paying members. Nearly all the unions have headquarters. Scientific instruction is taught in the schools of the state; 1,300 public lectures have been given and all unions have been active in the amendment campaign.

Mrs. Blair, National superintendent of juvenile work, who has charge of the Demorest medal contests in Nebraska, reported nearly 2.000 contests; one diamond medal, thirteen grand gold, 178 gold and 728 silver medals have been taken in the state, with two contests planned for the diamond in October. Indeed the Demorest contests are growing into a children's crusade against the saloon, and to Mr. Demorest we owe more than to any other man, this hour's enthusiasm.

Nearly all the state superintendents were present and reported progress.

The work of the "Open Door" in Omaha, under the supervision of Mrs. Clark, enlisted the sympathy of many. We had with us Mrs. Clara B. Hoffman, the stalwart of stalwarts. She gave us a drill in hot shot and shell, which, if rightly aimed, will be telling on the barricade of the enemy. Also, Mrs. Scott of Kansas, who proved herself an able defender of the truth; an ally to be sought after when a battle like this is on.

How the Spirit of the living God has turned the hearts of the Nation's "good and true," toward us in this struggle for deliverance! Miss Willard and Miss Gordon reached us on Thursday. Truly their coming, in an hour like this, was as a "Rock in a weary land." And as Napoleon's soldier said to a surgeon when he was probing near the heart for a bullet, "Take care there, surgeon, you will hurt the Emperor," so Nebraska's temperance daughters would cry out if one touched with the steel of unkind criticism this our princess of reform.

The memorial service occupied one half hour of our allotted time. This was a moment of "sacred hush"—for during the year thirteen of our truest and best have left our ranks below, to join the blood-washed throng, that link us to the throne.

Nor would I omit in this brief report the uplift given to our battle-worn veterans, by the Rev. Mrs. Townsley, who preached the annual sermon from the words, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

These three days and nights of earnest work discovered to us many new lines of approach upon the enemy of our home, the American saloon. As in other days, all roads led to Rome, so in Nebraska, all lines of W. C. T. U. work lead to the polls on November 4, 1890. And we are working, trusting and believing, that that day will be our Gettysburg.

The old corps of officers was reëlected with the exception of recording secretary; Miss Ella Watson, of Bellwood, being elected for this place.

We chose our full quota of delegates to the National Convention, and may Heaven grant that this delegation may go into that far-away southern port with its banner of victory streaming to her balmy breezes.

ISABELLA S. SPURLOCK.

PERSONNEL OF THE CONVENTION.

Nebraska W. C. T. U. has added one-fourth to its membership, and one-third to its financial receipts in 1890. In round numbers she has 4,000 women and has expended $3,000. She is the banner state in Demorest medal contests, thanks to the indefatigable energy of Mrs. E. A. Blair, of Creighton, our National chalk talker.

Mrs. E. T. Scott, National organizer, made an admirable address September 26. Mrs. Hoffman carried all before her. Miss Mary A. Ripley was twenty-five years principal of the Boys' High School at Buffalo. She is cultured and kind, an effective speaker and a decided acquisition to Nebraska, whither she has gone to live at Kearney. Miss Ripley is a strong addition to the working force of our white-ribboners upon the prairies. Mrs. Stone, of Milford, Neb., is another rising speaker and worker on all phases of the movement.

I must make brief mention of the M. E. Church in which the convention was held. The inspiration following the meetings conducted one year ago by Rev. C. H. and Eugenie St. John was the source of the building. Mrs. C. M. Woodward spoke at the laying of the corner stone, and the W. C. T. U. has placed a beautiful memorial window, and by the board of trustees is given the use of this church for all its meetings, upon the ground that it is a religious organization.

Rev. Frances E. Townsley's sermon on "The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon" was an inspiration. She is state evangelist and in her circular has this sensible hint: "Do not use abbreviations in prayer. God has time to hear the full names of organizations. Do not ask Him to bless the W. C. T. U. but the Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

Mrs. A. F. Newman has been a great sufferer for months by reason of a sprained ankle. She is indeed a "Shut-in" and should have the prayers of all our women. Recently she fell in her own room and hurt her diseased ankle worse than ever. Her annual report was read by Mrs. H. W. Hardy, of Lincoln, and was full of meat. She endorsed the admirable plans of Miss Frances E. Kingman, of Falls City, that the W. C. T. U. in each town should know the name of each penitentiary convict from their locality, send him literature and religious letters and take his name into their prayers. What a different view of the convict is this from any ever before had and how much more in line with His who said, "Inasmuch."

Miss Rebecca J. Watson, of Bellwood, Nebraska, a gracious, dignified young lady (returned missionary from Japan) made a most pleasant impression on the convention. She said: "In Tokio is a local W. C. T. U. of over 300 members. On the morning I left for this country many accompanied me to the station, sending this message to the W. C. T. U. of America: 'Tell our sisters we are at our work and intend to keep at it until all the evils connected with this evil be banished from our land.'"

Mrs. Hitchcock, state president, is a strong, vigorous personality, trusty and true. Her annual address commanded attention and was full of common sense and Christian hope. Out of 156 delegates she had all but thirty-one votes. The bright and versatile Mrs. C. M. Woodward was the other candidate, and was made vice-president. Mrs. Fitch and Mrs. Lantry were retained as corresponding secretary and treasurer. Miss Ella Watson, of Bellwood, a very promising young lady, was made recording secretary.

Mrs. George Clark's social purity report roused more enthusiasm than any other. She said the average age of Omaha's fallen women is seventeen. The great majority are native born, several are daughters of ministers, deacons, etc. Beautiful Omaha! Its system illustrates Herrick Johnson's words: "Low license asks your son, high license demands your daughter also." A VISITOR.

NEW JERSEY.

The W. C. T. U. of Rahway have recently held a series of gospel temperance meetings, in several churches of our city, conducted by Mrs. J. T. Ellis, state secretary. They were a success financially and otherwise, good audiences greeting her each evening, and intense interest being manifested. About fifteen new names were added to the membership. Parlor meetings, and lecture room talks occupied the afternoons of the week, between fifty and sixty ladies attending. Children's meeting was appreciated by the little folks, of which they have borne testimony since.

Saturday afternoon's parlor meeting, held at the residence of Mrs. D. Kinyon, drew together about fifty young ladies, notwithstanding very threatening weather; they were much interested and it is hoped that at no distant day Mrs. Ellis may return and form a Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

The general feeling of the city and W. C. T. U. is one of appreciation of the work done by Mrs. Ellis; and we would recommend unions who desire to create an interest in their city and build up the local organization, to engage the services of this earnest worker for God, home and humanity, for a week. Her lectures are instructive, elevating, and interesting—a rare combination. Her parlor meetings are especially helpful. You can do nothing better for the cause of the Master, along this line.

CONNECTICUT.

FAIRFIELD COUNTY CONVENTION.

Fairfield county W. C. T. U. held its autumnal meeting in the Methodist Church, Greenwich, September 24. Sunshine, a hearty welcome, and a good convention rendered our day in this beautiful town memorable.

At nine o'clock a devotional service was conducted by Mrs. C. H. Fitz Gerald. It was a helpful meeting and its influence was felt during the remainder of the day. At 10:15 the convention was called to order by Mrs. Palmer. Thirteen unions were represented by delegates and two by reports.

A hearty welcome was extended to the convention by Mrs. Lockwood in behalf of the Greenwich union.

Reports from local unions were most encouraging, showing increased membership, and renewed activity in the working force. Greeting from the state union was presented by Mrs. Andrews. Dr. Wills, of the Presbyterian Church, was called to the platform, and gave a short address, full of practical temperance. After the noontide prayer, the morning session adjourned, and a bountiful collation was served to delegates and visitors at the pleasant headquarters of the Greenwich union.

At 1:30 the convention resumed its session. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Barnum, of Danbury. Reports were given from several unions and Loyal Temperance Legions. Special mention should be made of Company E. of Danbury. It is, we think, the banner company of the county; indeed, we doubt if many in the state excel it in organization and effective work. An interesting and helpful paper, entitled "Work for the Children," was read by C. F. Olin, of Stamford. Juvenile work was reported by our state leader, Mrs. Fitz Gerald. At three o'clock, Mrs. J. K. Barney, of Rhode Island, gave a Bible reading. Rev. Mr. Choate, of the Congregational Church, was introduced and spoke briefly.

A pleasant feature of this convention was the presence of the pastors during a large portion of the day. Our sisters of the Greenwich union are highly favored in receiving the support of their pastors. The workers' conference was conducted by Mrs. Andrews. An invitation was extended to the convention to meet with the South Norwalk union in April, and was unanimously accepted.

At five o'clock the convention adjourned with the doxology and the Christian Endeavor benediction. The evening lecture was delivered by Mrs. J. K. Barney.

WORK IN ELEVENTH DISTRICT.

The annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. of the eleventh Congressional district was held in Roseville, September 17-19, with ninety one delegates in attendance.

The convention was a grand success, with work well done, well reported, and hopeful plans for the future, from the district superintendents of the various lines of work. Twelve hundred and fifty-three members were reported through the treasurer.

Mrs. M. E. Metzgar, on account of family duties, retires from office, and Miss Mary Mahon succeeds her as district president, uniting her previous office as district organizer with the presidency. All other old officers were reëlected.

Mrs. L. S. Rounds gave two evening addresses and inspired part of one day's session with her earnest talk, holding a Bible-reading, and taking for her text, Rev. iii: 8: "I know thy works; behold I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it; for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word and hast not denied my name." "And thou shalt know that I am the Lord."

Miss Helen Walker, state superintendent of W. T. P. A. literature, was in attendance through two days of the convention.

At the gold medal contest Miss Nellie Johnson, of Rushville, won the medal.

All our local unions observed Crusade Day, going into the work heartily. ANNA R. MCGLYNN.

TWELFTH DISTRICT.

The twelfth annual convention of this district, was held at Roodhouse, September 9-10, Mrs. W. P. Kuhl, president, in the chair. There were fifty delegates present. To the untiring efforts of the members of the Roodhouse union, the success of the convention may be attributed.

The address of welcome was given by Mrs. E. E. Williams, the response by Mrs. Sutton, of Ashland. The reports from the unions of the district were generally encouraging and showed that women all about us are waking up to the fact that there is work for them to do in this onward march against intemperance.

The financial secretary reported that the twelfth district was the banner district in payment of the first $100 to the state. The report of the president showed that she had labored faithfully and with untiring zeal during the year and was successful in organizing eleven new unions, making a total of thirty-seven in the district.

The resolutions on evangelistic work, loyalty to the state and woman's suffrage were unanimously adopted. Superintendents for fifteen departments of work were appointed.

Mrs. L. S. Rounds was with us and gave out of her abundance, to our discussions on all questions of importance, and rendered the convention very interesting. She also gave two excellent addresses to large and appreciative audiences. Hearts were warmed by the interchange of friendly sympathies during the convention, zeal quickened and new thoughts acquired for the home work. M. G. NEELEY, Sec.

KANSAS.

THE SEVENTH DISTRICT.

The semi-annual convention of the seventh district W. C. T. U. met at Kinsley, September 10-12.

Mrs. Woodrow, the district president, Mrs. Holloway, the district organizer, and Mrs. Grubb, the National superintendent of foreign work, were with us, and the uplift of thought and knowledge gained by these days of work together was of great benefit.

The Kinsley union feel it a great privilege that they were allowed to entertain the convention. We feel that our towns-people see clearer what we are trying to do, as well as what we are doing.

The president, Mrs. Holloway, says, "Don't forget to tell THE UNION SIGNAL what excellent music we had, and of the beautiful decorations."

The old corps of officers was elected. It was decided to hold but one convention during the coming year.

If any of the unions of the seventh district need inspiration we recommend Mrs. Grubb and Mrs. Holloway.

Messrs. Roberts and Minich, of Hutchinson, made addresses, and were well received. A DELEGATE.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

GRAFTON COUNTY CONVENTION.

The second annual convention of this county was held at Haverhill, September 11. Seven unions were represented, viz: Bath, Bristol, Haverhill, North Haverhill, Littleton, Lisbon and Woodsville. The old officers were reëlected: President, Mrs. G. W. Richardson, of East Haverhill; secretary, Mrs. Bittinger, of Haverhill; treasurer, Mrs. B. Dow, of Woodsville. A graceful welcome was given by Mrs. Squires, of Haverhill, in which our organization was likened to the palm tree, with its fruit growing as near heaven, and as far from the earth as possible, its branches emblems of victory, etc. Mrs. S. C. Sawyer, of Littleton, responded.

During the convention several interesting papers were presented, animated discussions following, especially on work among lumbermen, and Demorest contest work. To the surprise and pleasure of all present, Mrs. Hatch, matron of the W. C. T. U. Mercy Home, was with us and gave a very interesting account of the work of the Home. Twenty-seven dollars were pledged by different individuals in aid of the Home. The address by Blind Ann of the county farm, was one of the interesting features of the program, and elicited the close attention of the audience which filled the chapel, many of the students from the academy adjoining, standing in the entry. It had been thirty-two years since Blind Ann had been in a church, and her expressive countenance showed her interest as she listened eagerly to all the exercises, particularly the music. Through our visits to the county farm, Ann became interested in the work of the W. C. T. U., and gave a pair of ear ornaments she had had for years to be sold and the amount given to the Home. We thought them too precious to be disposed of in that way, and at the state convention last year, raised twelve dollars for the Home, and the jewels are framed and hung up in the sitting room. Ann wears the white ribbon as she was made a life member of the State W. C. T. U. by the unions of Grafton county.

At the close of the afternoon meeting several of the delegates visited the jail distributing flowers, also copies of "Our Gospel Letter," to the inmates. The evening exercises were held in the church, which was filled with an attentive audience, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. The devotional exercises were conducted by the pastors, Rev. E. W. Stoddard and Rev. G. W. Buzzell; appropriate music was furnished by the choir, and the young people who participated in the Demorest contest did credit to themselves. Ally Deane, aged thirteen, recited "Patriotic Prohibition" and received the medal. Each of the other contestants received a bouquet of flowers. This contest closed one of the most successful conventions ever held in Grafton county.

WESTERN WASHINGTON.

SEATTLE WORK.

In the far northwest, W. C. T. U. work is progressing, and occasionally we have the privilege of hearing a National lecturer. It does us great good, for we do not get them as often as our Eastern unions. Colonel Geo. Woodford has just closed an eleven days' meeting, which was a grand success. He made many friends among the drinking men, who parted with him as they would from a dear friend. Hundreds signed the pledge and started a new life. The meetings, with one exception, were held in the City Mission. On Sunday night we felt that the Mission would not accommodate the people, so went to the Armory, an immense hall belonging to the National Guards. This was filled, every available seat being occupied, and many were compelled to stand. His subject at this time was "Purpose," and was particularly interesting and instructive to the young. He is a powerful and impressive orator, and can't help but carry conviction with him. The meetings at the Mission were composed chiefly of men, and just the class we desired most to reach.

HURON COUNTY CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. held its annual meeting at Wakeman, September 20. An unusual interest pervaded the meeting throughout, and the time would have been most joyous, had it not been for the recent death of Mrs. Cole, one of our county superintendents.

"What can the girls do?", a report of the recent Y conference at Toledo, Ohio, a history of Townsend Y's, and some excellent music, were contributions from our younger sisters. The department of mercy was presented. "Woman's Mission," "Healthful Dress," "Food," "Religious Training of Children," and a "Practical Talk on Tobacco," were subjects well treated and worthy of more extended mention. Miss Lee, who recently won a Demorest silver medal at New London, recited again "The Rumseller's Legal Rights." Mrs. Hammond, of Cleveland, conducted a question-box in the afternoon and made an address in the evening.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

STATE CONVENTION. SUFFRAGE NOTES.

The beautiful town of Madison, situated near the lovely lake of Herman in Lake county was the place of the first annual meeting of the South Dakota W. C. T. U. For eight years previous, the territorial union met in annual convention, but the state union was organized one year ago.

The meetings were held in the Baptist Church which had been handsomely decorated for the occasion. The county delegations were designated by bannerets in the same manner as the state delegations are at the National Conventions. They were elegantly hand painted by Mr. Lang of Yankton, and were the gift of the state corresponding secretary, Mrs. Flora M. Swift.

There were present 150 delegates and visitors, and 125 voting members. Among the visitors were Rev. Anna H. Shaw, lecturer for the National American W. S. A.; Mrs. S. S. Fessenden, superintendent of Franchise for the N. W. C. T. U. and Miss Matilda Hindman, of Pennsylvania, who has been speaking in the interest of the suffrage amendment in South Dakota, since the first of April.

The first session—Thursday afternoon—was given to devotional exercises, reports of secretaries, treasurer, organizer, and district presidents. The corresponding secretary's report showed an active membership of 1,779, with 129 unions. Brown county leads in the number of organizations, having seven W. C. T. U's, two Y's, and seven Loyal Temperance Legions. Twenty-one new local unions were reported. Yankton W's lead in money raised during the year, $343.80; Lead City second, with $287.50. Of the Y's, Madison stands first with $60. In amount of money paid the state, Yankton comes first with $67.10, and of the Y's Highmore is first with $18.30.

Mrs. Barker, state president, presented a handsome, hand-painted banner to the state, to be given each year into the custody of the district having made the largest increase in membership during the year, the district giving it to the county, and the county giving it to the local union having the largest increase in membership. On one side of the banner which is of crimson satin, is painted a bunch of golden-rod and wild roses. On the other side which is of old gold satin, is the motto: "Enlisted for life." The prize was carried off by the first district, Turner county, and Parker local.

In the evening a large audience gathered in the Opera House, and hearty addresses of welcome were given by Mrs. A. M. McCallister in behalf of the Madison W's., Mrs. J. L. Jones for the Y's and Miss Hattie Whalen for the normal faculty, public schools and Chautauqua Assembly.

Mrs. D. W. Myers made an excellent response, after which Mrs. Fessenden gave a most able and convincing address on "Equal Suffrage," holding her immense audience to the close.

Friday morning after devotional exercises, routine business was transacted, and five-minute reports were heard from thirty counties.

The afternoon was given to the president's address and ten-minute summaries of reports of superintendents, which filled the time until 4 o'clock, when the convention adjourned, to visit, by invitation, the new Chautauqua Assembly grounds on Lake Madison. The Madison Chautauqua is now a formally organized corporation and many of the leading women of the convention showed their appreciation of, and confidence in, this noble undertaking by the enterprising citizens of Madison, by taking stock, the shares having been placed at $100 each.

Friday evening was given to a Demorest gold medal contest in the Opera House under the direction of Mrs. Minnie Barker Horning, state superintendent of medal contests. The medal was awarded to Miss Hannah McDonald, of Highmore. The entertainment was highly enjoyed by the large audience. Each of the nine contestants, who were from different counties in the state, acquitted herself with great credit, but Miss McDonald's effort was a master-piece, and the award gave great satisfaction.

The election of officers, Saturday morning, resulted as follows: President, Mrs. H. M. Barker, Huron; vice-president, Mrs. Emma A. Cranmer, Aberdeen; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Flora M. Swift, Yankton; recording secretary, Mrs. D. W. Myers, Vermillion; treasurer, Mrs. Eugene Steere, Pierre. Dr. Nettie C. Hall, of Wessington Springs was elected organizer. Delegates to the National Convention were chosen as follows: Mrs. R. J. Smart, delegate at large; Mrs. O. J. Ward, Mrs. Irene G. Adams and Mrs. P. E. Johnson.

It was voted to hold the next meeting at Watertown.

Saturday afternoon was mostly devoted to reports of superintendents, all of which, as well as district and county reports, showed that the resolution last year to make franchise a special line of work, had been faithfully carried out.

Resolutions were again adopted, making franchise a special line of work, and pledging coöperation with the state E. S. A. to secure the ballot for women, and expressing gratitude to Susan B. Anthony and the speakers of the National American W. S. A., as well as all others who have assisted or are assisting in suffrage work in South Dakota.

Rev. Anna Shaw, by invitation of the convention, addressed the women on "Bible Grounds for Suffrage," from 1:30 to 2 p. m. on Friday and Saturday. Every woman felt fortified and strengthened for campaign work after these wonderful addresses. Rev. Anna Shaw also spoke in the Opera House on Saturday and Sunday evenings to packed houses, and scores were converted to suffrage. Mrs. Fessenden spoke with great power in the Presbyterian pulpit Sunday morning, and in the afternoon to an immense audience in the Opera House.

The white-ribboners of both North and South Dakota will learn with grief that Mrs. M. E. Kline, who was the able and efficient treasurer of Dakota Territorial W. C. T. U. for four years, and of the South Dakota W. C. T. U. for the past year, has moved to Chicago. Mrs. Kline resided in Mitchell, and was, with Miss Hesse, engaged in the business of millinery and ladies' furnishing goods. She is a first-class business woman, and it is through her financial ability and integrity that the Dakota and South Dakota W. C. T. U. attained, and has retained a financial standing second to no business firm in the West. She is also a devoted Christian, and her sterling qualities of head and heart have already been recognized by the National W. C. T. U., in making her president of the Board of Directors of the National Temperance Hospital. No better choice could have been made. All friends of the hospital may rest assured of an able, wise and economical management while she stands at the head. Mrs. Kline is still in the millinery and ladies' furnishing business with Miss Hesse, and they have located at 62 Forty-third street, Chicago. Miss Hesse is also a fine business woman, and was a pioneer W. C. T. U. woman of Dakota, having been the first superintendent of foreign work in the Territory. The love and prayers of the W. C. T. U. of both Dakotas go with them to their new home, and many hopes are expressed that when the women of South Dakota are enfranchised next November they may be persuaded to return and enjoy their freedom with their hosts of friends in the new republic.

The second (Black Hills) district W. C. T. U. convention was held in July, at Deadwood, but as no report is at hand further than the receipt of a splendid program, it cannot be reported in this article. This district is one of the best in that state, and under the able leadership of Miss Grace French, has done a brave, grand work in whisky's strongest hold in the state—the Black Hills.

The state W. C. T. U. was formally tendered two acres for Headquarters, from the Lake Madison Chautauqua Association, which generous gift was accepted with a resolution of thanks by the convention. The executive committee will at once begin to solicit funds for the erection of a building which they hope will be begun next spring. An individual subscription of $10 will entitle the giver to room in the building for two seasons, by furnishing a cot. The executive committee was permitted to choose the location for Headquarters, and selected a place near the lake in a beautiful grove.

NEW YORK.

TRIBUTE TO A WORKER.

Through a correspondent I learn that Mrs. I. J. Howard, who has held the office of county superintendent of the prison and jail department of the W. C. T. U., in New York City, during the past two years, has recently resigned that position, and is now superintendent only of the Gospel Mission, held in the Harlem prison—from which post she has not been absent one Sunday since March, 1888, except when detained by sickness. The results of the labors of the few consecrated Christians who have held that fort, eternity alone can reveal.

I wish to add my tribute to Mrs. Howard's half-century of faithful work in the temperance cause, and also her mission work as a pioneer in California and Arizona. Her labors have been most earnest and self-sacrificing, without expectation of reward. Feeling most strongly the necessity of temperance reform, she has given freely of her time, strength and means, often to the deprivation of needed comforts for herself. Physically feeble, she has many times risen from a sick bed to minister to those in prison. Now that her working days are drawing to a close, as she, herself, is deeply impressed is the fact, it seems to me some recognition of her long-continued services should be shown, for the word of sympathy and gratitude can never come amiss. S. M.

LEWIS COUNTY.

The third annual convention of this county was held in the Methodist Church, in Port Leyden, September 3.

The young ladies of the Epworth League had kindly decorated the church with ferns, potted plants and a profusion of cut flowers. Mrs. M. B. O'Donnell presided. The opening devotional exercises led by Mrs. Sacket were earnest and impressive.

The morning and part of the afternoon were given to reports of officers, local unions, and superintendents. Much practical work has been done in the departments of narcotics, scientific temperance instruction, fair work, literature and prison and jail. Services have been held regularly in the county jail and poor house with good results.

Interesting papers were read on "Our Boys," by Mrs. Merrill; "Scientific Temperance Instruction," by Mrs. Clara Bacon; "The Master's Claim on Christian Women in Temperance Work," and "Young Women's Work," by Miss Cora Keener. The members of the Loyal Temperance Legion gave, besides a song and responsive exercise, five brief recitations, and won much praise.

The question-box contained several questions of deep interest in our work. Mrs. O'Donnell's ready, clear and concise answers enlightened us on more than one puzzling subject. Her address closed a day of much interest and profit. It was earnest and forcible. The appeal to work for the amendment was especially impressive. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. M. B. O'Donnell; vice-president, Mrs. Edmond Thompson; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary L. Johnston; recording secretary, Miss Sarah Thompson; treasurer, Mrs. Susan Sacket. Two little girls, after a collection speech from one of them, gathered the offerings of the audience.

FULTON COUNTY.

The W. C. T. U. of this county held its annual convention August 28, in Gloversville. There are four unions in the county and each was well represented. The meeting was called to order by the president, Mrs. Frances Bently, of Gloversville.

Mrs E. D. Corrie, of Gloversville, gave the address of welcome, which was responded to by Mrs. Jennie Heath, of Northville. The presentation of the county banner by Mrs. William Place, was a pleasant feature of the forenoon meeting.

In the afternoon the election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. Frances Bently, of Gloversville; vice-president at large, Mrs. R. P. Anibal, of Johnstown; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. D. Corrie, Gloversville; recording secretary, Mrs. Libbie V. McDermid, Vail's Mills; treasurer, Mrs. E. C. Bedford, Johnstown.

The president's address was one of special merit. Several very interesting and instructive papers were read, all deserving mention. One by Mrs. Van Valkenburg on "Were Man and Woman Created Equal?" and one by Miss Helen M. Culling, M. D., on "Is Alcohol a Poison?" were very able articles.

A parliamentary drill conducted by Mrs. Helen M. Bullock, of Elmira, who was present and also gave an address in the evening, was very instructive and entertaining. We find those who take The Union Signal and our state paper are the most interested and efficient workers.

Libbie V. McDermid, Rec. Sec.

CORTLAND COUNTY.

The fifth annual convention of this county was held in the M. E. Church of McGrawville, September 3 and 4.

Excellent reports of county and local work were given, showing an advancement all along the line. Two new unions have been organized since the last annual meeting

The address of welcome by Mrs. Hoag, and the response by Mrs. Blanchard were both excellent. One of the interesting features of the convention was a parliamentary drill, conducted by Miss Libbie Robertson, which we found to be very profitable.

The reports of the superintendents showed much earnest and active work done during the past year; twenty-four departments of work are carried on in the county.

The pastors of the different churches in the place gave earnest and encouraging words of greeting, which were beautifully responded to by Mrs. Hattie J. Smith. The address of the president, Miss Sara Collins, was earnest and helpful, containing many practical suggestions in the various branches of work.

A very interesting paper on the work of the Y. W. C. T. U. was given by Mrs. Jennie June, also one by Mrs. Mott on "Narcotics." The question box, conducted by Mrs. A. A. Rathbun, was an interesting feature of the occasion. Each session was opened by devotional exercises, and the noon-tide hour of prayer was observed.

The officers were reëlected with the exception of the recording secretary, who declined to serve another year. They now are as follows: President, Miss Sara Collins, Cortland; vice-president, Mrs. Jennie June, Blodgett Mills; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Minnie P. Starr, Homer; recording secretary, Mrs. Julia L. Tanner, Blodgett Mills; treasurer, Mrs. Jennie Boynton, McGrawville.

Among the resolutions were these:

Resolved, That we as Christian women and members of the W. C. T. U, do all in our power, by prayers, by influence and money to aid in the work of the Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment.

Resolved, That we watch with great interest and solicitude the contest now on hand in Nebraska, and that our prayers now ascend daily for the success of the homes against the saloons in that state.

Resolved, That as money as well as prayers are needed we as a county union will send from our treasury the sum of $5 to aid the work in Nebraska.

Resolved, That this county W. C. T. U. are thankful to President Harrison for signing and to the Senate and House of Representatives for passing a law which prevents the framers and originators of the "Original Package Bill" from over-riding the laws of prohibitory states.

DELAWARE.

BITS OF STATE NEWS.

During the warm months of less general activity in W. C. T. U. work, the temperance question was brought before the people at nearly all the camp meetings held in our little state. Brandywine Summit gave an entire day to temperance. In Sussex county, the subject was also made quite prominent. Tyndal's Camp, near Georgetown, having a prohibition day, with a sermon by Rev. R. Coursey, in the morning, and several addresses interspersed with music in the afternoon. Following prohibition day at this camp, a W. C. T. U. afternoon meeting was held, over which Mrs. Rebecca Jefferson, president of Sussex county, presided, and at which two presidents of local unions, Mrs. Luhaduay, and Mrs. Morgan, made addresses; and an interesting talk was given by Mrs. Frank Jones, superintendent of the Georgetown Loyal Temperence Legion, upon "Practical W. C. T. U. Work."

Passing from Sussex to New Castle, the unions in the small villages of this upper county, notwithstanding city visitors and the busy time known to rural housekeepers, have done excellent work the past few months. The union of the little village of Marshallton held four public meetings during the summer, and the first week of September gave a supper and entertainment which added $50 to their treasury. On September 24, they held another public meeting which was addressed by Rev. Alfred Smith, of Middletown, and the Rev. F. T. Benson, of Wilmington. The neighboring Newport union gave a delightful "Harvest Home" in Lyman's Woods, August 24, in which more than five hundred people participated. The Y's sold ice cream and cake, and made, as they usually do, the music of the occasion. Nearly all the provisions were kindly donated, the farmers having been among the most liberal, and tickets for the dinner were sold at twenty-five cents. The day was a perfect one. The platform decorated with flowers and flags, the gypsy fire over which a part of the dinner was cooked, and the people seated upon benches and in carriages around the stand, formed a pretty and picturesque scene easy to imagine. The Newport ladies worked hard in their preparations for the event, and were rewarded by a gain of $100. Mrs. J. T. Ellis, of New Jersey, Rev. L. White, and Rev. Mr. Hubbard were the speakers of the day. The Nassau union which will be recorded upon the minutes this year for the first time, gave a "Harvest Home," September 27, which, notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, was quite a success. Mrs. Julia Tomkinson, who is most earnest in her work of associate superintendent of social purity. Rev. L. McSorley, of Lewes, and Rev. J. T. Prouse, of Nassau, made the addresses. Of the Crusade membership which the large gathering of people made possible, and of the results of the day elsewhere, I hope to tell you soon in my report of our eleventh annual convention.

ANNIE W. SUTTON.

NORTH CAROLINA.

One week after the state convention, held in Asheville July 17, 18 and 19, the same women met with representatives from fourteen other states, to organize the Asheville W. C. T. U. assembly. We listened together with ever increasing delight to Miss Willard, Dean Wright, Miss Gordon, Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Hunt, Miss Griffin and others. The assembly was more than a success, and the reception which these good people gave to the white-ribbon women cannot better be shown than by the fact that we have four gratuitous offers of as many different sites for the permanent assembly which we propose to establish. Which one of these four we will accept, our committee has not yet decided.

Our semi-annual executive business meeting, held on the tenth of September, had a long and busy session. Mrs. Cortland, of High Point, resigned her position as superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legions, and Mrs. Annie Snow, of Durham, was chosen to fill her place. Miss Reynolds, our former corresponding secretary, having resigned, Miss Bettie D. Caldwell, of Greensboro, was elected to that position.

Much sympathy was expressed for the sorely bereaved family of our dear sister, recently called home, Mrs. Broadway, of Winston. The vacant office was voted to Mrs. Mamie Shaw, of Durham, and a committee appointed to draw up resolutions expressive, as far as words can be, of our heartfelt appreciation of Mrs. Broadway's loving service in our common work for the Master.

Mrs. P. J. Ector (our superintendent of evangelistic work) promised the meeting a two weeks' tour, for active evangelistic work, in early October.

Calls come to our president almost every week from temperance women in towns without unions. "Come over and help us," is their cry, and we, faithful and true, try to respond to every demand. Mrs. Tomlinson is soon to go out on her work as state organizer again. Work is being planned for Mrs. Winston in Eastern Carolina. Besides our own state workers, our president hopes to secure Mrs. Barney's invaluable help in the early spring.

From the prohibition town of Concord comes a delightful report of work in their county fair. The county of Cabarrus offers a prize in the first place for the best temperance essay; then the ladies establish a temperance booth on the grounds where the weary may rest and have both literature and lemonade free. The ladies also have cake and cream for sale there, by which profits they hope to cover expenses.

More and more we hope our women are beginning to understand the Lord's command; "To every man his work," and as the field broadens before us, may strength be given to do all work "heartily as unto the Lord."

MISSOURI.

WORKERS AFIELD.

Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace, of Indiana, is making many converts in Missouri. She spoke two nights in Jefferson City to fine audiences, among which were the Governor and other officials.

Mrs. J. H. Battles, of Nebraska, is giving general satisfaction, with her special theme Heredity and Health.

Mrs. Mary Read Goodale of Louisiana, is making a tour of the western part of the state, and Col. Geo. Woodford is in the eastern part. From many unions, word comes that "our membership was doubled on Crusade Day." Children's day was generally observed by Loyal Temperance Legions.

Missouri is not often reported in your valuable paper, but she is doing grand work all along the line.

Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman gave five weeks of earnest work to Nebraska, returning to her home in Kansas City, September 30, she remained there for the state Prohibition Convention, October 2.

October 3 was spent in Convention of 14th district at West Plains. Mrs. Hoffman will give addresses in Illinois, Michigan, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Toronto, Canada, between this and the National Convention.

MARYLAND.

CECIL COUNTY.

The fifth annual convention of Cecil county was held at Port Deposit, September 19. Fourteen unions were represented, including three Y's and one colored union.

After the devotional exercises, the address of welcome and response, the usual order of business was taken up. The president, Mrs. J. R. Milligan, gave a stirring address. A bountiful lunch was provided by the Port Deposit and Woodlawn unions to all delegates and visitors.

After the devotional exercises of the afternoon session, reports were read by officers and superintendents of about twenty departments of work, from which we cull a few important items. One new union was reported organized at Ellston by Mrs. Ellis, of New Jersey, with eighteen members, the old union having seceded and joined the "non-partisan" movement. Two new unions among colored people have also been recently organized by Mrs. Martin, of Bath. Mrs. Mary Woodbridge, Rev. Anna Shaw, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens and Mrs. Ellis have lectured in the county during the year. The treasurer reported dues collected from 217 members. Total receipts for all purposes $242.98. Fifty dollars contributed toward the expense of Woodlawn Camp-meeting; fifty UNION SIGNALS taken; seventy-four White Ribbon Heralds to which fourteen new subscriptions were added; six juvenile organizations giving a membership of 342; five Y's with a membership of seventy active members. It was decided to have a banner with clover blossoms and hay as the county emblem.

The program was interspersed with excellent music. Mrs. Ellis, of New Jersey, addressed a large audience in the evening. Thus closed one of the best conventions ever held in Cecil, Pa.

THE DAKOTAS.

One year ago, the territory of Dakota was divided into two states, and as a consequence the W. C. T. U. was divided into two state unions. Recently each state has held its convention, South Dakota at Madison, and North Dakota at Jamestown. To our surprise and delight, we found each child almost as large and vigorous as its territorial mother. At Madison a large delegation gathered, and notwithstanding our special campaign for suffrage, reported good work done on nearly all lines. The old officers were all reëlected, except Mrs. Kline, our efficient treasurer for the past five years, she having removed from the state to Chicago.

North Dakota's convention had nearly as large an attendance as South Dakota. One hundred delegates responded to roll call. They have increased the number of unions from seventy-four to 102 and they have nearly one thousand members. My mind runs back six years, when they had but three locals and only forty members. Miss Addie M. Kinnear, their president, has been untiring in her efforts to further the work. She has made for herself an enviable reputation as a speaker, has won the love and confidence of her sisters and has shown herself thoroughly competent for the great responsibility thrown upon her. Her annual address was a fine production, clear in statement, graceful in diction and inspiring in its sentiment.

The opera house was filled each evening to listen to the lectures given by Miss Anthony and the president of South Dakota W. C. T. U. The people were all glad to see and hear the honored pioneer of the suffrage cause, and at her Sabbath evening meeting, a gentleman was present who was one of the jurors before whom Miss Anthony was tried for illegal voting years ago. The old officers were all reëlected, save the vice president; Mrs. Ida G. Fox being elected to that position. The delegates to the convention at Atlanta from South Dakota are Mrs. O. J. Ward, Mrs. P. E. Johnson, Mrs. R. J. Smart and Mrs. Irene Adams. From North Dakota Miss Kinnear will go and probably one or two other ladies.

Truly the two new Dakotas are stronger and will do more work than the old territorial union could. While by constitutional law they were put asunder, the two are one in spirit and aim.

The Shortest Way.

"Ever go the shortest way to work: Now the shortest is according to nature." It is self evident that the shortest and most natural way to reach the sources of disease is by inhaling some vitalizing agent or remedy, which, breathed into the lungs in the same manner as the air, but richer in ozone, is absorbed into the blood and distributed over the whole body. Our experience of over 20 years, having treated 55,000 patients with the Compuond Oxygen, has convinced us that this wonderful vitalizing agent meets all requirements. The medical faculty are generally averse to the use of advertised remedies. This adds still greater importance to the fact that over one thousand physicians are using it in their practice.

We are permitted to refer to numerous patients, whose names and testimonials are to be found in our brochure of 200 pages, giving a history of the discovery, natare and results of Compound Oxygen. Numerous records of cures in all chronic diseases. Brochure sent free. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Publisher's Notes.

Here's Your Nice, Fresh

Literature, right from the presses! National Leaflet, No. 45, "The Home and its Needs" is small but "werry convincin." It is a clarion call to W. C. T. U. women, by Margaret B. Platt, to work, and among the methods given is that of subscribing for THE UNION SIGNAL. Consequently, we think it a remarkably good leaflet, and so much so that we offer to send you, free, enough to place one apiece for all your membership! So, there, we'll see how many want to be aroused. Gospel Lights Nos. 5, 6, 7 and 8. The first two are, "A Saloon Keeper's Temperance Lecture." The next, "A Weather Parable," by Mark Guy Peae, and the last, a quaint and winning talk on "The Will of God," by Prof. Henry F. Drummond, showing how to build up one's entire life in doing the will of God. The leaflets are only $1. per 1,000, postage 30 cents extra. Samples of above sent for a one cent stamp.

Temperance Lesson Manual vol. 5, No. 1, on "Our Country," by Mrs. Geo. Archibald. Patriotic recitations and songs, with an historical responsive exercise and new music (notes printed). Sample sent for two cent stamp.

Manual of Juvenile Work, by Helen G. Rice. Price 5 cents. It goes without saying that anything Mrs. Rice writes in this line is sure to be helpful, bright and inspiring. How could it be otherwise, when Mrs. Rice is continually doing the work she tells about, and in a way that uniformly wins? Here are plain, easily followed directions for organizing and carrying on a Loyal Temperance Legion.

Christmas Councils is the title of a first-rate exercise in the November Sunday School Crusader. It is worth a dozen of the usual namby pamby chimney descending exercises so common in late years, for the recitations have a meaning in them—an evident purpose to teach cheerfulness, kindness, and temperance. Now all these newly-printed pages are in expensive but thoroughly good. Five cents would bring you samples of all. Publications don't push themselves—wish they did. There, that's a mistake. Bad publications do, somehow, push themselves. Like weeds, you know—miserable things—where does all the plaintain come from? and the thistles and fennel? But who ever heard of a crop of good solid wheat coming up with somebody's tending and watching, tramping and harvesting?

Goes on in civilized society from the cradle to the grave. Dirt is degradation—and degradation is destruction. 270 MORE RESIDENCE LOTS AT HARVEY, ILLS.

THE NEW MANUFACTURING AND TEMPERANCE TOWN.

A GOOD INVESTMENT, ONLY TWO MILES SOUTH OF CHICAGO.

The 240 lots at Harvey, which I offered for sale to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, met with such ready sale, all being sold in about 60 days, that I have had 270 more lots placed in my hands. My duties as Advertising Manager of THE UNION SIGNAL prevent my giving my whole time to this work, and I have associated with me the Hon. Walter Thomas Mills, so well known to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, and from this date the address will be Walter Thomas Mills & Co., as below. C. D. PAINE, Advertising Manager UNION SIGNAL, 161 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

Its Origin. Some nine months ago the daily papers told of the purchase of a large tract of land two miles south of Chicago and eighteen miles south of the city hall. The land was described as lying at the junction of the Grand Trunk, Illinois Central and Big Four Railroads. It was then announced that Mr. T. W. Harvey, a gentleman well known in Chicago for his wealth and philanthropy in connection with Mr. Moody's Bible Institute and Evangelization Society had made plans to build here a city which should be both a successful manufacturing place and a strictly temperance town. Every deed says if the purchaser puts up a building that shall be used for a saloon or immoral purpose, or permits any intoxicating drinks to be manutactured, sold, or given away on the premises, o permits any gambling house, or house of prostitution, the property is to revert to original owners, as fully and completely as if the deed had never been made, and this without any compensation or forfeiture to the offending purchaser of the lot. This agreement is made a part of each deed and must be signed by both parties.

The Plans. It was considered that the temperance people of the land would be glad to invest in an enterprise that promises so well as this one does. You may have the utmost confidence in the enterprise, in the men who are behind it, and in the opportunity that is now given you to double your money!

First, last, and always, this is to be a strictly temperance town; every deed says so, insists on it, and already a number of applications for manufacturing sites have been refused by the Land Company, because they felt that it would be difficult to maintain their high temperance ideas and admit the firms that applied.

Second. It is to be a manufacturing city. It is true that the World's Fair is coming to Chicago, and that this property lies within fifteen or twenty minutes' ride of its location, and that the Fair will undoubtedly bring thousands to Chicago who will contentedly settle down and live in this great City of Cities, the marvel of the 19th Century, and that all this will conspire to increase greatly the value of real estate in Harvey; but even without the boom that the great Exposition will bring, Harvey is BOUND TO BE AN ASSURED SUCCESS AS A MANUFACTURING SUBURB.

Because of its unrivalled location. Because of the millions already invested.

Because of the manufactories already there. Because of many more that are coming.

There is no doubt whatever that Harvey will soon be a rival of its successful neighbor, Pullman, and the most conservative estimate is a Population of Ten Thousand in One Year, Instead of Three Years as We First Thought.

Reasonably so, for here are some of the plans of the Company which are now being carried out.

MACADAMIZED STREETS, AN ARTESIAN WELL OF ABSOLUTELY PURE WATER, SEWERAGE IN EVERY LOT, BEAUTIFUL PARKS, ELECTRIC LIGHT ALL OVER THE CITY AND IN EACH HOUSE, HOMELIKE HOUSES. WIDE STREETS, OVER 2,000 SHADE TREES TO BE SET OUT THIS FALL, PURE WATER IN EVERY HOUSE.

Do you want one or more lots? Make your home in Harvey if you want steady work. Invest in a lot if you want to make money.

What About the Manufactories? Harvey is already a busy place. Long train loads of brick, stone, lumber, etc., are unloaded; hundreds of men are busy on new buildings. The facilities for shipping are unexcelled. The rates of freight are guaranteed to manufacturers to be the same as at Chicago. Three roads now there, two more being built. The manufactories already there are the Automatic Mower and Mfg. Co., employing about 125 men, the Grinnell Wagon Works, from Grinnell, Iowa, manufacturers of steel headers, steel hay rakes, buggies, carriages, etc., employing about 250 men. Their buildings are of the following dimensions. One of 160x200 feet; one 200x240 feet, and one 82x200 feet. The Harvey Steel Car Company, formed under the patents of Mr. George L. Harvey, to manufacture steel passenger and sleeping coaches and freight cars. The buildings when completed will be as follows; One 80x200 feet, and two each 100x300 feet. Five tons of sheet steel will be used daily at the least by this immense company, which will probably employ a thousand men to begin with. The Car Company has a capital of $1,000,000 fully subscribed.

The Buda Mfg. Co. are about to move their plant to Harvey from Buda, Ill. They will employ at least 300 men. The Connor Core Drill Company are under contract to put up a factory. An extensive Windmill Company will also locate there. Two companies Employing 600 Women and Children are ready to come as soon as they are sure of finding that many employees to put at work. A grain elevaator is already built. What else?

A BANK, CHURCH, PUBLIC SCHOOL, NUMEROUS STORES, Grocery, Hardware, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc. By referring to the reduced plat you will see that all the manufactories are to be one side of the railroads, and all the residences on the other.

What Does it Mean to You? Here is a temperance town for temperance people; a place where Sunday will be kept and not made hideous by beer worshippers; a place owned and controlled by a company of Christian men; with numerous manufactories on the ground and more coming; with all the advantages of the big city right at hand—thirty-eight trains daily; soon will be more—and with none of its disadvantages; with pure water; pure air, and steady work for the steady home-maker; with the certainty of rapid increase of value for all who purchase now. The ma agement want people to buy who will come and go to work in the manufactories. Does that mean anything to you? They want temperance people. They want Bankers, Merchants and skilled labor of all kinds—carpenters, machinists, foremen, and artisans. Does this mean anything to you?

Do you want one of these 270 lots? The prices range from $200 to $900 per lot. Those from $750 to $900 are very choice Business lots, according to location. Size of lots 25x170 feet. Terms of payment, one-fourth down, balance in six, twelve and eighteen months. These prices are subject to change without notice; one party who purchased for $400 August 15, and paid $100 down, could have $1,000 for his lot, but refuses to sell for less than $1,500.

Send for Plats at Once. The Company prefers that only actual settlers should be the purchasers of lots, and if desired they will advance money for home building, but if you wish to buy on account of the profitable investment it cannot be denied you. There is good reason to believe that you can.

DOUBLE YOUR MONEY IN A YEAR!

We refer by permission to Mrs. T. B. Carse, President W. T. P. A.; Miss Mary Allen West, Editor of THE UNION SIGNAL; and to Mr. Geo. C. Hall, Publisher of THE UNION SIGNAL. A warranty deed will be issued each purchaser after the first payment is made. Untold millions of money are pressing toward Chicago for investment, and it is scarcely to be wondered at when property sells as did two pieces on State Street recently for $10,000 and $11,000 per front foot respectively. Chicago is the Future Great City, and with all the advantages we have named, you cannot make a mistake if you invest your money here in real estate at a trifle over $7 a front foot. It is a place where the world must learn that

TEMPERANCE PAYS, BUT SALOONS ARE A CURSE.

We have procured situations for every one who has applied for work and has said they would buy a lot in Harvey. Come to Chicago and look the ground over; this is no wildcat speculation. We have never failed to make sales to parties who have carefully investigated the statements above made. Come to our office and we will see that you have every facility to do this. The World's Fair location is definitely settled now, and cannot help but add value to this property. Address,

October Offers.

We want 5,000 new subscribers during October, and if you want what we offer as returns for your work they will come, and that without any particular "fuss or feathers." How would you like to have Henry Drummond's wonderfully popular books, "The Greatest Thing in the World" and "The Greatest Need of the World"? Send one new name with $1 and you can have either one of the two that you name. Lovely books both in binding and contents. Deep thoughts dressed in simplicity's garb.

—Or—

Miss Willard's picture, which will be ready in November. Why not get a new subscriber, add 25 cents ($1.25 in all), and get this beautiful aquarelle-tint life-size picture of your leader?

—Or—

If you send five new names, with $5, you can have the new and enlarged edition of Senator Blair's great book, "The Temperance Movement." Concerning it Miss Willard says:

"If I were president of a local union I would see that this book was read chapter by chapter at the monthly meetings. Our women, by this time, should be well furnished for the fray. They need to have the arguments at their tongue's end. Especially is this true of National Prohibition, which now looms above the horizon, the coming tornado in politics. On this theme Senator Blair is the expert among our sixty millions of people. To it he has devoted fifteen years of thought and honest hard work. Let us know what there is to be said on this question. Let us copy out paragraphs from this book of admirable temper for the local press in our own towns and villages. Let us make efforts for National Prohibition."

Why couldn't yours be one of a thousand unions to follow out Miss Willard's suggestion? By sending five new names you get the book and the education it will bring, free. Will you read this and forget it, or try to remember and then forget, or give a noble-hearted push in the matter?

The Convention Daily.

We have not made the usual announcements regarding the Convention Daily because of the difficulty experienced in getting the proper facilities away from our own plant to print so large a paper in so short a time. We have decided, however, on the following plan: A daily will be issued at Atlanta (five issues) subscription, fifteen cents, or five cents per copy. It will be entirely a written-up report and not, as heretofore, a stenographic one. The place, the people, the convention, church, the programs, personnel of the speakers, etc., etc., will make up the paper. There will be no premium, and we will not attempt to mail each day's paper by itself, but all mail orders will be sent after the convention has closed, and as soon as possible after the fifth session is over. In addition to this paper we will print an exact stenographic report of all the proceedings within a week or ten days after the close of the convention (providing we get 1,000 orders for the same) at 25 cents each. We prefer that orders be sent for the stenographic report rather than for the dailies, but if any wish to order both they can remit 40 cents, and if the 1,000 orders are not reached for the stenographic report we will return the 25 cents. After four years' hilly experience in running a daily at the conventions we have evolved the above plan as being the most satisfactory to all concerned. This announcement is to appear in each issue of THE UNION SIGNAL until November 6. We recapitulate the offers to make them as plain as possible.

The Convention Daily.

Five issues to be mailed in one package on November 18 or 19, $ .15.

The Stenographic Report

to be issued, if 1,000 copies are ordered, as soon as possible after the convention, $ .25.

No premiums or commissions can be allowed at these prices, except that in clubs of five or more the cost of sending the money can be deducted. The regular convention number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be dated November 27

All who believe in Prohibition as an economic as well as a moral principle, will rejoice in the remarkable success of the East Tennessee Land Company, which forever forbids the liquor traffic on its immense territory, by provision of title deeds. This company has sold, at par, $2.000,000 of its capital stock, and is now selling the small amount of Treasury stock in its possession at twenty per cent above par. In place of issuing the third million of its capital stock it is selling Debenture Bonds, drawing six per cent a year, payable semi-annually, and these are being rapidly taken. No other enterprise in the whole South has become so widely known in one year as this, and THE UNION SIGNAL congratulates all who are connected with its management, on the courage they have shown, and the success they have achieved. Their new city of Harriman is said to be building more rapidly and more substantially than any other of the new Southern towns. The successor of Gen. Fisk, as President of the East Tennessee Land Company, is ex-Postmaster-General Thomas L. James, whose reputation as an executive officer is not second even to our lamented leader's.

TOKOLOGY, a complete Ladies' Guide in thousands of families, has become a household word. Mrs. N. R. McC. writes: "Dear Dr. Stockham: I shall not attempt to express how thankful I am that you wrote TOKOLOGY. I cannot tell you how much it has done for me. Our son came almost without warning. I most heartily rejoice when I hear of the advent of a 'Tokology baby.'" Bought of agents or direct from us, Prepaid $2.75. Sample pages free.

Signal Notes.

THE temperance movement makes satisfactory progress in Madagascar.

REV. DR. VILLARO, author of The Problem is now putting the finishing touch upon a book manuscript to be called The Gatling Gun. Like the Gatling Gun of six barrels firing hundreds of shot in a minute the rapid movement being created by a crank, so the doctor's book has six chapters that fire at us hundreds of pungent thoughts turned over by his crank, the pen and ink. It will go to press some time this autumn.

A BAVARIAN-born cook, who began life at fourteen in a New York kitchen, owns a tenement in West Forty-ninth street, that she paid for out of her wages, $80 a month. In Buffalo, N. Y., a girl employed as a maid of all work, with wages averaging less than fourteen dollars a month, has already paid for one house and lot out of her earnings, and has made a payment of $500 down on another, the remainder of the purchase money to be paid in monthly instalments.

THE British Medical Temperance Association numbers over 500 members.

DR. B. W. RICHARDSON says we can form no idea what the history of civilized man would be if the effects of alcohol were altogether out of the field. Hitherto we have only heard of a world in which these effects have been present, but with perfect purity all this might in a few generations be changed by education and precept, founded on the treatment of the young who have undergone no aberration from nature.

SIXTY per cent of the students attending the Toronto Medical College are pledged total abstainers.

AN ocean of beer flows from the three fountains of England, Germany and America. England sends forth a stream of 900,000,000 gallons, Germany 900,000,000, and the United States 700,000,000 gallons. The Atlantic and Pacific are never drained, but this ocean of 2,500,000,000 gallons of beer is annually drained into human stomachs, crazing the brains, corrupting the hearts and damning the souls of millions, all by the consent and under the endorsement of Christian governments.

A GLASS of wine changed the history of France for nearly twenty years. Louis Philippe, King of the French, had a son, the Duke of Orleans, and heir to the throne, who always drank only a certain number of glasses of wine, because even one more made him tipsy. On a memorable morning he forgot to count the number of his glasses, and took one more than usual. When entering his carriage he stumbled, frightened the horses and caused them to run. In attempting to leap from the carriage his head struck the pavement and he soon died. That glass of wine overthrew the Orleans rule, confiscated their property of £20,000,000, and sent the whole family into exile.

MRS. MARY CLEARY DUNCREUX is not only president of the New York Screw Manufactory, but a practical working mechanic, who inspects all the output of her establishment, and who can turn out first-class cabinet screws, gun screws, watch screws and machine screws. She has been in the business for seventeen years, and maintains, as the result of her own experience, that girls have quite as much ingenuity and manual dexterity as boys, and lack training only, and not capacity, to become as good mechanics.

IT is proposed that army pensioners in England shall be paid monthly instead of quarterly, in order to reduce the amount spent on drink.

HERE is a clipping from an ancient newspaper: "On the morning of September 28, 1736, all the tavern-signs in London were in deep mourning; and no wonder, their dearly beloved patron and friend Gin was defunct,—killed by the new Act against spirituous liquors! But they soon dropped their mourning, for Gin had only been in a lethargic fit, and woke up much refreshed by his sleep. Fifteen years after, when Hogarth painted his 'Gin Lane,' royal gin was to be had cheap enough, if we may believe the sign-board in that picture, which informs us that 'gentlemen and others' could get 'drunk for a penny,' and 'dead drunk for twopence,' in which last emergency, 'clean straw for nothing' was provided.

BOND OF THE

Woman's Temperance Publishing Association

Incorporated under the Laws of the State of Illinois.

CHICAGO.

The Woman's Temperance Publishing Association promise to pay to the legal holder hereof, the aggregate sum of Five Dollars ($5) legal money of the United States of America at its office in the city of Chicago in installments of One Dollar ($1) each on the ..... day of ....., 189 , and of each and every year thereafter until fully paid, on presentation and surrender of annexed coupons and on presentation and surrender of this bond at the time of the payment of the last installment of One Dollar and six cents ($1.06) due thereon on the ..... day of ....., 189 , with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable annually. This bond, constituting the last coupon, will be received at any time during the year preceding its maturity for W. T. P. A. Literature, or for an annual subscription to The Union Signal.

This bond is secured by a deposit or an equivalent amount of the capital stock of said Association with Esther Pugh, trustee; such deposit at all times being equal in amount to the aggregate sum of all bonds issued by said Association.

In witness whereof the said Association has caused its corporate seal to be affixed and this bond to be signed by its President and Secretary this ..... day of ....., 189

[SEAL.] ..... President.

..... Secretary.

A PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

By referring to report of stockholders' meeting on page 8 you will find the outlines of a plan adopted by the W. T. P. A. at that meeting. On this page, by means of these forms, I hope to make it so plain as to answer all your questions. The capital stock of the association having been increased $50,000, the following plan was unanimously adopted: The stock is to be placed in the hands of a faithful trustee, Miss Esther Pugh being elected to this position, and on it shall be issued to the W. C. T. U. women of the land, up to Jan. 1, 1891, six per cent bonds of five dollars each, secured by stock in hands of said trustee. The fac simile of the bond given here will aid you in understanding the plan. As you see, each bond has coupons attached, each coupon represents the annual payment of one dollar with the accruing interest added. That is, the bonds run five years, and each year you cut off and send us its coupon which we pay. The conditions are that bonds can be sold only to W. C. T. U. women, and that no woman can purchase more than two. We wish them as largely distributed as possible, especially among those who do not now take THE UNION SIGNAL, and are not acquainted with our literature.

All coupons can be used either for literature, or in payment of subscription to our paper at any time during the year; if you prefer the cash you can have it at the expiration of each of the five years. No bonds will be registered, as the coupons can be used as here indicated, and it is taken for granted that each purchaser will take care of her own bond, and send in the coupons when due.

Why has this plan been presented? Because we wish the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association to be entirely in the hands of its friends; if all the bonds are called for by January 1st, as, judging by last spring's experience with stock, they will be, at that date the association will not owe a dollar to outside parties, and will have more than enough money to pay cash down for the immense Webb press that is now building for us, thus securing the benefit of the cash discount.

What will be the result from your standpoint and from ours?

1. You can invest five or ten dollars in a way that will bring you a good interest, if you wish the coupons paid in cash. If you take your pay-in subscriptions or in literature, the interest will be still greater, for you will thus be extending the power of our printed pages in your own home and in the homes of others whom you wish to influence.

2. You will have invested a small sum where it will do good and good only, and yet be as safe as if it were in a bank, safer than it would be in some banks.

3. You will take a deeper interest in the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association because you are a part of it. You "belong" and therefore will be more interested in helping on its plans whenever you can.

4. You will have your share in demonstrating to the world your faith in this great work of women for humanity. Is not that worth having?

The W. T. P. A. on its part will gain from five to ten thousand most loyal, true and helpful allies. We will be clear of debt to outside parties. We will be able to repay the bonds in such a way that we shall not feel it, and yet will gain that splendid constituency of noble women, who will intelligently coöperate in all our plans for extending the blessed work the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association is doing.

Who ought to be interested? All who stand for the Home in its deadly conflict with the saloon. Every woman engaged in this peaceful war "For God and Home and Humanity" should thus invest. Each local union should own one or more shares, that by means of the coupons, it could order supplies at any time. I have asked the privilege of having the first bond issued and presume that all of the general officers will show their interest in a similar way, and that such employés of the Association as are eligible will be glad to thus prove their faith in the W. T. P. A. The bonds will be offered at the Atlanta Convention, and doubtless several hundred will be sold there.

Remember, that after January 1, 1891, there will probably be no more bonds for sale. We feel sure these bonds will be popular, and so be called for at once. If any wish them who have not the money now, but will have it January 1st, if you write us so requesting, we will reserve bonds for you till that date. We prefer to put the greater part of the $50.000 in bonds, so as to have the financial interest in the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association as wide-spread as possible.

Remember that this business must be attended to at once, if you wish to secure the bonds. Address,

MARY ALLEN WEST, Secretary W. T. P. A.

THE attacks upon the public school system, cloaked under opposition to compulsory education in Wisconsin and Illinois, is arousing the friends of the "little red schoolhouse," and will thus result in great good.

As President of the World's W. C. T. U. Miss Willard receives so many cablegrams that she has been requested to select a cablegram address. She chooses "Humanity" for this purpose and has had the word duly registered; her foreign correspondents will please take notice.

THE murder of Chief of Police Hennessy by Sicilians in New Orleans, has created a profound sensation all over the land The excitement is deepened by news that these assassins have selected Mayor Shakespeare as their next victim and have so notified him. He is not at all terrified by their threats but declares that having been elected by thousands of people to enforce the laws, nothing shall deter him from doing his full duty by any band of assassins. The Committee of Fifty, composed of leading citizens, are working hard to bring the villains to justice. Notice having been received that the ship Elysia is approaching New Orleans with 700 Italian emigrants on board, the custom house officers are instructed to go down and meet the ship, and unless the emigrants can satisfy the officers concerning their financial and moral standing, they will not be allowed to land. If Louisiana has any more timber for making Governors and Mayors like Governor Nichols and Mayor Shakespeare, some other states and cities would do well to import it.

JACOB AND THE ANGEL.

BY J. E. RANKIN, LL.D.

Wrestling Jacob, let me go,
In the East, see morning glow;
On the glad wings of the light,
Let me take to Heav'n my flight.
Angel Stranger, first to me,
Tell my being's mystery;
What the great Creator's plan,
What is God and what is man.

Wrestling Jacob, breathing clod,
Secret things belong to God;
Why shouldst thou aspire to know?
Do thy duty here below.
Angel Stranger, tell thy name;
Did Thy word Creation frame?
Ere the morning stars began,
Did Thou love Thy creature man?

Wrestling Jacob, by this touch,
Thou hast pressed me here too much;
Know what is love's mystery;
Israel henceforth thou shalt be.
Angel Stranger, lo Thee now,
Marks I see upon Thy brow,
Nail-prints in Thy hands and feet;
Thee my Lord and God I greet.

Wrestling Jacob, take this grace,
Thou hast seen God face to face;
Prince thou art with Him in prayer,
Take the first-born's lot and share.
Angel Stranger, on my way,
Halt I Heav'nward from this day;
He can never be unblest,
Who has entertained such Guest.

"BEN, THE FOREMAN."

BY RAY RICHMOND.

The decision was made; a decision which John Wallace arrived at, after much deliberate thought and great anxiety; a decision which raised a conflict between the delicate voice of conscience, and the stern tones of duty. His foreman in the wagon factory, of which he was the wealthy proprietor, although an upright, honest man, a good "boss," and a conscientious worker, had, of late, been addicted to drink, and only this morning as John was making his way to his office, he met the foreman, Ben Heffner, reeling out of a saloon, his face flushed and his eyes bleary. As John gravely and sternly saluted him, a gleam of recognition flashed over Ben's face, only to disappear the next instant.

All the morning John Wallace sat at his desk, pondering over the situation. To allow one of his men to appear before the younger workers (many of whom were boys) intoxicated, not once, but many times, placed before them a bad example. To him his workmen were as a large school of children, over whom he watched, and whom he carefully trained. Duty demanded that Ben Heffner should be discharged. But—then! To discharge Ben meant to take from him his good name, as well as his good salary. Visions of a weak wife and half a dozen small children came before John's eyes, as he pictured Ben, falling lower and lower, until he lay grovelling in the gutter. Conscience shrunk from such a picture, and from being the cause of it, and whispered softly, "Keep him, help him."

"I have given him three chances; I have talked, I have remonstrated," John argued back. "If I let him go, will he go straight to the dogs? He is doing it now, as rapidly as any strongly-constituted man can. Or will the man within him rise to the surface, on finding himself discharged, and shake off the fatal coil which is enwrapping him?" And thus John Wallace soliloquized, until at last, after the subject had been fully canvassed, he decided that Ben should go. "If he proves himself the man I think he is, I will take him back to his old place at the end of two weeks. Neither he nor his family will suffer in that time. And if he succumbs, well, then I have done my duty by the boys, and will think that Ben's is a hopeless case."

At the end of the week, Ben was paid off and discharged. He came into the office with a silly smirk on his face, and his breath strong with whisky. He went out with a scared look in his eyes, and a far soberer demeanor than he had on entering. It wrung John's kindly heart to see the poor fellow's expression of grief and dismay. Ben had asked no questions, had made no effort to keep his place, but accepted his fate without a murmur. He knew, only too well, that he deserved it, and he also knew that his uncontrollable appetite had cost him a good situation. His first inclination on leaving the office was to go into the nearest saloon and squander every cent of his week's wages, and he no doubt would have done so but for a tube-rose blooming in a window, the perfume of which floated out to him. Jennie, his little wife, had worn tube-roses in her bonny hair that September evening long ago when he had stood at her side and promised to cherish and protect her.

"Confound the sickening smell," he ejaculated, for Ben was not a man to listen kindly to conscience's voice. Yet he did not go into the saloon near by, but reached home, quiet and decidedly sober. Jennie was too pleased with the turn of affairs to question him, and as the evening passed and he played with the children, instead of going "down to see the boys," she was very happy, although full of wonder.

The long, dark night hours were filled with torturing thoughts for poor, sleepless Ben. He saw his own conduct as he had never seen it before. A shiver of apprehension passed over him, as he realized where he might have been had his eyes never been opened. And then, he silently thanked John Wallace for discharging him, as he had done. Moreover, Ben, with sternest determination, set his teeth and vowed to never touch another drop of liquor. The next day he told his wife of the loss of his situation, of his determination to live a better life, and of his gratefulness to John Wallace. And, although a long, cold winter, without work, perhaps, stared them in the face, Jennie could not feel exactly unhappy, when she saw the old spirit in Ben's eye, and heard his voice resume its once determined ring.

The following day Ben started out to find work. He never once thought of going back to his old employer, but steadily, and sometimes hopelessly, tramped the streets day in and day out. Two weeks had gone, and Ben was without a position and almost without money, but no spirits had passed his lips since the day of his discharge. He passed the saloons and his old companions without one regret. At the end of that time, John, who had kept a sharp watch on all Ben's movements, took him back to his place. They had a long, serious talk together, after which Ben settled down to steady, hard labor. He kept his resolution manfully. He not only did this, but kept a sharp lookout on those under him, and many a young erring boy was brought back to an honest life by Ben's influence.

THE MEANING OF CHAUTAUQUA.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

I am so often asked, by letter and otherwise, my view of the work done at Chautauqua, that it seems worth while to formulate, in a degree, at least, such conviction as has come to me. The readers of THE UNION SIGNAL hardly need this, since its story is often referred to there, yet even for them there are some who are more or less uncertain as to the real nature of the movement.

I think that for many of us there has been thorough distrust of the sort of education to be acquired by Chautauqua methods. For my own part I confess in the beginning, to not only distrust, but dislike, which endured for a long time. Beginning as a mammoth camp-meeting, with some forms of culture thrown in, it seemed to me to carry with it many of the weakest elements in our American life: content with inadequate knowledge; the lack of thoroughness that is our bane, and great cackling over the very small egg represented by the Chautauqua diploma. The Chautauquan, a magazine which became at once its organ, did somewhat toward modifying this conviction. Its limitations were plain, but its work showed earnest purpose, and its scope constantly enlarged. Back of any incongruities and inadequacies, a large and generous mind was at work. No man, save he who had once been a circuit preacher, and had thus known the barrenness of the shut-in lives he encountered as he rode, could so well gauge the needs and the longings of women and girls cut off from intercourse with the world and ignorant of how to bring the world to their own doors. It is Bishop Vincent who is the heart and soul of the movement, and its largeness is of the same nature as his own.

Philanthropy has no right to the name unless its work is constructive. Its one aim, aside from the inevitable phase of temporary shelter or succor for the helpless, should be to develop the individual from the mass. Enlightenment, education, a better chance; these are bound up in any philanthropy that belongs to real progress, and all these are the watchwords of the Chautauqua movement. Fourteen years of steady advance finds the word to-day a synonym for many things impossible to realize or even fully credit till one's own eyes have seen, and one's own ears heard on the spot. With enlarging means and phenomenal growth, the settlement which began in tents is now a town, still in the grove on the shore of the quiet lake, but a city in its crowded, busy life. The great school of languages has men like Harper, of Yale, for the classical side, supported by others of equal reputation in their own states, and men of large gifts and culture represent modern languages. There is not a phase of work from history and literature to cooking, or general industrial education, that is not represented there. College students come to work up some neglected point. Ministers refresh themselves with study to which every light of modern criticism is brought. Oxford has sent for the last year or two, Principal Fairbarn, of Mansfield College, a profound thinker in the field of Biblical criticism, and a fascinating speaker on literary topics. Music, and art in general, is in the hands of experts, and the standard has not only risen steadily but is now of the highest. For three years, Dr. Richard T. Ely, of Johns Hopkins University, one of our leading authorities in political economy, has given courses of lectures there, and has now a great class managed by correspondence, and every department of science is equally well represented.

It is at this point that my own conversion, long a partial one, fulfilled itself. When, after that first course, a prominent lecturer there came to see me, I said to him, with the memory of his thorough German training in my mind: "I want you to tell me squarely just how you felt about going to Chautauqua, and how much in reality it represents to you."

It is violating no confidence to give his reply, since he has many times found occasion to repeat it to others. "I didn't want to," he said with a laugh. "Really I hesitated because I was not sure of the worth of anything to be done in such time and under such conditions. I am sure now. It is very American, but it is genuine work, and I shall always be glad to be part of it."

That is the summary of many an one who goes to scoff and remains to enjoy. John Habberton, for instance, best known to us through "Helen's Babies," went this year to study the comic side. He found it, but he found also something else; what it was he will presently tell for himself. It is sufficient to say that on the third day he was seen engaging a cottage for 1891, and planning to bring his family there for the season. More than this; having beamed generally upon every class-room then open, he proceeded to join the class of 1894, was promptly made its president, and went about triumphant with the class ribbon in his buttonhole. He laughed and we all laughed at a good many bits of by-play, but tears were often quite as near the surface.

One sees there hundreds upon hundreds, yes, thousands of women, and a liberal sprinkling of men, farmers and farmers' wives, whose lives had been unending toil till they found there their first outlook into something larger. Old women took courage, and began one and another course; anything they had desired and never found till now. On Recognition Day, the Chautauqua Commencement, four hundred and more of the class of 1890 marched through the Golden Gate, and up to the Hall of Philosophy where diplomas are given:—at their head a white-headed but bright-eyed woman of eighty-two years, who had just finished the four years' course, with the granddaughter on whose arm she leaned. There were other heads as white, if not as old, and one and all as they passed between the long lines of white-frocked children, strewing flowers before them, joined in the song the trained chorus led for them:

"Farewell, farewell to the old,
We bury the dead years joyfully
To find them again in eternity.
Farewell, farewell to the old."

Smile as you like at the big key and the solemn verger unlocking the gate; at the rows of many-colored seals that testify to work done; at all the small "pomp and circumstance" that makes up these final days; it is still all good; all a part of the new life, itself but a hint of more and better to come.

All over the United States circles have formed and are forming. The remotest village feels the stir, and its people learn how to work together on a broader basis than they have ever known. It is an enlarging and deepening of lives for all, and each year will lessen the sectarian element, already far in the background, and make of it, what its founder hardly dared to hope it might one day be,—a university for the people.

Chautauqua is a vital part of the many-sided work that more and more marks our passage from a century of material growth and thought into the nobler one so near at hand. Let me then end this most imperfect word with better ones from a master. It is Victor Hugo who shall tell you as hardly another man of the nineteenth century could, what is to be, and in this is-to-be, Chautauqua will own a share, larger than any of us have ever dreamed might be possible:

"For four hundred years the human race has not made a step but what has left its plain vestige behind. We enter now upon great centuries. The sixteenth century will be known as the age of painters; the seventeenth will be termed the age of writers, the eighteenth the age of philosophers; the nineteenth the age of apostles and prophets. To satisfy the nineteenth century, it is necessary to be the painter of the sixteenth, the writer of the seventeenth, the philosopher of the eighteenth, and it is also necessary like Louis Blanc, to have the innate and holy love of humanity, which constitutes an apostolate, and opens up a prophetic vista into the future. In the twentieth, war will be dead, the scaffold will be dead, animosity will be dead, royalty will be dead, dogmas will be dead, but man will live. For all there will be but one country,—that country the whole earth,—for all there will be but one hope—that hope the whole heaven. All hail, then, to that noble twentieth century, which shall be our children's, and which our children shall inherit."

THE OLD, OLD STORY.

BY HON. A. B. RICHMOND.

Ten thousand casks,
Forever dribbling out their base contents,
Touch'd by the Midas finger of the state,
Bleed gold for ministers to sport with.
Drink, then, and be mad. 'Tis your country bids!
—Cowper.

Yes, to the shame of our Christian country be it said, it bids the citizens drink and become mad, paupers and criminals. It is true the command is not direct—only by implication—and therein is the hypocrisy and sin. When a great and enlightened government, "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," sanctions a law or a judicial act, with a full knowledge of the consequences incident thereto, and inseparable therefrom, it tacitly approves of all that is likely to occur by the operation thereof. To say that a law does not sanction all of the well-known consequences of its enactment, is logic run mad, and falsehood in masquerade.

When a chemist places the ingredients of a well-known compound in his alembic or retort, it is evident that he contemplates the result. When our law-makers combine in an enactment certain privileges and franchises, whose well-known results are pauperism, disease and crime, they cannot but contemplate those results, and impliedly sanction them. The logic of this proposition is axiomatic. The supercilious smiles of politicians, and the dangerous sophistry and theories of men prominent in church and state, are rebuked and confounded by facts and statistics that publish to the world the inevitable consequences of licensed rum. Our law-makers cannot plead ignorance of these results; neither can they truthfully say that they do not know that the ripened ear comes from the planted seed. To enact a law that licenses places for temperate drinking, is to legalize the sowing of the seed with a full knowledge of what the harvest will be. Neither statesmanship, nor exalted position in churches or institutions of learning, can shield men from the just odium that should attach to those who would legalize temptations in the daily path of their fellow-men.

In all the thousands I have defended and prosecuted for crimes committed under the influence of rum, there was not one who had not commenced the downward course from that exalted eminence where the fashionable wine cup and beer mug were the privileged companions of the young and inexperienced. Temptations sanctioned by the so-called great and good have a most dangerous effect on the rising generation of men. The plastic mind of youth is most forcibly influenced by example and precept. How careful, then, should they be to whom is intrusted the education of those on the threshold of life, lest they mingle the poisonous example of their mature self-indulgence in the lessons they teach to those under their care; a D.D. or an LL.D. affixed to the name of an eminent instructor has a powerful reflex action on his favorite glass or goblet, and tends to conceal the deadly germ to which his system has become indurated. The mature oak bows only to the force of a tornado, yet, is the sapling bent by a summer zephyr.

"The pebble in the streamlet scant
Has changed the course of many a river
The dew-drop on the baby plant
Has warped the giant oak forever."

Men are not born drunkards, they are made so by surrounding circumstances. First comes the wine cup and beer mug, sanctioned by the approval of men in exalted positions. Next an appetite, ill-begotten by these germs of future dissipation, demands a stronger support to the diseased organism and additional fuel to keep alive the raging fires kindled by temperate indulgence. Then, from an inflamed stomach comes a demand for alcohol in any and every form that it can be obtained. Then, the sequel: Disease, pauperism, death and a drunkard's grave. Verily, nowhere in nature's broad domain are the laws of cause and effect more fully verified than in licensed rum and its certain consequences. Of the hundreds of thousands of drunkards of our land, all have commenced their careers from the respectable eminence of temperate indulgence, and ended them in pauperism, in prison, or on the gallows. Hundreds of them "built up the wasted tissues of their bodies" with alcohol until an insulted and diseased organism, unable any longer to withstand the logic of effects, laid down and died a miserable death; a positive demonstration of the falsity of a theory that has worked incalculable mischief to mankind. Let us remember that a sophism is not made logical by a D. D. affixed to the name of the logician who utters it.

From the pages of my morning paper I extract the following significant article:

"YOUNGSTOWN, O., Feb. 22.—Superintendent Templin, of the county infirmary, who is not a member of the Prohibition party, was asked yesterday how many of the inmates in the institution were sent there through the influence of liquor and said, 'Aside from those in the insane department fully ninety per cent have been sent there through whisky. The evils of liquor are nowhere more apparent than among the inmates of a poor-house.'"

A prominent statistician states that eighty per cent of the prisoners in our penitentiaries are serving sentences for crimes, whose primordial or direct cause was rum; ninety per cent of those who have died on the scaffold committed the murders of which they were convicted while under its demoniacal influence. In 320 railroad accidents that occurred in 1889, only thirteen were unavoidable, or from causes beyond the control of man; while the remainder were from carelessness begotten by the various degrees of intoxication of those to whom were entrusted the moving trains with their freight of human life.

The statistics of the United States census for the year 1880 show that our people expended during that year, $800,000,000 for intoxicating liquors, while they paid for bread only $505,000,000; for meats of all kinds, $303,000,000; for woolen goods, $237,000; for cotton goods, $210,000,000, and for boots and shoes, $196,000,000. These are the calculations of the New York Tribune, and they show that a people that boast of their Christian enlightenment, pay annually more than one-half as much more for intoxicating liquors than they do for food and clothing. Verily will the future reader of our history wonder why our missionary societies were so anxious for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the far-off heathen, while they were so indifferent to the need of missionary efforts at home.

With these startling statistics before us, is it not evident that the most important question of the nineteenth century to a Christian people is, What shall we do to redeem our country from the curse of licensed rum? To my mind there is but one answer: Place the ballot in the hands of the women as well as the men, with equal freedom in the exercise of their right to vote on all questions before the people. And why not? In all ages of the world women have ruled the most powerful and enlightened nations of the earth with acknowledged ability. As queens, the periods of their government have been noted epochs in the advancement of their nations towards the civilization and enlightenment of to-day. Even as warriors they have led steel-clad armies to victories where the courage of men failed in the conflict. As authors they have filled the world with the purest and best of modern literature; as scientists they have solved many of the mysteries hidden in the arena of nature; as musicians, artists and sculptors, they have challenged the best ability of man; as inventors their devices have enriched the world of human industry, while as mothers their teachings have molded for good the advancing thoughts and aspirations of our race. The hands that rock the cradle are even more powerful for good than those that hold the plow or guide the engine. The prayer taught at the mother's knee has often been a protecting shield against the temptations incident to the battle of life. The thought of a mother has often stayed the hand of the criminal at the very moment of the execution of a contemplated crime, and when a father's admonitions were forgotten.

To deny the right of woman to vote, or her ability to intelligently exercise the elective franchise is the crystallization of ignorance or prejudice. To doubt her moral influence at the ballot box is a relic of the ancient bigotry and barbarism that once recognized her only as a soulless chattel, while to concede to her equal rights and privileges under the law, is but in accordance with the principles of the advancing enlightenment of the nineteenth century. As certainly as that the light of the sun shall dawn upon a future day of election, will the women of all civilized countries eventually exercise the right of voting on all questions before the people. And when that time comes there will be no more licensed sin, no privileged temptations to vice and crime; pot-house politicians and ward statesmen will be "shorn of their locks," and the saloon and bar-room will no longer exert their influence for evil. Then, and not until then, will the day of our redemption come.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION.

BY REV. E. P. MARVIN.

The education of the rising generation is a matter of vital importance to both church and state.

An intellectual and secular education is not sufficient to secure welfare or safety. Rome had more intelligence and culture when she fell than when she was in her prime. The "shaggy demons of the wilderness" who trampled out her civilization were more moral than her citizens. The golden age of Grecian and Roman culture and civilization was that of foulest corruption and impending destruction. The fine sense of beauty has no necessary connection with duty, and the grammatical declensions of virtue have no connection with its practice. Education may create most accomplished rogues and dangerous neighbors. It is said that after Russia had tried secular education for a while, her Prime Minister said to the Czar, "We are raising a race of demons." The tree of the knowledge of good and evil in Paradise brought in the devil's millennium.

Knowledge of good and evil affords no assurance of a greater love of the one or of a greater hatred of the other than would exist in ignorance. Our first parents no doubt found the devil well enough informed. The archangel Michael and the arch-devil Lucifer may have the same intellectual ability and the same intellectual attainments but the fidelity of the one and the disobedience of the other make heaven and hell. Unless knowledge ripens into moral force it becomes the tool of selfishness and sin. Corrupted intelligence is worse than misled ignorance. Knowledge perverted is misused power. Give the printing-press to vicious men and they will only do harm with it.

There is to-day a superstitious faith in spelling-books. Men who ought to know better will tell you with census tables and statistics of all kinds in hand that ignorance is the cause of crime. But, if statistics are to be our guide, it is no more a cause than dirtiness of skin or a want of change of clothing. Ignorance is only one of many concomitants of crime. Intelligence is another. And knowledge is a third. It is a purely random inference of careless writers that, because ignorance and crime are often found together, therefore ignorance is the cause of crime. We must educate the moral and religious nature by the Word of God. We cannot make children honest by teaching them the multiplication table, nor virtuous by teaching them grammar, nor benevolent by teaching them geography. There is no logical connection whatever between a secular education and a good character. To make men moral we must educate the moral nature on the basis of revealed religion.

Washington said "Religion and morality are the essential pillars of civil society." And again, "Virtue or morality is the necessary spring of popular government. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education upon minds of a peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."

The Word of God furnishes the only valid sanctions of sound morality. If we reject or neglect this and rely on "the unperverted instincts of human nature," as well shut up our schools and wait for some Cæsar with his drawn sword for a scepter. Great populations, especially when congested in cities, must either be trained to the liberty of the gospel or be ruled by a tyrant. Where God and His will are not known and acknowledged, no imperative motives can be found to make men noble and good. The mass of men who believe they are to die like dogs, will live like dogs. Says Mill: "If a man prefers to be a contented pig, we should have no positive reason for thinking him wrong; even did we think him so, we should have no positive reason for telling him so, and even if we told him, we should have no means of convincing him." And can such persons be qualified to maintain civil order and free institutions? "Unless morality is rooted in a reverent love of God it will be driven before the sudden gusts of temptation like 'rattling autumn leaves' before the winter's winds. If it looks upon religion as the best 'Chief of Police' merely, and not as the interpreter of everlasting verities, it must of necessity be destitute of force. Short of the willing sacrifice of self to the righteous claims of God, and the cheerful movement of the mind within the limits of a supreme law, there is no pure or durable morality. Religion is the root of which the purest morality is the flower. The flower cannot exist without the root; and the root cannot exist and have vitality without the inflorescence in morality."

Our Christian education and evangelism to be most effective must begin with the young. Statesmen tell us that we must stop raising rogues if we would get rid of the race. Christian instruction should begin with the dawn of existence, and predominate through the whole course of education. "First, midst and last," we should teach "what man is to believe concerning God and what duty God requires of man." As eternity surpasses time in importance so does this surpass all other knowledge. If our children are trained in secular schools and grow up Godless, our boasted science will soon shine like an electric light over a moral graveyard. We must begin from the first to train the heart and conscience along with the intellect.

A NOTABLE MEETING.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The third International Congress Against the Abuse of Alcoholic Liquors, the preparation for which has occupied so much of my time and thought during the last two years, was held in Christiania, Norway, during the first week in September. The meetings began by a social gathering of the members on Tuesday evening, September 2, in the large hall of the Y. M. C. A., which was beautifully decorated with flags of all nations, the national emblems of Norway, and choice plants lent for the occasion. Tea and refreshments were served by the white-ribbon women. Dr. Bentzen, the secretary, in a few happy words, delivered in English, German and French, bade the visitors welcome, and responses were made by representatives from each nation.

At ten o'clock the following morning the Congress was formally opened in the lecture hall of the University by the president of the organizing committee, Dr. Dahl, Director of the State Board of Health. The ministers of state attended in a body and listened to the address, after which they retired, and business commenced by electing Dr. Dahl president of the Congress, and Dr. Bentzen, secretary, also one of the representatives from each country as honorary presidents. Dr. Forel, president of the permanent committee elected at the close of the previous Congress, then gave a résumé of what had been done by various countries in the promotion of temperance since the last meeting in Zurich, three years ago. It was really a report showing the growth of the various societies and the spread of the cause, and gave much encouragement as regards the different countries of Europe, though regret was expressed at the difficulty or impossibility of obtaining any statistics from the United States of America. This, we hope, will be remedied before the next Congress, especially as Miss Willard, as President of the National W. C. T. U., has been added to the list of names for the International Commission. The rest of the day was occupied by papers and discussions on the various methods that had been employed in Norway to bring about the happy results obtained in that country, and also a description of and discussion on the methods and merits of the Gothemborg system, one or other form of which largely prevails in Sweden and Norway. After a warm and interesting discussion, the general opinion of the Congress was decidedly in opposition to the system being introduced into other countries, considering it as a hindrance to the work of the temperance reformers, although some few members from Germany and Switzerland were still in favor of it.

The second day's papers and discussions were very practical, and, as Dr. Dahl expressed it in his opening speech, "the most important questions brought forward at the Congress." These were "The Relation of Education to Alcoholism," and "The Native Races and the Liquor Traffic." Said Dr. Dahl, "These two questions are closely related to each other, for the native races are like weak and untutored children whom it is our duty to guard against temptation." The first paper was read by Mr. Charles Wakely, secretary of the United Kingdom Band of Hope union. Several others followed from various countries, including a very valuable paper contributed by Professor Demme and read by Dr. Forel, showing the wisdom and necessity of absolute prohibition of all alcoholic liquors in regard to children. Some of the speakers opposed the formation of children's societies or administering the pledge to young people, but all were agreed as to the advisability of instructing the children as to the nature of alcohol and its effect on the physical system, either in schools or separate societies. Then came the point—the necessity of having teachers intelligently interested in the subject. Dr. Bergmann, from Sweden, told about the Total Abstinence Society formed among the students in Upsala University, and of the Temperance Home provided for them, where everything is done to supply a home and social comforts and companionship without the temptation to drink.

Throughout the entire discussion one could not but remark how very much public opinion, in regard to this matter of temperance among the young, has advanced in Continental Europe since the last Congress three years ago. Mrs. Leavitt reported the work done in America largely by the W. C. T. U., and in reply to some remarks of Pastor Bovet, Switzerland, I told of the work and result of the Y. W. C. T. U.

Then came the Rev. J. Grant Mills, of London, telling what has been done by the Native Races and Liquor Traffic Committee since the meeting in Zurich, and urging the formation of a National Committee in each country to work in harmony and bring influence to bear upon the legislation of each separate country in relation to this subject. Mrs. Leavitt followed, telling of what she had herself seen and learned of this drink traffic in Africa, etc. No discussion resulted, owing, probably, to the thrill of horror that followed Mrs. Leavitt's speech, and the undeniable truth of her statements.

An interesting discussion followed on the place occupied by Temperance Coffee Houses in the movement. A practical illustration of the kind of articles provided by the temperance people in Christiania was afforded to the members of the Congress in rooms behind the assembly hall in the shape of a variety of non-alcoholic drinks, sandwiches, tea, coffee, and milk, as well as cake and fruit, which were all furnished gratis during the whole of the Congress, and which were greatly appreciated by the members. Time did not permit the reading of all the papers sent in, but an interesting account was given by Pastor Bovet of the growth of the Blue Cross movement in Switzerland, while others told of work done in Holland, Germany, Finland, etc. Mrs. Leavitt represented the W. W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Selmer (Denmark) spoke on "Woman and Temperance." At the close, a permanent committee was appointed to act for the next two years, or until the next Congress should be organized. This consisted of the members of the organizing committee in Christiania, together with Dr. Forel, of Zurich, and myself, who were reëlected. It was decided to hold the fourth Congress in 1892, either in Germany or Holland.

During the week several meetings were held in connection with the Congress which deepened or added to the impressions received at the sittings, as well as reaching a wider public. Wednesday evening Mr. Wakely gave a lecture, describing the method of instruction pursued in Bands of Hope. To this meeting the male and female teachers of Christiania public schools were invited, and so much was the lecture appreciated that Mr. Wakely was requested to repeat it the next evening, which he did to a crowded audience. After the close of the Congress on Friday, the members were taken in two specially chartered steamboats up the beautiful Christiania fiord, round and among several of the islands to a pretty place called Sandviken where dinner was partaken of. Although all the guests were not teetotalers, and each one was at liberty to take what he pleased, yet the wine bottles were conspicuous by their rarity, and at some tables by their absence. The following Sunday Dr. Forel addressed the students in the University on "Total Abstinence." An interesting and useful feature of the Congress was the exhibition connected with it in which were collected various non-alcoholic drinks, temperance literature in several languages, charts, diagrams, etc., used in instructing the young. Pauses of half an hour or so were allowed during the sittings when the members had the opportunity of inspecting these objects or of partaking of some refreshment served, as indicated before, by the members of the W. C. T. U. in Christiania.

Everybody attending the Congress seemed to be pleased, not only with the arrangements, but with the result as a whole. The general impression was that these international gatherings of those working against intemperance, though not all teetotalers, are doing much to promote harmony of working and more united action. Dr. Granfelt, from Finland, proposed a scheme for the formation of a European Temperance Union, but the time did not seem to be quite ripe for that. A committee was, however, formed from different countries, in order to help forward the work, especially in Germany, and report at the next meeting. This did not form a part of the Congress, but was in connection with it. The International Commission, which was appointed at Zurich in order to aid the permanent committee in preparing the work for the next Congress, was re-appointed with a few alterations, owing to death, etc., and a few additions, one of which was, as I said, Miss Frances Willard for the U. S. A. in conjunction with Dr. Judge Black, Pennsylvania, and Mr. Stearns, New York.

September, 1890.

BITS OF TRAVEL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It has been my good fortune, recently, to make the acquaintance of a number of our temperance workers in the western part of the Keystone state. A very gratifying experience indeed, it was, to find such hosts of true and loyal women in our W. C. T. U. organization, especially in the counties of Lawrence and Crawford, whose conventions I attended. But few state meetings could surpass these in the intelligence, skill in debate, business promptitude and earnestness of purpose, of delegates. Mrs. Ross, president of Crawford county, exhibited rare tact and knowledge in the discussions following papers on various topics of our great reform; such broad titles as the following claiming attention: "What Does the State do for Our Children?" "The Bible and the Liquor Traffic," "Our National Curse."

I noticed that the good women seemed much concerned to fulfill their obligations as mothers, and how to conduct mothers' meetings with interest and profit was a fruitful theme for consideration. To occupy three evenings, and hold large audiences, attentive and interested, in a village of a few hundred people, was surely a test of the strength of our principles upon the awakened heart and conscience of good people in the nation.

Mrs. A. M. B. McCleary conducted the three-days meeting of Lawrence county with much ability. She had the strong support of all the pastors of New Castle, than whom an abler body of men, devoted to prohibition and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, cannot be found. They are stanch, true, earnest, "men with iron in their blood;" serious-minded from the study of National evils, and realizing the necessity for National reform. The reports from twenty departments of work exhibited wide-awake diligence on the part of our indefatigable sisters. Mrs. McCleary, state superintendent of the department for soldiers and sailors, arranged a special program for one evening, when the National superintendent was called upon to deliver an address. The old soldiers attended in a body; many of them had voted for the amendment, some "cared for none of these things," but it is hoped such received an arrest of thought that will produce fruit in the future.

In Mahoningtown, a railroad center, the Holy Spirit's presence has been felt, in the awakening and conversion of several employés, in answer to the efforts and prayers of the local superintendent. I was glad to see an outfit for a caboose, consisting of a handsome Bible, a hymn and tune book, temperance and religious newspapers and tracts. The need for furnishing passenger cars, as well as cabooses, with good reading matter was quite forcibly impressed upon my mind in the journey to and from Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. Meeting with almost a car full of young men—commercial travelers—who amused themselves by the perusal of the lightest literature, I could not but wish our sister, Jennie Smith, might find the way to somebody's heart and purse and supply this need.

"A Demorest elocutionary contest for gold medal" was a feature of both conventions. Nothing more educational has enlisted the young people of the country than this popular method. The next generation will not lack temperance orators on the rostrum.

A visit to the oil region is, to a novice, a unique experience. Oil City lies in a deep, narrow valley, the hills on either side rising precipitously to the height of several hundred feet—the sides terraced and thickly studded with houses—and everywhere the unsightly derricks, black with baths of crude petroleum, which bursts over and around them, after the drill of nearly a thousand feet down through soil, sand and rock, and the final shot from a blast of glycerine. I saw two of these wells, one being pumped and yielding twenty barrels a day (a very moderate amount) of black, nasty smelling stuff, so different from the clear, refined, beautiful oil we burn in our lamps; the other in process of drilling. I found a very polite and obliging employé who explained the method of refining; so it was my duty to return the favor by enlightening him regarding temperance politics.

The immense wealth to the country which has come through the discovery of oil, coal and natural gas in this valley of the Alleghanies can scarcely be computed—nor the impetus given to every branch of industry, by the development of such resources. Whether the monopoly of the Standard Oil Company, which has apparently the power to absorb all that Mother Earth has in storage of this valuable product, and which is now seeking to possess the newly-discovered petroleum in Ohio and West Virginia, is a blessing or a curse, seems difficult to decide—one thing the most obtuse cannot fail to discern—that large corporations have almost unlimited power of control in the political world as elsewhere, and that the poor patriot has but a small chance of success in these days when riches have increased so amazingly.

The necessity for education in our institutes and schools of methods was shown me quite forcibly by a conversation with a young man of more than ordinary intelligence, who drove me over the fine roads of Crawford county. His inquiry, which I considered the healthiest drink in our large cities, beer or water? presented a grand opportunity for me to explain the difference between a pure beverage and the unwholesome, deceptive and poisonous beer. A strange idea the country farmer boy has of city life. It is a healthful sign of progress that the farmers are forming leagues and alliances for "protection" of their interests—but, after all the combinations and trusts which bind men together for mutual benefit and material gain, what comparison will they bear to the far higher aims that unite the Christian temperance women of America?

Our watchword is and ever must be, protection for our children, our homes and our country.

SARAH A. MCCLEES.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE, THEN ON THAT.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Two temperance workers that I wot of went to Victoria, B. C., spoke to the great public in the evening, met the ladies in the afternoon, and organized a W. C. T. U.; met the children and organized a Band of Hope, then went their way in peace. Within a week they did the very same thing over again in ——, Montana, and went their way in peace. Three months after the Victoria union had bought headquarters, had established a weekly gospel temperance meeting, and had gathered in, through their signatures, the people whose personal attitude toward total abstinence set the key-note socially in that aristocratic little capital. Later on they presented prohibition petitions to the local legislature, and from that day to this have gone steadily forward with their work. Six months later there was not a voice to call out of ———, Montana, though it was a city from which perhaps most might have been expected of any within the borders of that territory. What made the difference? It was not that the work was well done in the first case, and ill done in the second. It was the material on which the speakers and organizers expended their energies. In the one case the people rallied to the call, they had that dogged persistence that characterizes the Britisher, and they were a settled population. In the other case they had the happy-go-lucky spirit and method of the frontier American. They did not continue in one place either as to locality or purpose. The seed of temperance reform had no deepness of earth. The work was voted transient.

Reader, to which kind of a local union do you belong, and what are you going to do about it?

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Our Book Table.

Six books on varied themes, each of unusual interest in its line, come from Lee & Shepard, Boston, most of them through A. C. McClurg & Company, Chicago. The first deals with spiritual themes.

A LOOK UPWARD, by Susie C. Clark. It is a common sense, Scriptural study of so-called Christian science, bringing out alike the fallacies of its leaders and the truths embodied in it. Though we cannot accept all of its propositions we are glad to have read it and have gained good thereby. Price $1.25.

HEROES AND MARTYRS OF INVENTION, by George Makepeace Towle. Archimedes, as of right, heads the list; his was the romance of invention, discovering and applying principles of science so long before they were believed by the rest of the world that his achievements were considered but romantic tales by those coming after, till later ages proved their reality. The lives of John Gutenberg, the inventor of the printing press, of Palissy, the potter, of James Watt; the Montgolfiers with their balloons, Humphrey Davy and his safety lamp, which he justly considers the crowning invention of his life; the builders of the Eddystone lighthouse; the inventors of cotton machinery, and of the steam hammer; the Stephensons, Robert Fulton, Elias Howe, all these are told in such pleasant fashion we feel acquainted with the men and women they portray. We all think more of George Stephenson when we learn that when he was a poor shoemaker, love for pretty Fanny Henderson led him to carry her shoe he had mended in his pocket several days, every little while taking it out to gaze fondly on it. Such touches "of nature make the whole world kin." Price $1.25.

A SUMMER HOLIDAY IN EUROPE, by Mary Elizabeth Blake.

The book opens with pleasant moralizing, not at all tiresome as the manner of moralizing usually is, and carries us pleasantly along through Ireland, where it lingers lovingly, France and Switzerland, showing us not only mountains, lakes and waterfalls, but men and women whom it is a pleasure to know, and their works in literature, art and architecture. The author evidently has eyes quick to see, a heart quick to respond to the beautiful, and, withal, a fine sense of humor which seizes and appreciates all the bright, funny bits which so many travelers let slip from their note books. She pinions on her pen point the practical jokes in architecture perpetrated by the jolly old fathers of Berne; rolls the mists from the Jungfrau till we stand awed by its splendor, and personifies the cities so that we never forget their personality. For example: "Lucerne is almost too well-bred. Both the place and the people have an air of being always in full dress." Taken altogether the book is welcome for its unhackneyed handling of a very hackneyed theme. Price $1.25.

The next two books bring us back across the water and must make young folks more interested in American history, and more patriotic. STUDIES OF THE CIVIL WAR is by our old friend, Albert F. Blaisdell, who has so well learned the knack of making literature and history charming to young people that he should keep at the business. The book is made up largely of selections, and they are skillfully chosen so as to be interesting, graphic and to arouse greater love for our country and reverence for those who died to save it. This, from "A Pen Picture of Abraham Lincoln," is worth framing in memory: "He had come into his wife's room, his step slow and heavy, his face sad, a complete picture of dejection. Observing his troubled look his wife said:

"'Where have you been, father?'

"'To the War Department,' was the brief answer.

"'Any news?'

"'Yes, plenty of news, but no good news. It is dark, dark everywhere.' He reached forth one of his long arms and took a small Bible from a stand near the head of the sofa upon which he had thrown himself, opened the holy book, and was soon absorbed in reading it.

"A quarter of an hour passed, and, on glancing at the sofa, I saw the face of the President seemed more cheerful. The dejected expression was gone, and the countenance was lighted up with new resolution and hope. The change was so marked that I could not but wonder at it, and desire to know what book of the Bible afforded so much comfort to the reader.

"Making the search for a missing article an excuse, I walked gently around the sofa, and looking into the open book, saw that Mr. Lincoln was reading that divine comforter, Job. He read with Christian eagerness, and the courage and hope he derived from the inspired pages made him a new man."

A chapter on "Boys in the Late War," makes the book all the more heartily welcomed by our boys. Price $1.25.

The next is for older folks, though boys and girls will also enjoy it. It is one of the series of "Decisive Events in American History," THE TAKING OF LOUISBURG, 1745, by Samuel Adams Drake. The graphic telling of this decisive siege impresses very strongly two thoughts: how God's providence aided brave men, and the fearful cost in more than money, of war. The taking of Louisburg, coming though it did thirty years before the Declaration of Independence, was as much a factor in gaining our independence as was the surrender at Yorktown. One thing in the book particularly pleases me, the vindication of Pepperell, by showing the nobleness of his character and his modesty, in beautiful contrast to the arrogance of some of his associates. Price, 50 cents.

The last book of the six bears the home-like title, NEW ENGLAND BREAKFAST BREADS, by Lucia Gray Swett. Surely, never was cook-book seen in such dainty binding, or containing so many toothsome recipes for the staff of life. Dinner, luncheon and tea are not forgotten in it, as its brown breads—half a dozen varieties, sweet rusks, strawberry short-cakes, tea and lunch rolls testify. We hail with joy a cook-book which gives not even a suggestion of indigestible cakes, "pies-an' things." Price, $1.00.

Six books also come from D. Lothrop Company, Boston. The first, like the last in the other list, has to do with housekeeping, better still, with preparation for housekeeping by girls. It is Sallie Joy White's COOKING IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS. All will welcome, in permanent form, the articles which aroused so much interest when published in the Wide Awake. Mrs. Joy here gives an outline history of the origin and growth of the movement for the industrial education of girls; an argument for the usefulness of public cooking schools, pointed by many unimpeachable instances of the good they have done in Boston; an appeal for the adoption of the school-kitchen by every city and town in the country, and a course of cooking lessons based upon those given in the Boston schools, the next best thing to a cooking-school itself for girls who live in towns where one is not yet established. Those lessons include not only the how but the why of a great many things, thus inciting not only to skill but intelligence. They inculcate the necessity of personal cleanliness, economy and attractive service. Price 75 cents.

STARTING POINTS, compiled by Abbie H. Fairfield. It is a book of selections for boys just growing into manhood, and tells them how to make a good beginning. Here are a few of the "Points": From Thomas Hughes: "Quit yourselves like men; speak up, and strike out, if necessary, for whatever is true and manly and lovely, and of good report; never try to be popular, but only to do your duty and help others to do theirs." John Gough: "If the pledge had been offered to me when I was a boy in Sunday-school, I should have been spared those seven dreadful years." "A boy without ambitions rarely comes to true greatness." Sarah K. Bolton. "Read your Bibles! Fill your whole souls with the thought of Christ; make of Him not only a Redeemer, but a Brother; not only a Savior, but a Friend." Canon Farrar. These specimens give an idea of the good things with which the book is packed. Price $1.25.

A volume of the "Spare Minute Series" which will be welcome, is THE CROWN OF LIFE, selected from the writings of Henry Ward Beecher. The selections cover a wide range, and are so felicitously made that we know Mary Storrs Haynes, who culled them, took great delight in her work, because of loving appreciation of the author. They bring out all the salient qualities of his style, thought and feeling; the pictorial beauty, the luminous view, the wide-reaching sympathy that characterize these respectively have here a palpable and very lovely presentment. The Introduction, by Rossiter W. Raymond, add greatly to the value of the book. Price $1.00.

One can scarcely imagine a greater contrast than the last book presents to its successor—WEDNESDAY, THE TENTH, by Grant Allen. This is a story of the South Seas, with enough daring, adventure, and hair-breadth escapes to fire the heart of any live boy, while the filial devotion shining through it, and the apparently unintentional temperance lesson it teaches, distinguish it from the usual common story of adventure. As its characters are all men and boys, Grant Allen has no chance to air his peculiar views concerning womenkind. Price 75 cts.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING NOVEMBER 2. 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 22: 54-71; Isaiah 31-36.)

Sunday, 2; Luke 22: 54-71. Verse 62, Peter's fall, his deep repentance, and the heroic devotion of his after life to the service of his Master, show us how little we can trust our own deceitful hearts, and also what great things for the good of the world one may accomplish, if he will truly yield his nature, however variable it is, to God. Peter was very weak, and became very strong. His example is a warning and encouragement to every one of us. Verse 63, Shame on men, that they have always mocked and crucified the saviors of the world, from our dear Lord and Redeemer down to the humblest reformer.

Monday, 3; Isa. 31. Verse 1, Reliance upon Egypt is distrust of God, who will avenge Himself by destroying both the helper and the helped. Our Egypt to-day is fine preaching and services, money and rich things, worldly culture and social influence, and we distrust God. Verse 7, Cast away your idols, and then God will give His people victory over the world.

Tuesday, 4; Isa. 32. Verse 2, As rivers of waters in a dry place, or the shadow of a rock to a heated traveler, so is Christ to the penitent soul that flees to Him, faint, weary and thirsting for salvation. Verse 3, What a great thing is that spiritual illumination, which enables one to have a sound judgment, so that he will not confound moral distinctions. Verse 5, We need spiritual noble-mindedness, in order that we may distinguish villainy and iniquity when they are covered up by some well-sounding names.

Wednesday, 5; Isa. 33. Verse 1, This chapter is the last of the prophecies against Sennacherib and the Assyrian power. It is true still, that the spoiler shall be spoiled in due time. Verse 24, Until our sins are pardoned, there is no real and permanent deliverance from suffering.

Thursday, 6; Isa. 34. Verse 1, This chapter abounds with threatenings against the enemies of the church. The "nations" should hear, for they will destroy themselves by destroying the church. Verse 16, God's Word is the truth that stands through all generations, and it shall never fail. It is the fullest exposition of God's will, and those only will come out right in the end, who apply the principles of the Bible to their lives and conversation.

Friday, 7; Isa. 35. Verse 1, Let us pray, and hope, and work for the glorious change in this sinful world, when the presence of Christ will change the moral wilderness into the garden of the Lord. Verse 4, "The realization by faith, of the glorious future, is what is best calculated to strengthen the weak hands and the feeble knees of the dispirited believer."

Saturday, 8; Isa. 36. Verse 1, The history in chapters 36–39 is given to explain and verify the previous prophecies. The same is found in II Kings, 18–20. Verse 15, The only way that the foes of God's people can succeed against them, is by deceiving them to let go their trust in God. In all our work, and in all our troubles, we should lean heavily upon the arm of the Almighty.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Temperance Work by Legislation. Hab. 2:12-15.)

1. No one should in the least degree cease his work by education and moral suasion, because of his interest in temperance work by legislation.

2. The liquor business is already in the laws, and it is there to stay. The efforts of legislation have been to regulate the traffic. If law can regulate, it can also prohibit the liquor traffic. The curse of the text is against license.

3. A liquor license is simply an "indulgence" granted by the state to do a harmful thing. The state has no more right to license anything injurious or dangerous, than the church of the 16th century had to grant indulgences to sin. The state has a right only "to promote the public welfare;" and that right forbids the other one of licensing dram-shops, or any other evil.

4. Wherever prohibition laws have been enacted there has been a great falling off of crime, and in many cases the prisons are emptied. Every cause of crime is a proper object for legislation; and prohibitory legislation is the only kind the liquor traffic should have.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let no friend of temperance, old or young, who reads this column fail to send a two cent stamp for a mite-box, Temple Bulletin, and descriptive card to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago.

If you cannot give largely towards the building of our beautiful Temple of temperance, you can give your mite, and get your friends to do the same.

The Loyal Temperance Legion of the land has been called upon for an offering for the Temple on the day on which the corner-stone is laid. The call was issued by Mrs. H. G. Rice, and Miss Anna Gordon, National superintendents of Loyal Temperance Legion work, in THE UNION SIGNAL of October 9. We trust our brave Legions, like true soldiers, will hear the command but to obey. We want to tell the Loyal Temperance Legion what two members of their organization accomplished in a single afternoon in Odessa, Texas. Mrs. A. G. Otterman, the wide-awake superintendent, writes: "At the last meeting of our Loyal Temperance Legion they decided to send $2 to the Temple; the sum looked so small that it was suggested that some of the boys and girls go out and take up a nickel subscription to swell the amount. This suggestion met with enthusiastic favor, and Edith Calloway and Jesse Otterman started out next day, and in a short time raised $3, making $5, which I enclose you." If two can accomplish such a result in a hamlet of a dozen families, what may not be accomplished by scores of children in our large towns? Now that Temperance Temple day has been officially set apart for Saturday, November 1, why not follow the plan suggested in THE UNION SIGNAL, just a year ago, by Rev. Ada C. Bowles, Abington, Mass.?

Mrs. Bowles writes: "Considerable study of the ways of raising money convinces me that the sum needed for the Temple can be raised readily by the following use of the mite-boxes. There are thousands willing to give a trifle if the opportunity met them face to face. Let a day be named by the National Union as children's Temple Day (a Saturday probably). Let the Loyal Temperance Legion be on hand, and from them a certain number be selected and distributed through every street and district in pairs, each bearing a mite-box and calling at every dwelling and work-shop. Who would refuse to drop the cent, the nickel or the dime into the boxes, when presented by these bright-faced girls and boys with the simple request, 'A few cents, please, to help the temperance boys and girls in a gift for the Temperance Temple.' They should be instructed, of course before, and at the time appointed assemble in the lecture room of a church, whence started with prayer and song in the strength of united action, they could go to a great success. On their return a lunch and counting jubilee could follow." It seems to us no plan could be more admirable than this. Let the work be done Saturday afternoon while the corner-stone of the great Temple is being laid. It would be an inspiration for the children to know this and also to know that 200,000 temperance boys and girls from the Atlantic to the Pacific were engaged in a like work. If superintendents of Loyal Temperance Legions will send to us we will forward mite-boxes and descriptive cards with picture of Temple on for the children to use.

The following gifts have come in during the past week for the Thompson Memorial fund: Ripley, Ohio, and Cadiz, Ohio, W. C. T. U. each send $1; Miss Katie W. Curtiss, Flint, Mich.; Mrs. J. M. Abrams, Brownsville, Pa.; Mrs. E. Teal, Starke, Florida; Mrs. Addie B. Yore, Rushsylvania, Ohio; Mrs. Geo. Briggs, Delavan, Ill.; Mrs. John Rowe, Ennis, Texas, each send $1 to the fund; Miss Margaret Craise, Denver, Col., sends $3.50 for the same purpose. She writes that the money came from the family mite-box, each member of which dropped a penny in it when they were caught using a slang phrase.

Our faithful friend, Jane E. Weeden, has been picking up some more money for the Temple. She sends $12 from the W. C. T. U., of Bluffton, Ind.; $6.75 from the W. C. T. U., of Warren, Ind.; $50 from the W. C. T. U. of Fort Wayne, Ind.; $25 from the W. C. T. U., of Decatur, Ind.; $1—individual collection.

The following four heroic women have the honor of raising full Baby Bands: Mrs. H. M. Morgan, Viroqua, Wis., $10 for 100 names; Mrs. C. J. Kimball, Murphysborough, Ill., $10 for 100 names; Mrs. R. A. Phillips, Springfield, Ill., $11.80 for 118 names; Mrs. A. E. Lyster, Mendon, Ill., $10 and 100 names.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore sends a gift of $100 for the Temple. It is indeed a source of deep regret that this gifted woman, who has been such a factor in placing woman where she rightly belongs, cannot be present at the laying of the corner-stone of the building which means more for woman's elevation than any building which ever yet was erected. Mrs. Livermore deeply regrets that she cannot be present to speak on the occasion, as lecture engagements prevent. She writes: "I shall be with you in sympathy, for I am deeply interested in your grand project. If the Temple, when completed, accomplishes as much good year by year as it has in the two or three years since it was projected, it will be a remarkably paying investment, for the W. C. T. U. women all over the land have been quickened into a white heat of house building by the influence of the unseen and unbuilt Temple. Women must always have homes and so must their institutions. I expect the next decade will see the W. C. T. U. as well housed in homes of their own as the Woman's Christian Association now is, and your Temple will be their great creator, which called them into being."

Our Children.

[Every little while somebody asks Captain Mary to put in here some "good pieces to speak." This week she leaves out her talk with you to make room for this capital exercise that comes from over the water, in the Temperance Record.]

SHOULDER ARMS.

Recitation for Seven Children.

First Boy:

Shoulder arms, together!
Marching on we go,
Ready for the battle,
Fearless 'gainst the foe;
Sin, and vice, and evil,
Darkness, dread, and wrong—
We must boldly fight them,
We must march along!
Boys, be brave and dauntless
At your Captain's call;
Shoulder arms, together!
Ready, one and all!

Second Boy:

Fight the foe of Passion,
Mighty though he be;
Though he rise in terror,
Make him swiftly flee!
Gentleness will slay him,
Love will overthrow—
Try the tender answer
That shall lay him low.
Conquer, conquer Passion!
Make the giant fall;
Shoulder arms, together!
Ready, one and all!

Third Boy:

Fight the foe of Falsehood,
Lurking ever near;
Truth shall win the battle,
Strike, and never fear;
All deceit and cunning
We proclaim our foe;
Falsehood is an evil
All must overthrow.
True and brave and honest,
Boys, we'll march along;
Shoulder arms, together!
Boyhood's happy throng!

Fourth Boy:

Envy, strife, and malice
All our life oppose;
We must rise and conquer
These, our cruel foes;
Take the heav'nly weapons,
For, though young we be,
All things dark and evil
Faith shall cause to flee;
Faith and prayer are weapons
Mighty all our life;
Shoulder arms, together!
Win the Christian's strife.

Fifth Boy:

There's another foeman
That we all must face,
Working dark destruction
Over every place;
Alcohol is deadly—
Cruel, wicked, strong—
Up, and slay the tyrant,
All ye temperance throng.
Lift ye up your banner,
Spread its folds of light;
Shoulder arms, together!
Win the temperance fight.

Sixth Boy:

We will use the weapon
Of our pledge-book here;
Those who keep to water
Little have to fear;
Touch not, taste not, ever;
Handle not the wine—
We are pledged abstainers,
Let us all combine—
Marching, fighting, battling,
Till the foe shall fall;
Shoulder arms, together!
Ready, one and all!

Seventh Boy:

Not in strength that's human
Can we win the day;
Mortal power can never Win the temperance fray;
Ask the Lord to help us,
And His succor crave,
As we seek to rescue
Souls He died to save.
Struggle for our brothers
At our Captain's call;
Shoulder arms, together!
Ready, one and all!

All Together:

Shoulder arms, together!
Temperance boys we stand,
Pledged to win the triumph
All across the land:
And strong drink we'll vanquish,
Fighting side by side,
While beneath our banner
Steadfast we'll abide;
Drink is harming thousands,
We must lay him low;
Shoulder arms, together!
Up, and face the foe!

CHRISTABEL'S TRUNK.

The clock struck four, the children came trooping and shouting home from school, and the winter's day turned towards its yellow twilight.

"About this time in the afternoon," said Christabel, "I begin to pack up my box of worries to send away."

"Now what in the world do you mean, dear Christabel?" said I.

"Well, it helps me to imagine that I pack up my worries, of all sorts, in bundles to get rid of, and all the things that have gone wrong in the day. Then I tumble them all together into a big box, and think of them as carried off, clear out of sight, and then when they are fairly gone I am all ready for the new things."

"And what are the new things, you queer Christabel?" I asked.

"Why, you see that when these others, all the worries and disappointments and so on, are actually gone and far away, I take much comfort in thinking that a great big box of joys and new hopes comes in by some mysterious express, and I have a beautiful time unpacking them. I cannot enjoy them unless the old ones are really away altogether, but when they are quite out of my mind I feel ready to take out and unfold the new ones."

"And how do they look?" said I. "Like chocolate bonbons, or what kind of pretty things?"

"Just like the most delightful Christmas box you ever saw," exclaimed Christabel. "In the first place they are wrapped in fresh, clean white paper (some of it is tissue), and the parcels are of all shapes and kinds. There is a good deal of Contentment, and that is often in the most beautiful blue jars, and is so fragrant besides. The Joys and Hopes come in different shapes, but they are all tied with ribbon of a lovely pink color, and among them are delicate little parcels, like square envelopes, of fancy paper with gilt, and faint, soft coloring, and those, as far as I can make out, are happy Memories and Thoughts."

"I should need a good deal of Courage, too, I think," said I.

"I have plenty of that," said Christabel promptly, "all packed in rich red boxes that are very nice and handy to take about with one. Patience, which I use a great deal of, and always want, is tied up with those beautiful neutral grays and browns that are so exquisite in effect, you can hardly tell why. They have a wide range, through all the old gold and dead leaf colors.

"And then," Christabel suddenly exclaimed with animation, "I must not forget that they sometimes send me a little gold box of some curious shape or other, with letters like this"—and she took a pencil and drew on the edge of a postal card the letters, Αγάπη—"I suppose it is the most valuable of all. Perhaps they would send me more if I knew better how to use it, for I find that what I use the most of is what comes the oftenest.

"A great comfort, too, is to find the old and spoiled things I have sent away come home fresh and fit to be used again. It may be a Friendship that had got quite worn and common, and seemed to have thin places in it, where it would give way. You can't think how good it seems to have it all fresh and beautiful again, with the new folds in it, and not a stitch to show where it has been mended—even stronger than it was, I believe. Sometimes, too, there is a Duty I am so tired of and when I have sent off all the old puzzles and vexatious thoughts about it, and open it again in its new package in the box, it always has a fresh, clean look that makes me like it better, and understand easier what to do with it."

"It makes me think of the old story," I said. "Pandora's box always had a pleasant sound, but the trouble with that was that she let all the blessings inside fly away."

"Pandora's box was nothing to mine," Christabel declared. "There are much nicer things in the way of joys and hopes nowadays than were thought of when that strange old trunk was packed, and more radiant than Jupiter or Vulcan or dark Hecate knew, or the bright young goddesses, even. And what do you suppose the gods could have been thinking of, to want these happy gifts kept shut up for mankind? That is the charm of my box of blessings, I can have all I want, just as fast as I can use it, only not any faster, and everybody else can have the same."

I sat and thought, while the twilight deepened, of Christabel's box of Joys, and her sweet-smelling jars of Contentment and the little gold box that was so precious with its Greek lettering, and the splendid gifts of Courage and Hope that seemed to come to her from invisible hands. "O, Christabel," I said at last, "I'm afraid you are a dreadful story teller!"

But Christabel looked at me with clear eyes, earnestly. "I believe there is nothing on earth so real," she said.—Ellen S. Bulfinch, in October Wide-Awake.

NOAH WEBSTER.

BY MARGARET W. SNODGRASS.

There was nothing very wonderful in the circumstances of Noah Webster when a boy, nor in his early life. He was the son of a farmer, was well educated, being ready to enter Yale at the age of sixteen. In his junior year he was interrupted by the excitement of the Revolution, and joined his father, who was already serving in the war. A few years later, however, he finished his course.

When he had been graduated, and had reached home after commencement, his father presented him with a small sum of money, about equal in value to four dollars, and told him that for the future he must take care of himself.

In those days the most common means of gaining a living by young men of fair education were school-teaching and the practice of law. Webster chose the first of these, while he should prepare himself for the second. In the moments of time he could snatch, after his school duties were done, he studied alone, until a few years later he was admitted to the bar. Had he been idle, careless of time, or fond of self-indulgence, this end would never have been reached.

While teaching, he also prepared several school-books—a reader, a grammar, and also a spelling-book which became very famous.

This spelling-book was bountifully illustrated by rude wood-cuts. These must have greatly charmed the boys and girls who read of "The Country Maid and her Milk Pail," and "The Boy who Stole Apples," and many a lad felt that the story grew too personal when he saw the account of the boy who went to the woods to look for birds' nests when he should have been at school.

This spelling-book reached such an immense sale that it alone supported his family during the many years in which he was engaged on his dictionary.

We cannot follow him through his long life, but in his seventy-ninth year he wrote a letter which gives us glimpses of his life and habits. Of these he says: "I have never been a hard student, unless a few years may be excepted, but I have been a steady, persevering student." It is not the sudden strokes of labor which come in fits and starts, it is not this which accomplishes great things, but the slow, steady work, day after day.

He tells us that he was in the habit of rising half an hour before the sun, and making use of all the daylight, so that he rarely used lamp-light at all. Apart from saving his eyes, this must have been a great means of preserving his health. With daylight his work ended, and his body and mind were alike ready for rest.

Again he says, "I was never, or rarely, in a hurry." Girls and boys, mark this well!—you who are hunting up hats and books, and hurrying to school at the last minute, leaving everything behind you in confusion. Is anything gained by it? Does it bring any ease or comfort to yourselves? Surely not. And the worst of it is that the habit of leaving everything to the last, and then rushing through in a hurry, will gain such a firm hold on you, as the years go by, that it will vex and worry half the sweetness out of your lives. Let us read and remember the words of Noah Webster: "I was never, or rarely, in a hurry."

Again he tells us how in Amherst, he cultivated a little land, made hay, and worked in his garden. And until late in life, he was in the habit of rising in the morning and making his fires through the house. Such exercise as he gained by these simple duties must have been a great gain to him in health and strength as he advanced in years. Such was his simple life while he performed a work which has made him famous.

At the ripe age of eighty-four, Noah Webster's life closed, blessed by the peace and comfort of the Christian hope. Let us remember the life and lessons of this great man as we open so frequently the book which cost him such patient toil.—Young Folks' Friend.

"Uncle John," said little Emily, "do you know that a baby that was fed on elephant's milk gained twenty pounds in a week?" "Nonsense! Impossible!" exclaimed Uncle John, and then asked: "Whose baby was it?" "It was the elephant's baby," replied little Emily.—Toronto Empire.

The Household.

"AS A MUSTARD SEED."

BY ADALINE HOHF BEERY.

From a gray clod a tiny shoot upsprings,
Stretches its limbs, and blinks in the broad sun;
As cheerfully abroad its branches run,
I ask, "What dost thou 'mid these weedy things?"
"My Master me divine provision brings,
And bids me grow and bless; how can I shun
His will? If I but woo and shelter one
Stray bird, I'm recompensed whene'er it sings."

O faithless! must your hearts be taught so oft
By things inglorious to proclaim the light
Of prodigal beneficence to men.
The laboring hands, and eyes that look aloft,
The sacrifice in deserts wide and white
Of life itself, expecting not again?

Huntingdon, Pa.

TWO WAYS.

BY EARNEST.

Among my friends are two mothers, each of whom may be taken as a type of a large class. Each is alike earnest and conscientious in the training of her only son, though differing widely in methods. One guards her treasure with jealous care, allowing him a knowledge of but few of the games and diversions common to most boys. All games of cards are forbidden, even those usually considered harmless, and he is closely held within the circle of mother-love. She says: "I hope to keep him by me, choosing his pleasures for him, until he is old enough to choose wisely for himself, and his principles have become so firmly grounded that the evil will have no temptations for him, no power over him, and so I will give the world a pure, true man."

The other gives her son a liberty which is almost license. He "runs at large" about the town in which he lives, knowing all that is going on among "the boys," taking part freely in all their games and pastimes, and this is the mother's theory in regard to it: "Let him know of all these things; let him see just how little there is of them that really satisfies any part of his nature, and when he is older he will turn from them all and seek for better things, and I, too, shall give the world a man."

Now which is right—which wisest in her treatment and method. I know there can be few general rules in these matters; that the temperament and disposition of each boy must be considered, and the training adapted to suit the case, but with the average boy, would either of these two ways be quite safe or successful? The one is innocent, but ignorant. Will he grow strong to resist evil, knowing nothing of it? Will he, so closely guarded, have the strength of will and purpose to say "no" when at last, the tempter meets him—as sooner or later it meets us all—or will he, because he knows not of these things, be taken unaware and fall before he realizes the meaning and the danger of that which menaces him? Will he not, boy-like, want some time to taste the forbidden fruits, and be charmed, perhaps held by their very novelty, and so fail of true manhood, though all unwittingly? Would it not be better for him to be told of both the good and the evil while yet he is within the "safe, sweet shelter of the household band," and taught to choose the good, not because he knows no other, but because he sees and feels for himself that it is the only right and manly way, and thus learn to know the use and shun the abuse of all things within and around him? Will he not be more helpful to his fellow-men, more charitable in his judgment of them if he knows something of what they have to cope with?

"Who has felt its strength will know
What strength to set against a sin;
And how temptation is overcome he knows
Who has felt its power within."

"To him that overcometh" the promise is given, and with it the knowledge and power to help others along the way he himself has walked; for how shall a man trust in his strength if he knows not of it? How shall he be sure he is strong while yet he is wholly untried?

And the other boy—is it sure that he will turn from the pursuits of his youth and seek for better things when he comes to man's estate? May he not be weakened and vitiated by too great liberty, and his strength of will be insufficient to lift him out and above the old pleasures, even though they no longer satisfy him? Can he pass through the fire and have no smell of smoke upon his garments? Will he be untainted? fit to take up the colors of true manhood and bear them on to victory? Is there not great danger that he will aim too low for himself, and be skeptical of high aims and holy purposes in others? Society, as the term is commonly used, sneers at the idea of virtue and holiness among men—is it not somewhat due to the attitude certain men take in regard to it? Is not this second method with boys most likely to produce a class of men who will not stand for or expect truth and virtue in all people and in all things?

It is hard to keep a high ideal if there is in one's self no conscious working up to it—hard to believe in higher things in the lives of men than one feels a proximate approach to in himself. If his daily life be not attuned to heavenly strains, he will not easily believe the lives of others around him are, and his atmosphere will be low and morbid, unfit for the growth of that which is good—it is a law of nature that where good does not grow, evil surely will.

Between these two ways is there not a "golden mean," where the average mother may stand with her average boy, and hope to make a true man of him?

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

BY PROF. DAVID SWING.

All reforms must advance along the one road of information and appeal. The children must early know of the higher life. It must be set forth daily, as being the only life worth living. As the hands and face of a child are to be kept clean, so the words, and even the thoughts must be as clean as the face.

As to the "paganism of the playground," when that playground is at the school-house some kind-hearted teacher should be out on the grounds with the children. Such a presence would keep language purer, and any one acting or speaking coarsely could be removed from the grounds and perhaps from the school. But this teacher should be capable of playing with the young so as not to be a millstone on the neck of youth.

At Ames, Iowa, I once spent a delightful Saturday. While the boys were playing different games out on the campus, nearly all the teachers, men and women, were sitting around, the women with woman's work in hand. The teachers seemed a part of the game. No wall in that college building contained any of the pencilings which are wont to deface the surfaces where vulgarity reigns.

It seems to me that there is no one way for reformers to pursue. They must impress heaven and earth into their service. Taste, reason, religion, are all upon the side of purity. It is necessary for the young person to be led by the older mind. The reflection of later life must be poured out lavishly upon the younger life, and when it is poured out sweetly it will all be drunk in, for all the young do is to drink the cup offered them, be it poison or nectar.

I wish I knew of some great secret of success, but there is no method except that of varied and life-long work.

WORDS TO THE WISE—FIXING THE STANDARD.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

Woman should fix the general standard for man in the community and fix it high and insist that it be reached and maintained. She can do this in two ways. First, as has already been shown, in the capacity of mother of boys and home-maker. She can, if she will, place herself on a high plane as to character, as to intelligence, as to habitual course of thought, as to aims and life purposes, and by thus giving a high tone to the home life, the home thought and the general conduct of the household, she can cause them to set their mark high. Yes, by all wise means she can so accustom them to loftiness that they will abhor every kind of lowness; can make them to live in the upper stories of themselves, so to speak, rather than in the basement—in the upper stories, in the bracing air, with light and warmth and broad expanse of view, rather than in the dimness and foulness and within the narrow confines of the cellar; in the upper stories, manifesting love and truth and intelligence and mental activity, striving for the good of all, rather than in the lower regions of ignorance and sensuality, and jealousy and rivalry and unworthy aims, walled in by the narrow confines of selfhood. Boys thus reared to manhood would help to fix the manhood standard high. "On that imperishable tablet where Fame inscribes the names of the good and the true and the brave the highest and fairest among them is only mother, written large."

But aside from these home considerations, the standard of manhood in the community will be as high as woman demands, and no higher. Man is her suppliant for home comforts and wifely companionship. Generally speaking, woman lets herself go too cheaply. Lets herself go, as the case may be, for board and clothes; for an establishment; for carriages and a retinue of servants; for a bare maintenance, confined all day at hard labor; or often to avoid remaining single, she is pleased and flattered by the attentions of a man, we might almost say by any man; caught by a smile, captivated by a fine appearance, lured by honeyed words. And think how cheaply she rates herself when, as does sometimes happen, the offers of a man whom she cannot respect meet her acceptance, when even libertinism is considered no objection, and she knowingly receives damaged goods.

Woman should rate herself high and make herself worth the rating, and then demand of man the highest qualifications, demand honor, demand truth, kindliness, intelligence, demand freedom from sensuality, demand the same standard for man as for woman; and all this not only in regard to marriage, but to his general standing in society. Let woman make these high demands and man will rise to meet them—must rise to meet them. And they will be made. For opportunities heretofore unknown are now open to woman and her uplifting is sure. And when woman shall stand on the high plane just mentioned she will never be content with inferiority in man as man has been content—and pleased—with inferiority in woman.

A point to be considered is the present condition of things as causing woman in many instances to dispose of herself so cheaply in marriage.

COMMEMORATION OF BIRTHDAYS.

BY EMMA CHURCHMAN HEWITT.

The constantly recurring anniversaries of the year are a possible source of good of which few people compute the importance. It has long ago been conceded that a common interest does much toward not only fostering but engendering good feeling between different members of the human race, as may be proved whenever we wish to prove it, by assisting some one whom we really and heartily dislike. By the time the work is accomplished, a certain measure of good feeling is established, which, perhaps, will never again be broken down, and not only do we feel pleasanter towards our ancient enemy, but the said enemy probably does not in future display in such a marked and glaring manner the disagreeable characteristics that have been so unpleasant to us. The common interest has produced a certain amount of good fellowship. Napoleon fully recognized the value of this principle when he directed that the dome should be gilded in order that the common eye of Paris should be turned towards an object of interest instead of insurrection.

In the preparation for the various anniversaries of the seasons, the different members of the family are brought together in closer communion. Little animosities are forgotten, and pleasant thoughts are stitched into the little pincushion for brother Ned's pocket, or into the hair-pin case for sister Sue.

But of all the anniversaries which return to us season after season, none are so cherished as the birthdays. A birthday is the peculiar property, owned in common with no other, of the child itself, and to have it remembered and observed, even in the slightest way, gives pleasure incomparable. It seems to the child as if the parents were so glad, in the possession of the little daughter or son, that they never forgot when time brought round the anniversary of thanksgiving for his or her birth. Remember the birthdays, oh, father and mother, if only with the tiniest gift—if only a bunch of flowers laid on the little one's plate, with a loving word and a kiss. And teach the children to remember each other's birthdays. They, in turn, will want to remember yours, and you will find their remembrance and thought very precious. On a recent birthday, a mother received from her son a cake of fine soap and from her daughter a lead pencil with a rubber on the end. Nothing very elaborate, you may well say, but bought with their own little savings, and given with the heartiest good will and love, and received by the mother with quite as much pleasure as if they had been a diamond ring and a seal-skin coat. In another family where birthdays have always been remembered, when the day arrives, the distant children remember and are remembered exactly the same as when they were little. Only a box of candy for mother, perhaps, or a loaf or two of "mother's gingerbread," for the absent son; but the day is not forgotten, and each feels that the others are glad in their mutual possession of each other.

And as to the parents and children, in their mutual relations, birthdays are the pleasantest anniversaries, so to the wife, all others fade into insignificance when compared to the wedding day. To the husband, even, engrossed as he is by things of grave importance, the coveted book, the new handkerchief, or even the single flower laid at his plate, "in remembrance," fills his heart with a glow, and floods his mind with a host of tender memories, and he sees his wife anew in the light of youth, and he thanks God that she is left to him still to be partner in his joys and ills.

Oh, let us always "remember" the birthdays and the wedding-days, let what other anniversaries that may, be forgotten.

ANNUAL MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS.

In accordance with the new by-laws of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association the annual meeting was held last Wednesday. The change from January to October was made so that the report given at the National Convention could be an accurate one, instead of being what it always must be when the year closes in December, just after the National, an approximate one. This time, being only a fractional part of the year, with the three harvest months left out, its report must be such as a farmer would give if called upon to take account of stock after the sowing and before his harvest was gathered. Since the last annual meeting the W. T. P. A. has sown largely, and is just beginning to reap the harvest. If the rest of the year does as well as the last three months of 1889, January will show material for the usual dividend. The stockholders therefore decided not to make a statistical report of this fractional year, but to incorporate it with that of the following year to be given at the next annual meeting. After that time the report will be given regularly in October.

Meanwhile, a full business statement will be sent to all stockholders in January, and the stockholders empowered the directors at their January meeting to declare such a dividend as the profits of the year's business shall warrant.

The stock of this association is in such demand that the increase voted at the last annual meeting was all bought immediately and about $1,500 more applied for. This being the case, and more capital being needed in the business, another increase of capital stock seemed imperative. It was therefore increased $50,000. Just here it may be well to state for the benefit of some who have asked if this increase of stock is not "watering stock," that it is not, for the very good reason that for every share, twenty-five dollars in cash is paid and goes right into the working power of the association helping to earn dividends. Our by-laws forbid the sale of any stock for less than its par value.

It has always been the policy of the W. T. P. A. to have its benefits as widely distributed as possible; for this reason no one is allowed to own more than $6,000 worth of its stock. It now proposes to further extend the participation of the white-ribboners in its affairs, so that those who cannot invest twenty-five dollars may still have a part with us. This was accomplished during the first years of the association's existence by selling stock to be paid for in installments of five dollars. This necessitated a complex system of book-keeping, and has been discontinued for some time. At this meeting a plan was adopted which it is hoped will accomplish all the good resulting from our former method, and also broaden our constituency and increase the circulation of our periodicals. The plan is this: upon the new stock, as collateral, to issue five dollar bonds, to be taken only by W. C. T. U. women, and no woman to be allowed to take more than two; these bonds to bear six per cent interest and run five years. On each are coupons for the yearly payments, the one dollar and accruing interest. The first coupon will amount to $1.30, the second, to $1.24, and so on till at the end of the fifth year the bond is canceled. At the close of each year the holder of the bond cuts off the coupon and sends it to us; in return she gets its face in cash, or what is better, it will be received as payment for a year's subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL, or for such literature in our list as the sender chooses. This, in brief, is the plan which is elaborated further on page 1. It is now optional with buyers whether they purchase stock or bonds. Probably those wishing to invest twenty-five dollars, or multiples of that sum, will choose the stock, and those who wish to invest smaller sums, or those who will not miss five dollars and prefer to pay their subscriptions five years in advance, so having no bother about renewing every year, will choose the bonds. Whichever you wish to do it is wise to do quickly, as our experience last spring indicates that the stock will go off like "hot cakes."

Various propositions were made to the stockholders in regard to moving our plant to quarters where rents are cheaper; after full discussion it was decided that as our present lease does not expire till May 1, 1893, the matter be laid on the table for the present.

The election of directors resulted as follows: Mrs. Carse, Mrs. Hagans, Miss Pugh, Mrs. Plumb, Miss West, Miss Willard, Mrs. Rounds, Miss Tobey, Mrs. Hoffman, Mrs. Christensen and Mrs. Carhart. Miss Willard protested so vigorously against being an active director, on account of her promise to her mother, and to the world through "Glimpses," to withdraw from all positions involving the necessity of financial acumen for the proper discharge of their duties, that the stockholders consented to let her rank as advisory member, giving us her counsel in literary matters, and other things which she understands better than the rest of us; we can the better afford to do this, because the other representative of the National officers on the board, Miss Pugh, has financial wisdom enough for two.

At each annual meeting an increasing embarrassment has manifested itself in the sending of so many proxies to me. This virtually contravenes our policy of not allowing any one to purchase more than $6,000 worth of stock, for it places in my hands proxies enough to give me the controlling vote. This I do not wish; I have no ambition to control affairs, and the responsibility of voting for so many women, most of whom leave the decision of how to vote, entirely with me, is more than I like to carry. I do cast the votes conscientiously, and so far have heard no word of complaint, but the principle of the thing is wrong and we must devise some way out of the difficulty. I called attention to this matter after the last annual meeting, and hoped that the proxies would be more evenly distributed; but they came in worse than ever this time. This results in large measure from the fact that as secretary, my name is signed to notice of meetings. Hereafter I am instructed to append to the notice, names of women likely to be present, to whom proxies can be made out; please do not forget next time to distribute your proxies.

On the other hand, trouble was experienced this year by having proxies made out to ladies not in attendance, several hundred votes being lost in this manner. It did not interfere with the transaction of business, as more than two-thirds of the shares were represented without these proxies; but it might easily have blocked business. We will prevent this hereafter by adding, "with power of substitution" to our form of proxy. When we have worked as long with bonds, stock, and proxies as our brothers, we shall be as waywise in the business as they; meanwhile they will probably laugh at our blunders. But we are improving rapidly; at first, it often happened that not enough women would send proxies to give the necessary working force, and that many who sent forgot to sign their name; now we have proxies from nearly all, and this year only one woman sent hers unsigned.

The directors' meeting convened immediately on adjournment of the stockholders' meeting, and discussed many plans which we trust will eventuate in the betterment of THE UNION SIGNAL, and other departments of the work. As Mrs. Andrew has left us, the directors decided to divide her work for the present between Miss Margaret Sudduth and myself, she taking the News From the Field and Signal Notes, and I the Children's page, as we have been doing since Mrs. Andrew went away.

MARY ALLEN WEST, Secretary.

DR. BUCKLEY VERSUS THE W. C. T. U.

The Christian Advocate of New York (Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, editor) has an editorial entitled, "Letting in the Light," which for a windmill skirmish outdoes Don Quixote with Sancho Panza thrown in. He claims that the W. C. T. U. has set out first, to found a church of its own, and second, to capture the M. E. Church in the bargain. He quotes our National W. C. T. U. president's annual address in New York City, 1888, to prove his first position, and by a garbled extract may make out a partial case with those who have not seen all of that document. But he distinctly omits her express statement that the "church union," of which she has sometimes thought, was not intended in any instance to disturb any present existing church relations; Methodists would still be Methodists and Baptists, Baptists, but, while holding the same relations to their own respective denominations, they would, in this church union of coöperative Christian work, furnish a practical and persuasive object lesson of the great advantage resulting from woman's equal participation in all that pertains to "the household of faith" ordained by Christ.

Why did not Dr. Buckley quote this utterance of Miss Willard's along with the other sentences connected with it? He also makes much in another editorial of her statement that "Christ, not the pseudo Paul of theology, is the source of all churchly authority and power," wherein she does but distinguish between the Paul of the Epistles and the exegetical caricature of the great apostle, drawn by certain old-time theologians.

Now, we have been in the counsels of the W. C. T. U., local, state and National, from the beginning, and we hereby declare that never in any state, or in the National Union, has there been any action looking to the formation of a church or a church union. Not the first line can Dr. Buckley find to justify a statement so pernicious and surprising. As our leader has said a hundred times, she "speaks for herself," and does not desire or purpose that the W. C. T. U. shall be held responsible for her words or her positions. She is very much an individual, and has a life-long habit of declaring her mind freely, but has been most considerate in declaring also that she spoke as an individual and not officially. It is well known that this paper is out and out for the emancipation of women in church and state; it believes that delegates duly elected by the conferences at home were entitled to seats in the General Conference, and that to rule women out where women had for years been members of electoral conferences at home that send men as delegates, was an act of injustice. We would like Dr. Buckley to tell us when and where any W. C. T. U., referring to this act of the General Conference, "classed it in a paragraph of condemnation with certain liquor dealers."

We believe the time will not be long before the church shall accord simple justice to Methodist women by admitting them to the full powers of the church in whose development their zeal has been the largest human factor and their faith the highest force this side the throne of God.

The doctor also sets forth that of fifty names attached to "an open letter" relating to women's church work and recently published in the Methodist papers, several signatures have been disavowed, even quoting notes written him (always in reply to notes of his own) by the ladies involved.

We happen to know that those who were most active in securing these names are not W. C. T. U. women, and so mention the fact for what it may be worth; also we are informed on good authority that four ladies who had forgotten having signed—over a year having elapsed since most of them did so—have since recollected that they did sign, and some, at least, have so informed Dr. Buckley. It is not by thus seeking to divert attention from the real issue that he will make votes against the admission of women to the General Conference. Is it right? is the final question, and upon that basis alone will come the ultimate decision.

In this connection we will answer some questions propounded by a Philadelphia subscriber:

"What were the facts in regard to the selection by the local conference, of Mrs. Newman, Mrs. Ninde and Miss Willard as delegates to the New York General Conference? Was it not the voluntary act of the ministers composing the conferences so electing them? Was not Miss Willard a lay delegate? Did the Woman's Christian Temperance Union urge or demand that any of its members be appointed to that position? Have those members of the W. C. T. U. consulted together as to their plan of procedure in using the church for universal suffrage, or is it their first duty to advance the interest of the church by removing the political methods which have crept into its management, and which have been the subject of very scathing articles in Zion's Herald during the past summer?"

1. The lady lay delegates to the General Conference were elected by the local conference without any solicitation on their part; in Miss Willard's case we know, and presume the same was true in case of the others, the election was entirely unexpected, she being in New York lecturing at the time, and knowing nothing of the matter till the receipt of a telegram announcing her election.

2. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union did not urge or demand the appointment of any of its members to that position. It could not have done so if it would, for the majority of us do not belong to the Methodist Church, and understand so little of its complicated machinery we should never know how to go to work to accomplish such a purpose.

3. The ladies elected delegates have not "consulted together as to their plan of procedure in using the church for general suffrage."

As THE UNION SIGNAL is not the organ of any church we have carefully refrained from taking sides in any church controversy. But in this case the principle involved is one of such deep interest to all Christian womanhood, and the quotations made by Dr. Buckley from THE UNION SIGNAL are so misleading because of their incompleteness, that after long and importunate solicitation we have decided to make this answer to his article.

THE NEW WEST EDUCATION COMMISSION.

Few other organizations do as much work along lines parallel with our own as does the New West, whose distinctive work is planting Christian schools in Utah and New Mexico. It is, par excellence, the work of bringing the idea of the Christian home, with its purity and peace, into the heart of Mormondom; and wherever it has a school there temperance as well as purity is taught. The best Band of Hope I ever saw, best in respect to actual results attained in the face of great difficulties, was in the New West school at Albuquerque.

This society held its tenth anniversary in Chicago last week, and the showing of its work accomplished was very encouraging, while the view it opened up of work needing to be done was so vast that it ought to incite every Christian patriot to greater endeavor. Each speaker emphasized the fact that the Mormon question is not settled; as Dr. Gunsaulus said, no pronunciamento of President Woodruff has taken lust out of the heart; it must be touched by something besides politics; we cannot trust even to intelligence; there must be a work of uprooting evil in the heart and enthroning God there. Mormons disfranchised in Utah are pouring over into Arizona and Idaho; they have no respect for the Christian religion nor for the American home; beside every Christian in those territories stand two Mormons, with hearts full of lust and disloyalty. To them the commands of the church are paramount to those of the state; and oaths taken are lightly broken. Throughout Idaho a system of "forgiveness" prevails which out-Jesuits Jesuitism.

In New Mexico and Arizona we stand confronted with the catholicism of Old Mexico, its bitter antagonism to the public school and its domination of politics. Here, then, are these two classes, ignorant, further from Christianity in life and doctrine than many heathen to whom we send missionaries, but they are American citizens, with the ballot in their hands, the ballot which a professedly Christian nation gives them, ignorant, un-American as they are, but denies to its Christian women. This ballot in their hands is a menace which may well make us shudder. Christian education, developing conscience in these soon-to-be-voters, is the only salvation, and this is the work of the New West Commission and the missionaries sent out to this New Southwest by other boards.

Among the speakers was Prof. Henry Gordon, brother of Anna Gordon, who for ten years has had charge of the New West Academy, at Trinidad, Colorado, and President Slocum, of Colorado College. Coming directly from their work there each spoke out of a full heart, of the field and its needs. No more heroic work is being done on any mission field than is done by young ladies, teachers in lonely villages where each may be the only Christian for miles, and must be not only teacher but sometimes preacher and counselor in general to her flock. A church planted in such places would provoke such antagonism that it could not live; but this teacher, with her kindly, motherly ways, wins the hearts of the children, and through them of their parents. She lays solid foundations, on which sometime, perhaps after she is dead, a church can be reared around which Christian homes shall cluster. Is not this work for God, and home and humanity?

FULL GROWN NON-PARTISANSHIP.

Iowa is the self-elected representative of non-partisanship, and considers Illinois the extreme type of a partisan state. Their late state conventions show the outworkings of the two policies; Illinois convention brought together a body of Christian women representing a membership of 14,500, united, earnest, active in all departments of Christian temperance work. Politics were not mentioned during the convention; perfect harmony and a sweet devotional spirit marked every session. In Iowa's non-partisan convention scarcely anything but politics received attention. The prominence given this theme verified the words of Neal Dow, in the Portland Journal: "I was at Chicago, and saw Mrs. Foster walk out with twelve others from Iowa, and that small company took away with them more intense partisanship than remained in the W. C. T. U. from the Gulf to the St. Lawrence, from the Atlantic to the Pacific." Political chicanery of the most marked kind was brought into play to unseat delegates elected by honest votes. After this Cromwellian "purging of the House," the order of secession was passed. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The seceders from the National elected Mrs. Mattie Bailey, president; Mrs. M. J. Aldrich, secretary.

As sixty-three regularly accepted delegates opposed this secession, they with twenty others who had complied with every constitutional requirement, but who had been rejected by the committee on credentials, proceeded to elect the following officers of the Iowa Woman's Christian Temperance Union: Mrs. M. H. Dunham, of Burlington, president; Mrs. William Blair, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Mary E. McMillan, recording secretary, and Mrs. Carhart, treasurer.

In perfect keeping with their course hitherto, Mrs. J. Ellen Foster and the officers of the seceding union are announced as intending to go to Atlanta as delegates! Comment is unnecessary, but THE UNION SIGNAL predicts that no voice or seat will be granted to women who have seceded from the National W. C. T. U., organized themselves and their sister seceders into societies, state and National, and by heralding themselves as "non-sectarian have sought to give the impression that the National W. C. T. U. and its auxiliaries are sectarian, while by announcing themselves as "non-partisan," they have sought to fasten upon loyal white-ribboners the designation of partisans. That the utmost patience will be exercised toward the authors of this last audacious proceeding we know, but that they will ever be recognized as in any wise related to the National W. C. T. U. we do not for a moment believe. Wishing them well in their chosen field, we must emphatically decline all further "entangling alliances" with their strange movements.

THE Columbian Commission includes at least four names of W. C. T. U. women: Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Maine; Mrs. Helen M. Barker, of South Dakota; Mrs. M. B. Carse, of Chicago, and Miss Frances E. Willard, of Evanston, as her alternate. Each of these ladies has shown remarkable executive ability, and will justify the wisdom shown in their appointment.

THE test case brought to the United States District Court, Kansas, in the Rahrer habeas corpus case has resulted in a decision declaring the prohibitory law of Kansas inoperative so far as original packages are concerned; many houses for sale of liquor were immediately opened in Topeka. Judge John T. Stoneman, of the Superior Court of Iowa, rendered a decision in three cases brought under the Iowa prohibitory statute, which amounts to a declaration of the unconstitutionality of that law. This opens up the entire question again. In view of this fact we shall commence next week a valuable series of articles by Judge McCullock on "What the Original Package Decision did not Decide."

FRIDAY morning Mr. Hall, our business manager, was summoned to Columbus, Ohio, by news of a serious accident from a fall suffered by his mother. Sunday night this aged saint passed over the river, leaving on earth the record of a long and useful life. Every good cause found in her a stanch friend. She was a stockholder in the W. T. P. A,, at its late annual meeting sending her proxy to Mrs. Carse who voted her shares, little thinking that so soon she would exchange them for the incorruptible riches of heaven. Mr. Hall has the sympathy of thousands in this sudden bereavement; especially that of the employés of this office, who sent by Miss West a floral offering to lay upon her coffin.

CONCERNING the New York and the Pennsylvania conventions Mrs. Frances Barnes writes: "Each of these two great state conventions numbered as many delegates as attended the National Convention in Chicago last year, and the verdict of both the older and the younger women was that never had there been so much harmony and enthusiasm, or more of blessing from the presence of the Holy Spirit." Miss Schoch, the brave Pennsylvania Y, writes that this state comes out of the storm which has raged so fiercely during the past year, stronger than ever and purified. Her membership has not decreased, and the spirit is admirable. From Vermont comes news of fifty-eight per cent increase of the Y's during the year, and other grand things to make the heart of Queen Esther rejoice.

THE New York Liquor Dealers' Association in appointing a committee of forty-four members, appointed twenty-four Catholics, not, probably, with any regard to their religion, but because they were prominent members. The fact was too significant to be passed by, and the Catholic Review has these admirable words in regard to it:

"One would imagine, to hear these dealers resolve and declare in convention, that the Council of Baltimore had never put the seal of shame upon their trade; that the public sentiment of the nation had never expressed disgust at their methods and wares; that they were not in so many cases the puppets of the brewers and distillers; that they were all honorable men, virtuous and high principled, but wronged by their neighbors; and that the trade is to go on in increasing honor and esteem until the end of time. Eager as we might be to defend our Catholic brethren against the charge of intemperate habits and prominence in the saloon business, a fact like this disarms us. Twenty-four Catholics, and perhaps more, on this committee, are to do their best during the coming year to shame their brethren publicly; to degrade their neighbors and defraud them, and to nullify, if possible, the effect of the Plenary Council of Baltimore! This is, indeed, our shame!"

The Watch-Tower.

Georgia W. C. T. U. is working vigorously preparing for the National Convention. Mrs. William C. Sibley, president of the state W. C. T. U., visited Atlanta, and addressed a grand rally in Trinity Church, with such power that great enthusiasm was aroused. All the ministers in the city were enlisted, eight of them with four prominent business men being appointed vice-presidents, and Hon. N. W. Hemphill, president of the reception committee. The editors also are awake, and contributions to defray expenses are pouring in. Sam W. Small came down from Philadelphia to help in arousing the people to make good their promises in the invitation extended to the National by the state and city officials. Mrs. Sibley and her committee of arrangements have chosen Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin to deliver the address of welcome, and have entrusted to the hands of her artistic daughter, Mrs. Lizzie Chapin, the painting of Georgia's elaborate banner.

Dr. Agnes Kemp and her daughter, who have been abroad for three years, have returned to their old home, Harrisburg, Pa., and received most cordial welcome from crowds of friends. Their W. C. T. U. home, the Prohibition Union, gave a delightful reception in their honor, at which welcoming addresses were made by Mrs. J. K. Garver, and Mrs. Phœbe Vaughn. Dr. Kemp and her daughter spent much time in Paris and Switzerland, where they did grand service for temperance and social purity.

The following cablegram was sent us by Mrs. Ward Poole, Press Superintendent of the British Women's Temperance Association: "The National Conference of the British Women's Temperance Association has been held in Sunderland. Deputations from the North of England Temperance League, the Independent Order of Rechabites and the Sons of Temperance, who each presented an address of welcome, were present, besides two archdeacons of the diocese and representatives of all denominations, including the Jewish Rabbi. The conference has received the warmest appreciation, and among many enthusiastic meetings, one for young ladies was held with great success; twenty-four signed and adopted the Y badge."

Maine's convention was a glorious success; Mrs. Thorp, Mrs. Shapleigh and Mrs. Ole Bull were in attendance, and declared it almost equal to a National. The largest church in the city was packed all the time. Miss Phelps, Canada's eloquent young orator, won golden opinions; Mrs. Barney, Miss Kimball and Mrs. Harper, National superintendents, were also in attendance, and all did grand work. All of these ladies remained over the Sabbath, and spoke in various churches. The resolutions, passed with great enthusiasm, had the clear ring, and the work reported in all departments showed a grand year's advance. Mrs. Stevens was unanimously reëlected president.

California's convention is in session this week at Stockton. Mrs. Johnston, the president, wrote last week that she felt sure returns will show a paid-up membership of six thousand. Miss Lathrop has been working hard sowing non-partisan seed, but thus far one small union is her only harvest. She proposes opening headquarters at Stockton during the state convention, but will be rather lonesome. General and Mrs. Bidwell are in attendance on the convention, Mrs. Bidwell being a very active W. C. T. U. woman. She expects to attend the National Convention. Ohio convention is also in session this week at Chillicothe. Miss West is in attendance. Mrs. Buell is attending the Virginia convention at Norfolk.

Miss Elizabeth Gordon, secretary of Massachusetts, writes that they have had a successful and harmonious convention, but that just before the election of officers a bomb shell dropped into their midst. It was a note read by Miss Tobey, announcing that feeling a special call to give her entire time to evangelistic work she declined to be a candidate for reëlection to the presidency. This being her unalterable decision, Miss Gordon nominated Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden for the position, and she was unanimously and enthusiastically elected. A telegram was sent her at Norfolk, Virginia, and the following answer received: "Am overwhelmed with surprise and gratitude. Accept only as a call from above, with entire reliance upon Divine guidance and under conditions to be adjusted later." On motion of Mrs. Thorp, of Cambridge, a resolution expressing pleasure at Mrs. Fessenden's acceptance, and pledging her the loyal, loving support of the organization was passed. Miss Tobey was presented with a beautiful bouquet as a token of love to be expressed in more substantial form later; a resolution expressing heartfelt appreciation of her services for the past six years was unanimously passed. ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

VERMONT.

THE SIXTEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE VERMONT W. C. T. U.

A growing interest in the work and harmony of spirit mark each succeeding convention. Wednesday the 24th of September dawned in cloudless beauty, and at ten o'clock some of the ladies gathered at Middlebury and spent the first half hour in prayer for the convention; the remainder of the day was occupied with the necessary business of the state officers and superintendents. The large-heartedness of the ladies of Middlebury was manifest and all felt they were welcome. Bountiful dinners and suppers were provided in the hall by the Addison county ladies. A large number of delegates were present throughout.

The prize speaking in the evening drew a full house. Each of the four contestants did credit to herself. Prof. T. E. Boyce, of Middlebury, chairman of the committee, announced the first prize awarded to Miss Bertha Phillips, of Townsend, and the second to Miss Ida White, of Felchville. Mrs. E. A. Kenyon, of Townsend, gave one of her best "chalk talks," choosing as her subject, "Which Shall it be, the Mill or the Still?" interesting both young and old. At its close some of the boys in the audience set up a howl of "high license" continuing it some moments. To all appearance the thought had been suggested to them, but by whom?

Thursday morning the convention was formally opened, the president, Mrs. E. T. Housh, of Brattleboro, in the chair. The 46th Psalm was read in concert, the hymn "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah" sung, and prayer offered by Miss Terrill, of Rutland.

Mrs. W. H. Button, of Middlebury, very pleasantly welcomed the delegates, and briefly indicated what she deemed necessary to be done in the future. Mrs. N. L. Franklin, of Rutland, responded very touchingly, and showed the work needed to sustain the prohibitory law. "No intelligent woman," she said, "wants license, high or low." Most of the officers answered to their names at the roll-call.

The president's annual address was an able and finely written paper; statistics and facts in regard to the liquor traffic were given and the original package question discussed. She was surprised, shamed and grieved at the number of votes cast favoring license at our late state election. At the close the convention arose and gave the Chautauqua salute.

The report of the secretary, Mrs. G. E. Davidson, of Newfane, showed that the work of the year had been encouraging; many churches have commenced the use of unfermented wine; ten counties have held conventions; letters have been written to Vermont congressmen concerning the prohibition of impure literature; also the letter to the candidate (since elected) for governor of Vermont, asking his position on the prohibition question, was warmly responded to in favor of our state law and its enforcement. There are auxiliary to the state, 110 unions with a membership of 1,917, including 373 Y's. The Loyal Temperance Legions number 1,505 and have about three hundred and forty-six honorary members.

In the afternoon Mrs. M. E. Bell, of Craftsbury, superintendent of prison, jail and almshouse work, advocated the establishment of a home for friendless girls and women, giving many good reasons why such an institution is needed.

Baby Neal Willard Richmond, of Northfield, was carried on the platform and introduced as a Christmas present and made an honorary member of the convention. Some one started "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," others taking it up, and all arose and gave him a hearty salute.

Several of the superintendents read very interesting reports showing good work done in their departments. Mr. J. E. Crane, of Middlebury, made a telling plea for prohibition by the use of the blackboard. The White Ribbon Quartette furnished excellent music.

The Y's furnished the evening program, and a very interesting one it was. The address by Miss Jessica Morgan, of Ohio, was listened to with breathless attention. The Middlebury college quartette was encored time after time; the soloist, Miss Simpson, of Burlington, was also called back.

Friday morning the departmental reports were concluded. The treasurer reported all debts paid and $204.57 in the treasury. Election of officers came next. All save two of the votes cast for president were for Mrs. Housh. The ladies all arose and greeted her with waving of handkerchiefs. She accepted with a few beautiful words of thanks.

In the afternoon a "mothers' meeting" was led by Mrs. Reed, of Shelburne. Mrs. Amy B. Fisk, of Montpelier, read an excellent paper on "How to keep our Children Pure," giving many practical suggestions. Mrs. L. F. W. Wilbur, of Burlington, presented Mrs. Housh "a little love token from the white-ribboners of Vermont to 'Our Queen Esther.'" The token was a purse of $50, the purse the gift of Mr. George Marshall, of Middlebury.

"Memorial hour" was crowded with interesting speeches, for a number of excellent workers had died during the year.

The resolutions adopted favor the maintenance and strengthening of our present prohibitory law; pledge the state union not to give its support to any party that does not put National prohibition in its platform; and thank those newspapers of the state which had worked so nobly for the retention of prohibitory law during the past few months against the assaults of its enemies. Miss Morgan, of Ohio, gave a brief but charming address on "Physical Culture and Dress Reform."

The delegates to the National Convention are Mrs. N. L. Franklin, Rutland, Mrs. H. H. R. Reed, Shelburne, Mrs. E. J. Nelson, St. Johnsbury, Miss Ada Hall, Chelsea, alternates, Mrs. C. E. Atwater, Burlington, Mrs. J. E. Wiswell, Cabot, Miss France Colvin, North Bennington, Mrs. E. M. Denny, Montpelier.

Each session was preceded by a half hour's devotional service, all of which were most helpful.

The address Friday evening, by Mrs. L. Washington, of Port Jervis, N. Y., was very entertaining; she spoke against high license, and related some of her experience in the West.

EAST WASHINGTON.

ITEMS OF TEMPERANCE INTEREST.

East Washington W. C. T. U. has had the services of Dr. Orpha D. Baldwin, Miss Henrietta G. Moore and Miss I. C. DeVelling for several weeks each during the past year. Recently Mrs. Harriet L. Adams, of Ohio, has been sojourning with us and has organized unions at Wilbur, Harrington, Egypt, Larene, Almira, Fairfield, Tekoa and St. John.

Mrs. Claudia E. Penn, 312 North Monroe street, Spokane Falls, has been elected corresponding secretary in place of Mrs. Graves, removed to Sehome. Mrs. Esther A. Jobes, associate superintendent of literature, was recently elected superintendent of the department in place of Mrs. A. P. Crystal, resigned. Mrs. Minnie B. O'Neill, reporter for the Leader, has left us for a year's course of study in Chicago Training School for deaconesses. Mrs. Susie E. Foster, press superintendent and reporter for THE UNION SIGNAL, has left the state to be absent for several months.

Mrs. Switzer recently organized a union at Ross Park, a beautiful suburb of Spokane Falls. The officers are: President, Mrs. H. N. Belt; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. S. Parker; recording secretary, Mrs. E. L. Powell; treasurer, Mrs. Frank Johnson; vice-president, Mrs. C. J. Moore. Four subscribers for THE UNION SIGNAL were taken.

The state union is arranging for an exhibit of banners and literature at the Northwest Industrial Exposition at Spokane Falls, during the present month. A very eligible location on the third floor has been assigned us. Mrs. Jobes, who has for some time been working the literature department in earnest, has a fine line of W. T. P. A. publications on sale, and quantities of temperance papers and leaflets for gratuitous distribution during the Exposition. The ladies all over East Washington are sending in fancy and home-made articles for the bazaar. Mrs. Lucy R. Berry, superintendent of fair work, and Mrs. Jennie L. Green, superintendent of juvenile work, have been hard at work for several weeks interesting the unions and Loyal Temperance Legions in our exhibit for the Exposition. Mrs. C. S. Wilson, chairman of the business committee, was one of the first to have up counters, etc., in our space. The Leavitt and Crystal unions are nobly assisting the state by loaning furniture, paintings, etc., for the bazaar, and in entertaining the president, and Mrs. Amanda Strong, of Walla Walla, associate superintendent of fair work, who will be in attendance during the Exposition. Among the attractions in one booth are the beautiful state shield that has hung in the New Orleans Exposition, and represented us in two National Conventions, a "W. C. T. U. ice water" barrel, and a two gallon jug bronzed and inscribed with temperance mottoes, from the Cheney union. It is inverted, is ornamented with white ribbons and informs the passers by that "wine is a mocker."

Many of our unions are taking up the Demorest prize medal contests. East Washington will be represented at Atlanta by Mrs. Mary Beach, of Colfax.

WALLA WALLA COUNTY CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. of this county held its annual convention at the First M. E. Church, commencing on the evening of the 25th of September, and closing on the evening of the 26th. The convention was opened with devotional exercises, led by Rev. W. W. Van Dusen, after which Mrs. Miller, of Arkansas City, Kansas, delivered a very interesting temperance address. On Friday morning the meeting was opened by the president, Mrs. Amanda Strong. This was followed by the annual election of officers and other business transactions. The convention closed with a very interesting Demorest medal contest, which was under the direct superintendence of Mrs. Miller, who has been in our city for a short time visiting friends, and has kindly assisted in this good work. We feel that the work has been very beneficial and inspiring, and anticipate good results for the future.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

STATE CONVENTION.

The seventeenth annual gathering of our W. C. T. U. opened at St. John's M. E. Church, in Dover, at two o'clock, September 30, Mrs. Knox in the chair. In the absence of Mrs. E. H. Pearson, of Epping, Mrs. Talpey, of Farmington, conducted devotional exercises, after which our president opened the regular business of the convention by remarks in her own most pleasing words. The weather was perfect, and with sunshine without and the loving, charitable spirit within, what could give a more auspicious promise of a successful session to its close? The work promised in the beginning to be a comprehensive one, and so it proved.

With the regular sessions, added to by trustee, executive and lesser committee meetings, all were "busy as bees." The twenty-four different departments were represented by their several superintendents, each full of interest. The several departments are as follows: Sacramental wine, evangelistic, Sabbath observance, peace and arbitration, temperance literature, young woman's work, hygiene, heredity, suppression of impure literature, non-alcoholics in medicine, juvenile work, work among railroad men, work among soldiers and sailors, work among lumbermen, White Cross and Shield, parlor meetings, state and county fairs, franchise, legislation, department of higher education, narcotics, Sunday-school work, jail and almshouse work, press, and mothers' meetings. Reports of these departments, and of THE UNION SIGNAL, Young Crusader, Oak and Ivy Leaf, scientific temperance instruction, and committee on resolutions, together with miscellaneous business, election of officers for another year and delegates to the National Convention, and the exchange of greetings with other bodies in convention assembled, combined to make a very busy three days' session.

Dover is one of the oldest towns in our state. The most cordial and hearty extension of the right hand of fellowship was given us by Mrs. Dr. Fenner, president of Dover's local union, and I am sure the entire city, with her several religious societies, was attuned to her spirit, and gave us royal entertainment. Mrs. Fenner was at the helm of the early Crusade in Dover in 1869, earlier than the Ohio uprising. The response was given by Mrs. Waldron, of Farmington.

Mrs. Knox, in her annual address, was loving, just and true, encouraging and inspiring us to greater zeal in the work of uplifting the fallen. Miss McIntire, the ever faithful treasurer, gave an interesting digest of the moneys she has received. Large amounts have been received and disbursed since the establishment of our "Mercy Home," and the care and responsibility of all to make it sheltering and reformatory, is not a small one. May God give it His blessing. It is only nine months since it was purchased and made ready for occupancy. Mrs. Hatch, the matron, reports many who have gone out with penitent hearts, and with resolutions—God helping them—to live better lives in all their future.

We were favored with talented addresses each evening. Mrs. Gleason, of Roslindale, Mass., spoke upon narcotics. Over $600,000,000 is spent in this land in this poisonous and filthy habit. Her address was fine, and closely listened to. Mrs. S. B. Fessenden, of Malden, Mass., a very refined and cultured woman, addressed a large audience the second evening. Miss Minnie Phelps, of Ontario, Can., gave us the closing address. She is a bright young woman. She was wonderfully helped in powerfully expressing the brain and heart sentiment, so brightly combined. Her subject (if she had one) was the "Liquor Traffic." She was bold in the assertion that this traffic can and will be destroyed as slavery was, though not in precisely the same way by "Civil War."

The beautiful flag bought by our state W. C. T. U. (one of the elegant draperies over the pulpit during the session), and whose value was enhanced somewhat by its voyage to and from the Paris Exposition, was given to the care of the East Andover union for the coming year, as it has had the largest per cent of gain to its list of membership during the year. (Fifty per cent.)

Another beautiful incident was the presentation of an India silk scarf, made at Antioch, and sent to Mrs. Albee, of Claremont. This was sent for the benefit of our "Mercy Home" in Manchester. It was voted to sell the scarf at ten cents a share, the scarf to be presented to Mrs. Albee in appreciation of her untiring interest in the collecting of contributions for the building and sustaining this charitable and humane institution.

It is not surprising that these last years of our successes under the efficient administration should result in the re-seating of Mrs. Knox as president; Miss Wendell, corresponding secretary; Miss Rowell, recording secretary, and Miss McIntire, treasurer. The machinery seems to be in fine order, and the National W. C. T. U. can rely upon New Hampshire as being true to every vital interest.

Let me again emphasize the union of the ladies of Dover, who were so cheerful, and expended so much labor and money for our entertainment, the harmonious spirit, the talent of the lecturers, and our love for "God and Home and Native Land," as characterizing the seventeenth anniversary of the New Hampshire W. C. T. U. We were most cordially invited to meet in Nashua next year.

NEBRASKA.

CONVENTION OF SECOND DISTRICT.

The semi-annual convention of the second district convened at Palmyra, Otoe county, September 16 and 17, under the direct supervision of Mrs. Zara A. Willson, district president. The first afternoon was occupied by an interesting consecration meeting led by Mrs. Utley and Spurlock; the address of welcome by Miss Rena More, the response by Mrs. Isabella Spurlock, and the president's address, which was full of good things.

In the evening we had a paper on the prohibitory amendment by Mrs. S. C. O. Upton, and a silver medal contest in which all the contestants did admirably, also a song by "Samantha" asking Josiah to vote as he had been praying, which captured the large audience. We were favored with very excellent music by a quartette of boys.

Reports of unions were given Wednesday morning, showing marked progress, zealous work for the amendment, and five new unions organized. A paper by Mrs. M. E. Bowers narrated why she was not interested in temperance work in the past, and why she was interested at present. Wednesday afternoon was covered by reports of committees, a recitation by Mrs. Miller, and select reading on "Franchise" by Mrs. M. A. Clark.

Wednesday evening we were favored by an address by Mrs. Clara Hoffman, which was very entertaining and explanatory in regard to the issue before us, and was listened to with marked interest by a large audience.

CALIFORNIA.

THE "BEAR" STATE WILL BEAR HARD UPON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Temperance is in the atmosphere in California, and the discussion is to go on until the thought of prohibition of the saloon shall so thoroughly saturate the souls of all, that "mind cure" will relieve our diseased municipal body of the ulcer of the liquor traffic.

All white-ribboners are on the qui vive for the state convention to be held October 20-24 at Stockton. One of the insane asylums is located there, which is surely a good object lesson for a temperance convention. Mrs. R. R. Johnston has made a tour of San Joaquin county, and with Mrs. McMasters, the county president, and the good ladies of Stockton, arrangements are perfected for a grand reunion. The program is full of good things, the one specially literary production being a poem by one of our honorary members, Mr. A. J. Waterhouse, the James Whitcomb Riley of the Pacific coast.

The railways, Southern Pacific and San Francisco and North Pacific, the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, and the stage lines of Mendocino, Lake, and Sierra counties generously grant reduced fares to those attending the convention.

Memorial services of Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, our fallen —no, our promoted—leader, were held throughout the length and breadth of California. Col. George W. Bain did valiant service for temperance in the Golden State, causing great enthusiasm and filling empty W. C. T. U. treasuries. Mrs. R. R. Johnston announces that Mrs. Clara Hoffman will begin a campaign on the Pacific coast February 1. She will receive a royal welcome. Our own state workers are doing splendid work in this state of "magnificent distances" and mountain staging. Mrs. Henrietta Skelton has made a tour in "The Kingdom of Humboldt"—a county as large as an Eastern state—and not a railroad in it, adding ninety-two members to our ranks. She assisted the ladies at the third county convention at Eureka, which showed good results. Mrs. Skelton will organize Calaveras county. Her work for the year is twenty-six unions organized, six resurrected, besides all sorts of temperance work including special efforts to increase the circulation of THE UNION SIGNAL and Pharos. She is the "general utility" woman of the temperance cause. Mrs. Emma Pow Smith sends most cheering news of work in Plumas, Placer and Sierra counties, all reached by staging, having organized fifteen new unions and aided them each in their county conventions. God bless these brave pioneers!

Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens is working up Tulare county most successfully under the supervision of its energetic president, Mrs. Hawkins. Mrs. R. R. Johnston seems to be ubiquitous—all over the state at once, always an inspiration. Since relieved of the presidency of the Oakland local, she will devote her whole time to state work. Mrs. Ada Van Pelt, formerly G. W. C. T. of the Good Templars of Nebraska, has succeeded her as president of the Oakland union, and will bring her well-known executive ability to temperance work in California. Mrs. Dr. Carrie F. Young, a veteran abolition speaker, Mrs. M. E. Congdon, Dr. Van Kirk and Miss S. M. Severance have lectured in several localities with success. Miss Severance is pushing the petitions for woman suffrage vigorously, having offered $40 in prizes to unions getting largest number of signatures pro rata. Mrs. S. A. Huston gave an able lecture on the Sunday Rest bill before the Woodland convention.

San Francisco county held a delightful quarterly county convention, August 13, 14. Excellent papers were read by Mesdames Johnston, Gray, Ruthrauff, Cook, Hallowell, Werth, Eden, Knoderer, Keeney, Goddard, Booth, Templeton, Carver, French, Cummings, Rowell, Selfridge and Buck, and Mrs. J. C. Bateham lectured on Sabbath Observance. Mrs. L. P. Williams is county president.

Sacramento county held its first convention with great éclat. Mrs. Charles McKelvey is president. Ringing speeches were made by Mesdames Hart, Ritter, Everett, Mayhew, Carley, Smith, Mrs. R. R. Johnston and Mr. Wadsworth, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and Mayor Comstock. The Sacramento union are about to erect a temperance temple costing $12,000, the lot being already secured; Mrs. E. B. Crocker has generously donated $1,500, and Mrs. E. B. Peckham $500 towards the building. The zeal of Mrs. M. B. Carse seems contagious.

Mrs. Joel Russell, state superintendent of fair work, secured space for a W. C. T. U. booth in the state fair at Sacramento, September 11–20, dispensing ice-water and literature, and exerting the powerful social influence for temperance which always follows these white-ribboners. The beautiful booth always has a bevy of admirers about it. Sonoma county had a most successful booth at their county fair. The "saloonatic" who paid $1,200 for license to sell drinks, could not make back even his license money because of the free ice-water of the temperance women.

The annual meeting of the Santa Clara W. C. T. U. showed energetic work. Free reading-room supported at cost of $180; watering-trough, $24; Temperance Temple, Chicago, $200; local work, $250.

Crusade membership day excited much enthusiasm, and the membership of California is greatly increased. Rev. S. Goodenough was the orator of the evening in the Oakland celebration, and made a most excellent address. Rev. H. H. Rice and Mrs. Van Pelt also made rousing speeches. It was resolved to call a state convention of all the pastors and one layman from each church in California, to meet soon in Oakland to push united effort against the saloon. There is no doubt about it, as all the speakers insisted, that if the church people were united, Christian men could settle the saloon question in one election.

Mrs. S. C. Borland, the energetic superintendent of temperance cadets and juvenile work of Alameda county, celebrated Miss Willard's day by a delightful picnic in Alameda with her young folks.

September 27 was a "red-letter day" for women journalists of this sunset land, for by the persistent efforts of Mrs. Emelie Tracy Y. Parkhurst, of San Francisco, who has worked most nobly for her own sex, the Pacific Coast Woman's Press Association was organized with a charter membership of 132 literary women. "Our own" Mrs. Nellie Blessing Eyster, a loyal white-ribboner, is president.

Judge Sawyer, of San Francisco, has rendered a decision which is a blow to local option, declaring it to be in conflict with the constitution of the United States to allow a license to be refused a saloon keeper because of the protests of residents in the vicinity, by which many saloons have been closed.

Now when saloons are planted alongside the most fashionable residences and the costliest churches and Y. M. C. A. buildings, it may prove an "eye-opener" to apathetic voters to vote for prohibition. By and by men will learn that all forms of local option are "too local and too optional."

The saloon keepers of the state have organized to defeat our local option law in the next Legislature and carry the state for a uniform license of $84 per year. They are seeking to subsidize the press by offering to pay liberally that their prepared matter may be placed in prominent dailies as editorial, a la Pennsylvania and Nebraska. The Oakland Enquirer bravely exposed the scheme.

Mrs. R. R. Johnston has had compiled by Mr. R. E. Bush, a most valuable little pamphlet, "Legislation in California Concerning Intoxicants," being a hand-book of all the laws relating in any way to the saloon. All temperance people are grateful.

The Alameda Protective Association is stirring up temperance sentiment by enforcing existing laws against the saloon. Dr. Robinson, Mr. Bronson, Mr. Hierlihy and Col. George Babcock, all stanch Prohibitionists, are foremost spirits.

The Prohibition Party is making grand progress. General Bidwell, governor "to be," Judge L. W. Elliott, H. H. Matlock, A. J. Waterhouse, M. C. Winchester, Rev. C. E. Rich, C. H. Dunn, Rev. T. B. Stewart, George T. Elliott and many others, under the able direction of Secretary Sheehan, are "keeping it before the people" and as the New York Voice says, "making things hum." The Anti-Saloon Alliance is educating more conservative public sentiment which the Prohibitionists will crystallize into paper ballots that shall be more effective in this temperance warfare than leaden bullets. The Good Templars and the Sons of Temperance—the last greatly strengthened by Rev. Mr. Osborn Coughton's campaign through the state—are very popular with the young people, and many young men from their ranks will cast their first vote November 4, for General Bidwell and Prohibition.

The rest of the news, which this lengthening letter cannot be extended to tell, we will carry to the National Convention, at Atlanta, Georgia, for California W. C. T. U. will run another excursion this year as it did last, to the Chicago convention. A delightful time is assured.

PLUMAS COUNTY.

The first annual convention of this county W. C. T. U. was held in Quincy, September 16 and 17 with nineteen delegates present. The season was most enjoyable, both to the citizens and the various unions present, for never before have the women of Plumas county been assembled together in so noble a cause as this, for the children and the home.

The consecration meeting of the first evening, in which nearly all took part, was a soul-refreshing season, and one long to be remembered by those who pledged their fidelity to God and the temperance cause. Mrs. Emma Pow Smith, evangelist at large for the state W. C. T. U., was with us, and very ably presided over the entire session. Her face fairly beamed with joy as she looked down upon the convention, for were these not all her very own unions, grown into maturity in a month?

A fine program was prepared, which was well carried out, and gave good cheer to the hearts of the womanly host present. Many excellent addresses were delivered, and several fine papers read, chief among which was one on "Evangelistic Work," from the pen of Mrs. S. J. Churchill, of San Jose, and one upon "Social Purity," by Mrs. Rose French, of San Francisco; also a very helpful and instructive paper on the "Relation of Temperance to Labor," by Mrs. C. G. Rodgers, Crescent Mills.

When Mrs. Smith delivered her masterly address upon the "White Cross and Shield" before an attentive audience, many felt that what the world needs most are mothers and teachers who will, through precept and example, teach a better code of morals to the rising generations about us.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year, and the convention adjourned to meet next year in Taylorville: President, Mrs. Mary Drew, Quincy; recording secretary, Miss Sara Hardgrave, Taylorville; corresponding secretary, Miss Mattie Goodwin, Quincy; treasurer, Mrs. Kate Standart, Greenville.

MEMBERSHIP CRUSADE DAY IN EAST NASHVILLE.

The morning of September 27th dawned gloomy and cheerless, and before nine o'clock, the hour appointed for our prayer-meeting, a drizzling rain began, which continued at intervals throughout the day. Despite this, however, and the fact that Saturday is a most inconvenient day for housekeepers to lay aside home duties, sixteen devoted members of our band met in the basement of the C. P. Church. Our leader chose a beautiful and inspiring Psalm for the opening, and after an earnest prayer for grace and guidance for what was before us for the day, a sister was asked to give an additional Scripture reading. Carefully selected portions of the second chapter of Acts were read, and our hearts burned within us as we listened, for we felt that God was with us, pouring out His Holy Spirit upon us, His handmaidens. We had a blessed meeting and went forth, in His name, to do what we could for our glorious cause. We met at four p. m. to report, held devotional exercises, and found that about fifty names had been added to our roll, and quite a number of subscriptions to our beloved UNION SIGNAL had been obtained. Altogether, it was a day long to be remembered, and we are glad and thankful that the thought of observing it ever entered that heart of that grandest of leaders, Miss Willard.

CAYUGA COUNTY CONVENTION.

The fifth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Cayuga county was held at Cato, September 10 and 11, the county president, Mrs. Mary L. Boyce, presiding. Representatives were present from fifteen unions, notwithstanding the rainy weather, which continued until the close of the convention.

Words of welcome to the county union were most beautifully expressed in a poem, written for the occasion, by Miss Wood, of Cato. Reports were given by superintendents of departments, by the corresponding secretary, treasurer and delegate to the National Temperance Congress; also interesting reports of newly organized Y unions, by Miss Florence Dangerfield, of Auburn, and Miss Laura Post, of Fleming.

The president's annual address was listened to with interest; it contained a review of the year's work, with plans and suggestions for the near future; at the close of the address the appreciation of the convention was expressed by a rising vote of thanks. Miss Celia Hutton, president of Yates county union, conducted a parliamentary drill, and was also called to preside during the opening of the query-box when interesting and helpful information was given. In the evening, Miss Hutton addressed the "Christian Voters," making an eloquent and forcible plea in behalf of the temperance cause.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. Mary L. Boyce; vice-president, Miss M. Gilmore; corresponding secretary, Mrs. S. M. Searing; recording secretary, Mrs. Lillian Osborn; treasurer, Mrs. E. Lytle. Mrs. E. Moshier was chosen delegate to the National Convention; the honor of becoming a life member of the New York state union was conferred upon Mrs. S. C. Crossman.

During the convention seven subscriptions were received for THE UNION SIGNAL, and among the resolutions adopted was one urging upon all members the necessity of subscribing for THE UNION SIGNAL and the state paper.

The convention adjourned to meet with Sennett union for the semi-annual meeting.

COLUMBIA COUNTY W. C. T. U.

The sixth annual meeting of the Columbia county W. C. T. U. was held at Chatham Center, September 17 and 18.

A day of incessant rain diminished the usual attendance, but not the earnest spirit of welcome and coöperation that belongs to our meetings. Miss Celia Hutton, the speaker of the evening, in the handling of the question-box, greatly enriched the session, and gave many helpful hints.

The president, Mrs. Marcia C. Powell, of Ghent, was reëlected with all the other officers. The devotional meetings were most earnest, all of them converging along different lines to this thought: "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds."

The department work with its gathering in of the "here a little and there a little" into golden sheaves, was of deep interest, though perhaps no single achievement deserves place in this brief notice. That of mothers' meetings and social purity, under our faithful superintendent, has been, perhaps, the most hopeful.

The resolutions touched that work, the suffrage question, especially as related to school elections, work for scientific instruction, and several local interests.

These gatherings are marvelous object lessons, and are training the women of our nation, who will avail themselves of this force, into a larger, deeper womanhood.

A. C. P.

CATTARAUGUS COUNTY CONVENTION.

This convention was held at Yorkshire Center, in the First Baptist Church, September 10 and 11.

The voice of our beloved president, Mrs. L. E. Adams, was heard at precisely 1:30 p. m., as she called the convention to order. The devotional exercises were in charge of Mrs. A. R. Arnold, of Elton. The address of welcome was extended by the president of the Yorkshire Center union, and the response came from Mrs. E. L. Johnson, of Cattaraugus.

The report of the corresponding secretary was given and accepted. Mrs. Boole presided at the round table, and brought out many good ideas for our consideration. Following this, came an hour with the Loyal Temperance Legion. The children were marshalled from the schoolroom by Mrs. Eva M. Howe, the local juvenile superintendent, and Mrs. Hopkins, county superintendent, gave them a very interesting talk, with chemical illustrations.

The Wednesday evening exercises opened with praise service, conducted by Miss Maggie J. Griffiths, of Elton. A touching address of welcome in behalf of the clergy was given by Rev. J. W. Archibald. This was responded to by Mrs. M. G. Peckham, of Leon, in a few well-chosen words, after which, Mrs. F. M. Congdon, of Randolph, presented the prize banner to the Franklinville Y's, this organization having increased in membership the greatest per cent during the year.

Then came the best of all, an address by Mrs. Ella A. Boole, our state corresponding secretary, taking from the Word of God her subject, "Deborah in the Battle," which was listened to by a large audience. We cannot praise her too highly.

On Thursday occurred a very impressive memorial service, conducted by Mrs. Ella A. Gurney, of Little Valley.

Mrs. L. E. Adams was made delegate to the National Convention, Mrs. A. C. Burnham, alternate. Reports from superintendents of departments were all good, showing that these ladies have been busy and untiring in their efforts. Credential committee reported forty-six delegates. Treasurer's report was very satisfactory. Money received during year, $192.81; paid out during year, $145.94; balance in treasury, $46 87. Miss Varnum also gave a very instructive talk to treasurers. Mrs. Adams was quickly chosen president, but on account of ill health we were obliged to accept her resignation. This was done with expressions of grateful recognition of seven years of faithful, loving service rendered. When the ballots were all in, we arose and gladly greeted our new commander, Mrs. M. G. Peckham, of Leon, whose hands we will try to support. Mrs. F. M. Congdon was lovingly welcomed back as vice-president, the secretaries were reëlected, also the treasurer.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

MRS. GOUGAR'S WORK.

In behalf of the Equal Suffrage Association of South Dakota, I wish to publicly acknowledge the work Helen M. Gougar has done for us in the pending campaign. She has raised nearly $900 for our suffrage work, and still sends words of hope and cheer from afar. She delivered twenty-one lectures in our state early in the summer. She had crowded houses everywhere, and won golden opinions from friend and foe. Her unanswerable arguments, her wit and eloquence will be long remembered by South Dakotians.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE First Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, Mo., has sent fifty dollars to the Prohibitory Amendment League of Nebraska. The churches are coming to the rescue!

EIGHT contestants from as many townships assembled in Kennett Square, Pa., September 19, and tested their elocutionary skill before a large audience, for the Demorest Gold Medal. The prize was awarded to Miss Florence H. Strickland, of Kemblesville. Her subject, "Home versus Saloon," was ingeniously handled. The young lady was sent to Scranton, Pa., on October 15, to compete for the grand gold medal at the W. C. T. U. state convention.

MISS M. R. YOUNG, who has so long been the efficient secretary of the Philadelphia county W. C. T. U., is soon to remove with her mother to St. Joseph, Mo. The best wishes of all white-ribboners will go with her.

MEMBERS of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association, of which Mrs. Elizabeth Boynton Harbert is president, will convene in annual executive session at Moline, November 5th and 6th. The significant and unparalleled victories of the past year, notably that in connection with the admission of Wyoming and the majority report of the woman suffrage committee in the Senate of the United States, render this a reunion of unusual interest and importance, and a special jubilee session will be one of the features of the convention. All patriots and advocates of an equality of rights, duties and responsibilities are earnestly invited to give their presence, their suggestions and coöperation.

A RECENT letter from Iowa has the following: "One dear white-ribboner, who does much towards the support of her family, and who sends her washing out usually, has been her own laundress for the past two weeks in order to secure the money to make her husband an honorary member of the W. C. T. U. Such is the material we have to work with."

"COLONEL WOODFORD has succeeded in reaching the hearts of the people, in arousing interest in the churches, in building up the W. C. T. U. and uniting the workers as no other worker has for years," writes the president of the Spokane Falls, Eastern Washington, union. This earnest worker has returned from the West, but his efforts there will continue to bless those with whom he came in contact.

THE Lincoln (Neb.) Daily Call, of September 27, thus pleasantly alludes to one of the bright social incidents of the convention of Nebraska W. C. T. U. recently held at Seward: "One feature of the convention must not be passed by, and that is the reception Mrs. C. M. Woodward gave the delegates at her home Wednesday evening, September 24. As many as two hundred delegates and visitors were received and entertained in a way that none but a good, noble and grand hostess could do. Luncheon was given to all. It was found necessary for some to be entertained in the yard. Long will this white-ribbon sister be remembered by the members of the sixteenth annual convention of Nebraska's Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

THE Muscogee, I. T., W. C. T. U. have a lot upon which they hope to erect a free reading room and public library in the spring of 1891. The union is poor but the members feel that this is a work which they must accomplish, with God's help.

THE annual conference of the Free Methodist Church of Ohio granted time to Mrs. J. L. Olmstead, of New Albany, Ohio, to present the social purity work, and passed a strong resolution indorsing it. Mrs. Clara Wetherald, of Holly, Mich., was elected a lay delegate to the General Conference of this church, which met in Chicago, October 8.

MISSES WILLARD and Gordon attend eleven conventions this year, including the National in Atlanta, viz.: Missouri, Michigan, Dominion W. C. T. U., at Montreal, International Sunday-school convention, National Educational convention, and the State W. C. T. Unions of Nebraska, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and North Carolina.

THE second annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. of County Line, N. Y., was held September 10. Mrs. Tripp was reëlected president. A Loyal Temperance Legion of thirty-five members is sustained by this union. Ten lectures, four entertainments and one festival have been given during the year.

PARLOR meetings have been the special work of the Lansingburgh, N. Y., union for the past year. Five have already been held with good results. The meetings are opened with prayer, followed by social converse. Baskets containing clippings, cut from the papers on the leading topics of the day, are passed, and each guest takes one or more selection to read aloud, time being given between each reading to discuss the topic. Five Demorest medal contests have been held under the direction of this union.

A MISTAKE occurred in the report made by Mrs. Johnson, of the South Dakota convention, which causes great annoyance to Mrs. Kline. In that report Mrs. Johnson spoke of Mrs. Kline as president of the Hospital board, which is not the case. The facts are these: Mrs. Baker, the president of that board, expecting to remove to Missouri, tendered her resignation to the board and Mrs. Kline was suggested as her successor. Later the board succeeded in persuading Mrs. Baker to retain the position. As the treasurership will be vacant at the approaching annual meeting, members of the board are anxious to have Mrs. Kline in that position, which all agree with Mrs. Johnson in believing she would admirably fill.

JEROME RAYMOND, a bright young student of the Northwestern University, Evanston, has become private secretary to Bishop Thoburn, and with him will make the tour of the world in 1891. Mr. Raymond carries letters of introduction from Miss Willard to leading philanthropists in all the countries he will visit, and is especially commended to white-ribboners. He has been Miss Willard's stenographer for a year or more, and is a young man in warm sympathy with all progressive Christian movements, and worthy the confidence and good-will of the best people everywhere.

SAN JACINTO, Cal., W. C. T. U., a small union in a small town, canvassed the entire village on September 27, Crusade Membership Day, securing more than one hundred members. The president writes: "We feel like saying 'Hallelujah!' "

MISS LIZZIE M. BOYD, of Wheeling, W. Virginia, began her winter's evangelistic work in October, in Syracuse, N. Y. Miss Boyd is a white-ribboner of the most typical sort, and a gospel evangelist whose works have made her dear to a large circle in many states.

Special Notice.

After November 15 we will withdraw the subscription offer concerning THE UNION SIGNAL and Miss Willard's Picture!

The picture will be ready in November, when we will fill all orders received, and will then be ready to give out agencies to sell the picture by itself. The moment it is seen it will create a great demand, and we will have orders without doubt for before the close of the next six months. Therefore we want agents everywhere who will agree to show the picture, and offer it for sale at the regular price, $1. We will give a large commission and appoint only one agent to a place. We want only those to apply who really mean to act in good faith as agents. We made the low offers in connection with THE UNION SIGNAL to be sure and get enough orders for the original contract with Prang & Co. The picture is wonderfully cheap at $1. You can make all your Christmas money as agent for it if you wish to. Apply at once for the territory which you know you can give the proper attention to. We will then let you know what you can do to get a framed picture free with which to make the canvass a successful one. This is your opportunity. You need not fear lest the orders given through the subscription offers will interfere with a canvass by you. Not more than 2,500 will go out thus. Besides, "seeing is believing," and in this case, captivating also. Moreover there are thousands of people who admire Miss Willard, and yet have naught to do with THE UNION SIGNAL. The very sight of this lovely aquarelle tint picture will everywhere and always be a temperance object lesson and sermon. Send in your applications promptly.

Nothing makes home so bright, comfortable and healthful as a "Garland" Stove or Range.

A special offer to readers of this paper: We will send a handsomely bound 536 page complete cook book to you free if you will do a slight service for us in your locality. Send a 2-cent stamp and your address to the Buckeye Publishing Co., Minneapolis, Minn., for full information.

$4.95 GOLD PLATED WARRANTED GENUINE. BOX JOINTS.

Don't buy a common looking silver watch when you can now obtain for the small sum of $4.95 a handsome genuine 14 karat gold plated hunting case, full engraved watch with a first class full jeweled movement, a perfect timekeeper, genuine lever and full plate handsomely damaskeened and ornamented, fully equal in appearance to the watches regularly sold by jewelers at from $25 to $35. In carrying this watch you have the credit of carrying a solid gold watch, as the plating process is got down so fine now-a-days that it is almost impossible to detect the difference. The engraving on the case is just the same as on the high priced watches, and is in the very loveliest and latest patterns. Some will doubt our ability to be able to supply such a watch at this price, and to convince you that we mean just what we say, we make the following most extraordinary offer for next 30 days,

READ!

Cut this out and send it with your order, and we will promptly ship the watch to you by express C. O. D. with instructions to the expressagent to allow you to examine it at the express office. If on examination you are convinced that it is a bargain, pay the agent $4.95 and the express charges and it is yours, otherwise you pay nothing and it will be returned at our expense. We could not afford to make such an offer as this unless we were confident that the watch will not only please you, but be a surprise to you. The Convention Daily.

We have not made the usual announcements regarding the Convention Daily because of the difficulty experienced in getting the proper facilities away from our own plant to print so large a paper in so short a time. We have decided, however, on the following plan: A daily will be issued at Atlanta (five issues) subscription, fifteen cents, or five cents per copy. It will be entirely a written-up report and not, as heretofore, a stenographic one. The place, the people, the convention, church, the programs, personnel of the speakers, etc., etc., will make up the paper. There will be no premium, and we will not attempt to mail each day's paper by itself, but all mail orders will be sent after the convention has closed, and as soon as possible after the fifth session is over. In addition to this paper we will print an exact stenographic report of all the proceedings within a week or ten days after the close of the convention (providing we get 1,000 orders for the same) at 25 cents each. We prefer that orders be sent for the stenographic report rather than for the dailies, but if any wish to order both they can remit 40 cents, and if the 1,000 orders are not reached for the stenographic report we will return the 25 cents. After four years' hilly experience in running a daily at the conventions we have evolved the above plan as being the most satisfactory to all concerned. This announcement is to appear in each issue of THE UNION SIGNAL until November 6. We recapitulate the offers to make them as plain as possible.

The Convention Daily.

Five issues to be mailed in one package on November 18 or 19, $ .15.

The Stenographic Report

to be issued, if 1,000 copies are ordered, as soon as possible after the convention, $ .25.

No premiums or commissions can be allowed at these prices, except that in clubs of five or more the cost of sending the money can be deducted. The regular convention number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be dated November 27.

Special October Offer.

Send us cash for 10 copies and we will send you 15 copies, or cash for 100 copies and get 150 copies, or cash for 1,000 copies and get 1,500 copies.

October Offers.

We want 5,000 new subscribers during October, and if you want what we offer as returns for your work they will come, and that without any particular "fuss or feathers." How would you like to have Henry Drummond's wonderfully popular books, "The Greatest Thing in the World" and "The Greatest Need of the World"? Send one new name with $1 and you can have either one of the two that you name. Lovely books both in binding and contents. Deep thoughts dressed in simplicity's garb.

Miss Willard's picture, which will be ready in November. Why not get a new subscriber, add 25 cents ($1.25 in all), and get this beautiful aquarelle-tint life-size picture of your leader?

—Or—

If you send five new names, with $5, you can have the new and enlarged edition of Senator Blair's great book, "The Temperance Movement." Concerning it Miss Willard says:

"If I were president of a local union I would see that this book was read chapter by chapter at the monthly meetings. Our women, by this time, should be well furnished for the fray. They need to have the arguments at their tongue's end. Especially is this true of National Prohibition, which now looms above the horizon, the coming tornado in politics. On this theme Senator Blair is the expert among our sixty millions of people. To it he has devoted fifteen years of thought and honest hard work. Let us know what there is to be said on this question. Let us copy out paragraphs from this book of admirable temper for the local press in our own towns and villages. Let us make efforts for National Prohibition."

Why couldn't yours be one of a thousand unions to follow out Miss Willard's suggestion? By sending five new names you get the book and the education it will bring, free. Will you read this and forget it, or try to remember and then forget, or give a noble-hearted push in the matter?

Children always Enjoy It.

SCOTT'S EMULSION

of pure Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites of Lime and Soda is almost as palatable as milk. Children enjoy it rather than otherwise. A MARVELLOUS FLESH PRODUCER it is indeed, and the little lads and lassies who take cold easily, may be fortified against a cough that might prove serious, by taking Scott's Emulsion after their meals during the winter season.

Beware of substitutions and imitations.

Signal Notes.

DR. JOSEPH PARKER, of London, recently preached on communion wine, expressing himself very strongly against the use of fermented wine at the sacrament.

A FOREIGN exchange states that the next official bulletin of the Congo Free State will contain a decree prohibiting the importation or sale of distilled alcoholic liquors in that region where the use of these liquors has not been established.

THE New York Clearing House recently indorsed two checks to the value of $3,168,432. They did not represent the outlay of a foreign missionary board, or even the output of a great mercantile house; they were the price of a single purchase of beer!

A SPANISH temperance newspaper is published at Valparaiso, Chili. Recent numbers contain articles on "Alcohol and Disease" and "Why Does Drink Cause Death?" Record is given of the organization of the third Spanish speaking lodge of Good Templars, formed in that city.

AN old colored man who addressed a temperance meeting at Welden, N. C., said: "When I sees a man going home wid a gallon of whisky and a half-pound of meat, dat's temp'rance lecture nuff for me, and I sees it ebery day; I knows dat ebery ting in his house is on de same scale —gallon of misery to ebery half-pound of comfort."

THE Princess of Wales is president of a society called the Pension Fund for Nurses. Lately 750 nurses received their certificates from her hands, and it is worthy of note that many of them brought purses of money to establish a fund to help poorer nurses acquire their training; this fund is a memorial to Mr. Junius Morgan, one of the gentlemen who endowed the society.

SIR CHARLES MITCHELL says that no one who has carefully studied the various social problems in South Africa can fail to be struck with the absence of drunkenness among the natives of Natal, compared with the prevalence of it amongst the natives of the surrounding states, and that this result is due to the anxious care with which the government and legislature of Natal have endeavored to safeguard the native interests in this respect.

A REMARKABLE tribute to the effectiveness of zenena mission work has lately come from an unexpected source. A manifesto has been issued by a number of leading Maalvis in India, which accuses Mohammedans of being asleep, while the Christian missionary women, under pretense of teaching handiwork, are going about as spies and beguilers, leading native women away from their ancient faith and inducing them to become Christians. It solemnly warns all Mohammedans to use all their power to protect their homes against this danger.

THE following testimony from General Von Moltke, the great military hero of Germany, is remarkable, coming from a land flowing with beer, which is commonly considered as harmless as milk. Verily, the day of enlightenment is at hand! He says: "I, myself, abstain altogether from alcohol. I do not consider it necessary or helpful, except, perhaps, after fatiguing work, when the principal thing is to revive one's strength at once. Certainly, one of the greatest enemies of Germany is the misuse of alcohol. A healthy man needs no such stimulant, and to give it to children, which is often done, is absolutely wicked."

SINCE the first of last April, in obedience to a decision of the committee on diet, no intoxicating drink as a daily ration has been served to any patient in any asylum under the London county council. Instead of the pint in the day and half pint at night, milk has been provided, so that it can not be said that nourishment has been reduced. The attendants and nurses were offered, in lieu of beer, sixty and fifty shillings per year, and in nearly every case, the liquor has been relinquished and the money accepted. The medical officers are unanimous in favoring the new departure. "The patients are quieter," "They don't quarrel nearly so much," "They are less excitable," "I am sure the patients are much less trouble now," "It is better for everybody," "It was strange at first, but now we like it, and should not wish to change back again," were the substance of the majority of their testimonies. Not only does the abstinence from liquors improve the health and morals of the patients while in these asylums, but it teaches them that beer is not that necessity to life which is inferred when it is made a part of their daily rations. Hospitals in this country might well take pattern from this successful London experiment.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Von Moltke's ninetieth birthday was celebrated with great honor at Berlin, Sunday.

The Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior (Congregational) is in session in Chicago.

Hon. Walter J. Lamb, one of the best constitutional lawyers in Nebraska, has come out publicly for the amendment.

Dr. Storrs was unanimously reëlected president of the American Board, and the report of the Committee of Nine was adopted.

The Board of Overseers of Harvard University have decided with emphasis against President Elliot's proposed three years' course.

Germany's new military law has gone into operation, bringing the total number of officers and men in its standing army up to 516,000 on a peace footing.

Mobile has suffered the most disastrous fire of its history; it raged for five hours, destroying warehouses, steamboats, wharves, factories and freight cars.

Mrs. Stephen V. White, of Brooklyn, has given $5,000 toward endowing a professorship in Monticello Seminary, to be named in honor of her husband, "Deacon" White.

The American Missionary Association which held its anniversary in Northampton, Mass., last week, shows receipts for the year to be $406,038, exclusive of the Hand fund, $47,482.

Over 1,500 prominent women of New York City have pledged themselves to use their influence to make their voter friends work for and vote the People's Municipal League ticket.

The Voice has succeeded in raising its $15,000 Nebraska fund, and sends $1,000 to Miss Willard to be employed in the amendment campaign under direction of the National W. C. T. U.

Governor Humphrey, of Kansas, has removed the police commissioners of Leavenworth, for failure to enforce the prohibitory law, and appointed others whom he thinks will do so.

The Lever is continuing its exposé of census stuffing in Omaha, giving some startling facts; 5,000 Italians and paupers have taken out naturalization papers, paid for out of whisky boodle.

Mrs. Frank Snoad, one of our contributors, has received a letter from the Queen of Roumania expressing her Majesty's warm admiration for Mrs. Snoad's poems, and the "high literary pleasure they afford her."

Attorney-General Kellogg, of Kansas, is in Washington trying to secure a speedy decision in the Rahrer case, appealed to the Supreme Court. In the natural order this case would not be reached under a year or two, but he hopes to bring it on within thirty days.

The Cincinnati Times-Star, as quoted in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, comes bravely to the defense of Miss Willard against the attacks of Dr. Buckley whose bitterness and incoherency, it says, "is only equaled sometimes on the stump in the midst of the hottest political campaigns."

A VILLAINOUS scheme is reported to us by a reliable person lately in Salt Lake City, names being given to substantiate the report. It is that a movement has been inaugurated there to send a large number of former residents of Nebraska, now voters in Salt Lake, back to Nebraska to vote against the amendment. Our informant adds that a noted gambler is the agent of the whisky ring in this scheme, and that twenty-five men had already signed the contract to go, the consideration being passage paid each way.

THE following resolution was unanimously passed by the Ohio W. C. T. U.:

Resolved, That we appreciate the grand work for women and for temperance and education done by Henry W. Blair, United States Senator, for many years our champion in the highest legislative assembly of the nation, and we earnestly hope for his reëlection, and are confident that our white-ribbon sisters in New Hampshire will try to help bring this about.

THE Massachusetts Convention of Universalists in its last session, by a large majority passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the exclusion of women from direct representation in the government of our state, while taxed for its support, is unjust in principle, and therefore unwise in policy.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the incoming legislature to grant to all women full municipal suffrage, upon the same terms as to men, as a further step in this much-needed reform.

THIS is the program for laying the corner-stone of the Temple: Song, America, children's chorus; Crusade Psalm, Rev. Florence Kollock; Invocation, Rev. E. P. Goodwin, D. D.; Responsive Scriptural Reading, led by Bishop Samuel Fallows, D. D.; Song, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," Mr. Whitney Mockridge, chorus of children and audience; Address, Hon. Thomas W. Palmer, president of the World's Columbian Exposition; Address, Hon. Neal Dow; Poem (written for the occasion), Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap; Address, Rev. A. H. Delano, D. D.; Address, Miss Frances E. Willard, President of the National W. C. T. U.; Inception of Plan and Present Status of "The Temple," Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, President of the Woman's Temperance Building Association; Song, "Saloons Must Go," children's chorus; Dedicatory Prayer, Rev. Herrick Johnson, D. D. Laying of the corner-stone. Song, "Rise, Temple, Rise," children's chorus. Doxology. Benediction, Rev. Frank Bristol, D. D.

A FRIEND writes requesting that in justice to loyal and temperance Lutherans in Nebraska, and to the progressive branch of Lutheranism known as the "General Synod of the United States," we correct the statement made in Miss Willard's Nebraska letter in our issue of Oct. 9, that the Lutherans are solidly opposed to the amendment. More than one-third the members of the Stella W. C. T. U. are members of the Lutheran church; at a meeting of the Nebraska Synod of the Lutheran church held a month before the date of Miss Willard's letter the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That as an ecclesiastical body, boldly we reaffirm our former position, and place ourselves again on record in favor of the prohibitory amendment.

Resolved, That we regard this as the most efficient, feasible and safe method of dealing with this monster evil, and that we hereby recommend our people to use their influence in favor of, and vote for the prohibitory amendment on the fourth day of next November.

We are very glad to make this correction, and feel sure Miss Willard will be equally glad to have it made, for she never knowingly does injustice to any one. She was evidently misinformed.

A CIRCULAR comes to our desk, apparently well authenticated, but of such a nature that we cannot help believing it a forgery. It is apparently a type-written letter, on a sheet bearing the letter-head of the "Board of Education, Omaha, Neb., C. F. Goodman, president; Charles Conoyer, secretary," and signed in autograph by Charles Conoyer. It is addressed to the school-teachers and those interested in the public schools of Nebraska, and is an appeal to vote against the amendment, because prohibition will decrease the wages of teachers, for the reason that the license money in that state goes into the school fund. It sets forth that the cities of Nebraska would lose $750,000 annual revenue by the adoption of the prohibitory amendment, and "the natural result would be that the salaries of teachers in our cities and towns would be reduced, and many of the best teachers would have to be dropped altogether." This is the legitimate outworking of turning license money into the school fund. As we showed, when the plan of applying receipts from internal revenue to education was proposed by General Logan, it would bulwark the liquor power with the public school, and so make it impregnable.

CHAIRMAN BENTLY, of the Nebraska Prohibition Committee, sends out a few last words of warning and encouragement before the decisive day, November 4. He emphasizes the fact that the liquor men have conducted the campaign with unparalleled falsehood and slander; that all the forces of the National Liquor League, the Milwaukee brewers, the Peoria distillers, every saloon-keeper, and the saloon's retinue of thieves and thugs are united in this struggle against the amendment. He gives these directions for work on election day: "Organize an amendment committee in every voting precinct. Pledge from five to fifty workers to give the entire day, November 4, to this all important work. See that plenty of tickets are sent to every precinct in good time for use, and keep close watch for fraudulent and defective ballots, which will be circulated by the enemy. Spot every hired poll worker of the saloon side, and detail shrewd men to head off their tricks and break down their influence. Be on your guard against all manner of fraud, deception and illegal voting, and stay to witness the count. The law provides that the canvass of ballots shall be public. Have at least two witnesses to the canvass of ballots at every polling place, and report the result to headquarters at Lincoln, as soon as it is known. Do not get tired in the afternoon of election day. Fight every inch, every hour, every minute, till the last vote is cast. It requires a majority of all votes cast to carry the Amendment. That majority is in sight; but negligence or over-confidence will bring defeat. Remember that a ballot cast blank operates the same as though cast against the amendment. See that your ballots contain these words: 'For proposed Amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage.' See also that these words appear on your ballot as a vote: 'Against the License Amendment.' Be sure and cast this also: 'Against said proposed Amendment to the Constitution that the manufacture, sale, and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage shall be licensed and regulated by law.'"

IT is the boast of this century that persecution for conscience sake is at an end; the case of Dr. Kelley proves the contrary. As all our readers know, Dr. Kelley, a leading pastor of Nashville, Tenn., resigned his pastorate to accept nomination as Governor on the Prohibition ticket. He has made a magnificent canvass, but the hounds have been continually on his track. Bishop Hargrave, his superior officer, presented charges against him to the Tennessee Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, which resulted in his conviction and sentence to suspension for six months. Dr. Kelley immediately filed an appeal to the next General Conference. Over eighty members of the Conference presented a protest against this decision, making seven points proving the action of the Bishop to have been contrary to the law of their church. Some of these points are that he raised the committee of investigation on his own motion, gave no previous notice to the accused of the charges against him, appointed on this committee men who had formed and expressed an opinion before their appointment; that after said committee's report against the accused had been voted down in the conference by a vote of 116 for non-concurrence to 25 against, he appointed another committee of three, without the concurrence of Conference, and on this committee placed a majority of known enemies of the accused; that the Bishop held that Dr. Kelley had not the option of trial by this committee or by the Conference, and that he, the Bishop, by virtue of his office alone, had the power to appoint the committee to try the accused without the concurrence of the Conference of which he is a member. The appeal concludes with this summing up: "The action of the presiding Bishop, in the appointment of said committee in manner, etc., as stated in the foregoing captions and protests, clearly deprive this Conference of its power over D. C. Kelley, one of its members, as conferred on it by paragraph 250, page 146, and paragraph 263, page 154, of the discipline—in no sense has the trial been by this Conference." One thing is clear, either the Bishop has transcended his powers, or the laws governing such ecclesiastical action are fit to emanate from the Vatican.

BY ELLA DARE.

I sent my soul afar into the spaces
To search for Truth in Truth's eternal places.

I said to self, forgetful be and lowly
As soul sails into the silence holy.

And let, I said, no thought of earth ambition
Go forth to soil or stain this sacred mission.

Out, out upon life's upper waters sailing,
Borne on by prayer-waves mighty and unfailing,

Soul went with all the powers and forces lent her
To seek the one, the universal center;

And as the earth lines melted into dimness
Closer came the real, closer came the sinless,

Until my soul kept time in rhythmic motion
Unto the currents of life's mighty ocean.

Out into God's great everlasting nearness,
Out into the deeps of purpose, in its clearness

My soul went with its prayer and its petition
For strength to fill the highest human mission.

For wisdom, too, to walk in ways the purest,
To sow the seeds where harvests follow surest;

To part life's tangled skeins all intertwining,
And choose from out the shadowed, but the shining.

With grand orchestral tones that swept the spaces,
And set the spheres to singing in their places,

An answer came—an answer to petition—
Behold, O soul, the highest human mission.

Gird on this truth in all its royal meaning,
Hold fast the real, let go the shallow seeming.

The central force of all eternal forces
That rules the stars and systems in their courses,

That holds the atom in the place assigned it,
And plans the weight of varied laws that bind it,

That thrills the heart of man with joy unbroken,
That fills his spirit with a peace unspoken

Is love—the mighty and all-inspiring
Is love, the conqueror, the all-untiring!

As daylight follows after early dawning,
So serving follows fleetly love's bright morning.

As souls are served by love and its divining,
Who serves the most will wear the crown most shining.

THE NEW CLERK.

BY JENNIE FOWLER WILLING.

"I see you concluded to take my man Morris," said Mr. Drive, as he seated himself in the office of Jackson & Co. "He's a bright fellow," he added, putting his hat on the table with the air of a man who knows his own business, and who means to attend to it fairly and properly, doing the right thing, and not going an inch further.

"I hope he's all right," and Mr. Jackson looked over his spectacles at Mr. Drive. "I took him on your recommendation."

"Yes, for aught I know; but you can see yourself from his face that he's a little fast. You never can tell how such fellows'll turn out. I can't afford to carry that sort of goods, so I shipped him. I didn't want to damage him; so I gave him a recommend that you'll see is carefully enough worded. He shows his worst fault in his face, and nobody worth minding is going to be taken in by him."

Mr. Jackson took up a package of papers, and gave a low, half whistle. Drive and he were the diameter of the universe apart on the question of an employer's duty. There was no use in talking, he would look after that Morris. If the fellow was "a little fast"—a little help—a boy of his—the Golden Rule, etc. These fragments of suggestions from a sense of duty hummed through his head, while he figured over a bargain with the thoroughgoing Mr. Drive.

That evening Mr. Jackson sent for Morris to come to the office about some affair; and after a few minutes "business" talk, he asked him to go with him to his Bible-class next Sunday. The young man "declined with thanks," under cover of an engagement, and bowed himself out. "None of that Pecksniff stuff in mine," he growled mentally, his mustache hiding the curl of his lip. An old newspaper sarcasm had been buzzing about all day, and he let it race through his head for the fiftieth time. "Put beans in the coffee, water in the vinegar, dried leaves in the tea, and come to prayers." He had a good enough place with Jackson & Co., wholesale grocers. It was a world jollier than old Drive's establishment, but somehow, the atmosphere was even less to his taste. Ah, there was the rub. He had been getting used to loud, rough, rattling laughter, out of craterous hearts. There was something in this place through all the hum of business that brought up his past like a dead, upbraiding face that would come to the surface. He had caught himself wondering again and again what his mother would say to the gay fellows into whose company he had drifted since she left him—only two years before. Perhaps if he had brought his church letter—nonsense! A man wants to see a little something of the world before he settles down to humdrum church life—if he ever does again. Out of those leading strings—and his heels struck the pavement in masterful style, as he strode off to his boarding-house.

The next morning his head ached "confoundedly," as he phrased it, while he dashed cold water over his flushed face. "I declare I don't know but I ought to hold up. The fellows did— Well, never mind! I'll show that I hold the lines," nodding belligerently at himself in the glass, while he brushed his hair. What would his mother —Pshaw! No more babyishness! with a jerk at his cravat.

He gulped down his breakfast, for his heavy sleep had made him late, and Mr. Jackson had asked him to stop at the house for an order on his way down town. He ran back up-stairs and threw up the window, giving his coat a good shake outside. Cigar smoke does stick so!

The Jacksons were at "prayers" when Morris rang the side door bell. "It's the new clerk that I told you about last night, Mary," said Mr. Jackson, looking up from the Book, and speaking to his wife. "You go, please, dear," turning to his daughter. "Invite him in to our worship."

It was a dainty little body who opened the door for him. "Mr. Morris, I believe. The order is not quite ready. Papa is just reading for prayers. Will you kindly step into the breakfast room?"

"No, thanks, I would rather not intrude. With your permission I will wait here."

"O certainly; though it would be no intrusion. Please be seated," placing him a chair. A perverse corner of the portiere swung itself into the hinge, holding slightly ajar the door that she closed softly when she went back into the breakfast room. So, in spite of the magazine that he took up, he was an unintentional eavesdropper.

The steady strength of the familiar words of Scripture put to flight the sarcastic refrain that had begun again to hum through his head, "Beans in the coffee, water in the vinegar, etc." "It's your turn to pray, Mary," said Mr. Jackson to his wife. The gentle, even tones that came through the crack of the door sounded so like his mother's voice that the poor fellow in the reception room had to swallow hard. She mentioned "the men at the store," especially the one who was working so bravely to support his invalid father, and the new clerk—she must have known all about his mother, and the little country church. Morris felt that though her words were few and simple, they seized him with tremendous force. They were "as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies."

When Mr. Jackson came into the room with his hearty "Good-morning, Mr. Morris. If you'll wait a minute or so, I'll go down town with you," the young man's eyes were red with something more wholesome than last night's jollity.

You can easily guess the rest. When Christians are so at leisure from "haste to be rich," that they care for the spiritual welfare of their employés, multitudes will be brought to Christ.

WHAT THE "ORIGINAL PACKAGE" DECISION DID NOT DECIDE.

BY JUDGE DAVID M'CULLOCK.

I.

Soon after the announcement of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Leisy et al. vs. Hardin, now known as the "Original Package" decision, the question was put to the writer, whether or not that decision was good law. As thus stated the question does not admit of a categorical answer. If it means, "Will the decision be for the good of the people?" the answer must be, "Wait and see." A tree is known by its fruits. The liquor traffic will doubtless push its apparent advantage to its utmost limits. Some judges will be apt to give it a very wide latitude of construction, while those of a different mind will possibly, for the time being, be forced to yield to the pressure. But a reaction is not at all improbable, which may prove more disastrous to the traffic than if this decision had never been rendered.

If the question means, "Is the decision based upon sound legal principles?" a sufficient answer would be, "Inasmuch as six of the judges who rendered it say it is good law, while the other three say it is not, it might seem presumptuous for any one else to express a very decided opinion on either side."

But, whatever our individual opinions may be, this decision will certainly be taken as a precedent, in the decision of all other cases wherein the same point or points of law may arise. But it may not be equally clear to all minds just what points have been definitely determined, and therefore it cannot be expected that every judge will give it the same interpretation.

It must be remembered that not everything said in the opinions of the judges who render a decision is to be taken as undoubted law. They often make use of expressions which upon further reflection are found to require reconsideration and material modification. Seldom does a case arise, wherein the warning words of Chief Justice Marshall, quoted by the minority in their dissenting opinion, are more applicable than in this same original package case: "It is a maxim," says that great jurist, "not to be disregarded, that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision. The reason for this is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent. Other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing upon all other cases is seldom investigated."

It is wise, therefore, not to yield too much to this decision until it shall have passed through the fires of judicial criticism, in other cases that must necessarily follow in its wake. In weighing its force as a precedent, it must be remembered that it is the judgment of the court upon the facts of the case actually presented, rather than the individual opinions of the judges, that furnishes the precedent for the guidance of other courts in rendering their decisions. It is of the utmost importance that, when a case has once been decided by a court of last resort, especially if it involves a question of constitutional law, all other cases involving the same question should be decided the same way. Otherwise there could be no fixed rules by which the rights of person or property could be regulated. This is the reason for that great rule of stare decisis, which gives to the decisions of courts of last resort almost the force and effect of legislative enactments.

Therefore, it is that, although the judges may differ in the reasons assigned by them respectively why any case pending before them should be decided in a particular way, yet, if they reach the same conclusion, their decision ought to be accepted by all other courts as conclusive, whenever a similar state of facts is presented. But when the same court finds occasion to reëxamine its own judgment, it is proper for it to look into the reasons upon which it was made to rest, and if these are found to be unsound, it may well overrule its former decision and place itself upon more solid ground.

In applying any judicial decision to the determination of any subsequent case, the first thing to be done is to ascertain the exact point of controversy between the parties litigant in the former, and then to see how closely it runs parallel with the case in hand. In every judicial decision there are two main elements to be considered, the law and the fact. The judgment of the court is the proper application of the law to the facts of the particular case. The effect of one decision upon any other case will, therefore, depend very much upon whether the facts in the two cases run so closely parallel as to depend for their decision upon the same principle of law.

It does not appear from the report of this case, as it comes to us from the Supreme Court of the United States, nor from that of the Supreme Court of Iowa, what method was pursued by the trial court in ascertaining the facts. It sometimes happens that, in making up a test case, the parties will agree upon so many of the facts as they may deem sufficient to bring the disputed question of law fairly before the court. This may have been done in the present instance. Such cases are not always the most reliable as precedents. They are liable to be one-sided, and for that reason are not favored by the courts. In making one of them up, some things of importance are liable to be overlooked, which, if brought to the attention of the court, might lead to a different judgment. Such a case simply presents a conundrum to the court, of this nature: "What is the law upon this supposed state of facts?" The vice attending such a case is, that the whole force of the argument is expended upon the discussion of the question of law, admitted by both parties to govern the case, whereas, if the attention of the court had been directed to a close analysis of the facts themselves, it might have been found that a wholly different case was presented. In this way it is possible for parties who are disputing about the right of one of them to seize and confiscate a keg of beer belonging to another, to draw from the Supreme Court of the United States a decision that, for all time, will affect the commercial relations of the people of this entire country.

This being so, it will be in order for all other courts, in all future cases, to look into the real state of this case, to see if there may not be left some unexplored ground, which, if it had been thoroughly investigated, might have led to different results.

The facts in the case known as the "Original Package Case," at first sight appear to be very simple and easily understood. Gus. Leisy & Co., of Peoria in the state of Illinois, carried on a brewery at the latter city, where the beer in question was manufactured. They had an agent named John Leisy, residing at Keokuk in the state of Iowa. Gus. Leisy & Co. shipped by rail from Peoria, Illinois, to themselves, in care of their said agent, at Keokuk in the state of Iowa, certain beer in half and quarter barrels, and certain other beer in sealed packages, each of which packages contained twenty-four quart bottles of beer, upon all of which the government tax had been duly paid. Upon arrival at their destination all of the said half and quarter barrels, and all of said packages, were stored in a place occupied by Gus. Leisy & Co., in the said city of Keokuk, for the purpose of being there sold in violation of the laws of Iowa, and while yet in the hands of their said agent, were there offered for sale in the packages, in which they had entered the state. While so in the possession of the manufacturers, residents of Illinois as aforesaid, they were seized by a constable of the state of Iowa, for a violation of the prohibitory laws of that state. A writ, known as a writ of replevin, was then sued out by Gus. Leisy & Co., of Illinois, to recover their property. A trial ensued in which the constable undertook to justify his action in seizing the beer, by showing that he was authorized to do so by the prohibitory law of the state of Iowa. He was defeated in the trial court on the ground that the said law interfered with the rights of Gus. Leisy & Co. under the Constitution of the United States. He thereupon carried the case to the Supreme Court of the state of Iowa, where the decision of the trial court was reversed, and the law sustained. Gus. Leisy & Co. then took the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the decision of the Supreme Court of Iowa was reversed, and that of the trial court sustained. This is all there is of the case. The point decided is that, while the said beer remained in the hands of Gus. Leisy & Co. for sale in the packages in which they had brought it into the state, the authorities of the state of Iowa had no right to seize it under the prohibitory law of that state.

This decision does not profess to determine that the legislature of the state of Iowa had no power to pass the prohibition law, for the same court had, in other cases, expressly decided that it had that power. It simply gives the force of a judicial determination to that which had, many years before, been intimated by the same tribunal, that, while the imported article remained for sale in the hands of the importer, in the packages in which it had been imported, it remained subject to the jurisdiction of the federal government, in the exercise of its constitutional power to regulate commerce between the states.

In coming to this conclusion, a great deal of learning is expended by the justices in the discussion of certain principles of constitutional law, supposed to be involved in the decision of the case, and in regard to which there seems to have hitherto been some doubt. To give their decision all the force of a syllogism and thus render it unassailable, it seemed necessary to show that Gus. Leisy & Co. had the consent of the Congress of the United States to transport their beer from Illinois into Iowa for sale. It is true, it was conceded that Congress had not passed any law to that effect. The question, therefore, was whether or not silence, in such a case, gave consent. In some former decisions of the same court, it had been very pointedly intimated, if not actually decided, that so long as Congress remained silent, the states were not inhibited from passing laws forbidding the importation into such states, of intoxicating liquors, from other states. In other cases it seems the court had decided that the power granted to Congress to regulate commerce between the states was so exclusive in its nature and scope, that although it had remained silent, yet the states had no power to legislate upon that subject. This last position is the one now definitely adopted by the court. If, therefore, the prohibitory law of the state of Iowa is to be regarded as a regulation of commerce between the states, it is, in so far as it affects interstate commerce, void and of no effect.

Another point, therefore, to be determined was whether or not the prohibition law of Iowa was to be regarded as a police regulation, pure and simple, or whether it partook in some degree of the nature of a regulation of commerce between the states. All the judges agreed that, in so far as that law operated only upon the internal affairs of the state, it was purely a police regulation, and therefore, within the power of the state legislature to enact. But the majority hold that, in so far as it operates upon an important article, while yet in the hands of the importer, for sale in the packages in which it was imported, the law operates as a regulation touching the commerce between states, and, to that extent, it is beyond the power of the state legislature to enact.

In this last position they are stoutly antagonized by the minority, who quote largely from the opinions of the judges of the same court, in former cases, wherein they had decided similar statutes to infringe upon no rights secured by the constitution of the United States.

THE DOMINATION OF THE "FRENCH NOVEL," AND THE STRUGGLE AGAINST IT.

BY JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

In the Monthly Register, the organ of the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity, is an article on "Immorality and Crime," being a notice of a letter to a London newspaper by Dr. Edmond de Pressensé, author, publicist and senator of France. Pressensé's letter makes special reference to a lately published book on the prisons of Paris, of which he says that it deals with the most serious problems of our modern state of society, and that "the analysis given of the fearful statistics of crime, makes one realize what a seething pit of corruption lies close to our brilliant centers of civilization, and is day by day devouring multitudes of souls, even the very flower of our youth in its impure fires of Gehenna."

M. Guillot, quoted by Pressensé, continues in searching for the causes of the moral leprosy: "I denounce as fruitful sources of moral pollution, those books, the very titles of which indicate the obscenity of their contents, and which are not dealt with by the law simply because their name is legion; the impure advertisements which defile our walls, and the exhibition of photographs and engravings fit only to serve as sign-boards to houses of ill-fame. The cry of alarm has long been raised by voices that will deserve a hearing. At every criminal trial, the injury done to public morality in this way is pointed out, but the impression is only momentary. What are our legislators doing to turn back this deadly tide of moral turpitude? When will they boldly probe and cauterize these plague spots in our social system? Will they wait till mortification has set in and remedies are unavailing?"

Taking up the refrain, Pressensé then goes on to say: "For myself, I should rather say, 'What are our magistrates doing?' for the Legislature has spoken and voted, but its vote is nullified by the weakness of the judicial bench. It is idle for the magistrates to point to isolated instances in which convictions have been given, for the innumerable cases in which they have failed to prosecute create a precedent of impurity for the very worst outrages on public morality committed by the press." Pressensé next considers the prolific creations of a notorious novelist, whose baneful productions are commonly spoken of by his apologists as merely "realistic," but which the moral sense of any self-respecting community must unhesitatingly reject as the embodiment of nastiness. Yet, back of the French tolerance shown thereto, our essayist recognizes as a radical source of the general moral laxity, the enmity shown to revelation and to God. He instances this in the incident of an admiral, who, on taking charge of a vessel, had referred to his dependence for forty years upon God. Upon which La Lanterne thus severely comments:

"What can we think of a man who to-day, in the full blaze of the light of science, still believes in God, except that he is in a state of mental atrophy? Have we not ground for the most serious apprehensions, when we see that to a man of this stamp is intrusted an important commission, like the command of a fleet, a commission which requires the man holding it to be in full possession of his faculties?"

The historical researches of the talented author of the "Early Years of Christianity," have made very clear to his mind that a condition of moral rottenness in a state, such as is revealed in his righteous animadversions, means a condition that is surely tending, if it be not arrested, to dissipation and desolation. Such is both a natural sequence—if La Lanterne's "light of science" need be appealed to—and it is also God's mark and visitation upon unforsaken sin. Alas! that here in the "City of Brotherly Love" which William Penn founded, the infamous works of the French novelist which have been alluded to, works which have been justly placed under the ban in Leipsic, in London, in Toronto, and in other cities, should be published and offered for sale upon our most prominent thoroughfare. Can it be that those publishers are members of a Christian church, "in good standing"? And if that be so, do they ever face the question of the responsibility that they assume in launching such noisome productions upon their neighbors, and the unescapable decree that man's every act must be brought to judgment to receive its righteous recompense? What, also, have the overseers of the congregation to say touching their responsibility? for the publications of these purveyors of literature are "known of all men."

That was a beneficent requirement of the late John Crerar, of Chicago, in making provision by will for the establishment of a great, free library for the city, to wit, that its shelves should be kept clean and unburdened by any "skeptical trash" or "nasty French novels." He has told his wish plainly, and with vigorous Scotch directness. May the religiously concerned men and women of the lakeside city, together with the trustees charged with the carrying out of the will, be ever on their guard lest the importunities of enterprising, but heedless or unscrupulous publishers, and the clamors of a class among the users of the (prospective) library—morbid devourers of sensational fiction—operate to break down the wise and savory stipulation of the benevolent testator.

THE ANIMUS OF THE RUM POWER.

BY REV. B. W. WILLIAMS.

Contempt for Law.

I.

The advocates of a good cause are usually content to rely for its promotion upon fair discussion and open and honorable action. The patrons and promoters of evil frequently resort to unwarranted methods in defense of their conduct or opinions. The history of the temperance reform furnishes many striking illustrations of this truth. While temperance and prohibition workers have waged a legitimate warfare against the saloon, liquor men have too often been guilty of fraud and violence in their efforts to sustain their cause, and to oppose and withstand the truth.

The liquor interest in many cases has openly defied, and willfully violated the laws enacted for the promotion of the general welfare. Every good citizen should respect the laws of his country. Without this, there can be no security for life, property or reputation. He who repudiates rightful authority, and deliberately violates a wholesome and necessary law, may justly be regarded as an enemy to the public good. Persons engaged in virtuous employments are, generally, peaceable and law-abiding; it is the evil-doers who violate and resist the law. Tried by this standard, the venders of alcoholic liquors appear in an unenviable light. They have a proverbial reputation for lawlessness and crime.

I cannot forbear quoting, on this point, an extract from a recent speech of Hon. E. C. Heath, prohibition candidate for Governor of Texas. Hear him:

"The traffic is itself a violator of law. The producer of crime in its patrons, it heads the criminal catalogue as the most flagrant, shameless, universal transgressor on the soil of America. Is it forbidden to sell without a license? It sells without license or the payment of tax. Forbidden to sell to minors and drunkards, it sells to minors and drunkards. Required to heed the request of the wife of the drunkard, it heeds her not. Forbidden to sell on election days, it violates the whole spirit of this law, and the letter, too. Forbidden to sell on Sunday, it sells on Sunday—fights the enactment of Sunday laws, fights their enforcement, fights the day itself. Forbidden to sell in the local district where by vote it is prohibited, they openly or secretly press illicit sales to the highest possible mark. Where a sovereign state writes prohibition in its constitution and in its statute book, the traffic in and out of the state conspires at once to evade and violate such law at every possible point. It is the open boast of the traffic that it will not obey prohibitory laws, and that such laws cannot be enforced against it. Every possible effort is made to make good this boast. With superlative cheek they claim to have so violated every prohibitory law as to render it virtually null and void. Their paid advocates parade such treason against the state as a valid reason why the state should recede from its efforts to preserve the lives, property, health and morals of the people."

Not only do liquor men violate the law, but they stubbornly resist every effort to enforce it. When brought to account for their crimes, they have resorted to any duplicity, falsehood, or violence by which to escape justice. I will here give an account of a few instances in which the lawlessness of rum has been strikingly exhibited.

S. B. Bradford, ex-attorney general of Kansas, has had a large experience in the enforcement of prohibitory liquor laws, and has several times come near losing his life at the hands of liquor men. One night during the summer of 1882, three shots were fired through his office window, evidently with murderous intent; but fortunately he was absent at the time, having gone to a lecture and left his lamp burning. During his four years' term of office as attorney-general of the state, he traveled about 32,000 miles, enforcing the law in the various counties. He received scores of threatening letters, and was frequently in great personal danger. At Leavenworth, on one occasion, a man was selected to assault him, and followed him to his hotel for that purpose, but was made to hold up his hands and back out of the house. On another occasion, when Mr. Bradford was making a speech and organizing a law and order league at Argentine, in 1887, a clan of twelve or fourteen roughs and hoodlums made it up to kidnap him and put him in the river; but fortunately the plan was found out in time to defeat it.

Even a slight remark or hint in favor of the law against liquor sellers has sometimes incurred their hatred and prompted them to violence. Rev. D. C. Milner, an active Prohibitionist, was assaulted at Atchison, Kan., March 27, 1885, by a saloon keeper, by the name of Jesse C. Crall. The latter had been selling a vile compound known as "West India Herb Bitters," and had heard that Dr. Milner had said that this was a violation of the liquor law and ought to be punished. Upon this trivial provocation, a brutal and cowardly attack was made upon the venerable clergyman; and although he could use but one arm—the other having been disabled by a wound received in the war—he defended himself with good effect. After a number of blows had been dealt, both combatants clinched and went to the pavement. They were soon separated, however, and each went his way.

On the night of August 14, 1886, an attempt was made to blow up the residence of J. F. Tufts, at Atchison, Kan., while he and his household of five or six persons were peacefully sleeping. The cause of this atrocious crime was found in the fact that Mr. Tufts had been employed as assistant attorney-general of the state, and in that capacity was engaged in prosecuting violators of the prohibitory liquor law. Thus, in attempting vengeance on him, the lives of several others were endangered. No doubt murder was intended; but fortunately none of the inmates of the building were killed or seriously injured by the explosion. On Monday morning after this dynamite affair, Mr. Tufts went about his duties as usual. On returning to his dinner at noon he found that his wife had received the following notice:

"AUGUST 14, 1886—Mrs. James Tufts, Atchison, Kansas:—Mrs. Tufts, Please for yourself and Children's safety go to some Friends or some place outside of Atchison. Yourself and children are inosent but your Husband has tried to ruin our business hoping that you will take warning. CLUB ROOM."

Mr. Tufts had previously received anonymous letters threatening his life and warning him to desist from his course, but was not intimidated by them.

Other examples similar in character might be given, but these will be sufficient for the present article. In contemplation of such outrages, it is safe to arrive at the conclusion that the liquor traffic is essentially lawless and diabolic in its character, aims and methods. It is a selfish, heartless, infamous business, which produces sneaks, cowards and murderers. Let good men and women everywhere labor aggressively for the overthrow of that mighty agency for evil. Let there be vigilance to detect, and courage to expose and prosecute all violators of temperance and prohibitory laws.

THE VICTORY OF TRUTH.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—When the clamor of opposition is ringing in our ears we are often tempted to cry, "Wrong is forever on the throne;" but as time goes by we find that Truth, even when "on the scaffold" "sways the future" that she at last controls. Every great reform has turned on some pivotal question, and when the right answer to that question has been accepted by the consciences of men, victory has followed.

When the thought of the equal rights of men, independent of complexion, became universal conviction, the fate of human slavery for the entire civilized world was sealed. The fate of the temperance reform with the ruin and wretchedness it seeks to prevent turns on the question, What is alcohol? If by nature it is an outlaw, as soon as the people come to believe it they will outlaw it, is the logic of the past and present. Wily opposers often befog the popular mind and cause delay by evading the main question of a reform; but the day is over when that can be done in this case.

Twelve million children in our Republic are under laws requiring them to be taught what alcohol is and what it will do to them if they drink it. The question, with all it involves, is before us and cannot be badgered or browbeaten out of sight. It must be answered, and to the children of our nation and age. Modern science has answered it and declares "Alcohol is a poison," specially dangerous in small quantities because "It is the nature of a little to create an uncontrollable appetite for more."

It will probably not seem strange to the future historian that it should have been very difficult to get these and kindred truths fully stated in the school text-books offered on this topic. Truth that opposes popular notions and appetites has always had a hard time in the world. But truth, as we have seen, has in itself the elements of ultimate success, and, as the theologians would say, "It is in the nature of things that these deficient temperance school text-books should be revised," as the readers of this article probably know they have been, to a large extent.

It has been a great joy to welcome these books as they have come to my desk, one after another, fresh from the hands of the printer. First the Primary books, beautifully illustrated and as attractive as the best modern picture or story books; the Intermediate; and then the Advanced Grammar grade books, and the High School editions, all carefully graded and representing the latest and best educational methods of presenting truth.

There are great names as authors on the title pages of these books: Dr. H. Newell Martin, an F. R. S., and professor of Biology in Johns Hopkins University, a physiologist honored on two continents; Dr. Roger S. Tracy, of the New York board of health; Dr. A. B. Palmer, and Professor Stowell, both of the Michigan State University, and others.

This galaxy of authority settles the question of scientific accuracy. There is not a false note on the vital question in one of these books. They all declare in unqualified and understandable terms, that alcohol is a poison, and trace the story of its poisonous action through the threefold human system, the mental, the moral and the physical. And better still they are being put into the hands of the school children of the country just as fast as they can be printed.

Our joy over the large number of publishers of our indorsed books was somewhat shaded in May last by the consolidation of the houses issuing our four leading series, viz.: A. S. Barnes & Co., Ivison, Blakeman & Co., Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., and D. Appleton & Co., to make only one company called the American Book Company, of New York City.

The effect this consolidation might have on our cause created much anxiety, and led to many pilgrimages to New York to see if the dangers reported to me really existed. Fears were whispered in my ears to the effect that "the price of our books would be raised out of all practical sight," and that "the revised and indorsed books would be hopelessly shelved," and "the unrevised and unindorsed books only would be pushed upon the market." Happily all these fears have proved groundless. The following letter settles the first question; the prices of our books are not to be raised:

CENTRAL OFFICE OF THE AMERICAN BOOK CO.,
806 and 808 Broadway, New York.
Sept. 16, 1890.

Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Supt., Hyde Park, Mass.:

DEAR MADAM:—We hasten to assure you in reply to your inquiry. Your informant is entirely misinformed as to any raising of prices of temperance text-books published by us. On the other hand, they have already been slightly reduced, and are to-day cheaper than any other books in this branch published in America, or, so far as we know, elsewhere. It will be impossible for any state by public enactment, contract, or otherwise, to obtain good books as low as we now furnish them to the general public. Furthermore, we are looking forward to further reduction as soon as the economies which we contemplate can be put into force, which will be when interested rivals cease to misrepresent us, making it necessary for us to keep a large force in the field to refute slanderous charges brought against us. Please examine our inclosed list of introductory and exchange prices, which are in no case higher than those charged before the organization of this company, and, as you know, an important reduction was made in the Union Series by your personal solicitation.

Very truly yours, AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY.
[Signed] A. C. BARNES, Vice-Pres.

Another letter assures us that our indorsed books, instead of being "retired," are to be vigorously pushed into the market.

CENTRAL OFFICE OF THE AMERICAN BOOK CO.,
806 and 808 Broadway, New York.
Sept. 11, 1890.

Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Hyde Park, Mass.:

DEAR MADAM:—It gives us much pleasure to inform you that the four great series of Temperance Physiologies which have been prepared under your supervision are now completed by the publication of "Health for Little Folks" in the Appleton series. The series are known respectively as the "Authorized" (formerly published by Appletons), the "Eclectic" (formerly published in Cincinnati), the "Pathfinder" (from the Barnes press) and the "Union" (from Ivison, Blakeman & Co.) These will be placed in competition before the public solely upon their respective merits.

We will earnestly and cordially coöperate with the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to place one or the other of these series in the schools, and we shall be pleased to transmit to our agents such instructions as will lead to perfect harmony in agency work among those engaged.

Permit us to add that the interests of older publications which do not contain satisfactory temperance matter will not be permitted to stand in the way of any changes to later books which may be desired by our patrons. Your suggestions for the general good will always be gratefully received, and we beg to remain, Very truly yours,

AMERICAN BOOK CO.,
By BIRDSEYE BLAKEMAN.

It now seems that what we feared in the consolidation of these companies might be a disaster to our cause, is proving a help.

Wendell Phillips once said, "If you can permeate your school books and school-houses with the truth that is the basis of your reform, the victory is a question of only a short time." We now have the "permeated school books," and the law has given us the larger share of the "school-houses," and the question, therefore, of how soon alcohol will be abolished from the habits and traffics of the American people depends upon the faithfulness of the present temperance workers in securing the enforcement of the spirit and letter of these temperance education laws. MARY H. HUNT.

A GLIMPSE OF WHITE-RIBBONERS IN "THE CITY BY THE SEA."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—During a recent unexpected and hurried visit to Charleston, I heard and saw things concerning the W. C. T. U. there, which I believe will be of interest to all the white-ribbon sisterhood. I was the guest of Mrs. Jessie E. McCown, with whom I had for some time corresponded, but whom I had never before seen. I went unannounced, but found a sister's greeting, and hearty sympathy in the object of my visit.

On my way I had learned through the papers of Mrs. Chapin's recent lecture at Allendale, and feared I should miss seeing her; but fortunately she had returned, and soon came to bid me welcome.

It was a time of deep sadness and gloom, for one whom the Charleston W. C. T. U. had adopted as a son lay languishing his young life away, and Georgia mingled her tears with theirs. The tender ministry of these faithful women, and their devotion to the cause the young lecturer had represented, reminded me of the godly women of early New Testament times.

There were intervals brightened by the hope that the sufferer might yet recover, and during one of these Mrs. Chapin and Mrs. Terry spirited me away for a drive to Magnolia cemetery, which is even more beautiful than far-famed Bonaventure. It has the same grand, old live oaks, festooned with long gray moss; but the river and sea view is far more extensive, and from one point there is a charming sight of the city and its gleaming spires.

Of course I went to see Mrs. Chapin, and not only is her home delightful, but the way leading to it. I went by the way of South Battery, which faces the Bay, and gives a view of Sullivan's Island, and the harbor guarded by far-famed Fort Sumter. The sun shone brightly on the rippling waves; the soft sea-breezes gently swayed the long moss on the oaks in the little park; in the background were the lovely mansions, with their Grecian columns; and over all bent the sapphire sky.

From Mrs. Chapin's charming home on East Bay street, there are lovely views of the river and sea. Within, all is bright and cheery, for she is a model hostess. The artist daughter was away for the day at Sullivan's Island; but I saw many of her beautiful paintings and sketches.

The Charleston W. C. T. U. is doing a good work. The ladies make a weekly visit to the almshouse, holding a prayer service; nor do they go empty-handed, but carry with them not only necessities, but luxuries. They also visit the hospital and the jail, and hold devotional services with the sick and the prisoners. In all these places and to the poor and sick elsewhere, they have given many flowers, and papers and leaflets; and homeless ones have been cared for until able to care for themselves. During the summer months eighty adults and one hundred and twenty children were furnished with tickets for a sail around the harbor. Under the auspices of the union a gospel temperance meeting is held every Sunday evening, conducted by an earnest Christian young man. Plans are now in progress to extend the work. The young ladies have a union of their own, and are doing a good work among the children.

I found Mrs. Chapin quite busy, as she always is, between the local work, her frequent lectures, and her preparations for the South Carolina convention, soon to be held at Newberry.

Since my return the dreaded blow has fallen upon the Charleston W. C. T. U., and not upon it alone, for all South Carolina and Georgia and Florida mourn the untimely death of Henry D. Howren, "the reformed journalist," cut down in the morning of his brilliant career as a temperance lecturer. Born in Georgia, reared in Florida, graduated at Emory College, engaged for six years in journalism in Charleston, and for the last seventeen months lecturing in the three states,—how closely does his death draw together those who knew and loved him in all these sections. But it was to Charleston he "went home to die," in the house of his faithful friend, Mrs. McCown, and in that same little upper room, often mentioned in his lectures as the hallowed spot of his conversion. There for seven weeks this faithful friend, tenderly assisted by Mrs. Chapin, sought all in vain to restore to health one whose arduous labors had made him so valuable to the cause.

The W. C. T. U., the members of the Charleston press, and other friends, laid him away, in hope of a blessed resurrection, in the churchyard of Old Trinity, near the grave of his uncle, Rev. H. W. Durant.

Sweetly mournful as the chimes of old Saint Michael's will ever be the memory of Henry Howren, so young, so bright, so lovable, whose earthly sun went down at noon. But, with him, we can only trust "his work was done," and that he has "gone home to rest and peace."

TEMPERANCE CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Never in the entire history of the country was the question of prohibition so fully discussed in Congress as during the session just closed, and this in itself is a matter of great encouragement. But it did something besides talk. The passage of the Original Package Bill evinced a healthy desire to do right. Then it gave Oklahoma prohibitory laws until the adjournment of its first legislature. It also prohibited the sale of intoxicants in army canteens in prohibitory states. This we have to accept as the half a loaf, which is better than none. The temperance people tried hard to secure a law prohibiting the sale in all army canteens, but failed. It also extended the Sunday law of Washington, prohibiting the sale of intoxicants on Sunday to the rest of the District.

While the past session of Congress did not do what it ought to have done for prohibition, it advanced several steps farther than any previous Congress had ever done, and there is a fair prospect that the bill for a Commission of Inquiry into the effect of the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic will be passed at the next session. It has been reported favorably by the House Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, and Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and is on the calendar of both the House and Senate. I am informed that Speaker Reed has expressed his willingness to give recognition to have this bill called up at the next session, and it will probably be passed. Senator Blair told me that the Senate was waiting for the bill to be sent over from the House. It is expected that there will be no difficulty in the Senate, as that body has passed this measure a number of times. President Harrison will willingly sign the bill, as he voted on it when in the Senate, and has since expressed himself as favorable to it.

An official investigation of the effects of the liquor traffic will be a good preparation for the consideration of a National constitutional prohibitory amendment. This resolution advanced farther in the Senate at the last session than it has ever done before. It was reported favorably by the committee on Education and Labor, and was brought up for consideration in the Senate shortly before adjournment. Senator Blair stated that a number of senators desired to speak on the resolution, and by request it went over without prejudice. So it can be called up at the next session at any time. This resolution has not been acted upon by the House Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic to which it was submitted. It is likely that four or five members of this committee will oppose it, while six will favor it.

Late in the session, by request of the W. C. T. U., a bill was introduced into both the Senate and the House to prohibit the importation, exportation and interstate transportation of alcoholic beverages. It was referred to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and to the House Committee of the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. Congressman Joseph D. Taylor, of Ohio, said he thought the House Committee, of which he is chairman, would report it at the next session.

Quite a number of measures touching various phases of the temperance question were introduced, but most of them are still in the committees, and it is probable that but few of them will be reported and acted upon by Congress at the next short session.

A bill to prohibit the granting of liquor licenses within one mile of the Soldiers' Home, is on the House calendar, having been reported favorably by the committee of the District of Columbia. Congressman Grout, the chairman, expects to bring it up at the next session.

The Alcoholic Liquor Traffic committee did not report the bill to prohibit the exportation of liquors to Africa and the Islands of the Pacific, or the resolution to authorize the President of the United States to form an alliance with foreign countries for the suppression of the liquor traffic with the native races of the Islands of the Pacific and Africa; nor have similar measures to these, which were introduced into the Senate, been reported by the Senate committees.

Another measure which the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic committee has not acted upon is the bill to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors on the grounds of all exhibitions and expositions, for which appropriation is made by Congress. Yet it is very important that this should be passed before the date of the World's Fair at Chicago. It is very apparent that unless the Christian people of this nation demand that this or a similar measure be passed by Congress that liquors will be sold on the Fair grounds.

Senator Blair's resolution requesting the President to invite an International Congress to meet in Washington with a view to the suppression of the slave trade and of the traffic in intoxicating liquors and fire-arms with uncivilized peoples, and also to secure the disarmament of nations and the organizations of International Courts has not made much progress in the Senate, and it is very doubtful if it will be acted upon at the next session. Senator Blair, at the request of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, introduced a bill to prohibit the sale and manufacture of alcoholic liquors in the territories as a beverage. The Committee on Territories to which it was referred has not reported it. This is another measure that there is little probability will be acted upon at the short session.

The bills for prohibition in the District which were introduced into the Senate and referred to the District committee early in the session, still slumber in that committee and there is little prospect that any prohibition bill will be reported next winter. The District prohibition bill introduced into the House was referred to the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic committee which also has not acted upon it. And while a favorable report might be expected from this committee, the probability is that it will not take time to make a report on it at the short session. The House District committee has decided to report favorably, with some amendments, the high license bill prepared by Commissioner Douglass. The bill fixes the barroom license at $600, and the committee, I understand, propose to recommend that this be increased. However high they make the license, the results of the traffic will be the same, and true Prohibitionists will oppose licensing the nefarious business.

AN INTERESTING RECORD.

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—The non-partisan record of the Iowa W. C. T. U. is a subject of interest in view of the recent withdrawal of a portion of that body from the National W. C. T. U., on the plea that the partisanship of the latter cannot be tolerated by Mrs. Foster and her adherents. In 1883, at the annual convention, the Iowa W. C. T. U. adopted the following:

Resolved, That we recognize an overruling Providence in the circumstances which lead to the advocacy of prohibition by the Republican party, and that we pledge our earnest and faithful coöperation with that political party which shall give the needed prohibitory legislation to best protect our homes from the liquor traffic.

Iowa W. C. T. U. state convention, 1884:

Resolved, That we remember with gratitude the party that kept faith with the people with reference to prohibition, and the brave members of the twentieth General Assembly who stood by principle, and by their votes placed prohibition in our statute books, and afforded protection to our homes. (This reference is to a Republican legislature.)

Iowa, again in 1885, from the official circular issued by the Iowa W. C. T. U.:

Resolved, That without committing our organization to the support of a political party in its party measures or in its nominees, aside from its prohibition measures, we have, as a state union, coöperated with an existing political party in procuring prohibition measures with gratifying success; and as we desire in the future to ask additional temperance legislation, we deem it unwise and inexpedient, by the adoption of any resolution, to antagonize a party that can and has most surely protected our homes by prohibitory legislation, even before public sentiment compelled it to furnish us the best embodiment of prohibition principles.

From stenographic report of Mrs. Foster's address in Portland, Maine, October 2, 1890:

"The state of Iowa has always been non-partisan. I might talk till the morning light illustrating the acts by which partisanship has been carried on in every state of the Union, except the one of which I have the honor to be president. . . . . I will take care of my influence; I will put it where I want it to go."

A "NON-PARTISAN."

DON'T be discouraged because you are misunderstood as to your actions and motives. It is a part of the price of living to be misjudged.—W. S. Studley.

Our Book Table.

THE GOSPEL OF COMMON SENSE, by Charles F. Deems, D. D., published by Wilbur B. Ketcham, 13 Cooper Union, New York. Price $1.50.

This gospel is contained in the epistle of James, which never before seemed to have half the meaning which Dr. Deems shows us in it. In his introductory chapter he presents strong evidence that the author of this epistle was James, the brother of Christ, and in succeeding chapters brings out the wonderfully practical character of his directions. For example, in speaking of the partiality shown the rich in their assemblies, James uses a word, translated "wearing a gold ring." Dr. Deems translates it "A man be-gold-ringed," and shows how James' language seems to have been intended to throw contempt upon the "dude" of his time. The verse, "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin," is made the text for a capital chapter on "The Sin of Uselessness," and so on; each verse and phrase is found to be replete with meaning, a meaning which applies directly to the conduct of life. While reading the book of James in the light of Dr. Deems' commentaries we agree with Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock in the opinion that the application of this epistle in the region of economics is that which alone can save our civilization.

The NEW YORK LEDGER for October 4, contains a fine portrait of Henry W. Grady, with a character sketch by Oliver Dyer.

RHYMES FOR LITTLE READERS is a lovely baby book in colors, its cute pictures lithographed from original water colors by Miss A. W. Adams. The rhymes are the favorite jingles of so many generations of babies that they have become classic, but the pictures are new and full of life and spirit. Price $1.00. D. Lothrop Co., Boston.

SKETCHES IN THE FAR WEST, by Jessie Benton Fremont, has before been mentioned in THE UNION SIGNAL, but it deserves special notice in this connection as a thoroughly enjoyable book. Price $1.00. D. Lothrop Co., Boston.

HOW THE WAY WAS PREPARED, by Calvin Fairbanks, is a story of quite as thrilling adventure, and of treatment more barbarous than South Sea islanders visited upon their captives, but it is every word true, as many living witnesses can testify, and came to pass in these United States along in the forties. It is hard to realize that such things did occur here half a century ago; harder to understand than is the Salem mob that greeted Dr. Cheever's Dream of Deacon Giles' distillery; that it is so, proves that the world does move. Calvin Fairbanks is enshrined as a saint in the hearts of many men and women of to-day who owe their free birth to his heroic help to their parents in the old slavery days. The story of those days, and of his life are here graphically told, yet without any bitterness. The old hero still lives at an advanced age, and his only support comes from the sale of this book. Chaplain McCabe personally bore the expense of its electrotype plates, and it is published by the Patriotic Publishing Company, 334 Dearborn street, Chicago, in cloth, at $1.25. There is also a paper edition.

REFORMATION PRINCIPLES, by our good friend, J. M. Foster, 620 Freeman Avenue, Cincinnati, published by Revell & Co., Chicago, discusses, from the standpoint of consecrated common sense, civil government, God's moral ordinance; the responsibility of Nations; Sabbath reform; temperance; divorce laws; the labor question; the race problem; the relations of church and state; the Bible God's letter to His people, and other live questions. That its themes are well treated, the author's name is sufficient guarantee. The book can be ordered of him.

Joint authorship of books seems to be quite the rage now; the latest example is WARP AND WOOF, by Frances Hartson Wood and Eva Paine Kitchel, published by F. H. Wood, Boonton, New Jersey. Unlike most books, its introductory chapters are the most charming part of it; taking us as they do, into a New England garret and into the old New England life. Aunt Kate, the heroine, is finely drawn, and naturally blossoms out into a strong advocate of freedom, temperance, the equality of the sexes, "a white life for two," and all other good things. As is the custom with joint authorship books, there is much inequality in it, some chapters being much better than others; to find out "which is which," you must read it. Price $1.50.

From the Open Court Publishing Company come THE ETHICAL PROBLEM,—three lectures by Dr. Paul Carus, on Ethics, a Science; The Data of Ethics and The Theory of Ethics—and an EPITOME OF THREE SCIENCES, Comparative Philosophy, Comparative Psychology, and Old Testament History. The first is by Prof. H. Oldenberg, the second by Professor J. Jastrow, and the third by Professor C. H. Cornill, each introduced as a specialist in his line. The first essay is really a study of Sanskrit, presenting in condensed, popular form, an outline of the efforts of Europeans to master Vedic literature as well as the contents of the Vedas themselves. It differs from some authorities concerning the great antiquity of these writings and in other particulars; yet gives a very interesting and comprehensive view of this wide field. The last essay is not Old Testament history in its widest sense, but a study of the rise of the people of Israel, written, not by a skeptic, as we might expect from the publishing house which issues it, but by an orthodox Christian, we are told in the introduction. He takes the view that there is a generic difference between the Old Testament and the New, and that the attempt to ignore this difference has resulted either in artificially forcing the Old up to the height occupied by the New, or worse still, forcing the New down to the moral plane of the Old. Undoubtedly there is a sense in which this is true, yet we cannot forget that when "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" was written, the Old Testament was the only Scripture extant.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let all friends who desire to see the W. C. T. U. come speedily into entire ownership of the Temple, send at once a two-cent stamp to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, for a Temple mite-box, Bulletin and descriptive card.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce that the Western Passenger Agents, who promised two or three weeks ago (as recorded in this column October 16) to give a reduction of one and one-third fare to all persons attending the laying of the corner-stone, at their meeting yesterday rescinded this decision, because there were no accredited delegates that we could pledge to attend. We hope the difference in fare will, however, not hinder our friends from being present November 1, on this most historic and memorable occasion, even if they have to pay full fare

Preparations for the corner-stone ceremony go on apace. Members of the Loyal Temperance Legion in our suburban towns are practicing the music which is to be sung on the occasion; so, also, are hundreds of children in the Sunday-schools of the city. Rehearsals are taking place twice a week on the three sides of the city. It is expected that two or three thousand children will take part in the chorus. A large part of the ceremony will take place in the second regiment Armory, on Michigan avenue. It will accommodate 6,000 persons. The building will be handsomely draped and decorated with the National flag. Almost every state is sending silk banners in abundance, which will be carried by the children in their march from the Armory to the place of laying the corner-stone; those who have not a banner will carry a small flag. The children will be accompanied by marshals wearing white satin badges, headed by a band of music. They will be preceded and followed by a platoon of police. Visitors will follow in carriages.

The following letter, which we most heartily indorse, has been received from our National President, Miss Frances E. Willard: "I will give $10 towards $100 to secure a tablet for our blessed and beloved Deborah (Mrs. Zerelda Wallace), who, at seventy-one years old, goes forth alone to speak 'For God and Home and Native Land.' No purer, nobler name will gleam in our great hall. Yours for a wee bit of gratitude to live folks as well as to departed worthies. N. B.—I think this is my first outburst of praise in 1890, and for it I expect to be forgiven."

We wish we had more room to speak of the personal gifts sent in; we make mention of a few in this paragraph. On her way to Europe in search of health, a staunch white-ribboner, Mrs. Mary E. McChesney, of Chicago, sends a gift of $100 for the Temple. Mrs. S. P. T. Bryan, Ellsworth, Minnesota, sends a second installment of $25 on her pledge of $100. Mrs. Ellen Dowling, Pana, Ill., on a pledge of $100, sends $40 as a second installment. We are in doubt whether this is a personal gift or one from the union. We wish when persons send money for unions they would specify it plainly.

Mrs. Jane Beatsom, Rockford, Ill., pledges $100 and sends $5 as first payment; she also pledges $100 for the Social Temple of Rockford, and sends an installment of $25. Forty dollars has been received by express in gold coin from a lady who does not want her name known. She writes that she sends the money for the benefit of Vermont. Mrs. Eunice Thompson, Conn., aged ninety-five years, sends $1. Mrs. B. Harrington, Greensburg, Ohio, aged ninety years, also sends $1. A beautiful child (little Mary Ireland) accompanied by her mother, came bounding into the Temple office the other morning, her face beaming with pleasure, in her hand was a big silver dollar, which she handed us, saying, "I saved this in my mite-box to help build the Temple."

Mrs. M. E. Nourse, Northfield, Minn., sends $100 in memory of her husband, Allen N. Nourse, who died March 29, 1889, aged seventy-eight years. A mother sends $1.70; she says it is the savings of her baby boy now in heaven, David W. Barnes, Saticoy, Cal. Mrs. C. A. Butler, Griggsville, Ill., sends $5 in memory of her husband, E. W. Butler, who was over eighty-five years old when he died. Mrs. S. A. Stout sends $2 in memory of her husband, Rev. James Stout, who died May 5, 1890; in the midst of active work, the Master called him home. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Sparta, Ohio, sends $1 in memory of Bryant Bocoven, their organist, who died September 20, aged twenty-one years; he was a loyal Prohibitionist. The W. C. T. U. of Blanchard, Iowa, sends $5 in memory of their beloved president, Mrs. J. E. Winney, who died May 26.

Mrs. G. W. Clark, president third district W. C. T. U., Omaha, Neb., writes as follows in regard to a pledge made at their late district meeting. "It is safe to declare that no part of the meeting afforded the delegates more satisfaction than did that of the pledge there made of $100 to secure, in Willard Hall, a tablet commemorative of our own heroic martyr, Watson B. Smith, whose devotion to the cause in which we labor, was, on the night of November 4, 1881, at the hands of our vindictive foe, sealed with his life blood; though dead his life is a benediction and an inspiration to our workers in their impending conflict with the powers of darkness in our state."

All money orders and checks for the Temple should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh, 161 La Salle Street, Chicago, National treasurer, and treasurer of the Temple fund. All information in regard to the Temperance Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, Pres. Woman's Temperance Building Association.

QUIET WAYS ARE BEST.

What's the use of worrying,
Of hurrying,
And scurrying,
Everybody flurrying,
And breaking up their rest?
When every one is teaching us,
Preaching and beseeching us,
To settle down and end the fuss,
For quiet ways are best?
The rain that trickles down in showers
A blessing brings to thirsty flowers;
Sweet fragrance from each brimming cup,
The gentle zephyrs gather up.
There's ruin in the tempest's path;
There's ruin in the voice of wrath;
And they alone are blessed
Who early learn to dominate
Themselves, their violence abate,
And prove by their serene estate,
That quiet ways are best.

Nothing's gained by worrying,
By hurrying,
And scurrying,
With fretting and with flurrying
The temper's often lost;
And in pursuit of some small prize
We rush ahead and are not wise,
And find the unwonted exercise
A fearful price has cost.
'Tis better far to join the throng
That do their duty right along;
Reluctant they to make a fuss,
Or make themselves ridiculous.
Calm and serene in heart and nerve,
Their strength is always in reserve,
And nobly stands each test;
And every day and all about,
By scenes within and scenes without,
We can discern with ne'er a doubt,
That quiet ways are best.

PEGGY'S FORTUNE.

BY MARGARET SPENCER.

That Peggy Ward should have one thousand dollars sent to her in a letter, "every mite her own," Aunt Joanna said, was amazing! But everybody was glad, for they loved Peggy well. This is the way it came about.

At sunset in February, 1880, a strong gale was blowing, a heavy sea running, and the keeper of station No. 4 had kept close watch all day of the vessels on the treacherous Jersey coast. To his practiced eye storms were gathering from the northeast and southwest, boding ill and not good.

A little girl, not more than ten years old, stood in the open doorway of her home, talking to a big, bronzed man, cheery looking and strong; dressed in a great-coat and thick Scotch cap.

The surf came tumbling in and roaring on the wide beach. The sky was thickening, and the wildness of the gale would have soon housed another girl than Peggy.

"Do let me go, father, just for one minute. It looks grand out there; but do you think the vessels will all get in?"

"Run, run, then, for your sea rig, and come along for a short walk; you'll be needed indoors to-night, Peg, I'm afraid; looks like a tussel out there—it's coming fast; strange they didn't anchor sooner. Tell mother to keep plenty of her good coffee hot, and make the old stove snap; plenty of wood piled up, and plenty of dry, warm clothes."

Keeper West was a hardy beachman, who for forty years had lived within sound of the sea. His especial fitness for the work, his efficient management of his crew of six surfmen, gave him only a good record of brave deeds.

From May till September the keepers on the Atlantic coast are in active service as captains of their crews, having entire control of all station property, and direct all operations of the life-saving service. Many of them live in the neat station-houses all the year.

Hand in hand Peggy and her father tramped along the beach, the wind almost lifting the small figure off the sand; but Peggy was used to sand and wind, and used to looking for sails at dusk, and used to climbing to the lookout, holding fast to her father's hand in November or February gales. The patrol met and changed at sunset for the evening watch; exchanged checks, and marched on and on, keeping sharp eyes seaward.

A three-masted schooner had anchored a mile out; another and another, like specks in the distance. It grew dark. Peggy ran inside the snug little house where the mother was fastening the storm shutters, lighting the big lamps, putting one in its place in the upper window. Peggy hung her wet jacket and cap by the fire, while the kettle sung, just as though there was no storm, and the coffee boiled, and the supper table was laid. A little anxious looking mother, thin and brown, but kindly and efficient in this busy home. It began to rain, then snow; and the chill wind turned them into sleet.

"Won't father come in for his coffee, Peggy?"

"Not yet," replied the little girl; "he and patrolman Dick have gone down half a mile; they saw signals of distress; the schooner looked like a wreck!"

"Let me take a look, child," and the mother climbed the narrow stairway to the roof, where the big glass always lay, but it was too dark to see. The keeper and his men ran to the boat-house. The signal guns came faintly through the storm. They made a fire on the beach, but it burned fitfully in the rain. The red lights flashed scarlet through the sleet, and one after another was rapidly sent up. They saw them from the nearest vessel and fired a gun in response.

The beach apparatus was placed in position; the line shot too far and failed to touch the rocking, tossing schooner. Another and another line, but with sleet and wind they had parted. At last, the little piece of iron carried its life-saving line to the vessel. The sailors drew it on board. The "hawser" was sent next, and then the breeches buoy was put into communication with the brave men on the shore. The first person to land was the captain. He sprang out and exclaimed, "Thank God for these men! I came first to see if I can bring my wife and baby safely over, or will the life-boat stand this sea?"

"No, Captain, no! we'll land you safe and sound, every one, with the breeches buoy," answered Keeper West. "How many of your crew?"

"Nine in all."

Faster than I can tell it, the line swung across the sea and back. This time the pale, shivering wife came in her husband's arms. She was so silent and cold, one strong surfman wrapped her in a blanket and ran with her to the warm house.

It seemed an endless time, but minutes were precious and few when back bounded the buoy with the mate holding close to his breast the little baby, tucked warmly in rugs and wraps. He crowed under the blankets, as they put him in Peggy's lap.

It was now two o'clock in the morning. The sea thundered and roared, but the wind had lulled. Out into all these hours had flashed and shone the light from the station, seeming to draw the half-frozen, worn-out men by its very shining, into safety and deliverance! The apparatus was housed in the boat-house. The men had eaten breakfast and crawled into their warm beds for a nap. Comfort and shelter were always awaiting the wrecked.

But the pretty, pale wife of the captain saw nothing of the brightness, nor of the anguish; she lay on her cot tossing and moaning with fever and delirium. Peggy fed the baby warm milk and held him in her small arms all night; and they both slept, as only children can.

"Don't fret, sir, the fever will be gone soon; it's only the chill and the wet." But vainly the cheery mother talked to the captain; with the mocking sunlight over the treacherous sea in the morning, delirium increased. A surfman brought the Long Branch doctor, who shook his head and came again that night.

In a low chair, close to the stove, almost behind the woodbox, sat Peggy, flushed and radiant, with Jamie's fat fingers clutching familiarly at her hair and eyes.

The young captain, sick at heart, with his head on the pillow beside his unconscious wife, looked across the room at the picture, and said low, "Mary, Mary, if you could see them now! The little brown mother and our boy—Dear Lord, save her! Oh, save her life for us!"

Two long, watching, anxious weeks. The doctor said, "Take her away from the sound of the sea; go to the mountains a month, then take her home. Leave the baby with Peggy."

Earthly blessedness had come to the little mother! She jumped up and down in ecstacy.

There, by the winter sea, Peggy's story began. No dearer one will ever be told to the captain of "The Pearl," and his beautiful wife Mary, than was told them in the little station on the beach.

"Oh! I've seen you, child, in my sleep and dreams, and in all my pain; I've seen you with my baby in your little arms. Come here!"

Jamie's mother sobbed, and clasped Peggy to her heart. The captain held his boy without a word, and kissed Peggy tremendously, the easy carriage from Long Branch rolled away, amid good-byes and blessings from the sturdy beachmen and the faithful family.

NEW YORK, April 10, 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS:—Make ready to give up the baby, and the baby's little mother. I will be down to-morrow. My wife's father has taken her home to Maine. We will follow them. Don't say no.

Faithfully and gratefully, JOHN SOMERS.

This letter was read aloud by Keeper West to "his folks."

"But, mother! how can I go? and they such fine folks, and I've got only one good dress—and—"

"Peggy, wait and see," replied the patient mother, so used to watching and waiting.

Father gave Peggy and the crowing, laughing baby one good look, "hemmed" a good deal, and went to the beach (he seemed to have a cold).

It would all make a big, beautiful book, to tell how the captain captured Peggy with her baby; how she was fitted to the "loveliest clothes!" in New York; how she stayed at the great house in Portland where Jamie's rich grandfather lived, and his pale mamma lived there, too, while the captain went to see about his schooners.

In June, Peggy sailed home with Captain Somers. They landed close by the little sea home, and the big, strong father in his sea boat met them with open arms.

And that is how Peggy came by her fortune, for Grandfather Saybrook put one thousand dollars in the bank "for the little Mother Peggy, in the name of James Somers."

GIRLS AND THEIR PHOTOGRAPHS.

Learn to say no when asked for your photograph by one not especially dear to you. There is in that little word much that will protect you from evil tongues. Learn to think that your face is too sacred to decorate the apartment of Tom, Dick or Harry, no matter if each one of the three is one of the pleasantest fellows in the world. When the sun imprinted in black and white just how sweet and how dainty you look, it did not mean that the picture should have incense in the shape of tobacco smoke, or dubious praise in the form of a discussion of your points rendered to it. Give away your picture with discretion. Remember that some day will come along Prince Charming, who will have a right, the right owned by the master of the heart, to ask for the counterfeit presentment of yourself after he knows that he is going to have the real girl for his own. Think how mortified you would be if he should discover that the giving away of your photograph has been almost as general as the invitations to your New Year's party. Think how he will feel if he sees your face looking over the mantel-shelf in Dick's room—Dick whom he knows to be a braggart, and a man for whom he has the utmost contempt! Then just learn to say no. Don't display your photographs to your men friends, and you will not have this unpleasant task; but if you should do it, and have not the courage to say the little monosyllable, be wise and refer them to papa.—Exchange

NEVER SORRY.

Not long ago the writer asked a class of small boys in Sunday-school what was their idea of heaven. It was curious to note how their replies were influenced by their own circumstances in this life. A ragged little urchin, who had been born and brought up in a squalid city street, said it was "all grass and green trees." One from the richer quarter of Boston said it was like a big, broad avenue, with tall houses each side. A sweet-voiced Episcopal choir-boy was of the opinion that people would sing a good deal in heaven. The last member of the class, a quiet, thoughtful boy, though one of the smallest in the class, answered, just as the bell was ringing for the close of school hours, "A place where—where—you're never sorry."—Our Sunday Afternoon.

SOMETHING TO DO.

Which of you can straighten out these crooked sentences, re-writing and punctuating them so that they shall say what their author really meant to say?

"A man was killed by a railroad car running into Boston, supposed to be deaf?" A man writes: "We have decided to erect a school-house large enough to accommodate five hundred scholars five stories high." On a certain railway the following direction was printed: "Hereafter, when trains in an opposite direction are approaching each other on separate lines, conductors and engineers will be requested to bring their respective trains to a dead halt before the point of meeting and be careful not to proceed till each train has passed the other." A steamboat captain, advertising an excursion, says: "Tickets, twenty-five cents; children half-price to be had at the office." A hotel was thus advertised: "This hotel will be kept by the widow of the former landlord, Mr. Brown, who died last summer on a new and improved plan." "Wanted, a saddle horse for a lady weighing about nine hundred and fifty pounds."

The Household.

HE WEARIES NOT.

Ofttimes I grow impatient with the day
  Which brings new worries and the weight of fears;
Ofttimes my soul repines; I chiding say,
  "Who shall atone for sadness and for tears?"
Ofttimes my heart grows weary, and in pain
  I see the ones who falter, or who fall;
Ofttimes my tears fall down like winter rain,
  We are tired, doubting, anxious children all;
    He wearies not.

I see the little ones whose forms are clad
  In garments thin through cold and dreary days;
I see a world where brothers, selfish, mad,
  War with each other down life's weary ways;
I hear the voices and the cries of pain;
  I see men tempting other men to fall,
And doubting, wondering, fearing, sick at heart and brain,
  I scarce dare trust the Father—knowing, guiding all,
    He wearies not.

He wearies not. Mine eyes are blurred with tears,
  And in life's misty dimness, I am blind;
He wearies not; but all my doubts and fears
  He yet will answer with a purpose kind.
My hands are tired; He will give me rest.
  My heart is heavy; He will comfort give.
The ones who sorrow shall be joyous, blessed;
  Who sadly die shall glad, eternal live,—
    He wearies not.

LITTLE JANE.

BY EMMA F. SEARLES.

You catch a glimpse of it as you wind down the stony country road, past the cool stretch of woodland, this queer old brown farm-house. If you should chance to come suddenly upon it in the dusk of a summer evening, it would remind you of a great silent bat, with its wide-spread wings. But in the glow of a summer noontide, you would find shelter and most grateful shade within its wide, vine-covered porches and sheltering eaves.

There is the gnarled old orchard, sloping away on the southern hillside, with its dark umber trunks clearly marked by the soft canopy of leaf above and the velvet carpet of green below, dotted here and there by the white clover faces, and the sun-kissed buttercups. How blue is the sky above; how brightly the robins sing; but their song is not sweeter than that of the little willow-shaded brook below, as it glides over its pebbly bed, away and away to the sea.

There is a garden paling at the back, and you can see, in fancy, as you sit in the shadows of the great maple tree at its entrance, the piles upon piles of nut-brown potatoes, the juicy lettuce, the scarlet radishes, and the luscious currants, that have found their life and sweetness in this bit of mother earth in the years that are gone. But it is all uncared-for now, and the strong, rank weeds grow thick over all.

There are spacious barns and outhouses, telling of stores of ripened grain and yellow corn, of health, plenty, and contentment. But the great bins and mows are vacant to-day; the stalls are empty; the huge doors swing on time-worn hinges, and their dreary moan makes you shudder and start, though the clear, summer sunshine flecks the brown floor at your feet.

You seem to hear for a moment, wafted from the silence of this yesterday, the merry, girlish laugh, the manly voice, the song, the story, that made these old walls bright in the dear old times, as the country lads and lasses gathered from their peaceful homes, and husked the yellow corn or pared the rosy-cheeked apples, by the light of the high-hung torch and the pale-faced harvest moon. Where are they all now? And where to-day is the youth and hope and love of this yesterday?

The wide paths are grass-grown, and grass-grown, too, are the narrow beds of box and mignonette that used to lie beside them. The front door stands ajar, but you find it warped and hard to open. The huge black knocker with its serpent's eyes looks coldly at you, and again you start and tremble, as with wanton fingers you let it fall, and send the dreary echoes reverberating through empty hall and garret.

As you enter with hushed breath, you see beneath your feet a gray, worn mat, keeping still its lonely guard before the great front door. A flood of memory rushes o'er you, as your weary feet, worn with life's hard journey, press once more its smooth, brown surface, and you sit down upon the broad, winding stairway, and, burying your face in your hands, you ponder and weep. How the shadows shift and change; how the faces come and go—go, alas, so many, to return no more. The strong face of the father browned by the harvest sun, with hands large-veined by toil; the gentle, calm-faced mother, with smooth, white brow and silvered hair, silvered, alas, so early, for the little fingers clung so closely, and there were so many errands for those busy, loving feet. The jovial face of brother Tom, full of fun and frolic and life; the faces of friends and neighbors that came and went when the great door swung wide on hospitable hinges; and then, ah, then, the face of little Jane. The face of little Jane, how shall it be described? You have seen no other like it, though you have looked and looked in the busy marts of the great city, and in the quiet by-ways of your life. The face of your little playmate, your companion, your special charge in those dear old days so long gone by. You always called her "little Jane," though you scarcely knew why, and after that dark, dark day, when you looked for the last time upon the peaceful face and the lightly-folded hands, you always called her "poor little Jane," though she had only slipped out from the love and sunlight and warmth of the old brown farm-house, into the eternal summer and brightness, where they need not the light of the sun, "For the Lord God giveth them light, and where they reign forever and ever."

The bright bit of a parlor was darkened that sad day, and the soft curtains at the windows were carefully knotted back with ribbons of creamy white. The big family Bible that held the record of your lives, and the short and inexpressibly sweet life of poor little Jane, was lying upon the table. Beside it lay a great cluster of white lilies; white lilies upon the mantel where the little clock ticked, ticked, ticked, with mournful monotony; white lilies on the plain little casket, and one great creamy chalice resting lovingly upon the snowy pillow beside the whiter face of poor little Jane, seemed to say, "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

White and still she lay that day, with the deep violet eyes closely shaded by the soft lids and the long curling lashes. The rings of loose, tawny hair lay damp above the blue-veined temples. There was no touch of suffering left upon the tender lines of the little face; only an unearthly radiance that had brightened every feature, as with soft strains of music the heavenly convoy had borne her swiftly home. Her tiny hands had been outstretched in glad welcome and surprise, and the sweet light lingered until the little face was shut forever from your view. Ah, even that day, the blue eyes of little Jane, closed to your tears, the whiteness of the fragrant lilies, and the fleecy sky that hung over the old brown farm-house, beheld with open gaze "the King in His beauty, and the land that is afar off."

You bore her away from the dainty bit of a parlor with its spotless curtains and white walls, through the wide old hall with its oaken floor, over the brown door mat, which softly hushed the bearers' feet, across the shady portico where the swallows glinted in and out to the tiny nests she had watched them build in the springtime, through the green, smooth lawn where you had played all the long bright summer, and you laid her away in the shadow of the great orchard, where the birds sang and the bees hummed, and the smell of the clover was heavy and sweet.

There she rests to-day, though again and again the little mound has been covered with the white mantle of winter, or the emerald mantle of summer, and though the small white stone at the head, bearing only the simple inscription, "Little Jane," has grown mouldy and dim from the storms of the years. The storms of the years that have swept away every inmate of the old brown farm-house and left it silent and alone, but guarded maybe by the sweet spirit of little Jane, which in the dusk of the summer twilight hovers about its dear familiar rooms, or in the heat of life's hard battle may guard with tender care, the little boy who wept so bitterly that day she went away—who knows?

In a letter to the son-in-law of Dr. Livingstone, Henry M. Stanley bears testimony to the effect of the gospel on converts in the heart of Africa, at once a testimony to the success of missionary operations in the Dark Continent, and the genuineness of the faith of the native converts:

"I take this powerful body of native Christians in the heart of Africa—who prefer exile for the sake of their faith to serving a monarch indifferent or hostile to their faith—as more substantial evidence of the work than any number of imposing structures clustered together and called a mission station would be. These native Africans have endured the most deadly persecutions—the stake and the fire, the cord and the club, the sharp knife and the rifle bullet, have been tried, to cause them to reject the teachings they have absorbed. Staunch in their beliefs, firm in their convictions, they have held together stoutly and resolutely."

The attempt
Is all the wedge that splits its knotty way
Betwixt the possible and the impossible.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING NOVEMBER 9, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 23: 1-12; Isaiah 37-42.)

Sunday, 9; Luke 23: 1-12. Verse 2, In many cases besides this one of our Lord, the most terrible forms of injustice have been practiced under the forms of law. Verse 5, The history of Christ shows us that there is no course of life so righteous and innocent that it cannot be accused and persecuted. Verse 9, Sometimes it is best to give no answer to our adversaries. Herod looked upon Jesus as a mighty magician, and hoped to be amused and entertained. There are many now who seem to regard the church and religious services, as a social club, and an entertainment. The earnestness of Christians should put to shame such people, as the earnestness of Christ must have shamed the shallow Herod.

Monday, 10; Isaiah 37. Verse 1, In times of trouble, God's people will always find help by going to the house of the Lord. It is a strange and worldly way, to absent one's self from the church services in times of trial and bereavement. Verse 15, When we are in the midst of trouble, we should never forget to lay the matter fully before the Lord; His gracious help may then deliver us, as Hezekiah was delivered.

Tuesday, 11; Isa. 38. Verse 1, Our lives are so uncertain, that we ought always to keep our affairs in shape so that if we die suddenly, our benevolent plans may be carried out, and our business may give as little trouble to our friends as possible. Verse 3, One should aim to live such a life of truth and uprightness in the sight of God, that it may be a source of comfort to him when he is upon his deathbed.

Wednesday, 12; Isa. 39. Verse 2, God is opposed to vain ostentation and alliances with the world. We may be foolishly flattered by the attentions which the world gives to us; and we should know that its smiles are more to be dreaded than its frowns. Verse 8, True repentance humbly acquiesces in all of God's ways.

Thursday, 13; Isa. 40. Verse 2, It was a sore chastisement to Israel to be carried away from their native land to Babylon; but God would still be their God, and that would guarantee their restoration. Verse 4, This chapter is full of consolation to those who are faint-hearted because of the slowness in the progress of the gospel kingdom. It is made up of promises of consolation, protection and change for the better.

Friday, 14; Isa. 41. Verse 10, However dark the prospect of the world may seem, God never wants His people to give way to fear. The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, and in the end the truth and the right will prevail. Verse 17, However feeble God's people may seem in themselves, the Lord will protect them, and will raise up the necessary instruments for their deliverance and triumph.

Saturday, 15; Isa. 42. Verse 1, The reference is to Christ, whose coming was to be characterized by meekness and gentleness, but who was the elect Redeemer appointed by God, to give help and life to this sin-cursed world. Verse 10, Pray that God may help us all to live and work, so that we may have a part in that glorious song-service, which shall celebrate the victory of our Lord over the whole earth, and the complete overthrow of sin and Satan.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Home Recreations and Education for the Young. Prov. 2: 10, 11.)

1. The best recreation and the best education is afforded by having for the children a bright, happy home. Every one who has a home, however poor, can make it this kind of a home.

2. It is not a help to the children to have everything done for them. Every little and big hand should be engaged to contribute something toward the brightness and cheer of the home; then all will enjoy it, will not have to go somewhere else to hunt pleasure, and will be benefited by it.

3. Teach the children in the home life that it means nothing less than their ruin to want to be everlastingly amused. Even a little boy or girl will amount to nothing until that foolish and wrong notion is put out of the mind.

4. In looking for amusements for the home, no place should be given to those that tend to enfeeble the body, weaken the mind, or corrupt the heart. Home recreations and education will fail of their true end if noble, Christian, useful characters are not the result, such as the text describes.

THE SCIENCE OF MOTHERHOOD.

"Mothers are born, not made," you say, and therefore to talk of a science of motherhood is absurd. But what is a science? Webster says it is "Knowledge duly arranged and referred to general facts and principles upon which it is founded." If there is no science of motherhood in this sense, it is high time that there was. Nothing promises more for the improvement of the next generation through better methods of training children, than the fact that all over the land, the science of motherhood is being studied as never before. Mothers' meetings, in connection with local unions, are doing much in this direction, while the kindergarten and the kindergarten idea brought into the home are blessing thousands of young lives, and making thousands of women more worthy of the crown of motherhood.

In Chicago this work is being carried on in a unique manner and a large scale, under the supervision of Miss Elizabeth Harrison. As a kindergartner she is well known in this country and in Europe; out of her kindergarten work has grown, so to speak, her mother-garten. For some years she has conducted mothers' classes; this year her work is thoroughly systematized and so arranged as to reach out to a large number. The headquarters of this work are at the Art Institute, where the Woman's Club has its rooms. Here she conducts the central class of mothers, for whom she has a carefully prepared course of instruction running through three years, forty lessons a year.

These lessons include the philosophy of child development, occupying the first hour, and practical lessons in stories and how to tell them, singing lessons, as much of the kindergarten gifts and occupations as mothers can use with children, experiences, which all who have conducted mothers' meetings know to be among their most valuable features, and other things of vital importance for mothers to know.

Branch classes are conducted in various parts of the city. Miss Harrison has the supervision of these; lays out their course of study, gives the opening lecture, and supplies them with teachers trained by herself. Thus, the work reaches many more than she could personally instruct. Women of all ranks eagerly avail themselves of these classes; here, side by side sit the wives of millionaires, and women who must sacrifice something to pay the annual tuition of ten dollars, yet who feel that it is worth a sacrifice to be better fitted to rightly train the souls God has entrusted to their keeping.

At the opening of her classes a few weeks ago, Miss Harrison delivered a lecture which embodies so much that will do mothers everywhere good, we make large extracts from it for the benefit of out of town readers:

"There are physical mothers and there are spiritual mothers, and there are those who combine the two. It is a mistaken, a very wrong idea which hinders the work very much, that the fact that a woman has given birth to a child makes her a mother in the highest sense of the word. If any of you would go with me just two or three blocks over here on South Clark street I can show you women who have given birth to five, six, sometimes eight children without apparently a vestige or spark of real motherhood in them. If you will listen to the workers in the dark districts of our city, they will have told you such tales of brutality of some mother, such as one's kicking a three-year-old child, with a curse, across the room, while straightening out the dead body of its baby sister; of another mother letting her child, who scalded his arm until the flesh had dropped off, go twenty-four hours before the arm was cared for, and then bringing it to the free dispensary to be treated because she could not sleep, the child cried so. Such things are common things among that class of mothers. Yet they are physical mothers; they have given birth to children. It is the higher element of motherhood about which I wish to talk with you.

"If, again, you would go with me some morning, or with our missionary workers, and visit some of our charity kindergartens and see those young girls' faces light up with joy as they seize a dirty little hand, and see the loving tenderness with which these little street arabs are taken by them, and washed and dressed and sometimes kissed, and see the quiet firmness with which those little, weak, marred wills, born of an inheritance of crime, are patiently dealt with, you would realize that spiritual motherhood can sometimes be developed even without physical motherhood. It is that element, spiritual motherhood, of which I would speak to you to-day. It is that element to which Froebel appealed, and, thank God, it is common to all, spiritual motherhood. Of course the ideal state of affairs is where the physical mother is the spiritual mother also. . . . .

"Your child has a body; that body can be developed into more beautiful and symmetrical proportions, and by means of its development can aid the intellectual life and increase the spiritual growth, or the reverse. The body is trained, so far as all training after birth can come, by means of exercising the muscles and the senses. Froebel gives the mother many hints as to how to do this; of course he cannot pretend to lay down for you or me, or anybody else, every detail, or tell any mother exactly what she must do with her child. Your own mother instinct, your own native good sense, your own ingenuity must aid you, but he can give you the general rules which govern all growth.

"The muscles of the child may be trained in two ways. They may be trained so that the child becomes very conscious of its body, and the body, simply alone, is developed; I mean made strong, the mind and intellect being secondary to it. The true training of the child's muscles should be an unconscious training by means of play in order that while the body is being trained, those muscles are being made the willing servants of the spirit, and are aiding the child in its intellectual life. Consequently a mother's first duty is to learn how to play aright with her child. That sounds absurd. 'What, systematize my play? Teach me how to play with my child? I love to do that any way.' Yet there is a best way. Be careful how you play with the child. Each time you fondle and handle him, each time you dance him up and down, each time the little tossing, kicking limbs are stretched by your hands, they are trained and exercised. There is nothing in the world more painful to a true lover of children, to one with insight, than the child conscious of its own body. That is abnormal and wrong. . . . .

"Again, another important thing to be considered in the training of the child in play is that it develops the social, moral and spiritual side of its nature. I want you to see that you cannot develop the child's body without touching its soul and its intellect.

"Many a mother has the feeling that if she washes, dresses and feeds the child, teaches him the catechism and sends him to school her duty is done; but far from it. The mother, whether she knows it or not, is a teacher, the greatest, strongest and most lasting teacher that her child has. The mother has not only the physical care of the child in her hands, but she has the source, the fountain head of his intellectual life, because true psychology teaches that all true doing is the result of willing, that all true willing is the result of thinking, that all true thinking is the result of feeling.

"The Bible says, and, by the way, it is the best book on pedagogy that I can recommend to you, 'As a man thinketh in his heart so is he,' and so does he, and so do we all, according to our thoughts. Feeling may be compared to mist or smoke, dim and almost impossible to define. The mother in the home life, far more than she realizes, has it in her power to create the right feelings in her child. It seems to me that if I could impress this one point upon you I should be satisfied. Teach your child to love the right things, to abhor the wrong things, in the simple, childish, playful way, not by your maxims and dogmas, but through the feelings; then all will be accomplished. The rest will follow just as the seed, planted in the ground, will grow, and the plant will fructify. If you want the right kind of fruit you must plant the right kind of seed.

"Thought is father to the will. 'As a man thinketh so is he,' and as he is so does he. Remember the source of that statement. Compulsion is the attempt to get a deed done without the desire which should go before the action of the will. Voluntary obedience is a deed which is performed after the right stages of growth have been gone through. First, the individual desires it; second, he thinks about it; third, he wills to do it, and fourth, he voluntarily does it. Compulsion is just the opposite. It is an attempt to force the fruit without planting the seed. This makes the difference between voluntary and forced obedience. Now, please do not misunderstand me. I would have a child obedient, obedient by forced obedience if absolutely necessary. It is the surgeon's knife, only to be used on the rarest occasions. A child rightly treated and rightly handled, will not need forced obedience in the large majority of cases. But the poor little creature who is brought up without obedience is indeed an unfortunate child. Therefore, do not misunderstand me, and wait until you get voluntary obedience, but plant your seeds, make your child want to do the thing by your own conduct and by his environment.

"Perhaps the least understood, and the most important part of the work is the child's spiritual nature; the child's relationship to God. It is not enough, I say it with all reverence; I say it with all love for our churches and our Sunday-schools and all the grand Christian workers and their self-sacrifice, their years of labor—it is not enough to have your child sent to Sunday-school. It is not enough to teach a certain amount of Bible texts, such as the International Lessons very wisely have laid out. Nor, on the other hand, is it enough to give your child certain ethical laws and rules, certain codes and duties which he must follow. Those are husks. True religion, the religion that Froebel would have the child taught, the religion for which every soul is hungering, is a consciousness of a oneness with God, that feeling of a nearness to God at every moment of the child's life, that feeling of a constant communion and companionship with the Divine Being. As an illustration, I remember that I was at a friend's house in the country one summer. A little fellow three years old, and I, were gathering currants from the bushes. I said: 'How good these currants are?' He said: 'Yes, I tell you I love currants; thank you, God, for giving us these currants.'

"What I mean by true religion must be taught in more ways than one. Froebel has laid it out and defined it in the four-fold way. First, he shows how the mother should guide her child into a sense of the divine, of God, through nature; the very wind as it whistles past is a strange, mysterious, invisible thing. The child says: 'Mamma, what makes the leaves grow? Mamma, what makes the smoke go up?' Froebel tells you, 'Now is the time for you to begin to teach your child the great invisible through these great forces of nature as revealer of God.' Therefore I would say to you, if possible take your child at some time during the year into the country. In this respect town-prisoned children are debarred from their natural rights to know and love Dame Nature. If necessary, economize in every way that you can to take your children to the country, that they may see the flowers spring up, hear the birds sing, may breathe the fresh air, rejoice in the glad sunshine, grow quiet under the light of the stars, and look through nature up to nature's God. Again, if it is impossible, if reasons beyond your will and control debar you from this, you can take your children to the parks. You should have some stated time for such excursions, just as much as you have for taking them to church. Let them see the glories of nature.

"In the third place, we do not make half use enough of our back yards. I have come fresh from Germany, where even the little square court, not twenty feet wide, oftentimes is made to blossom like the rose. It is an evidence of German love of plant life and German love of child life. The average back yard of our city is a sad commentary upon the average misunderstanding of a child's needs. No matter how small your little yard, it can be made a spot where your child will feel the growth of nature; will feel that there is something beyond his ken which is causing the grass and plants to grow.

"Another means by which Froebel would have the child brought near to God, and that is the meaning of the development of the spiritual life, is by means of the church. Please remember that the church should be to the child the house of God, the house of his father, the place where he is to learn to love and to reverence, not where he is to hear creeds and dogmas, religious arguments and wrangles about my church and your church. These should be kept banished from the child as you would banish poison. If your husband will argue with your clergyman about foreordination and baptism tell your husband to stop, and if you can't make him stop send the child to the nursery; do not let him hear the discussion. Remember that he must be so trained that he will be able to answer, 'Why I am a Christian,' before he can tell, 'Why I am a Methodist, a Presbyterian or an Episcopalian.' That is the kind of training Froebel wants the church to bring to the child. The ringing of the church bell should represent to him the voice of the church saying, 'Come to church, dear people; come to church, dear people.'

"A third means for developing religion, this is a point so much neglected in our city life, the inner intuition of the child, the life of the soul in the human being which seeks something greater than itself, something outside and all around and about itself; the sublime, eternal, whatever you may call it, the father I would call it to the child. That faint spark or germ of the divine within the child reaches out hungrily for the divine without the child. If it be among the possibilities every growing boy and growing girl should have some place where he or she can be alone at times; alone with his own soul. If it cannot be so appointed that he can have a room to himself there should be a time at least when the child could be alone. There should be opportunities for the child to view the sublime; the sublime in mountains, if possible, if not, our lake in a storm, the glorious sunset, view them in silence. You mothers meddle with your children's spiritual life too much. This silent drinking in of the sublime is one of the greatest aids in helping the child to realize that there is a God.

"Again, this spiritual life can be developed by means of deeds, by the child's own doing. A child should be so trained that every characteristic of deity has become somewhat of a reality to him through his own deeds before he is talked to very much about it being the attribute of God. The Bible says, 'Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God.' They are so pure themselves that they can comprehend God.

"Let me illustrate. We always in the kindergarten take Christmas time for growing the true Christmas spirit; for developing the spirit of loving and giving, rather than that of the usual idea of what ought to be done for children at Christmas time; which latter process, makes them selfish and greedy. All the children in our kindergartens are trained to do something at Christmas time for somebody else; to make toys to give to others, and this in turn causes them to be radiantly happy. For two weeks one holiday time we had been at work busily trimming the large Christmas tree for the Third Avenue Industrial School connected with one of the missionary training schools. At last I told my little workers before the close of school, 'Children, what do you think? I am going to let you do something else. I am going to let each one of you bring a toy here, one of your nicest, the one you like best, and let you give it to one of those other dear little children for Christmas. Will not that be fine?' Every little heart responded with joy. The next morning the toys were brought; the nicest toys, no broken ones, but the firstlings of the flock, and brought in with all the holy joy of self-sacrifice, One little bright three-year-old child brought her knitted doll. She was an affectionate child. She held it up and kissed it and said, 'Good-bye, Jack, good-bye, Jack,' with such emphasis that I weakened, like a coward, and said, 'Constance, darling, you need not give Jack away if you love him so much.' Instantly the blue eyes looked up at me in amazement, and she replied, 'Why, I have my mamma and my papa and my other dolly at home! Good-bye, Jack; you must make that other little girl love you.' With that she deliberately walked up to the Christmas tree and hung it upon a low branch. As she came back to her chair her face shone with a light as if she, like Stephen of old, had looked up into heaven, and had seen the glory of God. After we had finished our work and sung and danced around our tree and had thrown kisses at it, and talked about how happy the little children would be on Christmas morning, I said, 'Now you may sit down here in a circle on the floor, and I will tell you the true Christmas story.' So down we sat, happy all of us in this Christmas spirit, and I began and told them the old, old story, how in a far-off land the shepherds watched their flocks by night, how the strange and mysterious light came, the singing of the angels, and the announcement of the birth of the Christ child. They listened with almost breathless attention. Finally, when I had finished the story, I said, 'Would you like to know why our Heavenly Father sent his only Son to the world?' There was not a word spoken. I continued, 'The Bible teaches us that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son.' One little five-year-old child exclaimed, 'Why, he was just like us!' That is what I mean by finding God through deeds; finding God through their own lives and conduct. An unselfish soul will understand unselfish love. Thus in this four-fold way we would have you train the child into a constant companionship and communion with the Divine, so that his whole life becomes spiritual, so that all his tendencies, all his purposes, all his motives, all his views of life are spiritual."

THE OHIO STATE CONVENTION.

Since coming to this office I have seldom been privileged to attend a state convention, and so look into the faces of the good women for whom, all the year we work. Feeling the need of the inspiration such a meeting affords, I accepted the invitation of the president, Mrs. Monroe, to participate in the Ohio convention held last week at Chillicothe. The regular reporter will set in order, for our readers, the work of that convention; it is in my heart to give something of the impressions it made upon me.

The very air was instinct with Crusade memories; there were its mothers. Mother Thompson, with her spiritual face, and Mother Stewart, whose eye is not dimmed, nor her natural force abated, though the snow lies thick and white upon her venerated head; among the delegates was a larger number of "good gray heads" than we often see at a convention, around each of which clusters blessed memories. Mrs. Monroe, the president, herself a Crusade leader, presided with the quiet efficiency of one whose mind is stayed on God, even in the midst of what to others would be distracting cares.

The devotional services, in charge of Mrs. Annie Palmer, National Evangelist, Mrs. Romick, sister of our Esther Pritchard, and Mrs. Trego, state evangelists, brought and kept a delightful spirit in the convention. Nearly three hundred delegates were in attendance, representing a paid up membership of ten thousand, an increase of a thousand during the year. Reports of superintendents showed encouraging advance along many lines of work, especially the evangelistic, the juvenile, social purity and temperance instruction. The young women are rallying as never before under the Y banner, six hundred new recruits having come into this branch of the army during the past year. The convention recognized their presence and efficiency by electing their state superintendent, Jessica Morgan, recording secretary. The platform was graced by an easel bearing a portrait of Mrs. Frances Barnes, and when the lady herself appeared, as she did Thursday afternoon, she received a very warm welcome. The Y's had conferences each day, and closed the convention with a grand mass-meeting in the rink, Mrs. Barnes being the speaker.

The meetings were held in the largest church in the city which was so crowded that it was seen to be necessary to secure a larger audience room when Miss Willard was to speak; the skating rink was engaged and seated for the occasion, with fifteen hundred sittings. Every one was taken and every inch of standing room occupied by the "standing committee," as Miss Willard called them, when complimenting them, in her happy way, on their patience under difficulties. She evidently felt the inspiration of such an audience, and fairly outdid herself, capturing not only her audience, but that entire conservative town. Her presence, and that of Anna Gordon, were very helpful throughout the convention. Ohio congratulated herself upon the presence of so many National officers at her convention, while they were equally happy to meet the grand women of the Crusade state.

A pretty episode broke up the routine of business Friday morning. It having been noised abroad that Mrs. Clevenger, the well beloved state secretary, had brought her baby girl to Chillicothe, she was requested to bring it to the convention, that all might see the little maiden. Mrs. Monroe took the little one in her motherly arms and said: "One year ago our dear secretary came to us under the shadow of a great affliction; for God had taken back to heaven her little boy, her only child. To-day she comes in joy because of this new treasure lent her. This little one, as you see, is healthy and well-behaved as W. C. T. U. babies should be, has staid at home behaving herself while her mother has been working here, and now comes to receive her name and her badge from our National President." Miss Willard stepped forward and tying the white ribbon around the little arm, pronounced the name which had been chosen by the mother in loving recognition of her associate—"Henrietta Monroe," and most beautifully expressed the wish that the child might grow to emulate all the gifts and graces of her whose name she bears, that this little arm may grow strong for service for God, and home, and native land, and that when she attains her majority, this hand may drop the ballot for the right.

Mrs. Clevenger responded most feelingly for baby and herself; confessing that one of her first thoughts after baby came was of thankfulness that Wyoming had come into the union a free state, expressing the desire that she might grow into the possession of the grand qualities of those who now surrounded her; above all, that she might from her very babyhood be consecrated to the service of Him who took little children in His arms and blessed them. Tears stood in many eyes, and from all hearts arose prayers for blessings on the child.

Mrs. Monroe and Mrs. Clevenger were reëlected president and secretary with practical unanimity. Mrs. Hussey, for so many years the faithful treasurer, has removed to Richmond, Ind., and Miss Emma Goodwill, of Canton, succeeds her.

The convention presented many interesting features, and many grand words were spoken; its culmination was reached, it seemed to me, at its central hour Thursday noon, when kneeling on that platform, Miss Willard voiced our devotions in a prayer so comprehensive, so full of loving faith, that it seemed to bear us to the very gate of heaven.

The Watch-Tower.

Of the graduates of Vassar College three hundred and five are now engaged in teaching, and many of them have attained high rank in this profession. Thirty-nine of the Alumnæ are classed as literary workers, of whom Mrs. Lizzie Williams Champney is probably best known. Twenty-two physicians come next in order, of whom eleven have married since receiving their degree. Mrs. Christine Ladd Franklin has won a fellowship in Johns Hopkins University, and the degree of LL.D. by her scientific papers, yet no one would suspect it from her quiet, retiring manners. Miss L. Martin, class of '80, is Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Mrs. Ellen Swallow Richards, one of the three chemists, is instructor in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and has been the recipient of many scientific honors, both at home and abroad. Miss S. L. Day is water analyst for the Massachusetts State Board of Health. Five of Vassar's graduates record themselves as farmers or raisers of stock; two are making dictionaries; two are missionaries in Japan.

Miss S. A. Scull, of Philadelphia, for thirty years a teacher in schools of higher instruction, and more recently connected with the faculty of Ogontz, has long made the study of Greek mythology and art her specialty. She spent a long time in Greece, and as the result of infinite pains has prepared and classified a collection of views showing the noted development of the religious art of Greece. Being unable to obtain in the market views suited to her purpose, embodying artistic selection and technical excellence, Miss Scull mastered the details of the photographic science, in order to enable her to bring the work up to her own high ideal. Professor Mahaffey, of Dublin, a distinguished specialist, said that her views from Mycenæ and Tiryns are the only correct ones he had ever seen, while her photographs of Hellenic architecture are admirable. These views were on exhibition at the recent National Educational Association in St. Paul, and won high praise from specialists. Miss Scull has resigned her position at Ogontz, and will devote her time to giving illustrated lectures on these subjects.

This message comes from Miss Mary Morris, to whom on her departure for Japan, Miss Willard gave a letter of introduction to the workers there: "I visited most of the principal cities of Japan and found a well-organized W. C. T. U. in all of them composed of what seemed to me the most earnest Christians. As soon as the ladies knew of my arrival in the different cities they called upon me and at once made arrangements for a meeting. Most of these meetings were attended by gentlemen as well as ladies. There was no difficulty in having large and interesting gatherings, one at Osaka numbering three or four hundred. In Tokio the temperance ladies entertained me very handsomely by giving me a dinner at one of the Japanese hotels; it was served in foreign style, and twenty of us sat down at the table. I was very much struck with the deep sense of responsibility these ladies feel, not only in temperance, but in reform generally. I cannot but be thankful that we, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of America, have extended a loving hand to the Japanese women by sending our representatives, Mrs. Leavitt and Miss Ackerman, who by the blessing of God, have done such good, effective work there."

The London Christian gives the portrait and a very interesting sketch of Mrs. Ahok, the wife of a mandarin of Foo Chow, who has lately visited England to plead for missionaries to tell her people the way of salvation. She came at her own expense, and most pathetic was her reiteration of the only English words she knew, "Come over and help us, and come quick." She spoke to large audiences throughout England, a returned missionary interpreting for her. It is only eight years since her own and her husband's conversion, but it was thorough work with them. Mr. Ahok sent his wife on this mission, when she felt called to go, saying, "Surely Christian women will come when they know how great is our need." She returned home via Canada. Arriving at Montreal she was informed through her servant that they could not land without paying the tax of $50 apiece imposed on all Chinese. She could not understand it. She has always used her influence for the perfect freedom of the English in her own country, and could not believe that a Christian nation would lay such an obstacle in the way of one working as she was for her people. The delay thus occasioned was all the more to be regretted as Mrs. Ahok was hurrying home because of her husband's illness, and when she arrived, he was dead. He it is who has given so liberally to Christian work in Foo Chow, and in charity to his own people.

A LIFE LESSON.

I have read a legend, I know not where—
The tale alone can I now recount—
That away in the East, so famed and fair,
In ages past was a marvelous fount.

Where'er a drop from this fountain fell,
No matter how arid or hard the land,
That drop would into a streamlet swell,
With emerald banks on either hand.

And so the desert, long, brown and bare,
Where this wondrous water was scattered round,
Was soon transformed to a landscape rare,
And the sterile sands into fertile ground.

'Tis naught but a legend, strange and old,
Yet if on the mythic tale you dwell,
A lesson of value will it unfold,
A priceless message of truth will tell.

We can make like this fountain our daily life,
And the words we utter, the deeds we do,
Shall be springs of good with the power rife
To turn worthless lives into grand and true.

Thus round us ever, in blessing thrown,
Our influence gracious shall God-like make
The lives that only before have known
The way which the weak and wandering take.

"MY OUTDOOR STUDY."

BY MARGARET SPENCER.

Wonderful and fascinating was an article, written long ago by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, upon this subject. I wish our girls would read it. I can never forget the joy it gave me, away back in the "war times." Perhaps your gardens, like mine, have fainted and suffered from this long summer's drought. Our best and dearest blossoms have died, but the more sturdy and enduring have gathered strength for early frosts, and will die in glorious colors. Our beds are banked with gold and scarlet. The tall asters, the salvias, the most glorious chrysanthemums, are in their "prime." The wide plumes of crimson coxcomb, and the silvery pampas grass divide the summer annuals from the winter ivies, and nasturtiums fill the low bed with radiance.

The only real life for our girls is out of doors; I mean all they can possibly get. To some, summer has brought rest, vigor and health, by an outing in salt waves, or by the purple mountains; to others, work, poverty, and ill health, but in some measure our great Master offers to all sunshine and blue sky. Henry Ward Beecher used to say: "Money buys books and houses and food and raiment, but 'out of doors' is like salvation, 'without money, and without price.'"

"Oh, I am so tired!" sighs Mary in office, store, or sewing room, nursery or hot kitchen. All day, work, work, work, till the sun goes down behind the city spires. They go on crowded cars, and the busy school-girl spends the best hours of each day in the school room. This is necessary, but there is a midday blessedness of sky, of sun and cloud, a peep at the trees, if one looks for it, a little walk in the sweet air, and a good drink for the thirsty ones. We exhaust all our mental power; use, till threadbare, the nervous force of brain and hand, but one little hour or less of outdoor food will build us up quicker than bottles of tonic!

I know a large room in Washington full of girls from sixteen to twenty years old, perhaps older. They "feed" oily plates for printers, and sew books and cut and fold, from eight to five! Their long row of windows looking toward the east and south keeps them alive! I see them at the short noontime, water and tend the window boxes of scarlet geraniums, and white alyssums, and with bits of twine train the little vines to creep upward! Very little things? but these girls are stronger, better, purer in character for the peep of blue sky, and the still, grateful voice of the cheery friend in the window! Across the city street into a court, or just a wall between them and the clouds, but God's face is always in the sky!

Grammars and histories are important, but not half so necessary to a perfect soul and body as an intimate knowledge of nature. We begin with our babies in their pretty carriages—standing deep in the grass under the shady trees; and let them sleep to the sweet lullabies of the rustling leaves. They begin life out of doors! and "Starry Eyes" in the nursery, "sweetest saint in all the calendar," kicks and cries until the door opens, and she goes outside nursery walls! Our girls may have to do without costly sashes and dainty boots, "yellow dog carts," and "lovely hats!" but an outdoor study is a child's inheritance!

Mrs. Hayes, while in the White House, asked the gardener to make her small bouquets every morning, and send to the family reception room (the red room). She arranged them herself on a large table, and gave them to callers as they said good-bye. A member of her household told me that she said one day: "You see, dear —— I have a great many working girls and women come to see me, who have no flowers; and live in close rooms. I love to walk with them through the conservatory, across the flower garden, and give them a little fragrant bunch of pinks or roses; It makes them grow. I grow myself in doing it!"

We have a little man of nine, who leads his college-bred father many a brisk walk through shut-away places in wood and field, to tell him the name of trees which his older eyes have never seen!

"What makes Susie so pale?" "Oh, she hates to walk, and climb, and run. She always reads." Poor child! "Booky folks" are very nice, and smart, and all that, but give me the fresh-air child, who springs to the first crack in the door, summer or winter, to chase butterflies, or throw snowballs at the unsuspecting father—may be!

The baby cried; the bread burned. Mother was worn out; Mary's head throbbed with the household friction. She did all she could, then slipped into the small yard or garden, or down the street a minute. The "outdoor study" was open! "Its roof and floor was ever-changing blue and verdure,"—perhaps only a tree, or a spray of vine tangled over her neighbor's fence. The picture was artistic and restful, the air fresh, and the sunshine glorious! When our hearts are heavy with longings for some unattainable thing, duties drag like a run-down clock. Oh, let us fly to our outdoor study, reach up to the topmost shelf for the dear books, "done in blue and gold," pray a little prayer, quietly, by ourselves, to the blessed Father of our outdoor household, whose splendid library is never closed, whose sweetest stories and most perfect pictures are our own!

Oliver Wendell Holmes measured every tree on his place with a tape line, and knew each one personally. Walter Scott wrote his best books out of doors, under the trees, and his neighbors used to ridicule the man "who wrote whole days under an umbrella." We grow rich, for our possessions can never be valued. Fresh every hour, new with every sunrise and sunset.

Dear girls, make your "study" everywhere; make it airy and spacious; claim the best and biggest, and sunniest spot near you! If you would have beauty, and grace, and spirits, and love, you must go up and down among the flowers, however few, or common, or poor. It inspires you with new life, and glorifies most common things. In this study you are never disappointed, but always surprised. Suddenly, out of a weedy corner, peeps up a golden-faced pansy, blown by some summer wind, and last November's blasts hid away this year's harvest of bloom! Not all the finery of riches can make you gladder. How confidential you grow with the "first families;" they bow and smile, and invite you to come again, and you go again and again, and dream of the roses and pinks and fragrance, of the waving plumes, the sheeny gowns, dotted with blossoms which no human hand could paint or weave.

The boundless freedom of this out of doors! Unrest flies away; and you wonder how you lived through the confinement of the working hours! It is greater freedom than one comprehends. The friction of small duties, the caprices of uncertain tempered households, step off like a soiled garment. The kind whisperings of these companions are so restful, dignified, and silent, and respectful. Mother Nature comes to us from God. She widens all our theories, and narrow, hateful, selfish views. A little pink and white blossom grows down in the cabbage patch, a thousand morning-glories spring up and climb over the oldest, most tumble-down barn or fence. The yellow of the soft-petaled flower, or the pale blue of the forget-me-not of the woods teach us lessons of dearest, fullest love "toward all." In this study we learn priceless lessons. Money cannot buy them, nor brains alone teach them. We may go the world over in search of knowledge and wisdom and power, and come back to some lowly home to be taught God's great lessons beside this "homestead door of bird, or bee, or flower." "A new heaven above and a new earth beneath."

TRUST God to shape your life for you, and do not rashly thwart the wise Power, who knows our wants and gives us the help we need, if we will only accept it, who makes it possible for a human soul to bring gain out of seeming loss, and strength from sacrifice when we learn that this life is but a page of the Divine Book, and remember that immortality waits for us when this lesson is rightly comprehended.—Louisa M. Alcott.

THE very first step toward action is the death-warrant of doubt.—George Macdonald.

News from the Field.

WYOMING.

STATE CONVENTION.

Wyoming held its eighth annual convention at Cheyenne, October 2d and 3d: officers present being corresponding secretary and treasurer, and delegates from four unions. We had a very enjoyable and profitable time, and found from reports that, though our unions are few, much good work has been done during the year, most noticeably in jails and prisons, social purity and franchise.

Only one Loyal Temperance Legion was reported, and that is in a ranching country with headquarters at a small town consisting of little beside a postoffice. Their leader comes seven miles to meet with them. Yet it is an active little band, and has held four medal contests this year. They challenge the other juveniles in the state to a contest for a gold medal at the next state convention.

In the absence of Mrs. Fisher, president, removed to Denver, Mrs. Jones, corresponding secretary, presided. There was a cordial address of welcome delivered by Mrs. Cory, of the local union, which was ably responded to by Mrs. Boyd, of Laramie, state treasurer.

A very excellent address on "Physical Culture" was given by Miss Crouch, one of the teachers in the city schools. Her perfect pronunciation, clear, sweet, cultivated voice, and graceful gestures, all showed that she practiced her theory.

Miss Northup, of Cheyenne, presented the cause of the "White Shield Cottage" which the Cheyenne union has established as a home for friendless women.

Friday morning session was devoted to business, including reports from department superintendents, and reports of corresponding secretary and treasurer. An interesting paper on "The Instruction of Children," by Miss Emma Page, of Manville, superintendent of juvenile work, was read. Master Earl Jones, of Green River, was made an honorary member, and as he had always been a teetotaler, he "qualified."

At the afternoon session a memorial service for Mrs. Sonnesberg, of Sheridan, was conducted by Miss Northup. Cheyenne union was granted the custody of the state flag, having made the greatest increase in membership during the year. Officers elected for ensuing year were as follows: President, Miss L. A. Northup, Cheyenne; corresponding secretary, Mrs. F. A. Jones, Green River; recording secretary, Miss Lou Ege, Rawlins; treasurer, Mrs. E. S. Boyd, Laramie; vice-presidents, Mrs. Belle Spure, Sheridan, and Miss Nettie Gregory, Manville.

The first part of the evening session was devoted to business and the presentation of resolutions. Mrs. Therese Jenkins addressed the convention on "Temperance, Physiology and Franchise." The subjects were eloquently and gracefully handled. Her clear, strong voice, her earnestness and her evident belief in the cause, carried her listeners with her resistlessly. And then "they say" women should have no rights! Mrs. Jenkins is our superintendent of franchise and understands her department thoroughly, besides being a loving mother, and conscientious homekeeper.

Rev. L. D. Lambkin, of Greeley, followed Mrs. Jenkins in an eloquent and powerful address on temperance. It has rarely been our privilege to hear so grand a speech, and we doubt if there is a minister in the state who would so fearlessly attack the "Whisky Ring," or the "Two Old Parties."

INDIANA.

STATE CONVENTION.

The Indiana W. C. T. U. held their seventeenth annual convention in the First Baptist Church in Terre Haute, October 12 to 14.

The secretary's report shows 284 local unions and a membership of 5,079. The treasurer reported total receipts for the year to be $3,639.27.

Mrs. Nichol's annual address was strong and helpful, but it contained the sad news that she could no longer serve us as our state president. After all Mrs. Nichols has been to us this was hard to accept, but, as on more than one occasion before, the Indiana W. C. T. U. gave up their best for higher duties. Mrs. Nichols, with her usual munificence, gave fifty dollars to meet the last payment on our State Fair Cottage, and the convention as a small token of their appreciation, presented her with a beautiful silver water set. Two hundred delegates, the general officers, twenty county presidents and eighteen superintendents of departments made up the convention—one of the largest and most satisfactory ever held.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. Mary E. Haggart, of Indianapolis; vice-president, Mrs. Lena M. Beck, of Bloomington; corresponding secretary, Miss L. E. Reed, of Indianapolis; recording secretary, Mrs. A. V. Hastings, of Richmond; treasurer, Miss M. G. Hay, of Indianapolis.

The Organizer Publishing Company held their annual meeting of stockholders in the Congregational Church on Saturday morning. Their term of incorporation was lengthened from seven to nineteen years. The capital stock was raised from $5,000 to $10,000, and a dividend of three per cent on all paid up stock by the 1st of January, 1891, was declared. The following directors were chosen for the ensuing year: Caroline Edgerton, of Dunreith; Mrs. K. Loftin, of Indianapolis; Mrs. M. R. Dennis, of Richmond; Miss Reed and Miss Hay, of Indianapolis, and Miss Whistler, of Marshfield.

The following are superintendents nominated and confirmed:

Organization and lecturer, Mrs. Mary E. Haggart and Miss L. E. Reed; young women's work, Mary Frazer; juvenile work, Mrs. K. T. A. Straw; assistant, Mrs. Jennie Miller; organizer, Mrs. Addie Northam Fields; heredity, Anna R. Bryson, M. D.; health, Laura B. Jennings, M. D.; Sunday-school work, Mrs. Nellie Dungan; scientific temperance, Mrs. Lena M. Beck; temperance literature, Caroline Edgerton; press, Sarah B. Whistler; purity in literature and art, Mrs. Naomi Tomlinson; narcotics, Mrs. K. Loftin; orphans' homes, Mrs. I. R. Benham; peace and arbitration, Mrs. A. V. Hastings; jail, prison and almshouse work, Mrs. M. E. Cadwalladar; evangelistic, Mrs. L. M. Thompson; soldiers and sailors, Mrs. Agnes J. Perry; communion wine, Mrs. R. T. Brown; Sabbath observance, Mrs. M. R. Dennis; promotion of social purity, Mrs. J. R. Nichols; assistant, Mrs. Ellen Baxter; mothers' meetings, Mrs. L. B. D. Cowan; medal contests, Mary E. Balch; flower mission, Miss Josephine Graves; state and county fairs, Mrs. Gertrude Fulton; franchise, Mrs. Haggart. Mrs. Lewis Trist, of Warsaw, was made German evangelist for that department.

The work among miners which comes under evangelistic work is also to be provided with an evangelist.

Among the reports your correspondent noted the following: Joint county conventions held, 18; number of counties represented, 55; number of local unions represented, 125; number of members attending, 630; number of members added to local unions, 133; number of subscriptions to Organizer, 567; number of shares stock sold, 151; UNION SIGNAL subscriptions, 45; Oak and Ivy Leaf, 10; Young Crusader, 10; cost of each, $25; number of miles traveled, 5,720. Mrs. Benham reported for the Orphans' Home department, 2,426 children cared for in the different homes. The evangelistic report showed eight women doing special evangelistic work.

The state organizer's (Miss Palmer's) report showed 3,000 miles traveled; 144 towns visited and forty-four unions organized. Mrs. Loftin, treasurer of the Organizer Publishing Company, sold 100 shares of stock during the convention.

A subscription of more than sixty dollars was raised to erect the Willard Fountain, already projected by Mrs. Straw and the Loyal Temperance Legion.

Among our visitors were Miss Willard, Anna Gordon, Ida C. Clothier, Mrs. Helen G. Rice, Mrs. Esther T. Pritchard, Addie Northam Fields, now our very own, and Addison and Martha J. Hadley.

Miss Willard presented the convention with 200 copies of her annual address of 1889. Mrs. Rice with Mrs. Straw held several conferences with the juvenile workers present, and on Sabbath afternoon she and Miss Gordon addressed a packed house of children in the Congregational Church.

Esther Pritchard's Bible Readings were full of spiritual power and blessing to all who were privileged to hear them. "The W. C. T. U. is God's Prophet to the People," "Building for God," "Systematic Giving," "The necessity of a clean heart as the condition of a Christ-like life," were her subjects. A messenger of the Most High Mrs. Pritchard seemed to us.

Miss Willard addressed an overflowing house on Sabbath afternoon upon "A White Life for Two." Not less than 3,000 persons were present.

The churches were occupied during Sabbath by the W. C. T. U. Collections were unusually generous this convention.

One hundred dollars were subscribed to place a memorial tablet in the Temperance Temple for Mother Wallace. The Richmond union are to place therein a similar tablet in memory of Dr. Mary F. Thomas.

"OUR FARM."

Addison and Martha J. Hadley, "Friends" and friends of all that is good, out of the bounty of their hearts, presented the Indiana W. C. T. U. 110 acres of land upon which to erect an industrial school for girls. The farm lies twenty-four miles from Indianapolis, and one-fourth mile from the town of Hadley. Ten thousand dollars are to be raised for the erection of the home, six thousand dollars of which were raised in less than one hour's time. These two friends of ours, as humble as they are generous, desire no notice, because of this, and were happier in the giving than we in receiving (if that could be) judging by their tearful, happy countenances. May God bless them more and more every day of their lives, and enable us to faithfully perform every duty growing out of this new trust.

EVENING MEETINGS.

Friday evening Mrs. Beck, vice-president, conducted the devotional exercises. Rev. J. H. Crum, pastor of the Congregational Church, welcomed us on behalf of the churches. President Duncan, of Coates College, on behalf of the schools, and Mrs. Edith Gillette on behalf of the W. C. T. U., to all of which Mrs. Haggart responded in her clear, characteristic manner.

Saturday evening, Y evening, is always one of the most pleasant of our state convention, and this one was no exception to the general rule. Miss Frazer, state superintendent, also a student of the State Normal, presided. Devotional exercises were conducted by Misses Jordan and Claybaugh. Miss Hay made her farewell address, and was presented with a beautiful bouquet of roses, with the gratitude of the Indiana Y's. Ralph C. Norton, an honorary member, told why young men should "join the Y." Miss Clothier made the principal address, charming her audience as she always does in Indiana. By the way, we almost claim Miss Clothier, at least she is always welcome to Hoosierdom. The prize Y banner passed from the custody of the Richmond Y to that of New Castle Y.

Monday evening, the First Baptist Church was packed hours before the hour of assembling to hear Miss Willard. Words fail us. "Our seer," Hannah Whitall Smith, says, "Yes, and a safe leader, for she will have naught but an intelligent following."

Tuesday evening, a grand gold medal contest was conducted by Miss Mary Hadley. Four young ladies and four young gentlemen competed for the prize. The medal was won by Frank Hill, of Parke county.

NOTES.

The convention was most harmonious. The Daily Organizer a success.

Greetings were received from and sent to the Illinois state convention. Greetings were telegraphed to Mrs. Balch in Nebraska.

Alice R. Palmer preached in the First Baptist Church Sunday a. m.

Quaker faces and bonnets were numerous. God bless them. The Y's presented Miss Hay with a gold ring and Y pin. While this was a loving, beautiful token, your correspondent could have whispered in their ear that nothing on earth could persuade or force Mollie to leave them. The Loyal Temperance Legion workers presented Mrs. Straw, our faithful, efficient superintendent, with a beautiful Bible.

Many new faces greeted us at the convention. Among them Mrs. Cooper, president of Dubois county, with her baby in her arms. Our convention baby last year was Master James Beck.

Young ladies, and visiting boys and girls made excellent pages.

The daily papers accorded us much space and courteous treatment, but we did not reach their editorial columns.

Among the older workers, Mrs. M. R. Dennis, Mrs. Edgerton, Mrs. J. R. Wood, Mary Hadley, Mrs. Cadwalladar and others greeted us.

Miss Reed, our editor and corresponding secretary, quietly took care of everything.

The board of superintendents chose for their chairman, Mrs. M. R. Dennis, and for their secretary, Mrs. Nellie Dungan.

In their resolutions the Indiana W. C. T. U. took no backward steps. "We have crossed the Rubicon."

October 28th was appointed as a day for holding a picnic upon the farm given us by Mr. and Mrs. Hadley.

The Loyal Temperance Legion, of Terre Haute, presented Mrs. Rice with a beautiful bouquet before she went home.

So many pleasant occurrences did not crowd out business. Indeed this was the busiest convention I ever attended. Almost too busy to utter usual compliments, we could only look and feel our gratitude, and hope to prove it by future deeds.

Our hostess, Terre Haute union, and Vigo county certainly deserve much credit for their excellent planning for us.

Mrs. Tremaine and Mrs. Gillette and their co-workers were untiring, loving and patient. God grant that our stay among them may work them greater good than any of us dream.

Our new president, Mrs. Haggart, needs no introduction to the public by our pen. A native of Pennsylvania, and a graduate of the Normal college of that state, she is a trained woman in thought and speech. Twenty years ago she made her first public speech, in Danville, Ind., upon "The Higher Education of Women." This lecture called her to all parts of the state to address teachers' conventions. Her first suffrage address was made in Indianapolis, in 1874. Since then Mrs. Haggart has spoken in every state in the union.

Humanity's suffering from the rum curse caused her first to demand the ballot for woman. A prohibitionist from the beginning, Mrs. Haggart is loyal to the principles of the organization. She is also ready to devote her entire time and talent to the Indiana W. C. T. U., and her 5,000 women pledge faithful coöperation.

Yours for the best year in our history,

SADIE B. WHISTLER.

FIFTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The fifth district annual convention convened at the Congregational Church, Sycamore, Ill., September 24-26. It was thought by those present that it had been one of the best conventions held in this district. The president's address and report showed an increase over the previous year's work accomplished, and the superintendents of departments had not lost their courage, but were anxious to perform the work laid upon their shoulders, trusting God to care for the increase. Mrs. M. C. Holmes, a noble hearted women, whom we all love, presented the district with a beautiful banner.

Our beloved, true, and ever courageous president, Miss Emma S. Norton, who then occupied the chair, was without a dissenting vote unanimously elected our leader for the ensuing year, and the fervent prayer of our hearts is that with her as our captain, inspired with the spirit of God, the greatest of all leaders, we press on toward victory.

Having faith in God we with visionary eye see this victory, and November 1 intend to lay the corner-stone of a monument that shall stand for ages, even though some unforeseen power may crumble it to the earth, the memory and influence of those so faithful to the cause of temperance would live forever. God is truly blessing women's work.

MRS. C. E. HUNT, Dist. Sec.

SIXTEENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The eighth annual convention of the sixteenth district was held at Flora, August 27-29. The opening session, Wednesday evening, consisted of a grand address by the state president, Mrs. Rounds, on the "Worth of a Man to the State." This was excelled, if that were possible, by her address the next evening on "Social Purity." The third evening was occupied by Miss Mary Cowen, state superintendent of Y work, in an admirable address. The choir, which by the way, is an unusually fine one, furnished excellent music for the occasion. Reports from the unions were most encouraging, showing earnest, active work all along the line. Superintendents were appointed in six different lines of work. The convention decided to pay the district president a salary the coming year. The unions were asked for pledges of money to help do this, and responded generously. The officers are Mrs. Nellie Sheplor, president; Mrs. Dryden, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Laura Martin, recording secretary; Mrs. Severton, financial secretary; Miss Hattie Moore, treasurer.

OHIO.

CRUSADE GROUND.

The Highland county convention met in Belfast, twelve miles by carriage from Hillsboro. It proved a rainy morning, yet the earnest women were there, and we all received a cordial welcome. The church was a perfect bower of beauty, made so by the profusion of flowers, these flowers tied by white and yellow ribbons. The address of welcome was given by Rev. Mr. Hartley, and wit, wisdom and pathos were combined in his well chosen words; response, by Mrs. S. M. Perkins, of Cleveland, who briefly reviewed the work of the Crusaders, a work which is now girdling the globe, and dotting the whole earth with unions. Able papers were read and ringing resolutions adopted. One resolution pledged the women to work for suffrage.

The question-box was well filled, and replies were given by Mrs. Perkins, assisted by Rev. Mrs. Murrey. The latter was temporary chairman, and presided during the day.

In the absence of the president, Mrs. Arthur was elected president pro tem. The Belfast union has many earnest, faithful workers, who entertained most handsomely the delegates and visitors from other unions.

In the evening we all convened in another church, which was also decorated with an abundance of flowers. A band of music, some of whose members came ten miles, assisted in the opening entertainment. This band, besides rendering sweet music, contributed five dollars to help the ladies in meeting their expenses.

Mrs. Perkins gave her lecture, "The Needs of the Hour," to a crowded house. She also gave three lectures in Hillsboro, and was the guest of our "Saint Eliza," in her historic and most hospitable home. The noble woman, Mrs. Thompson, who started this stupendous movement, upon which the sun never sets, is most gentle and refined, yet is as bright and cheery as a June morning. "Her children rise up and call her blessed, her husband, he also praiseth her. Give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates."

One feels that Hillsboro is a sacred place, the Mecca of the temperance women, and it is truly an inspiration and a benediction to sit at the same table, and be sheltered by the same roof with our heroic Crusade leader.

Her gifted daughter has charge of the juvenile temperance work, and is revered and loved by all the children. One son, a physician, is at home, and is the staff and the joy of the mother's heart. Judge Thompson, the husband, is a courteous, intelligent man, an earnest advocate of woman suffrage. The servants are well cared for, have been in the family for years, and are happy and contented. The servant girl question would be speedily solved were all mistresses as tender and as thoughtful as is our gentle "Saint Eliza."

MAINE.

STATE CONVENTION.

The sixteenth annual convention of the Maine Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held October 7 to 9 in Payson Memorial Church (Congregational), Portland. This church edifice is the largest, and one of the finest in the city, and the Y's had made the place beautiful with cut flowers, potted plants and the National colors, while conspicuous among the decorations was our state banner and that of the National department of peace and arbitration, of which our own Mrs. H. J. Bailey is superintendent. This banner, it will be remembered, was sent by Mrs. Bailey to the Paris Exposition.

The hospitality of the Portland union and of the citizens was unbounded. Large audiences were constantly in attendance, and at some sessions the seating capacity of the church proved insufficient. Two hundred and twenty-seven delegates and ex-officio members, beside many visitors, were present, making this by far the largest W. C. T. U. convention ever held in the state. Mrs. Thorp, president of Cambridge, Mass., union, Mrs. Shapleigh, of Cambridgeport, and Mrs. Sarah Bull, daughter of Mrs. Thorp, and widow of Ole Bull, were the guests of the convention, each contributing much to the pleasure and profit of the meetings. Mrs. Bull, on being introduced, responded by playing a National air of Norway, and favored us with several other fine selections. Inspiring vocal music was furnished by a quartette composed of prominent Methodist ministers, one a presiding elder.

The business sessions were preceded by devotional hours which revealed the secret of our power as an organization and verified the words of one sister who said she enjoyed the W. C. T. U. because there she met the most spiritual women from all the churches.

The address of welcome on behalf of the union was given by Miss Cornelia Dow, General Neal Dow's daughter. Mrs. Geo. S. Hunt, president of Portland union, was prevented by illness from being present, but a kind letter from her and a beautiful basket of flowers from Mr. Hunt showed that their hearts were with us. Nearly all the clergymen of the city and many from other parts of the state were in attendance and spoke words of commendation and encouragement. Short addresses were made by Neal Dow, Mr. Taggart, National secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and by the local secretary, Mr. McDonald.

The reports of the corresponding secretary and treasurer indicated a year of remarkable prosperity. Forty new unions have been organized and there has been a net gain of nearly seven hundred members. Thus in two years our membership has almost doubled. Reports were read from twenty-seven departments, each showing a clear conception of the work in hand.

Mrs. J. K. Barney, of Providence, National superintendent of prison work, and the superintendent of Sunday-school work, Miss Lucia Kimball, of Chicago, spoke in connection with the reports of their departments.

At the first evening session Rev. Dr. Merrill, the genial pastor, welcomed us in a manner so cordial that we felt as if we belonged to his parish. Mrs. Stevens' annual address, though very brief, was as able as ever.

The speakers from abroad were Mrs. Barney, Mrs. Frances Harper, Mrs. Thorp, and Miss Lillian Phelps, beside Miss E. U. Yates, of our own state. That all of them were appreciated by the citizens of Portland, as well as by the convention, was evident from the close attention accorded them, and from the contents of the collection baskets.

The same general officers who have so faithfully served the interests of the work were reëlected. When the tellers announced that Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens had received every vote cast for president, the enthusiasm reached its height, and as she was conducted back to her place upon the platform, moved by a common impulse the convention rose and gave her a prolonged Chautauqua salute, while the happy faces told, as a whole series of resolutions could not have done, in what love and honor this noble woman is held by her co-workers after a service of fifteen years in our state union.

The report of the resolutions committee was very comprehensive and was unanimously adopted. The scene which was witnessed, when after the adoption of the following, the quartette arose and sang a temperance song with the refrain, "Yes, the saloon must go," will not soon be forgotten.

"Resolved, That we reiterate our intention to be as we have always been, neither a partisan nor a sectarian organization, but this shall not prevent us from the frank declaration that we will lend our influence, express our gratitude and good will, and offer our prayers for any society, association or movement in church or state, that has for its watchword, 'The saloon must go.'"

From the opening of the first session to the closing hour when with joined hands we united with the quartette in singing "God be with you till we meet again," the most perfect harmony pervaded the gathering, and as we separated to return to our homes, it was with the desire to do more in the coming year than ever before for "God and Home and Native Land." PROGRESS IN THE FIFTH DISTRICT.

The W. C. T. U. of the first district has been much strengthened during the past month by the presence of Mrs. Dora Evans, formerly state organizer. Her ability as a singer, lecturer, evangelist and organizer makes her services in temperance work desirable and valuable.

We held a joint meeting recently at Horton, Mrs. Evans speaking on W. C. T. U. work in general, and I, by request, on temperance work in the military prison, Ft. Leavenworth. We then attended the Jackson county convention, held at Hoyt, Kan. Mrs. Pettijohn, the county president, has the happy faculty of inspiring her co-workers with the resolve to do their best, and a good program and much interest in the convention was the result.

The membership in the first district was nearly doubled in the last year, and we are aiming to duplicate the report for the next convention. JULIA A. CHASE,

[In lieu of other news from this state, we are glad to give the following letter from Henry H. Faxon, one of the truest friends of the W. C. T. U.—ED.]

QUINCY, Oct. 13, 1890.

Miss Elisabeth S. Tobey, President of the Mass. W. C. T. Union:

DEAR FRIEND:—Wishing to inspire the union with renewed activity at your seventeenth annual convention, to be held at Worcester, I enclose my check for $500, for use in times of emergency.

The Christian women of this commonwealth need neither fear the threats of politicians, nor be discouraged by their refusal to contribute to your treasury because your organization declares for prohibition. A menace cannot put down a righteous cause championed by God-fearing women. When money is wanted it will be forthcoming from those whose zeal for the good of humanity towers above party policy or official greed.

Use all your influence individually and collectively in defeating, for the Legislature, criminal lawyers, as they are more dangerous than the law-breaker, and will always be found advocating measures for the protection of their clients. Attorneys who defend rumsellers and their lying patrons are not selected for office because of their virtues.

Our country is in extreme peril from the vicious and pauper hordes pouring in upon us from all the nations of the globe, and this will soon become the thieves' paradise. The depredations of these classes are doubly dangerous, because they instinctively turn to politics, and all their power is exerted in bringing about the selection, by corrupt means, of judges, district attorneys, clerks of courts, and every other official who will shield them in their rascalities.

If the courts are defiled, cases against a high order of scoundrels whose political and social influence is stronger than law, will be nol prossed, placed on file, or disposed of by other methods known to those who connive with crime. I regard district attorneys as the most important officials in the state. Judges have to rely in the disposition of cases mostly upon information imparted by these attorneys. It is therefore the duty of all law abiding citizens to do their utmost to secure honest men whose whole time will be devoted to investigating cases which are to come before them for trial. There are many well-disposed persons who overlook the fact that a rascal alone will make greater exertions to save his neck from the halter than a dozen revivalists together will to save his soul from perdition. There is not a noted villain in this country who does not know the tremendous value of political influence. This is why large cities have become the harbor of refuge for those who seek to gain a sumptuous living at the expense of others.

In conclusion let me say that healthy reforms will be made possible, only when women have the same right as men to cast their ballots upon election days and have them honestly counted. Yours truly,
HENRY H. FAXON.

CONNECTICUT.

NEW LONDON COUNTY W. C. T. U.

The autumn convention of New London county W. C. T. U. was held in Jewett City, October 2d. The day was one of those beautiful ones, when the earth is decked in brilliant robes, the skies were bright above and it seemed that nature was trying to do her part for the success of the convention.

Mrs. Denison presided throughout the day and evening with grace and dignity. After a devotional meeting the convention was formally called to order, the president read the "Crusade Psalm," and the convention joined in singing "Stand up, stand up for Jesus." Mrs. Partridge, in behalf of the Jewett City union, welcomed the "daughters of the county to the hearth-stone of the mother union." The response was interesting and appropriate.

The unions were well represented, and the reports of work done were most encouraging. The report from Voluntown was particularly interesting. Jewett City reported the largest increase in numbers, their membership having increased to nearly one hundred fifty since Crusade Membership Day.

Mesdames Forbes, Andrus and Fitz Gerald were present throughout the day, and by their suggestions and presence helped to make the meeting a success.

Miss Ferguson's paper, "A Thought," was helpful. Miss Culver, state superintendent of scientific instruction, gave a talk on that department, and also some facts relating to the text book furnished by the state. Miss Haskell told what the Y's are doing, and gave a bright description of "Holiday House," where working girls could spend their summer vacation, enjoying rest, recreation and good board for a moderate price. This was an enterprise of the Norwich Y's and was so successful this summer that it will be continued next year.

Among other items of business it was voted to send $10 to Nebraska to help on the amendment campaign. In the afternoon Mrs. Barney gave a Bible reading from Mark II. the subject was "Work." The four men who carried the paralytic, represented organized, persistent effort. In the evening Mrs. Barney delivered her lecture, "Facts and Fancies," which was enjoyed by all who listened to it.

A NEW LONDON LOYAL LEGION.

Sunday, October 12, Company A, of Niantic, which has been having a long vacation, met and re-organized. Forty-five were present, and all seemed interested. The Legion has a banner and a library of forty volumes.

RESULT OF MEMBERSHIP CRUSADE DAY.

MISSOURI.

AN HONORARY MEMBER'S TESTIMONY.

A word of good cheer is never unwelcome. This time it comes from St. Clair county, Mo. Preachers, W. C. T. U. workers, and the prohibition "vieux garde" are all in line, doing effective work. Union gospel temperance meetings are being held all over the county. A central executive committee furnishes speakers when necessary. The township committees arrange for the meetings, time and place, etc. Good local speakers are thus interchanged between townships where their style and address would be most acceptable. The W. C. T. U. of Osceola edit and control one column in the three papers published at the county seat. Their judicious selections and writings thus reach Republicans and Democrats alike. No distinction is made. The saloon must go, and with it the saloon drug-store and all attendant evils. Such is the cry, and it is being heard and heeded. All honor to every department of the noble W. C. T. U. They may make a mistake or two occasionally, but by God's help they come out right in the end. The clouds clear away just as soon as they sink "self," which sometimes will be prominent, and continue to work "for God and for Humanity."

As an honorary member I can subscribe myself,
Yours, VAN B. WISKER.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. EMMA A. WHEELER, corresponding secretary of Michigan W. C. T. U., has been appointed to make the kindergarten report for the National Convention. All states should send their reports to her at once to 56 Bostwick street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

MRS. S. A. MCCLEES, National superintendent of soldiers and sailors, spent a large portion of the month of September in Pennsylvania, giving evening addresses at the conventions of Lawrence and Crawford counties, and filling engagements for various local unions in the western part of the state.

THE Boston Transcript says of John G. Woolley's work under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. at Boston, lately, "He is a powerful man—quiet, concentrated, logical and immensely in earnest." The strongest testimonials come from places where Mr. Woolley has spoken. At Delaware, Ohio, a large, sympathetic audience greeted this true orator—"The Gough of to-day," as his admirers delight to call him, and it was noticeably there as everywhere that his great power lies in his "Word of Testimony" to the power of the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ to lift from the lowest depths to which the rum fiend can drag the soul, up to where the man may be clean, and this fearful appetite no longer have any power.

THE W. C. T. U. of St. Clair county, Mo., has engaged from one-half to one column of space in each paper published in the county. By securing this space for one year from the editors, and taking, in each case, a receipt from them, there is no uncertainty about the tenure of the privilege. Largely through the personal influence of the temperance women, the ministers of this county give their hearty indorsement to the cause, and once each month take turns in conducting the Gospel temperance meetings.

MRS. G. H. READ, of Bloomington, Ill., than whom there is no sweeter-spirited, "stronger-couraged" woman in W. C. T. U. ranks, thus describes, in a private letter, the manner in which a six hours' wait was spent, upon her return from the state convention. "Poor accommodations, little old depot without sufficient number of seats, but we had a re-arrangement of things and held a meeting most of the time. There were a lot of young men and boys, railroad bridge builders, that hovered on the edge of our meeting and expressed regret when we left. Some earnest words were spoken to them, and we showed them Miss Willard's photograph. Some of them had heard of her and some had not. All of them had used tobacco; one had taken the temperance pledge for six months, another for a year, because they found 'they were drinking too much.' Their comrades certified to the fact that they had kept it. I personally talked to them and urged them to give themselves to Christ, just as they were, for His cleansing. I told them of my boy in heaven, and showed them his picture in which they seemed interested and with real hearty hand-shakes and prayers for them and vote of thanks for us, we bade them good-by."

MAJOR AND MRS. E. T. SCOTT have been working for nine months in Nebraska, all through the campaign, and no voices have been more powerful for our cause. The reports that come to us from private and public sources are among the most satisfactory that we have from any of our workers in the great harvest. Let local unions take notice that wherever they go numbers are added to our W. C. T. U.

THE W. C. T. U. of Racine, Wis., unanimously indorsed the following resolution at a recent three o'clock meeting Many of our W. C. T. U. women throughout the Eastern states, have from time to time denounced all forms of cruelty to the dumb animals, but this is the first body of temperance women in Wisconsin to come to the front on the humane question. May the time soon come when all our unions and all organizations for the promotion of justice will declare against every form of cruelty common to this age, and coöperate with our humane societies in the enforcement of our humane laws. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That as the practice of vivisection seems to us cruel, unnecessary, and directly opposed to the spirit of Christianity, we will do all in our power to create sentiment against it, with a view to legislation for its total prohibition.

THE National superintendent of work among foreigners, Mrs. S. F. Grubb, has raised the money for, and distributed nearly seven hundred thousand pages of foreign tracts in Nebraska, during the campaign. Pennsylvania donated nearly one-third of this amount. The tracts were sent by the superintendent directly to forty towns, cities and hamlets, and great good is expected from them.

THE first silver medal contest of Walla Walla, Washington, was held September 26, closing the fifth W. C. T. U. county convention. Mrs. L. H. Miller, of Arkansas City, Kan., conducted the contest, making a brief address about the contest, from the first in New York City, May 9, 1886, to London and Glasgow, round the world via San Francisco, Shanghai, Honolulu, and back to the diamond medal contest at the last National Convention, with number of contests held, and medals awarded up to latest date attainable. Fifty children sang from Marching Songs, "Temperance Boys and Girls," "The Coming Strike," and the Temperance Doxology. Ten contestants from the graded schools and Whitman College, met a crowded house, and for one hour and a half temperance elocution rung from floor to vaulted roof. A brilliant thirteen year old girl, the youngest contestant, bore off the medal on "Prohibition, the True Anti-Poverty Party." Every selection was excellently rendered. Much credit is due the gifted elocution teacher of Whitman College, whose fine temperance recitation in connection with an address on the "Work of the W. C. T. U.," by Mrs. Miller, opened the convention the evening before. Walla Walla has an entire block called "Saloon Row," and two breweries. The military post of Fort Walla Walla is located there, also the state penitentiary of Washington, and a large hospital and Catholic school. The city population, 7,000. An address on "Prohibition in Kansas," by Mrs. Miller, on Sunday evening, September 14, before a crowded house, was listened to with closest attention and interest.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

All friends who have subscribed to the Amendment Fund for Nebraska, are requested to send in the money immediately, as it is needed to settle pressing bills. Coin collectors will be pleased to know that a very old coin, a silver dollar bearing date of 1795, has been sent for amendment work. It will be sold to the one offering the highest sum before November 4, the money to go into the W. C. T. U. treasury for the amendment.

THE LAST OUNCE OF POWER.

To My Comrades of the White Ribbon in South Dakota:

Your state is to-day home's sacred battle ground. There is not a population on the globe sifted cleaner than yours from the elements that are not civilized and Christianized enough to perceive what woman is to temperance. With a prohibitory law so excellent and the ballot in woman's hand, you can elect such officers as will put out the saloon already voted out. Heroic work has been done; every indication is encouraging; enthusiasm (that "God in us") begins to stir the people's heart; "Let the home have two votes instead of one," is the glorious rallying cry; but "who would be free himself, must strike the blow."

Now is needed the last ounce of power; the one final effort that shall reap the fruits of this long, laborious seed-sowing. Women must go to the polls; according to immemorial usage they must "have the last word"; after the conflicts of candidates let the gentle voice be heard, "Won't you please vote for our side?" or failing here, "Won't you please not vote against us?"

The women of Wyoming "behaved themselves valiantly for their people;" they wrought with full purpose of heart even "unto this last." May divine strength be given you for this day of days, November 4, 1890, and for the protection of your little ones may you win.

"The weapon firmer set
And surer than the bayonet;
A weapon that comes down as still
As snowflakes fall upon the sod,
But executes a freeman's will
As lightnings do the will of God."

Yours for Dakota's homes,
FRANCES E. WILLARD.

American "Nosology."

There can be no doubt as to the almost universal prevalence of Catarrh in this country. Even our speech has acquired a nasal twang. And this is not, as might be supposed, "The twang that spoiled the hymns, when Cromwell's army sang," but it is undoubtedly a catarrhal symptom. In most medical works at the present day the nose is very "prominent." The "fierce Catarrhs" continue their ravages. But, is nothing to be done? Is there no remedy? Let us see.

CHILLICOTHE, O., Oct. 24.

DEAR BROTHER HALL:—The literature table of Ohio W. C. T. U. under the care of Mrs. Gray, of Medina, was the best I have seen this year. It was ten feet long, I judge, by three feet wide, was just at the foot of the stairs as one entered the church. Nobody could miss it! Everything we have at W. T. P. A. Headquarters was attractively displayed, and two or three pleasant and practical ladies in constant attendance. What could have been better? But I have seen conventions where our literature was nowhere visible and hardly a word said about it from beginning to end. Do speak of Mrs. Gray's exhibit, for it is entitled to special mention. Crusaders still ahead! FRANCES E. WILLARD.

A Personal Notice.

We regret being obliged to say that Mrs. Laura A. Berry, who has had charge of THE UNION SIGNAL mailing list, has left us to make her home in Denver. She leaves the list in better condition than it has ever been, and it is due her to thus publicly acknowledge her efficiency, faithfulness and keen appreciation of all the responsibilities that have been hers. It has been a verdict unanimous that there have been fewer mistakes in her department than ever before, and the few that have been made could always be rapidly and unerringly traced. So we accord this "well done" with the utmost heartiness, and with the best of wishes for Mrs. Berry's future success.

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE BULLETIN
REVISED EDITION.

One-half the size of the original, with more than twice the number of pages.

Proof sheets read critically by Dr. Nathan S. Davis, of Chicago.

Ohio teachers declare it to be "just the help needed" to gain a comprehensive idea of the teachings of science on the question of narcotics.

It contains full information regarding all the indorsed text-books, and some desirable charts.

It suggests books for reference, of great value to those desiring to study the question exhaustively.

It contains a series of "Question Lessons," and some experiments particularly helpful to teachers in the lower grades.

In the W. C. T. U. meeting it can become an educator on one of the most important phases of temperance work.

In the Teachers' Reading Circles it prepares the way for an intelligent consideration of this new branch of study added to the curriculum by legislation.

In the home it creates sentiment that will aid materially in making these compulsory temperance education laws successful in their enforcement.

Chicago Lots.

ON THE INSTALMENT PLAN.

I suppose everybody knows that the enormous expenditures of money to complete the arrangements for the World's Fair will increase the value of lots in Chicago very materially, for all will be needed for building purposes in time.

Just think of it, a nice lot on the West Side for $150, $25 down and the balance $5 per month until paid. Ninety feet above the water in the Lake; the highest spot in all Chicago. Title perfect. Abstract furnished with every lot.

Bible Temperance Studies.

A Book for Evangelists, Bible Students and Temperance Instructors, containing

A Lesson on Every Reference to Temperance or Intemperance in the Bible.

By M. Josephine Griffith, B. S., Professor of Bible and Ethics, Cook's Academy, Havana, N. Y.

Used by Dean Wright in his correspondence classes, and recommended by Bishop Vincent for the Temperance Seal Course of Chautauqua Readings.

Miss Willard says of this Book: "Miss Josephine Griffith, B. S., Professor of Bible and Ethics in Cook Academy, Havana, N. Y., has just brought out a promising volume of Bible Temperance Studies. They are intended for evangelists, Bible students and temperance instructors, and contain a lesson on every reference to temperance or intemperance in the Bible. We have had many handbooks of similar intent, but I have seen none that illustrates the boiling-down process so desirable in this busy age. The specialty pursued by the author has given her a comprehensive view of her subject. She has known how to select the best from a mass of material, and an endless variety of illustration. The hurried pastor, Sunday-school teacher, and white-ribbon speaker will find here an arsenal of weapons for the ever-deepening warfare. May they wield them well."

Rev. James F. Dickinson, of Orange, N. J., writes: "I am really astonished at the evidence of research, painstaking and ability. May it have a large circulation, and do much good."

WHY WAS IT?

Why was it that 240 lots in the new temperance suburb of Chicago—Harvey—were sold by us in 60 days? Hear, now, some of the reasons. People all over the country have and so when this opportunity came, they showed it by investing their money in the future great city. But why have confidence in Chicago in general and Harvey in particular?

Because every one concedes that the growth of Chicago is a genuine one, and that the plans for Harvey are well laid and already sure of success. For instance, the Tribune said the other day: "Forty-two car loads of machinery are on their way from Grinnell, Ia., to Harvey, from the former shops of Craver, Steele & Austin." In order that the men who will handle these forty-two cars of machinery may have homes for themselves, one firm alone is under contract to put up one hundred houses before January, 1891, in Harvey. But to go back a little. Pullman is a great success as a manufacturing city. Why? Because the heavy capitalists said it should be so. So now, in Harvey, the same decree has gone forth and events are rapidly shaping themselves to the upbuilding of a manufacturing city that shall be

FREE FROM SALOONS, WITH AMPLE R. R. FACILITIES, RIGHT AMONG FACTORIES.

Where the streets will be macadamized and lighted by electric lights. Where good sewerage will be provided and where the residences will all be on one side of the railroad tracks and the manufactories on the other. Where pure, soft water will be piped to each house, and where any faithful working man can own his own home in a place where he can enjoy all the advantages of the great city, with none of its disadvantages. Why, of course, if the place has a population soon of 10,000 people—as it assuredly will—who wouldn't want to invest when they can get their money placed before the big boom starts?

If you want to know about the manufactories that are coming, whereby 2,000 men will get employment, write for a plat and prices of lots. And don't be too long about it. 240 lots were sold in 60 days. It's not at all improbable that the 270 lots we now have the sale of, will go in less time.

The prices range from $200 to $900 for lots 25x170 ft. The latter named price is on lots for business purposes.

You can get work in Harvey, if you want it, and own a lot there, or you can make money by buying a lot and holding it, say a year, when the improvements will add their own value to your investment.

We refer by permission to the Metropolitan National Bank and The American Trust and Savings Bank. You cannot make a mistake in following up a success like this, which has been partly described to you. Write for fuller information. Send on $10 or more, to secure best lot unsold between prices named. You will be treated fairly and honorably.

The Convention Daily.

We have not made the usual announcements regarding the Convention Daily because of the difficulty experienced in getting the proper facilities away from our own plant to print so large a paper in so short a time. We have decided, however, on the following plan: A daily will be issued at Atlanta (five issues) subscription, fifteen cents, or five cents per copy. It will be entirely a written-up report and not, as heretofore, a stenographic one. The place, the people, the convention, church, the programs, personnel of the speakers, etc., etc., will make up the paper. There will be no premium, and we will not attempt to mail each day's paper by itself, but all mail orders will be sent after the convention has closed, and as soon as possible after the fifth session is over. In addition to this paper we will print an exact stenographic report of all the proceedings within a week or ten days after the close of the convention (providing we get 1,000 orders for the same) at 25 cents each. We prefer that orders be sent for the stenographic report rather than for the dailies, but if any wish to order both they can remit 40 cents, and if the 1,000 orders are not reached for the stenographic report we will return the 25 cents. After four years' hilly experience in running a daily at the conventions we have evolved the above plan as being the most satisfactory to all concerned. This announcement is to appear in each issue of THE UNION SIGNAL until November 6. We recapitulate the offers to make them as plain as possible.

The Convention Daily.

Five issues to be mailed in one package on November 18 or 19, $ .15.

The Stenographic Report

to be issued, if 1,000 copies are ordered, as soon as possible after the convention, $ .25.

No premiums or commissions can be allowed at these prices, except that in clubs of five or more the cost of sending the money can be deducted. The regular convention number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be dated November 27.

Special October Offer.

Send us cash for 10 copies and we will send you 15 copies, or cash for 100 copies and get 150 copies, or cash for 1,000 copies and get 1,500 copies.

Special Notice.

After November 15 we will withdraw the subscription offer concerning THE UNION SIGNAL and Miss Willard's Picture!

The picture will be ready in November, when we will fill all orders received, and will then be ready to give out agencies to sell the picture by itself. The moment it is seen it will create a great demand, and we will have orders without doubt for before the close of the next six months. Therefore we want agents everywhere who will agree to show the picture, and offer it for sale at the regular price, $1. We will give a large commission and appoint only one agent to a place. We want only those to apply who really mean to act in good faith as agents. We made the low offers in connection with THE UNION SIGNAL to be sure and get enough orders for the original contract with Prang & Co. The picture is wonderfully cheap at $1. You can make all your Christmas money as agent for it if you wish to. Apply at once for the territory which you know you can give the proper attention to. We will then let you know what you can do to get a framed picture free with which to make the canvass a successful one. This is your opportunity. You need not fear lest the orders given through the subscription offers will interfere with a canvass by you. Not more than 2,500 will go out thus. Besides, "seeing is believing," and in this case, captivating also. Moreover there are thousands of people who admire Miss Willard, and yet have naught to do with THE UNION SIGNAL. The very sight of this lovely aquarelle tint picture will everywhere and always be a temperance object lesson and sermon. Send in your applications promptly.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION
MODENE
AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Signal Notes.

Father Mathew's immortal pledge was, "For my own sake, for the sake of others, and for the glory of God, I abstain."

THE Blue Cross Total Abstinence Society, Switzerland, originated twelve years ago, now numbers several thousand members, and has branches in Belgium, France and Germany.

THE Russian Duchy of Finland, has a Temperance League. a Blue Ribbon movement, a form of Good Templary moulded by government orders, and a coffee-house movement.

THE French temperance society, Paris, has offered a prize of two hundred dollars for the best original work on alcoholism and its cure.

FATHER ZIEGER, of St. Louis, Missouri, on a recent Sunday, announced from the altar that he had prepared a list of the habitual drunkards in the parish, and handed it to a committee of sixty ladies of the congregation. The ladies were to keep a watch on the drinkers, who were to be socially ostracised

WHILE Edward T. Taylor, "the seamen's friend," was delivering one of his temperance lectures, a well-known drunkard present, disliking some of his remarks, commenced hissing. Father Taylor turned the attention of the audience to him, and then said in his own peculiar way, as he pointed to him: "There's a red nose got into cold water. Don't you hear it hiss?"

THERE is a singular unanimity of opinion among physicians with regard to the destructive power of alcohol upon the human brain. Dr. Kate Mitchell says, "the brain, the most important organ of the body, the passions, the intelligence, of all human desires and feelings, of the highest as well as of the basest of our propensities, is the organ the earliest and the most profoundly attacked by alcohol."

A VIENNA scientist has invented a fluid for use in war which is intended to put a stop to the carnage of battles. The bursting of a shell charged with this compound instead of killing those in the neighborhood, renders them unconscious for two or three hours. Thus troops could be disarmed and battles won without bloodshed or even injury to health. The idea seems Utopian, but such suggestions point to the time when war shall no longer disgrace Christian countries and mar God's World.

A RECENT estimate places the annual consumption of tobacco in the United States at 310,000,000 pounds. This makes an average annual consumption of five pounds for every person in the country. But as not more than one-fifth of the population use tobacco (and that is an appaling average) those who do use it must consume twenty-five pounds per annum. If the price of these three hundred and ten million pounds of tobacco for three years, were placed in the public treasury, it would more than wipe out the entire national debt.

A FOREIGN exchange gives the following statistics in regard to the vast army of temperance children in England. It is estimated that there are 10,073 local Bands of Hope, with a total membership of 1,361,150. The Church of England Juvenile Temperance Societies number 327,000 members, in 3.000 societies; the Wesleyan Bands of Hope are 3,436 with 358.150 members; the United Methodist Free Church Bands of Hope are 656 in number, and have 70,036 members; there are 46 branches of the League of the Cross, with a membership of 20.000; the Young Abstainers' Union has 81 branches and 7,899 members; the two Phœnix Orders have 178 juvenile divisions, and 10,322 members; the Cadets of Temperance contain 8.071 members in 196 divisions; the Juvenile Rechabites—the Order which had done the pioneer work in this matter—has 900 "tents" and 40,000 members. Another great contingent is furnished by the Independent Order of Good Templars, which has 1,180 juvenile temples, with a membership of 86.138. There is, no doubt, some overlapping, but after ample deductions have been made on this account there remains a cold-water army of young abstainers at least 2,000,000 strong, and in their 17,000 societies receiving systematic training. Whilst the chief object of the Band of Hope is to guard the young from intemperance, incidentally it is a school of music—it encourages good reading and promotes the study of elocution, and sometimes lends itself to various other efforts for social welfare. One band of Hope at least has a swimming class in connection with it and another has a rambling club. No one can doubt that the juvenile temperance movement is an important element in the social welfare of the nation. or that its advance will contribute to the prosperity and happiness of the people.

THE TEMPLE

What Means This Stone?

Nov. 1st 1890.

Mary T. Lathrop.

I.

Long the misty stretch of time
A million bells peal out their chime,
A million bells of every clime,
And silver tongue;
They ring from steeples tall and fair,
They sound from turrets carved and rare,
And over altars steeped with prayer
For ages long;
Till at this shrine a vanished time
Thrills into song.

II.

The world has reared its temples old,
In ages dim and days of gold,
And evermore in reverence wrought
Its highest faith, its deepest thought,
Its strongest love and sacred pain,
In marble white of holy fane.
Then ring, sweet bells of olden years!
With joyous tone;
A morning breaks, a promise cheers,
A newer temple Woman rears
For God and Home,
And, as the world's slow vision clears,
Comes to her own.

III.

Upon the years that are to be,
There glows a radiance fair to see;
There dawns the coming century of truth and right;
The clouds are lifting from the skies,
From valleys dim the mists arise,
Before the morn the midnight flies,
And all is light.
The gate of hope now softly swings,
Above its arch a great bird sings,
The shackles fall, of might and wrong,
And all the world breaks into song.
Ring, temple bells, from steeples gray!
In gladness ring!
Love's golden day is on the way,
And Christ is King!

IV.

Between the darkness and the dawn,
The days to come, the cycles gone,
The age of love and age of brawn,
Is laid this stone;
On which shall rise a temple set
Like jewel in a coronet,
In purpose high unrivalled yet
By shrine or throne.
Its walls rebuke the blighting shame
That, sheltered by a legal name,
Now dims a nation's fair renown
And tears her holiest altars down.
Our ensign here in faith we rear —
Henceforth this place is battle ground.

V.

From fair foundations wide as love,
To slender turret far above,
Shall into stone and arch be wrought
The glory of prophetic thought;
And throned upon the graceful height,
Its emblem true shall stand in light
Serene and fine —
A woman's figure, calm and fair,
Outlined against the upper air,
With hands uplifted as in prayer.
Who builds this shrine
Saw age divine
Come swiftly on to human kind.

VI.

Beyond the shadows long and dim,
Upon the future's golden rim,
We lay the stone and raise the hymn
Prophetic, grand
Abide in strength, O jewelled stone!
For thou art set for God and Home,
For feet that stumble, hearts that moan,
In all the land.
Abide in strength before the gates
Where God's eternal promise waits.
We give thee to thy mission sweet,
With lavish wealth of love complete,
Nor count the sum.
Who knows but on this altar-place
May shine the glory of His face,
When Jesus comes!

The Lever comes out in a new dress and a new head, which, we trust, will always as of yore, keep level.

Minister Robert Lincoln sailed for New York Saturday, on leave of absence; he will return to London in January.

The $100,000 proposed to be raised to establish a medical school in connection with Johns Hopkins University, admitting women, is secured.

A sale involving the transference of $4,000,000 interest in the iron manufactories of Youngstown, Ohio, to an English syndicate, has been made.

Funk & Wagnalls have sent Miss Willard $700 more for the Nebraska fund, making $5,700 in all contributed by them to be expended under direction of the W. C. T. U.

The Temple corner-stone is the largest ever put in place in this city; so heavy is it that no derrick in Chicago was strong enough to handle it and one had to be imported for the purpose.

La Salle A. Maynard, formerly of the New York Observer, and more lately of the New York Mail and Express, has been added to the editorial staff of the Christian at Work.

A monument erected through the efforts of naval officers to the memory of the members of the Jeannette exploring expedition was unveiled at the Annapolis Naval Academy Cemetery last week.

As we go to press the snow of ballots is falling in Nebraska which is to decide the hardest fought battle of the century between the home and the saloon. God give victory to the right there and wherever this November snow is falling.

Judge Caldwell, of the United States Circuit Court for the eighth circuit, rendered an opinion Friday, declaring the Original Package Law constitutional, and also sustaining the constitutionality of the Iowa Prohibitory Law. In consequence saloons are again closed in Topeka.

The will of Franklin B. Jagger, of Burlington, Iowa, gives $5,000 each, to the American Home Missionary Society, the Iowa Congregational Home Missionary Society and Iowa College, also $2,000 to the Burlington city library.

The Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior, in session at Chicago last week, reported $57,585 receipts for the past year, fifteen new missionaries sent out, and 1,143,000 leaflets distributed. Eighty lady missionaries are supported by this Board.

Mrs. M. L. Mc Lendon, chairman Committee on Entertainment, 117 Washington street, Atlanta, sends a most urgent request that all state corresponding secretaries send her, at once, accredited lists of their delegations to the National Convention.

The Prohibitionists of Rhode Island applied to the United States Circuit Court for the appointment of Prohibition supervisors at all polling places during the election. The state ballot law provides for Republican and Democratic supervisors, but makes no provision for those of other parties.

A wide-spread organizing in favor of Sabbath rest is developing in the three closely united cities of Davenport, Rock Island and Moline; it started among clerks; the Knights of Labor, Labor Congress and Farmers' Alliance are joining in the movement, and Christians of all denominations are backing it.

Postmaster Van Cott, of New York, in order to guard against unintentional violations of the law excluding lottery matter from the mails, announces that it applies not only to lottery tickets, circulars, etc., but to newspapers and other publications containing any advertisement of any lottery or gift enterprise offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, also that as advertisements of "European Government pension bonds" are held to come within the provisions of the law, no publication containing such advertisements can be received at or mailed from that office.

THE National Temperance Hospital held its annual meeting last week, closing its first year without debt, and with brighter prospects for the future than it has ever before known. A full report of its work is crowded out this week, but will appear shortly.

WE have just received the first number of the Temperance Teacher, edited by Miss Julia Coleman, published monthly by Frances Richardson, 47 Bible House, New York City, which promises to be very helpful to all teachers of temperance, either in Sunday or public school

CREDENTIALS for delegates to the National Convention will not be sent out before the delegates leave home; but each state president will be furnished a blank at the opening of the Convention which she will fill and to which she will certify, so says Mrs. Buell, National secretary, and all delegates will please take notice.

ALL of our regular "Contributions," and much other interesting matter has given place to the Temple this week. As this corner-stone laying is an event of a century we can afford to give it the right of way. The second paper of Judge McCulloch, on "What the Original Package Decision did not Decide," and other delayed matter, will appear next week.

SIX months ago Miss Juniata Breckenridge, of Oberlin Theological Seminary, applied to the Cleveland Congregational Conference for ordination; the only question which arose as to granting her request was based on her being a woman. The matter was referred to a committee of five to report at the next meeting. This committee has just reported in favor of her ordination, and their report has been adopted by a vote of thirty-three to fifteen. A minority report was submitted by Dr. Leavitt.

MRS. ELLIOTT, late president of the Illinois Non-Partisan Alliance, declined reëlection because she could not subscribe to Article 6 of their constitution which forbids any officer of the organization making speeches for any political party. She said she proposed to stump the county for the Republican Party nominees, and has kept her word by speaking at a Republican rally in Chicago last Friday night. A notice was immediately given that next year an effort would be made to strike out this obstructing article from the constitution.

THIS month the Methodist Churches are voting on the admission of women to the General Conference, all men and women of age, in full connection with the church, having the right to vote upon it. According to the Northwestern Christian Advocate, very little interest is developing in the matter, the vote thus far being much lighter than was expected. Doubtless interest will increase as the voting progresses. The Methodist press, with the exception of the New York, Northern and Southwestern Advocates, are in favor of women in the Conference.

THE fact that the dense crowds of Saturday, with the thousands of children massed on one of Chicago's busiest corners round which the cable cars spin every few minutes, were handled so admirably that not the slightest accident occurred, reflects great credit on the policemen in charge, commanded by Lieutenants Shepherd, Backus and Arens. Fifty patrolmen, dressed in their best, escorted the children and watched over their interests unflaggingly. "It's an easy crowd to handle," responded one to our remark of how admirably it had been managed. "Not much like a whisky crowd."

A CALL is out for a grand mass-meeting of the friends of the American Sabbath in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and Wisconsin, at the First Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago, November 11 and 12, 1890. Leading ministers and laymen have been engaged to discuss the issues involved, especially Sunday closing of the Columbian Exposition. It will probably be the most notable Sabbath observance meeting ever held in this country. All persons attending from a distance should secure certificates of the agent of whom they purchase railroad tickets, so as to obtain reduced fare in returning.

OUR office was thronged Friday and Saturday with friends coming from a distance to witness the ceremony of laying the corner-stone. Mrs. J. M. Graham and Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Dexter came from far-away Winnipeg, Manitoba; Mrs. F. H. Ingalls, National superintendent of narcotics, with her husband, from St. Louis; Mrs. Helen B. Harford, of the Missouri W. C. T. U.; Rev. J. E. Rutledge, of Browning, Mo., who carried the beautiful banner of that state; Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, president of Michigan, poet of the day; Mrs. Burroughs, of Cleveland; dear Mother Argo, of Clinton, Ill.; Mrs. Harrison, of North Carolina, are a few of those who thus honored us. Neighboring towns sent large delegations, notably Aurora, which sent nearly its entire union.

THE diabolism of saloon influence was never more apparent than in Omaha during the closing days of the campaign. Mob law reigned; the lives of leading temperance men have been threatened, and all forms of intimidation, as well as of boycotting, bulldozing and corruption, have run riot. Schemes for "doctoring" poll books, withholding Omaha's returns until those from the rest of the state are in, and then "stuffing" them as needed to carry the state for whisky, are among the "arguments" used by the opposition. The same spirit is at work in other parts of the state; Red Ribbon Hall in Lincoln has been repeatedly set on fire, the last time much damage was done, the fine pictures of John B. Finch and President Skinner being destroyed. The circular to teachers and friends of the public school mentioned last week, and which Conoyer, the clerk, owns to writing, has been sent broadcast over the state, with its lying statements concerning the pay of teachers in prohibition states on which it based a plea for license. All these frantic efforts prove how desperate is the case for the liquor men and how high the stakes for which they are playing.

THE Permanent Committee on Temperance of the General Assembly (Presbyterian) having received earnest appeals from Nebraska for aid in the prohibitory campaign, sent out a statement of Nebraska's need, through its sub-committee, Rev. J. B. Turner and Dr. I. N. Hays. Its object was to lay upon the hearts and consciences of Christians their duty to respond to these appeals. This was enforced by quotations from the repeated exhortations of Assemblies, Synods and Presbyteries upon the subject, for example, the utterance of the Assembly of 1890: "The peril of the public sale of intoxicants is too great for any valid excuse of its existence. We commend to our ministers and people, as Christian citizens, vigorous, persevering efforts towards the enactment, in every state, of statutes which shall hopefully secure the entire prohibition of a traffic largely responsible for the bulk of the drunkenness, crime, pauperism, and social miseries which afflict our land." A strong appeal for money followed in which it was declared that opposition to the saloon, the brewery, the distillery, is a most practical application of Christ's teachings. It is Christianity applied. "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil."

LAYING OF THE CORNER-STONE.

BY REV. J. E. RANKIN, D. D.

Where once 'mid Nature's trackless wild,
The wigwam's smoke was rising,
Where roamed, untutored, Nature's child,
Nor knew God's grace surprising:
Beneath yon temple, arched with blue,
Above the clouds extending,
To God we build this Temple new,
Our gifts and praises blending.

How changed, indeed, the outward scene!
Still downward glides the river;
The sun proclaims, with course serene,
The great, unchanging Giver.
But teeming towns around us throng,
Vast trains go by with thunder,
Labor lifts up her ceaseless song,
Awakens ceaseless wonder!

With prayer to God, this stone we place;
With cheerful songs, adore Him.
These walls, may they go up with grace,
With honor, rise before Him:
These gates, long may they open stand,
And children's children gather,
The Word of God, within their hand,
To learn of Him, their Father!

How soon will all our work be done,
How transient gifts and graces,
Our names no more beneath the sun
Be heard in sacred places!
God grant they may be written where
Unfold unfading pages;
Our souls as temples builded fair
Upon the Rock of Ages!

THE WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

Address at Laying of Corner-stone, Nov. 1, 1890.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

It was a legend of the Greeks that Atlas carried the round world upon his shoulders. It is a truth of science that man's head may mass within itself "the long result of time," "all that art yields or nature can decree," so that, having involuted here whatever has been elsewhere evoluted, that head becomes the globe's epitome. And thus each man may be himself the famous Atlas, carrying upon his shoulders his own world. What an illuminated globe is the great brain of Gladstone, of Tennyson, of Tyndall! What resplendent hieroglyphs of God, of man, of nature, gleamed from the mystic scroll of Shakespeare's brain, and Humboldt's and Spinoza's! And doubtless as God sees, to whom there is no little and no great, the rare and radiant sphere of each man's brain is a million times more marvelous than any globe that glitters in the midnight sky. The limitless outreach of thought that leaves the lightning far behind; the sweet reasonableness of reason; the brilliant play of wit; the white wing of imagination, that angel of the mind; the magic wand of memory; the splendid enginery of will; the witchery of love; the pure, bright flame of God's spirit gleaming at the center of all other powers and lighting up the mighty galleries of mind—all these are royal gifts that all were meant to share. But out yonder on Chicago streets well nigh five thousand shops are licensed to sell the poisons that darken every window of this temple built by God and lighted by the Holy Ghost. And the Woman's Temple, whose corner-stone we are so soon to lay, is reared because the noblest temple in God's universe is marred and blackened, shaken and shattered by the saloon poison that sickens every sense along the streets of all the world. From the heights that lift him nearest heaven, a few glasses of what they sell by government permission behind the screens that cannot screen their shame, will dash a man down to the dog's, the donkey's and the devil's plane.

Nay, I beg pardon of that trio, for each member of it strictly fulfills his destiny; but what shall be said of that Chicago father who, when drunk, beat his dying wife with the dead body of their infant child? Yet he was but the supreme consummation of what that man begins to be who desecrates with alcohol this temple of the body, this palace of God we call the brain. There is not a crime so impious, so unnatural and so loathsome as temple-desecration. In many lands it is punished by death. But what are senseless stone and mortar to this temple of an exquisite symmetry, with its holy of holies—the heart; its gleaming shekinah—the eyes; and its epitome of worlds—the dome that covers in a brain that can think God's thoughts after him! The Bible says: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."

The man who drinks desecrates the holiest temple in the universe; the man who sells intoxicating drinks is a temple desecrator by profession, and the Woman's Temperance Temple carries these supreme lessons to every thoughtful eye by its presence, by its name, by its uses, by its corner-stone bearing the sacred words, "For God and Home and Native Land."

The word temple means "palace of God." In the world's childhood men meant by this not merely a place of worship but the very dwelling place of Deity.

"The groves were God's first temples, ere man learned
To hew the shaft and lay the architrave,
And spread the roof above them."

The temples of Egypt are of immeasurable antiquity; they culminate at Karnak, where more than four hundred and twenty thousand feet are covered by a single one of them, five times as much space as is required by St. Paul's cathedral, London. Baalbec has three great temples, the largest two hundred and sixty feet in length and containing a single stone sixty-four feet long, thirteen wide, and lifted twenty feet above the ground.

The classic Temple of Vesta, most sacred of all Roman shrines, is said to have contained the sacred fire and relics upon which depended the existence, not to say the welfare of the Eternal City.

But the Bible has brought nearer to us than any other (except our own!) the Temple of Solomon, built about three thousand years ago, to contain the ark that held the Tables of the Law. But antiquarians tell us that this most famous of all buildings was not so large as the average English parish church of the last century. Herod's Temple, where our Lord once taught, was well nigh a hundred years in building, but was but little larger or more magnificent than that of Solomon.

The Temple of Juggernaut, in India, was built twelve hundred years ago, and is a huge pagoda, square in plan and finished with profuse ornamentation, and a tub-shaped dome. The whole Christian world regards it as the concentration of basest idolatry, and its profuse ornamentation reminds us temperance women of the high license grog-shop, as its tub-like dome recalls the "sour mash" tub of breweries, while its cruel worship well may typify the subservience of parties to the remorseless liquor power.

All of these temples I have visited except the last, and studied their ruins with intense interest, but the Parthenon, the classic Temple of Minerva, gleaming on the hills of Greece, with the resplendent statue of the Divine Maid, in fancy restored to its pristine glory, when her brilliant helmet and burnished shield flashed far out over the blue hills and bluer sea,—this sanctuary is the only one that the Woman's Temple in Chicago calls to mind. And the bewildering beatitudes of history have their climax in the thought that when Cadmus brought letters into Greece Chicago gleamed in God's great purpose already an accomplished fact; its solid streets and sky-climbing masses of stone and iron stood forth to Him as they do to us to-day, only a thousand times more wonderful, for God alone knows to what glory and greatness this city of material miracles shall grow.

The Temple of Minerva dominated the Acropolis at Athens beside the Mediterranean Sea; the Temperance Temple at Chicago will stand beside Lake Michigan; the first was dedicated to Wisdom's goddess, the emblem of man's reason; the last to Christianity, the fulfillment of man's faith; the woman's statue that crowned the one wore a helmet and grasped a shield; that which will crown the other has hands outstretched in blessing and face upturned in prayer. Athens marked with classic temple the loftiest height that man has reached alone; Chicago's temple soon shall hold aloft on Gothic spire that blessed cross which is the only lever that raises woman up, and with her lifts toward Heaven the world. Here may the fire of God's spirit ever burn, and the holy vestals of the Christian home keep bright its altars for wayward, wandering eyes to see, as the "light in the window" that recalls the fireside's cheerful glow of their childhood's happier years.

It is said that into the very fabric of some sacred shrines the rich and reverent have cast treasures of gold and jewels; but what temple ever had so much tenderness mixed in its mortar as this one that mothers love, and whose records hallow the names of little children here and in heaven?

The temples of Egypt were without windows; the woman's temple in Chicago will be flooded with light. The temple of Janus, at Rome, was closed in time of peace; but our peaceful temple of temperance and trade will be most open in most peaceful times, standing in mountainous majesty upon our chief commercial highways.

It is now almost seventeen years since the woman's temperance crusade began. That pentecostal movement lasted fifty days; drew not less than fifty thousand women out of their homes and into the saloons with Bible, prayer and song; and banished the grog-shops from two hundred and fifty towns and villages, beginning at Hillsboro, Ohio,—the Jerusalem of gospel temperance work. Mrs. Eliza Trimble Thompson, the woman who led the first among those peaceful praying bands, is here to-day, in the serene after-glow of seventy-five motherly years.

General Neal Dow, the man whose name will shine in history as the Father of Prohibition, is beside her, straight and sturdy as his native pines, and his good, gray head gleams with the gathered snow of eighty-seven soldierly years. Body, soul and spirit make the trinity of all effective forces, whether associated or individual. The spirit of the temperance movement is Christianity, typified in this saintly leader of the Crusade; its soul is righteous law, for which Neal Dow has stood so long; its body is that local habitation, stately and grand, whose corner-stone we put in place to-day. Chicago, cursed with five thousand saloons, is its natural location. Second only in population, it is America's first city in enterprise, first in fertility of invention, business resources, and that greatest of all qualities, faith. It is the world's chief market and railway center. While its shadows are dark, its lights are correspondingly brilliant. It gave to the world a Moody, greatest of evangelists; a Philip Bliss, to whom we owe the world-wide gospel songs; a B. F. Jacobs, inventor of the International Lesson series; it is the center of temperance work for Christendom. This Temple means the temperance question; it means the woman question; it means the labor question; for in the Temple that shall be reared on these foundations all great ideas embodying the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man shall have a home.

"Rise, Temple, rise," is the prayer of all our hearts. And not of ours only, but of that great company in the World's W. C. T. U. whose eyes converge upon Chicago, knowing of this hour. For the card of invitation bearing a picture of the Temple has gone to three thousand names among our local unions in Africa, Asia, Australia, Scandinavia and the Islands of the Sea. Lady Henry Somerset, of England, is thinking of us; so is Pundita Ramabai in her Bombay school; so is the Queen of Madagascar; so is Mary Clement Leavitt, now at work in Finland, Mary B. Willard, in Berlin, Hannah Whitall Smith in London, Jessie Ackerman in Australia, Mrs. Youmans in Canada, and Mrs. Whitney in Honolulu. There is not another building in Chicago so widely known, so widely loved, so cursed by bad, so blessed by good people. There is not a building in Chicago that has been the mother of so many lesser ones, for in all lands the W. C. T. U. is going into permanent headquarters of its own. Joint stock companies are being organized, stock taken, and the twofold plan of accommodations for our work and rentals to furnish funds for its prosecution is being generally followed. The Woman's Temple at Chicago means a new era in woman's work. Why should it not, for never before since the world began, was the inspiration given to any woman to arise and build on a scale so vast and for a purpose so progressive. Other women have indeed combined to erect orphanages, hospitals and prisons, in which to house the products of the liquor traffic; this woman plans for nothing less than to cut off the traffic itself. She is a type of the W. C. T. U., which expects by God's blessing to banish the use of alcoholic drinks from the customs of society, and the license to sell alcoholic drinks from the laws of the land.

Memorial Hall, the central attraction of the Woman's Temple, is some day to become the Westminster Abbey of the temperance reform. Here will be cherished its precious names and faces; here its brilliant banners will be hung; here its watchwords emblazoned; perchance its martyr's names inscribed. For this majestic movement has its romance and history; its literature and art; its discoverers and soldiers; its statesmen and saints. Seeking to overcome the greatest curse, it has enlisted the grandest constituency the world has known, except Christianity itself, of whose vast army the temperance movement is to-day the most aggressive and victorious battalion. And in this Memorial Hall there shall be a tablet for Mary Clement Leavitt, our temperance Stanley, who carried the war into Africa not only, but every country of the globe; one for Gen. Neal Dow, the Father of Prohibition; one for Eliza Thompson, leader of the Crusade, and for Mother Stewart, its Richard Cœur de Lion; one for Mary A. Livermore, our Great-heart among women, and one for Sallie F. Chapin, who has "fired the southern heart;" one for John B. Gough, our "Nonesuch" of the North, and one for George W. Bain, the South's chief orator; one for the mighty Finch that we have lost; one for St. John, the leader of Prohibition's steadfast army; one for Senator Blair, the famous champion of the National Constitutional Amendment; one for Margaret Bright Lucas, first president of the World's W. C. T. U., who left us but a year ago, and one for Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, of whom our hearts are sorrowfully saying:

"Green be the turf above thee
Friend of these better days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise."

But, best of all, this homelike amphitheatre, with a fountain in the midst, is to be open at all hours, like gates of gospel grace, that the health and healing of our Lord may be offered to the sick ones who come to us from the saloon. There will be one place in the city's center where the desolate and outcast, whether men or women, will always hear the song,

"Jesus the water of life will give,"

and

"In thy cleft, O Rock of Ages, Hide thou me."

There will be one Pharos lighted by a woman's hand, shining out fair and true over the billows of time and the breakers of temptation.

Over the entrance to this hall the words, "Not willing that any should perish," are to concentrate into a single sentence the spirit of the Crusade and purpose of the W. C. T. U. In our days of small beginnings, when our gospel meeting was held each afternoon in Lower Farwell Hall, how little did we dream of the mighty shelter that was coming in these better years. But all the while God's stone and iron were prepared, and His trees were in the forest for us.

"His purposes have ripened fast, Unfolding every hour," and here we are to lay the corner-stone and build what each woman's heart desires and needs, "a home of our own."

The mite-box is the best basis of this great undertaking; if each friend of temperance would send for one and put in the littles for a year, there would be enough to build the whole great structure. Fifteen hundred of these boxes are now in temperance homes, but there ought to be ten thousand. That number would mean success organized, preëmpted, captured by consecrated common sense.

Pray for the temple, then, every true heart;
Give to the temple, then, ye toilers of the mart;
"Granite from many mountains
Give strength to the Temple's walls,
And heart of oak grow stronger
As you answer the workmen's calls;
Thus, shall the lost ones rescued
In the years to come relate
How the daughters of women builded
For Heaven and Home and State."

Every enterprise originates from the inspiration of a single soul. The biographies of a dozen men contain the history of the world. They are the stepping-stones across the rushing stream of time; they are the sign-posts of the centuries. Life is the only real romance. God's picture book and fairy story are the only ones worth while. He works out each figure by itself; develops each character alone, then sets them in groups according to His heavenly plan. What a group is here from God's panorama of the greatest reform: The Methodist sister, Mrs. Judge Thompson; the fighting Quaker, General Neal Dow; the Scotch-Irish Presbyterian, transformed by thirty-five years of Chicago into the chief business woman on this continent, Mrs. Matilda B. Carse.

Some of us have hindered, and many have helped her but little. Business projects so colossal are certainly beyond my ken, but they are the basis of Chicago's greatness, and who of us is not willing (when she only asks permission to work for us, no legal responsibility whatever resting on the W. C. T. U.) to bid her God-speed, and to give her what we can?

A building thirteen stories high, nearly two hundred feet in length by one hundred in depth, and two hundred and sixty feet in extreme height, enclosing two million five hundred thousand feet of space, and costing eleven hundred thousand dollars, standing within stone's throw of the Board of Trade, and yielding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars annual rental, is such a body for the prohibition soul and Crusade spirit as bows me to the dust. Like Sheba's Queen before the Temple of Solomon, I "have no more spirit in me." But Mrs. Carse has enough for two—nay, for a regiment!

"Your courage rise with danger,
And strength to strength oppose"

has been her motto from the beginning.

Two women have been the Aaron and Hur of a prophetic trio—Esther Pugh, our National W. C. T. U. treasurer, who is custodian of the building fund, and Helen L. Hood, secretary of the Building Association. And there are two young Chicagoans—stalwart as athletes and as clean in their lives as women—David and John Carse—the loyal sons of a generous sire, long since departed, and of a regal mother, crowned this day by our love and admiration, who have stood by her like knights of the new chivalry. The woman who has come into the kingdom for such a time as this is no tyro in associated work for Christ. She is a Chicagoan of the Chicagoans, having lived here almost constantly since 1856 and seen the city grow from fifty thousand to one million one hundred thousand inhabitants.

Take this list of the institutions carried on by the Chicago W. C. T. U., of which Mrs. Carse has been president since I resigned that honorable position in 1879:

The Bethesda Dispensary has treated 1,651 persons during the year—physicians have made 206 visits. The Hope Dispensary has just started.
The Bethesda Sunday-school.
The Hope Sunday-school.
The attendance for the year at these two Sunday-schools has been 8,000.
Central W. C. T. U. restaurant, than which there is not a finer in the city. Here over a thousand are fed daily, and any profits made are to help carry on the local work of the W. C. T. U.

Take the Woman's Temperance Publishing House, founded by Mrs. Carse in 1880, with its $125,000 of capital stock, 150 employés, five editors, one hundred and twenty-five million pages sent out last year, and declared dividend of seven per cent to stockholders.

Take the Foundlings' Home with its $125,000 worth of property, of whose Ladies' Aid Society Mrs. Carse has been president twenty years, and which has placed thousands of friendless little ones in Christian families.

Take the Chicago Free Kindergarten Association, the Anchorage for outcast women; the Home for discharged prisoners; the Martha Washington Home for inebriate women—to all of which she has lent her firm, kind hand when they most needed help.

All these I mention as simple facts, not to praise one whose own works "praise her in the gates," but to illustrate the years and variety of experience through which she has passed in preparation for this culminating work of her beneficent life. She was made by the mayor a member of the county school board, and by Honorable Thomas W. Palmer, president of the World's Exposition, she was appointed a commissioner for Chicago. It should be mentioned that President Palmer, well known as a champion of woman's work, has become a member of the board of directors of the Temple. Mrs. Carse belongs to the Union Park Congregational Church, and for years conducted the sailors' gospel temperance meeting of the W. C. T. U. at the Bethel Home.

It was the sorrow in a woman's home and her heart-broken appeal that nerved the arm of prohibition's greatest champion; it was home sorrow that prepared the gentle heart of the Crusade's heroic leader, and it was a piteous hurt at home that dedicated to our sacred cause the founder of the Woman's Temperance Temple. Sixteen years ago she was living quietly among us, the wealthy widow of a leading railroad official, who died in Paris, in 1870, whither he had gone with her, seeking to restore his wasting health. She had three sons then, of whom the youngest, little Tommy, was lame, and went about on crutches. He was a beautiful child, of great intelligence and the heart of his mother's heart. One afternoon while she was absent visiting his father's grave at Rosehill Cemetery, this little one ventured beyond the sidewalk in his play; a huge brewery wagon, heavily loaded, and whose driver was stupid with beer, ran over the helpless little fellow, and when his mother came home she found him dead. Then and there, not out of personal animosity (for she never knew who crushed the life out of her happy boy), but because of the mother-love of that great, grieved heart, she took a solemn vow to dedicate her life to the cause of temperance, to the safety of our streets and homes; so the work of these sixteen years has been made solemnly significant by her pathetic motherliness of mood and purpose, even as the perfume of the sandal tree comes forth most sweet when the axe has laid it low.

"To love is to go out of self," and so that motherly heart in its wealth of womanhood has poured forth its love like a libation on the altar of home's holy cause. Forever let them stand there, side by side, in all our memories; this household queen, tender as she is brave, and the loving little lame boy by her side, soon to be prostrate at her feet.

"How long, how long, O cruel Nation,
Will you stand to move the world on a child's heart?
Crush beneath your heel its palpitation
And stride onward to your throne amid the mart;
But that blood plasheth upward, O gold-heaper,
And its purple shows your path;
While a child's sob in the silence curses deeper,
Than a strong man in his wrath."

Thank God, the gentle little fellow did not die in vain! His small, white hand shall help us build the temple whose real corner-stone is his heroic mother's heart; his pitiful and helpless gesture as he fell under the beer wagon said, long since silently, what thousands of temperance children will shout in chorus on Chicago's streets to-day, "Saloons must go," and from the heavenly city his sweet voice will join, perchance, with theirs to sing,

"Little eyes have watched you grow,
Rise, Temple, Rise!
You are built for us you know,
Rise, Temple, rise!"

INCEPTION OF PLAN AND PRESENT STATUS OF "THE TEMPLE."

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

President Woman's Temperance Building Association.

I trust I may be pardoned if I seem egotistical in what I may say in regard to the inception and plan of the Temperance Temple. Its history cannot be truthfully told without the use of the personal pronoun.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union was organized in Chicago in 1874. Soon thereafter they commenced holding a daily three o'clock prayer-meeting in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, then known as Lower Farwell Hall. For almost nine years these meetings were kept up by the W. C. T. U., and through their influence thousands of intemperate men were saved and started in the Christian life.

The policy in carrying on the work of the Young Men's Christian Association was changed about 1883, and they would not allow us longer to hold our temperance gatherings in their rooms. We tried to find other quarters centrally located for our meetings, but failed to secure any. This was a great grief to us, for it closed one of our most effectual branches of work. It was borne in upon me that the Lord meant we should have our own building and hall. At my request the Central W. C. T. U., of Chicago, of which I was president, became incorporated so they could hold property. An architect was engaged, who drew up a plan for a building which would cost $350,000. Stagnation in the business world just then caused us to defer, for a time, any further plans for a building. The plan grew upon me, however, but it had changed; instead of its being a local building, I was impressed that it must be a National one, and as the National headquarters had been removed from New York to the more central city of the nation, Chicago, I felt that here was the place for a beautiful Temple, different from any the world had ever seen, fitted for the needs of the age, uniting beauty and utility; a great building, within whose ample walls a quiet, retired, holy place could be found where devout souls who mourn over the immorality and intemperance of the world could meet and supplicate God daily to save the nation's homes. It would also be the headquarters of the largest organization of women the world has ever seen. Besides all this it must be a humming hive of business; from its rentals would be realized a princely income—not to go into the pockets of the rich to make them richer, but to be expended in educating the land in temperance and righteousness. Moreover, this beautiful Temple should be the gift largely of women and little children—a gift which they would lovingly lay at the feet of Him who is woman's great emancipator, the Lord Jesus Christ, He who said, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

Daily the plan unfolded and grew; it became my thought by day and my dream by night. I became conscious, as conscious as if a voice from the heavens had announced it, that I was to undertake the erection of such a building. A wonderful baptism of faith seemed granted me. I became possessed with the thought that death could not overtake me until the building was erected, until the work my Father had given me to do was accomplished. So strong was I in this belief that if all the world had said it could not be done, I would have gone on just the same. I went before the board of directors of the Central W. C. T. U. of Chicago and told them I desired to be released from undertaking a merely local building, that it had been made plain to me that the building we were contemplating must be made a National one. They kindly released me, and gave up the plan of a city headquarters.

I went to our National President, Miss Frances E. Willard, who is always ready for the next thing. A woman whose vision is so keen, so intuitive, so spiritual, that she sees with prophetic eye what the coming century will bring, almost with as much clearness as she knows what the past one has unfolded. I told her of the pattern the Lord had given me of a new Temple for the twentieth century. That I had heard His voice saying to the temperance women of the nation, "The set time has come, 'arise and build.'" She entered heartily into the plan, and the first article on the Temple ever written for publication was written by her in THE UNION SIGNAL of July 22, 1887, and about ten days after the Woman's Temperance Building Association had become incorporated, the purpose being the erection of a national building for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Do not let those who hear me to-day imagine that I merely sat down and dreamed over the erection of such a building. Nothing of the kind. I consulted with architects, real estate dealers, and well-known, reliable business men, who had made a success of erecting large office buildings. I unfolded to them my plan of raising money for the building. They assured me it would be a success if I could raise the money as I proposed. It was five years from the time the plan was first given me until it crystallized into an incorporated company, July 13, 1887.

At the National Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, held at Nashville, Tennessee, November, 1887, the plan was presented to that body for its acceptance. It caused great enthusiasm and was heartily indorsed.

The financial plan of the building is as follows: The Temple will cost $1,100,000. Of this amount $600,000 has been raised in stock. It is to be bonded for $600,000 more, allowing a surplus of $100,000 for necessary expenses which will accrue before rentals are due. The stock has been subscribed by those favorable to the cause of temperance who are willing to accept five per cent for the use of their money, allowing the W. C. T. U. the privilege of buying back the stock at par in five years or within twelve years.

The lot on which the Temple is built has a frontage of 190 feet on La Salle street by 96 feet on Monroe. It is owned by Marshall Field, and is worth at a low estimate $1,000,000. We have leased it from him for two hundred years, without revaluation, at a rental of $40,000 a year. Mr. Field charges no rent for the first year and a half, viz., from the time our option on the lot commenced.

Burnham and Root are the architects of the building, and from the picture before you, you will see they have designed a most superb structure; the style, as you will notice, is French gothic. It is to be thirteen stories high, and will be used as an office building, with the exception of the rooms set apart as headquarters of the National, state, and city organizations, and a hall on the first floor to be called "Willard Hall" in honor of our beloved leader and president, Miss Willard. The Hall will seat about seven hundred. It will have a separate entrance on Monroe street, and is to be memorial in its character, being lined with marble. Upon the walls will be inscribed the names of noble women and men, as well as societies, who have given $100 or over to the building fund. It will have memorial windows, and pedestals will support busts of illustrious persons who have lived and died for the cause of temperance. Memorial tablets will tell of the great and noble departed. From Willard Hall the incense of prayer will ascend every day in the year for the suppression of the liquor traffic and the salvation of the drunkard.

You will observe in the picture before you that the building line at the tenth story retreats and the immense roof which contains three stories commences breaking, as it ascends, into gothic turrets, from the center of which springs a flèche of gold bronze seventy feet high, surmounted by the beautiful form of a woman, with face upturned and hands outstretched to heaven in prayer, symbolical of the attitude of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as she protests against the laws and customs of the nation in regard to the liquor traffic and appeals unto God for help to save her home, children and land from its destroying power.

The Geo. A. Fuller company has the contract for putting up the building, and they have signed a contract to have it completed for occupancy by May, 1892. Mr. Henry Dibblee has the agency for renting it. He reports many banks and offices already rented and a steady demand for more. It looks now as if the entire building would be rented by the time it is completed. The rental of the building is estimated at $250,000 per annum.

It is to be hoped that in five years the Woman's Christian Temperance Union will come into full possession of their building. They have already given, and pledged in gifts to the building fund, about $200,000, and money and pledges are coming in daily with increased rapidity. The National W. C. T. U. already own a large block of the stock; with a membership of 200,000 among its women, and 200,000 children in its Loyal Temperance Legions, the entire amount which the building costs might soon be raised.

The temperance children of the land are greatly interested in building the Temple; a constant stream of small gifts is being received from them daily. Women of means are sending in gifts of $100, but the rank and file are only able to give small sums, and their efforts to raise even a small amount of money for the building are truly pathetic.

Who can doubt, however, that He who inspired the plan will carry it on to a glorious fulfillment? We hear His voice sounding out above the doubts of friends and foes, alike: "Be strong and of good courage, and do it; fear not nor be dismayed; for the Lord God will be with thee; he will not fail thee nor forsake thee until thou hast finished all the work for the service of the house of the Lord."

ADDRESS BY REV. HENRY A. DELANO.

President Chicago Baptist Ministers' Association.

Prouder than Roman arch, loftier than Egyptian obelisk, fairer than Grecian temple, that structure, whose corner-stone takes its silent place upon the witness stand to-day. Fixed, unalterable, beneficent shall be its testimony to the consecrated hearts where this great enterprise first had conception, and the clear brains that gave it birth.

The tears of the Crusade falling in atmosphere so cold, have at length, unheeded, and too long unpitied, congealed, and the same old deathless purpose is wrought at last in stone. But living stones they are, "set at nought of you builders," and now to become chief, foremost and glorious in the great plans and purposes of philanthropic souls.

Woman was defeated there in that Crusade, her heel only lightly bruised the serpent's head, but her language was, "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall I shall arise."

The world's least observant eye has seen that a new and heaven-born purpose took root in the soil of her heart, cloven by the rumseller's spade, and o'ershadowed by the cypress of her graves, and the past years have been but the gathering of cedar, and marble, and gold, and precious stones for the building of the House of the Lord.

Meekly she bowed, but she rises to conquer, and if not to conquer to stay, and evermore go in unto the King echoing the old cry back, to all protestants, "I will go in unto the King and if I perish I perish."

Possibly Longfellow sung her song, building better than he knew, when he wrote The Ladder of St. Augustine:

"We have not wings, we cannot soar,
But we have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.

"Some evils must be trampled down
Beneath our feet if we would gain,
In the bright fields of fair renown,
The right of eminent domain.

"The mighty pyramids of stone,
That wedge-like cleave the desert airs,
When nearer seen and better known
Are but gigantic flights of stairs.

"Standing on what too long we bore,
With shoulders bent and downcast eyes,
We may discern—unseen before,
A path to higher destinies."

A silent witness, I said, should take its place to-day. There is a silent grandeur of nature, of art, of life. Nature, after all, is vocal; the cold marble is articulate and stone walls can prophesy. "What mean you by these stones?" is answered by mute monument, pathetic, silent statue, and towering cathedral around the globe.

True history is but the survival of the fittest. Somebody has called history "only a revelation of what God cares for." "The hope and future of the races shine and shoot forth from the low, bad customs they have outlived and left behind." Idolatry, witchcraft, feudalism, slavery and polygamy in old forms, are left behind. Yes, the fittest survives. Thousands came out of Egypt, yea, millions, but who knows any of them to-day other than Moses.

Hundreds of Jews had their day wherein to throw a stone at Paul, or cry out, "Away with such a fellow from the earth," but I know Paul better than I know any of these men, and a word from those lips of dust, or a gesture from those fettered hands stirs the world more mightily to-day than all the cries of the Jewish mob.

"Baseness," says a modern sage, "is dissolution, nobility is resurrection." Religion, Buckle tells us, is stationary, only knowledge survives.

Only that lives and flourishes that is trying to find out what God wants, and interprets God to man and man to self. When religion, or institution, or man, proclaim themselves done, finished; then Ichabod is written upon them and they are forgotten forever. Hence the survival of that which has somehow fitted itself to God, and so become immortal.

Oh, yes, we all admit it,—poverty and war, and social feud, drunkenness and crime must die, ere ever the golden morning of Christ's coronation dawns,—then why not welcome the brave hearts and ready hands that come to do His will?

Creation is graduation, and the foot of beast, the song of seraph, the corner-stone or the turret height, are only degrees in God's universal plan. And who knoweth but that the particles of dust, earth, rock, marble and granite lying there, are on their way to intellect and feeling?

What God means shall come will come. Look, away there in the thirteenth century, that mighty, imposing Niagara of Gothic beauty, that poem in stone, the cathedral of Cologne, was begun. The architect is unknown. His name is perished. In 1322 it was halted and the waters of the Rhine laughed at ambition's folly. Began again, and in 1509 halted. Tradition says that a symbolic iron arm was reared over it, and gave silent mandate that it was done. In 1830 work was resumed, the decree was smashed, and onward, upward, higher and still higher rose the pile, until in 1842 Frederick William laid the first stone of the transept, and now its solid buttresses, its intervening piers, its vast forest of lofty sky-piercing pinnacles, stand in perfect beauty and triumphant glory.

The temple which enshrines the hopes and purposes of this grand sisterhood of the world will rise and find no interdict of emperor or king staying it, and yet, in this selfish world, many a malign influence may oppose its aims, and the haughty despotism of narrow minds become its foe.

While it shall have utility and take its quiet place in the inland metropolis of the world it shall have higher functions. Woe be the day when Chicago shall scout the things made for her peace. There is a sign here that with woman's kingdom is the hope of that kingdom of righteousness and peace for which groaning empires wait, and the faithful of the earth pray day and night.

Moral enterprises in this republic have, and must needs more and more, come from the moral affections, the philanthropic and unselfish love of woman.

Remind me of what men have done? I know that a bird will build a nest better than Plato or Shakespeare; that woman is for home and man for war. But what of the day when "nations shall learn war no more"? What of the republic whose mother birds shall supinely consent to build the offsprings' nest by the door of the gin palace or beer hovel?

Ah! men have fought and died valiantly for honor and truth's sake, but not until stern necessity was at their throats, evil became intolerable, and crime unbearable. Self-protection will spur the man—but justice, philanthropy, and holy impulse rule the woman.

Corn laws were abolished in England, but not until the very throne and the throats of royalty were in danger. Disestablishment was brought about, but not until the horrors of revolution froze the vitals of lords and commoners. Slavery was destroyed, and freedom made a truth, but not until the lagging feet of self-aggrandizement and lust were steadying themselves in the streams of a nation's atoning blood, and war did what simple justice in men's bosoms refused to do.

Never until something higher than finance, national banks, bridge building and railroad projects engrossed the legislative mind, did woman ask for place; but with the birth of a moral issue, a question that touches home and childhood, and mother life, that touched vitally th eternal and supreme law of right, she came to the front. Harriet Beecher Stowe, Lucretia Mott, Susan B. Anthony, and hosts of others were heard of then.

And she has come to stay. She is but laying her corner-stone to-day. She has only begun to build.

If the world is to have moral issues, if society has divine relations and obligations as well as human, then she is needed, and her work is but commenced.

If this mad old world, this sensuous world, is ever to surrender to His precepts, His teaching who lay upon Mary's lap, if prison houses are to be transformed into schools of opportunity and hope, if the enslaved inebriate is to stand forth free and erect again, fit companion of the woman who gave him birth, and the lost Magdalenes, sisters of weaker men, rise to the angelic plane of Saviour instead of Seducer, woman must have large field and wider opportunity.

Give her this leavening opportunity. She will recast, she will influence, she will, under God, regenerate; go to the bottom, elevate society, reform its laws, and change the howling, discordant mob into an orchestra of reason and sympathy, where each shall try some noble part and all keep time.

All hail, fair temple, for thou art coming to the kingdom for a time like this! There is vast evidence, I know, that Satan struggles for final ascendency, but the spiritual nature, illustrated more completely in woman, is gathering the strength of heaven for a last and final contest with the prince of the power of the air, and the fair, true womanhood of to-day gives prophecy of the spiritual development to be, and the glory of the latter house shall exceed that of the former, abundantly.

Greeting from Norway.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR MADAM:—I regret exceedingly that I cannot be with you at the laying of the corner-stone of your wonderful Temple on Saturday, November 1. Your inspiring circular has aroused my heart's enthusiasm for your exalted work, and I know I speak for the Brooklyn Woman's Club, when I say, this conservative city of the East sends cordial greeting to her brilliant sister of the West, and while she renders such noble service, cheerfully resigns to her the third place in the galaxy of cities. God prosper you, and speed the ultimate fulfillment of your purpose. Thanking you for your gracious invitation, I am sincerely yours, AMELIA K. WING.

104 Columbian Heights.

MANCHESTER, N. H., Oct. 28, 1890.

MY DEAR MRS. CARSE:—I greatly regret my inability to be present at the laying of the corner-stone of the Temple—the only real Temple ever reared by women, for women and for the world, since the dawning of time. On such an occasion the morning stars might sing once more together, and all the sons of God shout for joy. The exigencies of the political campaign in my state compel me to remain here, and I can, therefore, in response to your kind invitation, only congratulate you upon the sure progress of your noble work, and, anticipating its completion, bid you and the great organization whose home you are building, Godspeed now and forever.

Truly and respectfully yours,

HENRY W. BLAIR.

SENATE CHAMBER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEAR MADAM:—I shall undoubtedly be in Atlanta Nov. 14-18. I cannot promise to go to Chicago Nov. 1. This session has been very long and tiresome, and I feel that I must devote as much time as possible, during the short recess, to my private business.

Very truly yours, A. H. COLQUIT.

Sept. 30, 1890.

PORTLAND, ME., October 28, 1890.

MY DEAR MRS. CARSE:—I should need no urging to be present at the laying of the corner-stone of the Temperance Temple if it were prudent in me to undertake the journey. I have a bad cold (now better) of several days' standing, which may easily run into pneumonia. It is important to avoid that, especially for one of my age. It would be a great satisfaction to me to officiate at that ceremony. Very truly yours,

NEAL DOW.

DEAR MRS. CARSE:—It is not probable I can be with you and your Temple, November 1st. My health is so poor that I can with difficulty manage my church work. You cannot count on my presence, although the day will be a great day for all who wish well to the nation.

With love, yours, DAVID SWING.

66 Lake Shore Drive, Oct. 7, 1890.

OTTAWA, CANADA, Oct. 28, 1890.

DEAR MRS. CARSE:—Allow me in this informal way to acknowledge the invitation for Mrs. Foster and myself to be present at the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of Temple on November 1 next. Public business which detains me at the capital is the only reason that precludes us from being present. How grandly you and your colaborers have wrought to consummate this great undertaking I well know. The building itself will be the outward evidence—the inward consciousness of having been instrumental in making permanent so great a means of doing good is, however, the great reward. Allow me to wish you a most crowded and successful day.

Yours, etc., S. E. FOSTER.

TIIE KING'S BUSINESS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A special feature of religious and philanthropic effort in England is that made by individuals of wealth and influence in a purely independent fashion. They build their own halls, project their plans, and promulgate their beliefs, "without let or hindrance" from the organized bodies all about them, and often receiving the most hearty sympathy from the churches and associations in their neighborhood. The Star Hall work, planted in Ancoats, one of the worst districts in the great manufacturing city of Manchester, is an instance of this. A gentleman of great wealth, seeing the bitter need of help for these people, has come from his beautiful suburban home, and with his refined and lovely wife and family, has taken up his residence in the very center of the Ancoats district, building commodious quarters for all the work, evangelistic, sewing school, coffee tavern, library, etc; a large hall for the Sunday meetings, a smaller one for evening prayers and the other services of the week, with his own home joined as to walls, the whole group of buildings surrounding a little court.

The Star Hall occupies the site of a once popular dance house which bore the same name, and was torn away to make room for the new order of things. The architecture is beautiful; harmonious draperies shut off certain portions of the great hall, as needed, a grand piano and rich-toned organ are placed on the platform, a well-trained band of music has its own room for practice and heads the enthusiastic company that goes out for open-air services at stated times; the young daughter of the house has charge of the sewing-school and of the girls' class on Sunday; the wife holds mothers' meetings every Monday afternoon, when the smaller hall, seating two hundred, is crowded with women of every grade of poverty up to genteel respectability; mothers with shawls over their heads, carrying the baby in arms, and often leading another little one by the hand press in, eager for the word of life. Conversions take place every day in the services held here, and never have I heard more wonderful testimonies, thrilled with holy joy and power, than from these men and women who have been literally digged out of the lowest pit of degradation and wickedness.

A week spent in London recently, made me acquainted with other independent enterprises of a similar character, notably that of Speke Hall, in the southwestern part of the city, where a great barn-like structure, formerly used in the service of sin, has been transformed into a temple for the worship of the living God. This, too, is headed by a devoted layman and his gifted wife, and the same thorough consecration pervades their whole lives as in the first instance of which I have written, their very home being held only for God, their manner of daily living, food, dress, furnishing, training of the children, all for Jesus. One cannot doubt the reality of such things, and it is not surprising that the Speke Hall work has already widened into several flourishing auxiliaries in other parts of the great, hungry metropolis.

Another glimpse of Christian effort which made a peculiarly deep and delightful impression upon me was that of the Shaftesbury Institute, established in the very heart of the slums of West London, and conducted by Miss Meredith Brown, a delicate, quiet woman, who knows no fear in working for her Master, or she would surely have been driven away long ago from the dreadful sights and sounds that envelop her. Even during the meeting in which I was privileged to take part there were frequent interruptions at the very door; but peace ruled all hearts within, and it was an unmixed joy to look at the transformed faces of the band of girls whom Miss Brown and her associates had gathered in from the streets to train for useful lives, "and above all to be Christians," as one of the helpers whispered to me. The work of the Institute is as follows: Factory girls' classes and clubs, sewing classes, children's classes, mothers' meetings, working lads' clubs, Bible classes on Sunday for men, factory girls and house girls at their respective hours, open-air meetings, lodging-house, factory, workhouse and infirmary visitation, and very many individual cases. It has been carried on as faith work from the beginning, and God has signally honored every branch of the undertaking. Miss Brown's little book, "Dark Scenes in Factory Life," fully sets forth the lights and shadows of these wonderful years of labor, and it would intensify the zeal of our own workers, I am sure, if they would send for it, addressing Miss Brown at the Shaftesbury Institute, Harrow street, Lisson Grove, N. W. London. Ten cents will cover the cost, postage and all.

Of course the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL have not failed to breathe sympathy across the sea in behalf of the mourners gathered on English soil in memory of Mrs. General Booth, the Mother of the Salvation Army. Over forty-eight thousand people stood beside that honored bier during the three days that it remained in Congress Hall. As I looked on her features, so wasted by years of suffering, yet still under the dominion of that "informing spirit" of intelligence, eager purpose, and limitless consecration to God and humanity, I seemed to be almost permitted to hear the eloquent voice that was wont in former years to sway the great throngs of London that pressed to listen to her unsparing denunciation of evil, and burning appeals for righteousness. In shining letters at her head we read her last words: "LOVE ONE ANOTHER, AND MEET ME IN THE MORNING." At her feet lay the plain bonnet and cloak which she wore in her Army work. Over her floated the Army flag, with its vivid motto: "Blood and Fire."

The funeral services at Olympia with its vast throng of twenty-five thousand people were indescribably impressive, especially the consecration prayer, and the singing by the family of the last words which they had sung about Mrs. Booth's bed in her dying moments:

"We shall walk through the valley and the shadow of death,
We shall walk through the valley in peace;
For Jesus Himself, will be our leader,
When we walk through the valley in peace."

The leading voice, that of Emma Booth Tucker, rose clear and soft, mingled with the tones of the General, the little grandchildren, and the other members of the family, while hushed sobs throughout the great assembly formed an accompaniment to the pathetic chorus. Oh, may we live, serve, and conquer as did this great-souled woman!

The annual public meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance occurred in the Free Trade Hall of Manchester, on the evening of October 21, and was a notable occasion, in point of members, eloquence and enthusiasm. Sir George Trevelyan, M. P., presided, and made a fine opening speech. The immense hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, even of standing room, over five thousand people having come together in the midst of a driving rain. The leading speakers were, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M. P., M. W. S. Caine, Mr. David Lloyd George, M. P., and Mr. Samuel Pope. It seemed like a dream that I should be sitting there listening to Mr. Caine and Sir Wilfrid Lawson, concerning whom I had so often, within the last seven years, written "Signal Notes," and had tried to picture them to my own imagination. The reality was much better than my fancy, and they deserved all the applause they received, which was a great deal from first to last. A note of joyous victory ran through all the proceedings, over the defeat of the Compensation measure. Many allusions were made to the advance of temperance sentiment and legislation in America, and utterances of cordial sympathy in regard to the struggle in Nebraska. Sir Wilfrid Lawson described a touching scene which occurred during the recent Irish celebration in memory of Father Mathew, when a great number of persons took the pledge on their knees as it was repeated to them by Father Nugent, after the same manner in which Father Mathew was accustomed to minister in this holy thing. After all, is there any other way in which people can hope to keep it?

David Lloyd George, a young member of Parliament from Wales, took the hearts of his audience by storm. He poured out such a plea for temperance and righteousness as it has rarely been my privilege to hear. Once, in touching on a difficult, affiliated theme, involving the labor interests, he suddenly said: "I'm not a man of the world; I do not know its ways. I'm a simple Welsh lad"—here his voice was completely drowned by thunders of applause—"but since I first learned in my wild native tongue, 'Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap,' I have believed that a traffic which has sown in untold misery and ruin, must reap a dreadful harvest." He spoke in the most unaffected manner, and looked the ideal Sir Galahad as he uttered his honest, earnest principles. My heart was greatly cheered, as I trust many others may be, to know that the cause we love so deeply has its devoted leaders and united forces here, as well as in our own land, and that God is recognized as their strength and inspiration.

Our Children.

SALOONS MUST GO.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Songs sung by the children at the laying of the Temple corner-stone:

List to the tread of many feet,
From home and playground, farm and street;
They talk like tongues, their words we know:
"Saloons, saloons, saloons must go!"

For God they lift their flag of white,
His name is on their banners bright;
His law of purity doth show,
"Saloons, saloons; saloons must go!"

For Home's sweet sake they move in line,
With mother love their faces shine;
Their loyal hearts will have it so,
"Saloons, saloons, saloons must go!"

For Native Land their drums they beat;
Quick time they keep with marching feet;
America, for thee they know,
"Saloons, saloons, saloons must go!"

Thy kingdom come, O Savior, great,
In hearts and homes, in church and state;
But ere it comes, full well we know,
"Saloons, saloons, saloons must go!"

RISE, TEMPLE, RISE!

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

Upward thro' the sunny air,
Rise, Temple, Rise!
Brick and stone and timber fair,
Rise, Temple, rise!

CHORUS—Rise, Temple, rise;
Temple rise, rise, rise!
Rise, Temple, rise,
Temple, rise, rise, rise!

Walls so grand and doors so wide,
Rise, Temple, rise!
We are coming side by side,
Rise, Temple, rise!

Little eyes will watch you grow,
Rise, Temple, rise!
You'll be built for us, you know,
Rise, Temple, rise!

You will grow for temp'rance, too,
Rise, Temple, rise!
Grow for all things pure and true,
Rise, Temple, rise!

THE TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

Last Saturday there was laid the corner-stone of this beautiful building in which so many children all over the country are interested. I wish every one of you could have been here to march in the procession with your banners flying, your feet keeping step to Miss Willard's song, "Saloons, Saloons, Saloons Must go," and your hands pointing heavenward as you sing Mrs. Henry's Hymn, "Rise, Temple, Rise." Chicago never saw a more beautiful sight than that procession of children. I know that old King Alcohol, lurking behind saloon doors, and peeping out of beer barrels did tremble when he thought how soon they would "grow up."

As you could not all be here, I wish you would all learn the songs which were sung—that is what we print them for on this page—and sing them in your Loyal Temperance Legion meetings. "Saloons must go," is a capital marching song to sing at school and on your playground as you "march, march away."

Here is the responsive reading arranged by your Anna Gordon. Just try to imagine as you read it how grandly the responses made the arches ring when they were given by thousands of men, women and children.

Leader.—Fear not, O land; be glad and rejoice, for the Lord will do great things.

Audience.—The Lord gave the word: the women that publish the tidings are a great host.

L.—Thus saith the Lord thy Redeemer, . . . I am the Lord that maketh all things . . . that confirmeth the word of his servant . . . that saith to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid.

A.—Blessed is she that believed, for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord.

L.—Be strong and of good courage, and do it; fear not nor be dismayed; for the Lord God will be with thee; he will not fail thee nor forsake thee, until thou hast finished all the work for the service of the house of the Lord.

A.—The house that is to be builded for the Lord must be exceeding magnifical, of fame and of glory throughout all countries.

L.—Thou shalt make a plate of pure gold and grave upon it like the engraving of a signet, Holiness to the Lord.

A.—Thou shalt call thy walls salvation and thy gates praise.

L.—Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

A.—Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us.

L.—And they with whom precious stones were found gave them to the treasure of the House of the Lord.

A.—O Lord our God, all this store that we have prepared to build Thee an house for Thine holy name cometh of Thine hand and is Thine own.

L.—All things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee.

A.—Now, therefore, O God, we thank Thee, and praise Thy glorious name.

L.—Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; and establish Thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it.

All.—Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, world without end, Amen.

In the great corner-stone were placed the names of thousands of boys and girls who have contributed to this noble building. By the time you come to Chicago to attend the Columbian Exposition, as I hope you all will, the Temple will probably be finished. It will be the most beautiful building in Chicago, we all think, and on its very highest point will stand the figure of a woman with her hands clasped in prayer. Is not that beautiful for the crowning point of a building in which so many children are interested? You can each one of you think of it as the image of your own mother praying that you may grow into the very best kind of a man or a woman. For this is one thing which this Temple stands for—the making of all paths leading to the Grown-up-land, safe for little feet to tread.

Last week I went to the convention of the Crusade state. Do you know its name? There I saw the dear mothers of the Crusade, those who started the work which grew into the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and so made the building of this beautiful Temple possible. Mother Thompson, one of the loveliest old ladies I ever saw, was there—you would all want her for your grandma if you saw her—and Mother Stewart, who has written a big book about the Crusade. You know that in the Temple are to be marble slabs bearing the names of temperance workers; these slabs cost one hundred dollars each; the grown up folks are raising the money to put one in for Mother Thompson, and what do you think! one little girl only twelve years old, is raising the hundred dollars to put in the memorial to Mother Stewart. And the way she is raising it is the funniest part of it—she is publishing a paper, and giving ten per cent of all the money it brings in. It is not a big paper like the great "blanket" dailies, but just the daintiest, cutest paper you ever saw, about as big as your pocket handkerchief, and its name is The Midget. She is the youngest editor in the world, I presume, and her paper is very bright and interesting. Now I know you all wish to know her name, and where she lives, and how much her paper is a year. It is only twenty-five cents, and her name is Ethel Stout, of Delaware, Ohio.

This page of THE UNION SIGNAL goes on the "first form," that is, the half of the paper which goes to press first, and it must go to press before the great Saturday celebration, so I cannot tell you any more about it here, but you look sharp through the other pages, and you will see where I tell all about what the children did that day.

CAPTAIN MARY.

A BOY'S PARADISE.

The father mentioned in the following incident belongs to the large class of people who believe that "boys can be poked away anywhere," and in planning his new house no provision was made for the room which his young sons were to occupy. Fortunately, the lads had a grandmother who knew that an attractive room, all their own, has wonderful power to keep boys indoors in the eveuing; and the way in which she converted the father to her belief is thus described:

"David," she said to her son, "who is that large chamber for with the bay-window and two mantel-pieces?"

"For company, mother," was the reply.

"What company? I didn't know you expected any," said the shrewd old lady.

"O, for any one who happens along! By and by Emma will leave school, and have company, you know. James's wife and Cousin Hepsy come down twice a year to shop, and always stop here a night or two."

"But your own boys come here to sleep three hundred and sixty-five nights in a year, and have a thousand times the claim on you that any 'company' have."

"Yes."

"What arrangements have you made for them?"

And the father repeated the remark that he had made to his easy wife so often, that "boys didn't care, and that they could cuddle down and sleep anywhere."

"But these boys must not sleep anywhere after the new house is done. Unless you divide that long spare chamber into moderate-sized ones, and give one of them to the lads, I shall settle them in the room you have planned for me and make my home with Catherine. She has plenty of room, and is always urging me to come to her. I will not crowd your sons out of a room."

David Lane loved his mother, so the result was that the long "spare chamber" was finished so as to meet the wants of the boys.

Two happier boys never lived than these two when the time came for furnishing and ornamenting that room. Grandma took the matter into her own hands, and said they should have everything to their mind, so long as they kept within bounds.

"Now, what do you want in your room, boys?" she asked, when the house was nearly done.

"In the first place, we don't want any carpet, because somebody would be always telling us not to kick holes in it. We don't want black walnut furniture, nor a big looking-glass, nor china vases, nor anything grand that scratches or tears or breaks," Morton said.

"Well, say, what do you want, then?" said their grandmother.

"Well, grandma, we want an oiled floor, and two of your great braided mats; and an open fire-place, with your brass andirons from the garret; and a big hearth, where we can pop corn and roast nuts; and we want bright wall-paper, with pictures of the country; and two little iron bedsteads with blue spreads; four chairs, painted blue; a glass case for our stuffed birds; shelves for our books, and lots of hooks to hang our bows and arrows, violin, French horn, boxing-gloves, bats, and Indian clubs on. These, with the old sitting-room lounge and the old easy-chairs, will make us the most comfortable boys in the world."

Before the month closed, the "Boys' Paradise" was complete, and a score of wise fathers and mothers, with several scores of less wise boys and girls, had been invited to see it. No one now complains of the Lane boys for hooting from the top of the stone walls or howling about the streets by nights; and their mother says their music and their company do not disturb her half as much as the anxiety as to where they were by night used to do.—Exchange.

BETTER EMPTY THAN FILLED.

At a dinner in London lately Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the African explorer, related some experiences of his latest journey, one of which was decidedly interesting. Several men of the expedition, he said, received upon starting out a bottle of brandy each. The liquor was French, and the bottles were ornamental.

The first two months of the long journey were the easiest of all, and did not tax severely the endurance of the men, who nevertheless found it convenient, having the brandy at hand, to consume it little by little, so that at the end of those two months their supply of the stimulant was exhausted.

After that the hard work of the journey began. The men were none the worse for the lack of brandy. Mr. Stanley, after his many African journeys, knew this perfectly well. On a long and hard march in any country, stimulants are worse than useless. In an African journey, where everything depends upon a cool head, a steady will power which is subject to no fluctuations and a state of bodily endurance without reactions, alcohol is particularly injurious.

But Mr. Stanley had cautioned his men, after they had exhausted their brandy, to keep the bottles. They did so, and by and by they found some natives who were highly desirous of possessing those articles. Being in need of provisions, Stanley exchanged the empty bottles for supplies to the value of twenty-five pounds sterling, which sum was very much more than the brandy was ever worth at the highest valuation. This experience seems to suggest that while it may be wise to take bottles into Central Africa, it is rather better, on the whole, to take them empty than filled.—Youth's Companion.

A PROMINENT New York physician told me a few days ago that the constant chewing of gum has produced weak minds in fourteen cases of young girls now under treatment, the constant movement of the mouth causing too great a strain on the head.—Ladies' Home Journal.

The Household.

WILT THOU ME GUIDE?

BY MABELLE B. BIGGART.

Wilt Thou me guide? Swift comes the twilight hour,
And to its rest flew bird o'er perfumed flower,—
A trembling, weary soul, wilt Thou me guide?
It seeks its sorrows safe in Thee to hide.

Oh, could it lay its burden at Thy feet!
Oh, could it offer myrrh and ointment sweet!
It brings one little mite of rosy hue,
And holds it fast from eve till morning dew.

It fears to offer now this priceless gift,
Oh, grim and dark the shadows round me lift;
My faint and hungry soul before Thee stands,
And pleads for hope with weakened, lifted hands.

'Tis only Thou a broken heart can heal,
Though foot-sore now I'll trust, for joy I feel,
Can'st turn the night to endless, blessed day,
Wilt Thou me guide o'er hard and rugged way?

When eyes are dim, and foot-steps ever slow,
When others sink beneath their burdens low,
May they still seek and love Thee through the whole,
Give praise to Thee and trust with all their soul.

O Holy One, may each be glad to lend
His sweetest song forever to the end.
O lift my soul! In tender mercy hide,
Still Thou me guide. Through life and death abide.

Thy loving kindness I still need,
Thou art the Only One, and I will heed.
Swift close the day, while falls the evening dew,
My heart's best gift—it is of perfect hue.

WORDS TO THE WISE—WHY IS IT SO?

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

We have said that woman lets herself go (in marriage) too cheaply, accepting, it may be, wealth, or a comfortable home, or her board and clothes with hard labor conditions attached, or, as sometimes happens, the mere privilege of calling herself Mrs., whereas she ought to demand of the man nobility of character, together with respect and affection; demand, indeed, all qualities which draw forth her own love and respect. For the only true basis of marriage, the only basis of a true marriage, is a mutual attraction of mind and heart. One reason why a woman is ready to marry on a much inferior basis is the low estimation in which single women are held as compared with the married. That they are thus held is but a moderate statement of the case: is drawing it exceedingly mild. In the ordinary family we hear old maidism derided and spoken of as something to be avoided at almost any sacrifice. The habits, the occupations, the preferences and peculiarities of "old maid" acquaintances are lightly, we may say cruelly, commented upon. The little girl of the family hears all this, gathers and applies the moral, and, coming into young womanhood with this bugbear in mind, is hardly prepared to make high demands upon the man who proposes marriage. Often in children's nursery classics, as well as in more recent productions, a husband is the heroine's reward of merit, this reward being often set in a framework of wealth and grand position, and in some of our most popular modern juveniles the interest is made to depend largely on a boy and girl companionship quite different from a mere girl and girl companionship, the boy's presence and admiration adding zest to the story. In household legendary lore the young "Cœlebs" offers a tangled skein of silk, selecting for a wife the patient young woman who by long effort untangles the snarl, and rejecting every one who sighs over the task, or gives it up, or hastily cuts the knot. Another watches young girls at their bread-making, graciously selecting the thrifty one who scrapes every speck of dough from the trough. The woman's role is acceptance, the man's choice, and it is not generally considered so very much out of the way if the choice is made from motives of sensual gratification. The tendency of all this is harmful, because it takes marriage off that only true basis just now mentioned: mutual love and respect. While the well-to-do woman may marry, we will say from ambition, or on account of the greater respect and consideration accorded to the wifely relation, her poorer sister in the workroom, the salesroom, the factory, the various underground places of traffic, seems almost forced into marriage by a kind of necessity, a necessity of the present state of things. Her wages do but scantily furnish her a bare maintenance, often are not sufficient for even this. Her toil is oppressive; its weary hours stretch through the weary day; its fines and penalties hedge her about. Events show her that after a considerable lapse of years her services will be held in less account, and that her place will be given to some one whose more youthful attractions will more surely draw custom. Moreover, her across-the-counter acquaintance with women gives her a continuous consciousness that she is held in low estimation for the reason that she works for pay, in other words, she learns from them that idleness, rather than industry, is worthy of respect. Moreover, again, the average shop girl or factory girl cannot look forward to a time when she can secure even a comfortable livelihood, still less any amount of intellectual growth, or of what comes under the general name of culture.

Now from this irksome bondage, this despised and poverty stricken condition, this nightmare of toil and struggle, the one escape, as seen by her, is marriage. Thus the very force of the situation may compel her to feel flattered by and to readily accept the attentions of the first man who offers them, and to prevent her from making the high demands which should be made of any man who would assume the respousibilities of a husband and father.

We have glanced at some of the reasons why woman rates herself so cheaply and why so many marriages lack the only true basis; let us briefly consider the results of all this as affecting the community.

Perhaps it should be stated that the foregoing is said in a general way, and is to be taken only as it applies, and where it applies, and that the existence of true marriages is by no means denied.

THE POST OF DUTY IS THE PLACE OF BLESSING.

Although there were very few in all the vast crowd at Bethlehem who were interested in the wonderful advent of Christ, there were hosts of unseen friends on high to join the lowly shepherds in their glorious acclaim of joy. Even so is it now. The great whirling world may care very little for the unseen realities, but there is, nevertheless, a great multitude of the heavenly host who are at work with the saints below, in bringing forward the things that pertain to the Kingdom of God. It is so in all great movements. The total abstinence cause will certainly be victorious over all enemies of our Lord and of His Christ. The unseen helpers are at work with the lowly shepherd worshipers of earth.

These shepherds were at their post of duty when the heavenly helpers were revealed. And whoever would catch the blessing from on high, must be at the post of duty. A truly religious person is never so religious as when in the very thick of work. A religion that does not exalt and ennoble life, in every attitude and aspect, is a dead religion, and the sooner it is relinquished, the better. Our religion must glorify our work. We do not need to go apart from our work to get at our religion. Wherever the post of duty is, there should our religion keep us company; showing itself in fidelity, trustworthiness, courage, patience, and generous kindness. And there will it find all true Christian soldiers, fighting a good fight

"Content, like men at arms, to fight
Each with fronting foe."

Religion is soul-health. It is the very climate of the soul. It is the atmosphere in which the soul lives. And the humblest ones of earth may forever rejoice in the fact, that the first homage paid to the Incarnate Son of God came from the humble watchers on Bethlehem's plains. And whoever makes it the supreme business of life to help the poor and the needy in the destitute places—the mangers of this world—will surely find Christ in the manger, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

A STORY OF MT. BLANC.

BY A. J.

I am very impulsive and need to be led. I specially needed it when young.

I learned a lesson, in a short sentence, a few years ago, I have never forgotten.

We were at the foot of Mt. Blanc, in the village of Chamouni. A sad thing had happened the day before we reached the village. A young physician, of Boston, had determined to reach the heights of Mt. Blanc. He accomplished the feat, and the little village was illuminated in his honor; the flag was flying from the little hut on the mountain side—which all who have visited Chamouni well remember—that told of his victory. But after he had ascended and descended in safety as far as the hut, he wanted then to be relieved from his guide; he wanted to be free from the rope, and he insisted that he could go alone. The guide remonstrated with him, told him it was not safe, but he was tired of the rope and declared he would be free of it. The guide had to yield. The young man had gone only a short distance when his foot slipped on the ice, and he could not stop himself from sliding down the inclined icy steeps. The rope was gone so the guide could not hold him or pull him back. And out on a shelving piece of ice lay the dead body of the young physician as it was pointed out to me. The bells had been rung, the village illuminated in honor of his success, but, alas, in a fatal moment, he refused to be guided; he was tired of the rope.

Do we not get tired of the rope? God's providences hold us, restrain us, and we get tired sometimes. We need a guide, and shall till the dangerous paths are over. Never get disengaged from your Guide; let your prayer be "Lead Thou me on," and sometime the bells of heaven will ring that you are safe at home!

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 23:13–32; Isaiah 43–48.)

Sunday, 16; Luke 23:13–32. Verse 14, Sometimes the disciples of Jesus and the church are justly found fault with, but there is no fault to be found in Him. It is remarkable that the infidel world has been able to find so little fault either with Jesus or His Gospel. His words have given to the world the highest knowledge of God, of man and his relations, and of human destiny. Verse 23, How dreadful are hatred and malice, when they could lead the people on against the meek, and innocent, and righteous Jesus, to make for themselves the most awful record of wickedness that the world has ever known.

Monday, 17; Isai. 43. Verse 2. How remarkably beautiful is this verse of Scripture, which gives to all who are passing through trials and affliction such comforting assurance that they shall not be injured. Verse 18, We should always keep in mind the care God had over our fathers, and the many times He has cared for and delivered us. This should mightily encourage and strengthen us to put our trust in Him for all the future.

Tuesday, 18; Isa. 44. Verse 3, What a source of unending comfort it is, that God has not only chosen us, but our children as well. As families we should feel a united interest in Christ, because each one of us is equally an object of His care and interest. He came to bless families. Gen. 12:3. Verse 6, As there is but one God, we are safe by putting our trust entirely in Him; for there is no other God to withstand His purposes or that can destroy His work. He is a stronghold to take refuge in, and a solid foundation to build on.

Wednesday, 19; Isa. 45. Verse 1, The naming of Cyrus nearly 200 years before he was born, is a proof of Isaiah's inspiration that cannot be set aside. Verse 5, God has a life plan for every man, and if we do not follow the plan He has for us we cannot be blessed.

Thursday. 20; Isa. 46. Verse 1, Babylon's idols could not save either themselves or the people. Verse 4, Idols must be carried from place to place by their worshipers; but our God carries us from infancy to old age. Verse 10, Only God's plans will stand, therefore nothing is settled until it is settled right.

Fviday, 21; Isa. 47. Verse 10, The doom of a Nation is written, when it begins to trust in its wickedness. When our Nation relies for its revenue upon things that debauch the people, like whisky and tobacco, by all the teaching from God's dealings with other nations, shall we not perish if we do not hasten to repent? Verse 14, When God's work of vengence begins, it is always worse than the people expected. When the civil war broke out, which was God's vengeance on this country for the wickedness of slavery, it was thought that it would end in about sixty days.

Saturday 22; Isa. 48. Verse 5, God sent his prophets to Israel and events were announced, so that when they took place they might not foolishly ascribe them to other gods. Fulfilled prophecy is proof of the truth of revelation. Verse 18, There is no safety for us unless we sincerely keep the commandments of God. We will find no peace by following the evil example of Israel into disobedience and worldliness.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Soul Food—"Bible Reading Leaflet," July, 1889—Isa. 55:1, 2.)

1. Our souls need food just as much as our bodies. We must have good mental food in order to spiritual health, as we must have good physical food in order to bodily health. Novels, gossip, and the sensational matter served up in daily papers as a rule, is poor food. Leanness of soul follows the use of this bad food, and it brings upon us the wrath of God or the inevitable results of our own bad actions.

2. God has for us food sufficient, and we all may feed upon it and be satisfied. The text shows that it is satisfying and it is freely provided for all.

3. We find the real bread of life for our souls, by practically feeding on Christ. John 6:48-58. We do know in our experience, that in some sense we live on Him by filling our souls with believing thoughts about Him.

Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone; a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste.—Isaiah 28: 16.

And the Word of the Lord came to Solomon, saying, Concerning this house which thou art in building, if thou wilt walk in my statutes and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them; then will I perform my word with thee, and I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will not forsake my people Israel.—I Kings 6: 11-13.

LAYING OF THE TEMPLE CORNER-STONE.

The great stone is in its place, grace, grace unto it. Never did Chicago witness such a scene, nor has its like been seen in any city nor in any land. The date, November 1, was fixed for a Saturday, that the children might participate, and most grandly did they come up to their privilege. At one o'clock they commenced gathering, marshalled in bands and battalions, several thousand strong, and were seated in the galleries surrounding the four sides of the great Second Regiment Armory. There their bright faces shone, tier on tier; almost every child carried a small flag, while the army of banners was thickly interspersed in the shining ranks. Time and again the children joined in the applause of their elders with voice and waving flags,—a billowy sea of red, white and blue.

Meanwhile the main floor was fast filling up. And fill it did; every seat, every inch of standing room was taken; a dense mass of humanity, through which it was impossible to wedge one's way. The stage too was crowded, and bright not only with grand faces, but with flowers and banners.

Mrs. Carse introduced Miss Willard, who, she said, would at her request preside. Miss Willard remarked that she was so accustomed to preside with gavel in hand that she did not know how to do it without. None being within reach, a workman's battered hammer was given her and, decorated with white ribbon, did service as a gavel very appropriately in view of all the service that workmen's hammers must do in rearing the Temple whose corner-stone we laid that day.

The exercises opened with "America," a children's chorus, and how those children did sing! A slight, "gracious girl," as Miss Willard called her, Miss Mary Hofer, acted as precentor, and never did any pompous musical conductor so well do the part. Every movement was grace and her face was an inspiration to others than the thousands of children who so faithfully followed her leading. The Crusade Psalm was then read by Rev. Florence Kollock, pastor of Englewood Universalist Church. We had hoped to have Mother Thompson stand by her side, but affliction in her family kept the dear leader at home. Many loving thoughts went out to her, and many prayers implored God's blessing on that good gray head.

Rev. E. P. Goodwin, D.D., pastor of the First Congregational Church, Chicago, led in prayer, closing with the Lord's Prayer in which the vast audience joined. Bishop Samuel Fallows, D. D., of the Reformed Episcopal Church, then led in the responsive Scripture reading given on page six, thousands of voices joining in the response, as the audience, standing, read the alternate verses. We doubt if ever before that Armory resounded to the voice of prayer and Scripture as it did that day.

Miss Willard now introduced in her happy fashion, Mrs. Katherine Fisk, who sang Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic," as one can hear it sung only once in a lifetime, the children in the galleries and the audience below joining in the chorus. I wish I could make each one of you feel the inspiration of that moment, when from thousands of throats rolled out the refrain, "For God is Marching on." How wonderful His marching seemed, as we looked back over the quarter of a century since those words were written, and remembered that then the organization which has made the erection of this Temple possible, and which now encircles the globe, did not exist, even in the imaginations of those who now are its leaders.

So high was the pitch of enthusiasm that it seemed nothing could follow which would not produce a disastrous tumble; but when Miss Ames, "our Yolande," stepped to the front and commenced in her clear, mellow voice the reading of Mrs. Lathrap's poem, all felt that there was no fear of such a catastrophe; she took the audience up, right on the plane where the song had left them, carried them still higher, and then gently brought them down to rest at Jesus' feet. The culmination of the exercises at the Armory seemed to me to be reached with her utterance of the closing lines,

"Who knows but on this altar place
May shine the glory of His face
When Jesus comes."

Our artist has given a lovely setting to this poem on our second page; but nothing can bring out its beauties more grandly than did the cadences of that well-trained, sympathetic voice.

Miss Willard now introduced Rev. A. H. Delano, D. D., president of the Baptist Ministers' Union of this city, who gave the polished address reported on page three. At its conclusion she introduced Mr. Whitney Mockridge, who, Mrs. Carse says, has the finest tenor voice in the country; he sang, "Be Thou Faithful Unto Death," in a manner to make all believe her words, and very obligingly responded to an encore, with a selection from "Rigoletto."

Miss Esther Pugh read a number of letters and telegrams expressing regret at not being able to be present, and good wishes for the success of the enterprise. Among these expressions of interest were those from President Harrison, vice-President Morton, President Palmer, of the Columbian Exposition, who had expected to be here and address the audience, but was detained; General Neal Dow, Samuel Dickey, and Lady Macdonald, wife of the Premier of Canada, who not only expressed lively interest in the Temple, but strong approval of the W. C. T. U. A cablegram from Norway was also read.

Miss Willard now resigned the chair and gave her address, making many happy hits in her appeal to the children, which cold type fail to give you. Mrs. Carse followed with her historical paper, giving the "Inception of Plan and Present Status of the Temple," and this closed the exercises at the Armory.

Now came the most impressive part of the ceremony, those thousands of children with their banners, marching through the streets of Chicago, keeping step to the music of "Saloons, Saloons, Saloons must go." Before them marched four sturdy policemen, clearing the way, then came the band, and after that the tramp, tramp, tramp of those feet, whose march makes King Alcohol tremble. At the head of the children's procession walked two young girls, in white, carrying the beautiful Temple banner; their names are Hannah Grimn and Tillie Hendrecksen; glad and proud were they to represent their native Norseland—the land of Jenny Lind and John Ericsson, in this procession which means so much for the land of their adoption. Behind them came, in close marching ranks, band after band of Loyal Temperance Legions, each bearing its banner, as well as some one of the many others which were sent from all over the land. "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up," "We'll stand for the Right," "Prohibition is Home Protection," "God bless our Homes," "We'll Work for Temperance," "God is Helping," "Make Your Record Clean," were some of the significant mottoes those banners bore. Just before the procession turned into La Salle street a patrol wagon dashed through the crowd gathered there, and my heart stood still for a moment lest it should dash in among those children. It passed on safely, yet to many it brought the thought of the more terrible danger which the saloon brings to all those brave young soldiers, for in it, guarded by policemen, was a woman, drunk.

Meanwhile dense crowds, largely composed of men, had gathered at the corner of Monroe and La Salle streets, where the great foundations rest. The north half had been floored over, and this was guarded by policemen to reserve it for the children; a raised platform gave space for the officers and speakers, while still above it on another platform, rested the huge corner-stone, with tackle attached, ready to be lowered into place. This stone is of granite, finely polished on its sides to receive the inscriptions; it measures seven feet, nine inches on each face, and weighs over ten tons.

Standing on this upper platform, a never-to-be-forgotten scene lay spread out before us—the great masses of people filling the streets below, crowding every window of the great buildings surrounding us, even perched on the roofs of those tall structures; on the upper platform, stalwart workmen, with their hands upon the capstan ready at word of command from their leader to lower the great stone into place; just below, those leaders among men and women, Mrs. Carse, whose sublime faith, removing mountains of difficulties, has brought all this to pass, Miss Willard, Mrs. Lathrap, of Michigan, Mrs. Nichols, of Indiana, Esther Pugh, the stalwart, Helen Hood, the unstampedable, Father Hastings, Dr. Herrick Johnson, Dr. Goodwin, Bishop Fallows, Dr. Bristol, Mr. A. S. Packard, and other noble men and women; then that lower floor, filled with the children, and as many of our rank and file as could find standing room there; flags flying, banners waving; Oh, it was a sight to rejoice men and angels.

And when those clear young voices, led by their incomparable precentor, Miss Hofer, and Miss Nash who had so patiently drilled them, sung Miss Willard's song,

"List to the tread of many feet,
From home and playground, farm and street,
They talk like tongues, their words we know,
Saloons, saloons, saloons must go,"

every heart responded "Saloons will go" when this army grows up.

Dr. Herrick Johnson, President McCormick Presbyterian Theological Seminary, now offered the dedicatory prayer: "O Lord God Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, there is no God beside Thee. Thou dwellest in the high and holy places and inhabitest eternity. Heaven and the Heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee, how much less any house that Thy creatures can build! Yet, Thou condescendest to dwell in the heart of the lowly and the contrite. Of old Thou didst accept the temple Thy servants dedicated to Thee. And Thou hast kept covenant with Thy people from generation to generation. . . . Here we have laid the foundations of another temple, and as we this day lay its corner-stone we would set apart the structure by solemn act of dedication to the service of Almighty God. We pray that from foundation to top-stone it may be reared in Thy name and for Thy sake.

"We gratefully recognize the hand of our God upon us in the vast movement of which this Temperance Temple is to be the material embodiment and expression. Thou hast indeed made the weak things to confound the mighty, and Thy ways, Oh, Thou blessed and glorious Lord God Almighty, are not our ways, nor Thy thoughts our thought. We thank Thee that Thou didst put it into the heart of woman to organize the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, now covering the continent with its multiplied auxiliary and beneficent influence. We thank Thee that it was begun in prayer, that it was given a Christian name, that it was inscribed "For God and Home and Native Land," and that it has been kept true to its first consecration made by godly women on their knees as they baptized it with their hearts' tears, and implored Thee to put Thy seal upon it We thank Thee for its trials and its triumphs. We thank Thee for its crosses and its crowns. We thank Thee that it has passed from the day of small things to this day of mighty things. Thine is the glory and the power and the victory. Blessed be Thy name for the loving Marys and Marthas and Phœbes and Dorcases and Tryphenas and Tryphosas who, through this Woman's Christian Temperance Union, have brought their alabaster boxes of precious ointment and broken them for the bruised and heavy-hearted.

"And now, O Lord, as the corner-stone of this Temple building is laid in Thy name, we invoke upon the work of our hands Thy heavenly benediction. Speed Thou the house to its completion. May it stand perpetually for purity and sobriety, for truth and righteousness. Amid the hum of traffic about and within its walls may the voice of daily prayer forever be heard. Write Thine own name upon its room of assembly. Give Thine own wisdom to those who shall here counsel and plan for temperance and godliness and chaste lives. May the solid front of this Temple be lifted high to the sight and heart of this city in token that woman is here seeking, by earnest prayer and loving ministry, to put a bulwark of defense about the tempted and the fallen. Let it stand as the enduring granite protest of womanly hearts against the traffic that curses the home and degrades womanhood. May many a slave of the drink habit here be broken of his fetters. Give the poor outcast that passes this way, however lost to virtue, a sense of possible deliverance as she looks up at this house, and thinks of the Christ-like compassion that is here seeking to save the ruined and the lost; and may the memories thus stirred, and the hope thus kindled, lure the wayward, soiled prodigal back to virtue.

"To this end make this Temple, we beseech Thee, a fountain, a refuge, a sun, a battlement, a proclamation. May influences go out from it of every high and beneficent sort, fit for woman's heart and hands. Deepen and widen the waters that may flow from this temple door until they are "waters to swim in"—a river that cannot be passed over. Keep them pure and sweet by Thine Almighty grace, so that many a miry place, and many a thick-mantling pool of lust shall grow clean from their coming.

"And the praise of this and all other redeeming work we will give to Thee, Father, and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen."

Now all who could gathered round the great stone in whose recesses rested the two copper boxes, so soon to be covered from human sight by the ponderous mass of granite suspended above. In one box were thousands of names of contributors of the "mites" to the building of this Temple; baby bands, gathered by brave Jane Weeden and other mother-hearted women, Loyal Temperance Legion boys and girls who, in their glad spring-time have dedicated its gladness to God and temperance, men and women, bravely fighting in the thickest of life's battle; all these names rest there, and perhaps will rest, till the sea gives up its dead, for these foundations seem made to last as long as the great globe itself. In the other box was the Bible, whose spirit inspired the work, records of the Temple from the time it existed only in the brain and heart of Mrs. Carse till this day, records of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, National and state, which made the realization of this grand conception possible, Miss Willard's published books, and many other publications of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, copies of temperance papers, and of other papers in this city, portraits of leading temperance men and women, records of various other temperance organizations, coins, medals and other characteristic things for thirtieth century people to wonder over.

All was ready, and at the signal given by L. J. Wells to John Riley, the mason in charge, the men at the capstan carefully lowered the huge corner-stone till it dropped into its place, where Mrs. Carse, with a trowel which had been presented for the occasion, had placed the first mortar, and more skilled hands quickly finished the operation. Miss Willard struck the great stone three times with her hammer, one for God, one for Home and one for every land. Waving handkerchiefs gave the signal of completion and the sweet young voices at once struck up Mrs. Henry's hymn:

Upward through the sunny air,
Rise, temple, rise.

At the refrain thousands of arms were lifted with graceful, rhythmic motion, and many eyes grew dim looking at the beautiful, swaying mass of children, thinking of what this Temple meant to God's little ones. Many hearts were filled with tender, loving thoughts of the noble man and woman who built the first Temperance Temple for whose dedication this hymn was written, and prayers went up that through the dark cloud now overshadowing them God's love may so shine as to make their way light.

So inspiriting was the children's singing that Dr. Johnson proposed "three cheers for the children" and led off the "Hip, hip, hurrah" in a way which would have done credit to a college student, the audience joining with a will. "Now three cheers for Mrs. Carse," and they were given with like vigor, as were three cheers for Miss Willard and the W. C. T. U.

All then joined in singing the doxology, Rev. Frank Bristol, D. D., pronounced the benediction, the people slowly separated, and the grand occasion was over.

Not so its influence, for never was a more impressive object lesson witnessed. Not the most hardened in that great throng could have been untouched by it; to weak, tempted ones, it spoke of a future when the prophecy of the children's song shall be fulfilled and saloons, with all their horrible influences, shall have gone; to fathers and mothers it spoke of something better in life than money, fame or power— of the great "to be" in the future, when statesmen shall recognize the great truth that the protection of home is the chief concern of government. To the young men and maidens it voiced the call to the New Chivalry of Temperance, Purity and Truth; it spoke of the noble manhood and womanhood opening before them, wooing them to do exploits for God and Humanity. And those children—not one can ever forget this day with its lesson of song and story, of Scripture and prayer, all focused round the idea of temperance.

AN ARMY WITH BANNERS.

Nothing was more impressive than the wonderful display of banners. In response to Mrs. Carse's request these were sent from all over the land, each with an individuality and history of its own, and each rich in clustering associations. Their elegance and beauty of workmanship prove that the hard work our women are doing in the grand reform has not in the slightest degree dulled their æsthetic taste, nor detracted from the womanly skill of their fingers. Most of them were of white silk or satin, beautifully embroidered or painted with the emblems as sacred to the W. C. T. U. as were ever the eagles to the legions of Rome.

Missouri's standard showed a golden eagle on its staff; the banner beneath bore the state seal, with its legend, "Salus populi suprema lex esto." Above it, on a scroll, encircling a sword, was "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon;" and beneath, "VOX POPULI, VOX DEI." This was the largest, most imposing banner in the procession. Next it in size and very similar in texture and trimming was the banner of Maine, its staff also supporting a golden eagle. On it were pictured the pine trees of Maine and the trailing arbutus of the National Union, and its legend is, "In the name of our God we will set up our banners." Missouri's state banner bears, on a rich plush shield, the motto, "What ought to be done can be done."

From Xenia, in the Crusade state, came a beautiful banner with the same motto; its emblems were exquisitely wrought—an angel bearing the Crusade torch; a pillar sustaining the foundation stones of the W. C. T. U., the cross and the shield, and beautifully intertwined with all were oak leaves and ivy vine.

Hannon, Mississippi, Band of Hope, sent an elaborate banner of dark velvet on which was pictured the American eagle throttling the serpent and showing the motto, "The Saloon Must Go." Lanark, Ill., Band of Hope, sends a banner of blue with white lettering and a bunch of wild roses and wheat painted on it; Belmont, Iowa, Loyal Temperance Legion also sends one of blue, with a beautiful tracery of morning-glories. One of the Chicago Bands has one of plush, on which stands the boy leaning against the cross draped with the flag, and the motto, MRS. MATILDA B. CARSE.

"Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up." "Company A, 76th Regiment, Loyal Temperance Legion, Ohio," takes as its motto, "Make your record clean." Another bears the words, "God is Helping," and many others, beautiful and inspiring, are borne by the hands of the children. The Young Crusader banner bears the pictured semblance of its brave young namesake beautifully painted on satin. We are very proud of this picture, as it is the work of our own presses.

The Y's of Delaware send their beautiful banner, bearing upon a white satin ground, boughs covered with peach blossoms, and beneath the text, "Herein is your Father glorified that ye bear much fruit." The banner of the Findlay, Ohio, Y's is very lovely with its pictured nasturtiums. South Dakota Y's send their banner with its text, "Whatsoever God saith unto thee, do it." The Willard W. C. T. U., Detroit, Michigan, shows on its escutcheon the pictured face of our National President, and a bunch of trailing arbutus. Iowa's banner bears the state motto, "This is the victory, even our faith." Miss Willard's beautiful banner bears her well-known words, "We wage our peaceful war for God and Home and Every Land," and the water lily, emblem of the World's Union. The same flower and the same motto, with the exception of one word, adorn the beautiful banner presented to the National Union by Mrs. Carse for competition in membership. A crimson satin banner bears a cluster of white roses and the truth, "Prohibition is Home Protection."

Findlay, Ohio, must possess many artistic white-ribboners, as a second banner comes from there, with most exquisitely painted white roses. San Antonio, Texas, sends a very beautiful emblematic banner, as does Flushing; thus literally do these banners come from the Atlantic to the Gulf, showing the wide-spread and deep interest in the Temple whose corner-stone was laid with rejoicing. Several National departments are represented by banners, among them none more artistic than that of the department of non-alcoholic medication, with its legend, "For the healing of the nations."

One banner in that procession never saw the light before, this is the one of the Temple itself. On a groundwork of white is painted the Temple as we hope to see it stand before many years have flown; above it is the legend "For God and Home and Humanity;" it is suspended on a staff on which sits with outspread wings a white dove, emblem of the peace the world will know when "each man's weal is all men's care."

About an hundred banners in all were borne in the procession, of which we have described only a few; enough, perhaps, to give some idea of the beauty and significance of this army of banners. There were also ten elegant silk flags, of regulation stars and stripes, from North Carolina, Texas, Washington, North Dakota, Arkansas, Oregon, Indian Territory, New Hampshire and Wyoming. Patriotism was very prominent in all the decorations, as well as in the exercises.

The Watch-Tower.

There comes this pleasant item from across the water, through Mrs. S. F. Grubb, National superintendent of foreign work: "In an illustrated paper, which reached me this morning from Rotterdam, Netherlands, Geillustreerd Volksblad, I find 'Melinda Allen's Letter to her Aunt Samantha,' which came out last summer in THE UNION SIGNAL. It is translated into Dutch. Enclosed in the paper on a separate sheet is a description of the Temple and its history with some history of the rise of the W. C. T. U. 'Christen, Vrouen-Onthonders-Vereeniging.'" They give up the whole first page and part of the second to this description of the Temple, and have put out in form of a tract, the article on this subject translated from THE UNION SIGNAL of August 28, 1890.

An associated press dispatch having been sent all over the country declaring that the California W. C. T. U. at its late annual meeting declined to pass a resolution endorsing Miss Willard, Mrs. Johnston, state president, telegraphs us: "Associated Press incorrect. California is loyal. New state officers elected by a large majority are all loyal."

Among the many missionaries in attendance on the meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions for the Interior is Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick, of the mission in Spain. On the closing evening she gave a very interesting account of the work there, and closed with a strong plea that American women celebrate the approaching Columbian anniversary by endowing in Spain a Christian college for Spanish young women. There can certainly be no more fitting memorial of gratitude to Queen Isabella and of honor to her without whose aid America would not have been discovered by Columbus.

Mrs. Henry writes, "I believe the Temple to be the clasp to the volume of our history up to date; not binding us into a narrow space between inflexible limits, but like an album that I once saw, capable of the addition of pages. It must surely draw our states nearer, cementing interests, radiating influences, multiplying powers, so that we shall reach a degree of effectiveness in our work beyond any thing yet attained by us.

"And you, dear Mrs. Carse, what a monument it will be to your own generous love of the cause! I cannot help saying that. Of course this has been utterly beyond your own thought, but it must be, that as long as that building stands, the name of Matilda B. Carse will live. It is right that it should be so; for in this work you have been gathering up the prayers, the tears, the love, the faith, the hopes and fears of the women, the motherhood of Christendom, and molding them into brick, cutting them into stone, have piled them story upon story, where even the most careless and unfeeling must recognize them.

"I can see the throngs from all the nations of the earth going about Chicago in '93 and saying in all tongues:

"'What is that storied pile?'

"'That? It is the Temperance Temple.'

"'The women built it.' 'The women prayed in the saloons.' 'The women were heart-broken because of drink—this is the result.' 'The women had faith in God, and His Christ, the King of nations—this came of it.' 'They had Baby Bands—my baby's name is there—that helped a little.' 'The women wanted the laws made right—so they did this.' 'The women are educating the world—this is the center of it all.' 'The women had an eye to business; the rental must be immense!' 'That's where a fellow can find help to be good—come!'

"'There must have been a level head and integrity under all of that.'

"'That was Mrs. Matilda B. Carse.'

"'Who's she?'

"'Oh, a W. C. T. U. woman.'" ON DUTY.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ANNUAL STATE CONVENTION IN WORCESTER.

We were welcomed to the largest city in the United States which has no license government. There were no saloons in Worcester to mock us as we walked the streets, No drunkenness to sadden our hearts, everywhere we were welcome. The homes opened to us were the best in the city, and our hostesses were delightfully cordial, so that we forgot that we were strangers. The committees having the arrangements in charge planned the details so systematically that there was no confusion. Everything seemed to work automatically.

The convention was remarkably harmonious, not a ripple disturbed the unanimity. The spirit of obedience to God's will was evident, and we felt that this was one of the most delightful, and yet one of the saddest conventions in the history of our Massachusetts W. C. T. U.

The pleasure felt on welcoming Miss Gordon, after her long absence, was manifested in a tangible manner by the presentation of a beautiful basket of roses, by Mrs. E. M. Everett, in behalf of the delegates. The many warm words of welcome also showed that Miss Gordon holds an enviable place in the hearts of the W. C. T. U. women, who realize also her remarkable executive ability.

Miss Tobey's refusal to stand as a candidate for re-election was a great susprise to every one. We expected to reëlect her unanimously but just before the election of officers took place, Miss Tobey, with deep emotion, read a letter in which she stated that this determination was as sudden to her as to us, adding, "The call of God, which from time to time has been distinctly given to me, yet not so near as to make me sure it was to be immediately followed, has now come to me anew, and with such a power of the Holy Spirit filling all my being that I know it must be heeded. The call is not to leave the sisterhood and work so dear to me, but to devote myself to the evangelistic part, to lay down the official duties which of necessity divide and my time. It is not true, nor has it ever been, that any other organization claims my service. I have no future plan, no salaried position, nothing before me but to follow where the blessed Saviour leads me to labor. I trust it may be often under the auspices of our local unions, seeking to strengthen the workers and reach the women of our churches, so that they shall say to the Lord, 'Here am I, send me anywhere in the vineyard.'"

It was a solemn moment when Miss Tobey finished, many were in tears and all were deeply moved by the sudden announcement. The feeling of bewilderment which followed was marked. One and another rose asking if she would not reconsider her decision. To all of whom Miss Tobey replied that the Lord had talked with her and made His will so clear that she had no question but to follow where He led. Finding that all attempts were futile, the unanimous vote was given to Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden, who was in Virginia giving a series of lectures. Miss Elizabeth M. Fessenden, daughter of Mrs. Fessenden was called to the platform to receive the Chautauqua salute as her mother's representative. A telegram was immediately sent to Mrs. Fessenden, to which she responded as follows:

NORFOLK, VA., 10, 16, 1890.

ELISABETH P. GORDON, W. C. T. U.:—Am overwhelmed with surprise and gratitude, but accept only as a call from above with entire reliance upon Divine guidance, and under conditions to be adjusted later.

SUSAN S. FESSENDEN.

Before the convention closed, a beautiful bouquet of roses was presented to Miss Tobey by Mrs. Lane, of Worcester, as an expression from the delegates present of a larger gift which they hope to make at a later date, in which each member of the organization can be represented.

The following resolution, which was unanimously passed, was only a faint expression of the tender love and fellowship manifested for Miss Tobey:

WHEREAS, Our faithful and honored president, Elisabeth S. Tobey, who for six years has led the women of Massachusetts in aggressive temperance work, has heard the call of God to her soul to engage in other service in His name; therefore

Resolved, That we, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Massachusetts, in convention assembled, recognize that the Divine hand is guiding her, and though our hearts are heavy with the sense of the loss of her invaluable labors, we submit to the will of the Lord. We record our conviction that a great spiritual uplift has come to us as she has directed our vision to the supernatural agencies that are to be appropriated by faith, and that her skillful and systematic plans in directing our forces, have made us a more powerful factor for good. We express our heartfelt appreciation of her untiring efforts to strengthen every department of work for the elevation and Christianizing of humanity, and assure her of our sympathetic coöperation in all future labors, and our prayer shall ever be, "The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace." For the convention,

MRS. P. S. AYDELOTT,
MRS. MIAL DAVIS,
MRS. C. M. BACON,
MRS. M. G. WESTON,
MRS. A. L. ROLFE,
MRS. GFORGE F. EATON, Committee.

The following resolution also was offered by Mrs. A. C. Thorp, of Cambridge:

Resolved, That we are deeply grateful, in receiving the telegram of acceptance of the office of state president from Mrs. Fesenden. We believe her mental endowments specially fit her for the place of leader, while her earnest purpose and spirit of consecration make her an example whom we can delight to follow. We believe that if we give her our loyal, loving support, we shall, in the year to come see greater results than ever before in our work. This one thing let us do, forgetting those things which are behind, reach forth unto those things which are before.

The guidance of the Holy Spirit was also seen in the unanimous reëlection of the faithful officers who have served us in the past. Miss Elisabeth P. Gordon, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Helen G. Rice, recording secretary; Mrs. M. E. A. Cheney, assistant recording secretary; Mrs Amelia H. Wood, treasurer.

Among the pleasing features of our program were the solos by Mrs. Alice J. Osborne, Mrs. Ada B. Frisbee, both of Boston, Mrs. L. H. Olmsted, of South Hanson, and Mrs. May Sleeper Ruggles, of Worcester. These gifted singers have consecrated their talents to the service of the Lord, and are with us not only in their interest manifested in the program, but in the fellowship of the white ribbon.

A special practical feature was the workers' conferences held between the sessions. In one corner of the church could be seen a group of women eagerly listening to Mrs. Rice as she gave suggestions to Loyal Legion workers; in another corner could be heard Mrs. Gleason's voice in earnest discussion on tobacco, opium and other narcotics; in the rear gallery Miss Gordon was busy giving plans for the National constitutional amendment petition, while the ante-rooms were occupied by the various committees. Here also the Y's held their morning conferences. A new feature was the Y. W. C. T. U. organization conference where plans for the organization of new unions were discussed.

Miss Gordon's annual report was full of interest, as the following extract shows:

We are entitled to represent to-day at our seventeenth annual convention three hundred local unions organized in nearly as many cities and towns, with a paid membership of 10,000 and a following of 11,000.

In 1875 when Mrs. Livermore was elected president, only ten unions were reqresented at the annual meeting.

Then there were no young ladies' unions; now there are 47 and many young men have joined them as honorary members, Then, the work with the children was unorganized; now under the skillful leadership of Mrs. Helen G. Rice, nearly 14,000 of our boys and girls are a pledged and drilled army, and are only one division of the National Loyal Temperance Legion of over 200,000 members. Their little feet keep step to the prophetic words of Miss Willard, "Saloons, saloons, saloons must go." Hundreds of children in the Sunday-school also belong to this pledged army.

In the first years of our work the counties were unorganized, and individual workers were not developed. Our ranks were largely composed of Christian women who had learned to keep silence in the conservative churches. A leading minister says that the crusade opened the mouths of women, and then "How to keep those women still was the question." It had that effect sooner in the free West, we grieve to say, than it possibly could with those living under the shadow of Harvard college and the Old South; but the appointment of state superintendents and the organization of county unions, with their officers and superintendents, has wonderfully developed the members of the local unions, and has caused our women to think for themselves, and not believe that a certain order of things is right simply because it exists. As our National President says: "Many a W. C. T. U. woman now ends her sentences with an interrogation point where she used to end them with a period." Our fathers, husbands, brothers and the General Court have been much disturbed by many of these questions, and have found them difficult to answer, but they have answered some as we desired, and this shows another grand advance since 1875. We now have four laws which were not on the statute books then.

1. The scientific temperance law.
2. The law forbidding the sale or gift of tobacco to minors.
3. The law for the protection of girls.
4. The law placing police matrons in charge of women, detained or arrested in large cities.

The treasurer's report showed the receipts for the year to be $9,266.15; he expenditures $7,791.63; leaving a balance of $1,285.12. The state also holds seven shares of W. T. P. A. stock. Mr. Henry H. Faxon again generously presented us with $500, not included in the above report, making $1,000 which he has contributed to our work this year. We have sent donations to Nebraska and South Dakota, and $1,061.41 to the Temperance Temple.

Mrs Cheney devised new plans for advertising THE UNION SIGNAL and other papers, one of which was by means of placards with striking mottoes, such as,

"Help! Help! Help!
To pulverize the saloon.
How?
By putting THE UNION SIGNAL into the homes."

Her methods worked admirably, many new subscribers giving their names, so that our subscription list records 3,351 subscribers for THE UNION SIGNAL, 2,277 for the Young Crusader, monthly edition, 378 semi monthly edition, 158 for the Oak and Ivy Leaf and 1,100 for the state paper, Our Message.

The literature table was in charge of Mrs. Ellen M. Everett, who was very pleasantly remembered by the "Lemonade committee," in the gift of $25.00 as a slight token of appreciation of her wise and efficient arrangements for the distribution of lemonade during the G. A. R. parade in Boston, August 12.

A beautiful banner was presented to the Bondsville W. C. T. U. as a gift from Miss Tobey and Miss Gordon, that union having gained the largest increase in membership. The banner was white silk with a bunch of May flowers, and the words, "We wage our peaceful war for God, and Home, and Native Land."

Representatives from the nine companies of the Loyal Legion of Worcester took possession of the church on Wednesday afternoon, and gave us a model lesson as they conducted a children's convention. Master Frank Hall presided with a dignity and composure which might be envied by older presiding officers. The apparently impromptu speeches were animated and to the point, and called forth applause from the audience. Miss Flora Whittemore was introduced as the "noted violinist who would now favor us." Whereupon a little girl gave us a selection with variations. Her talent manifested at this early age may prove the announcement a prophesy. Representatives from the Temperance Army entered and presented fraternal greetings. This pleasure was planned by Mrs. Mary D. Ware, who, until quite recently, has had superintendence of the Worcester Legions.

Our special speakers, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Miss Lillian M. Phelps, Dr. Julia M. Plummer, Dr. Thomas and Dr. Mears, all spoke grand, earnest words and did us good service. The Y's also were well represented in Miss Effie M. Houghton and Miss Elizabeth M. Fessenden, who have been working together as superintendent and assistant superintendent of Y work. We are sorry to note another change in this department, as we trusted last year when we appointed Miss Houghton superintendent that she would be able to continue in the work, but circumstances made it necessary for her to resign in favor of Miss Fessenden, who succeeds her in office, and who bids fair to follow in her mother's footsteps as a public speaker.

The resolutions protested against license, high or low, and resolved to press forward towards constitutional prohibition and to coöperate with Mrs. Bittenbender for securing a National prohibitory amendment. A protest was entered against the opening of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. Our belief in the ecclesiastical and political emancipation of women was reaffirmed and it was resolved to continue to work for the full franchise. It was also voted to petition the Legislature for our amendment with penalty attached to the law forbidding the gift or sale of tobacco to minors.

The press of Worcester gave remarkably full reports of the sessions, while the Weekly Times issued a special edition which contained the reports and addresses in full.

We feel that we have given but a bare outline of the feast of good things, the practical help, the renewed zeal, the uplift of soul and the spirit of obedience to God's will.

BUTTE COUNTY'S FIRST CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. of this county held its first annual convention in the M. E. Church at Oroville, October 3 and 4, the state organizers, Mrs. Henrietta Skelton and Mrs. Emma Pow Smith conducting the same. These ladies are doing a good work in our state. The convention was a success in every way, and has done much to interest the public in our cause, as well as to encourage and strengthen those already engaged in it. California is slowly and surely progressing in temperance principles. We hope and believe that the time is not far distant when we shall see a radical change in our liquor laws, and that the wine industry, which is such a curse to our state shall be swept from our land. Our next annual convention will be held at Chico.

NORWALK NOTES.

The Norwalk W. C. T. U., dating its beginning back among Crusade days, has still a name to live, and at [illegible] time in its existence, perhaps, has it seen mor[illegible] ous times, or been more active and full of good [illegible] than now. The membership and interest are increasing each month. Thirty or more copies of THE UNION SIGNAL are taken, beside several copies of the Messenger.

At the county fair, recently held, a W. C. T. U. booth was fitted up tastefully, from which some five hundred copies of the Fair number of THE UNION SIGNAL were distributed, besides a quantity of other literature—the union appropriating five dollars from its treasury for the purchase.

A Demorest medal contest was most succes[illegible] out a large audience and adding some thirty [illegible] treasury. It is proposed to hold another [illegible] future. The union purposes offering two [illegible] testants from the High and Grammar scho[illegible] essays on Scientific Temperance—this cont[illegible] within the holiday season.

No gift from the union, as a whole, has yet been forwarded to the Temple, but individual members have sent in their mites to aid on this grand work.

Through the printed page and tbe spoken word we are keeping in touch with the temperance movement and its host of workers everywhere, and with little Tim we say, "God bless us every one."

A SUGGESTION FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF "COW-BOYS."

As I have no National superintendent to write to before the convention in Atlanta, I must write to THE UNION SIGNAL. I feel constrained by the love of Christ to say something in behalf of the ranchmen and cowboys, for they seem to me as sheep without a shepherd. I long to do something for them more than I have done, but I am compassed about with difficulties, lack of funds, lack of time on account of household cares and lack of sympathy from some who should give it to me; but blessed be the name of our God, He does not let me become disheartened. This morning I praise him for the privilege of being a co-worker with Him, and I am borne above discouragements by His "exceeding great and precious promises." "All things are possible to him that believeth," stands over against my difficulties; and in my lack, "My God will supply all your need" relieves my sense of poverty; and in the absence of sympathy and support from friends, the voice of Jesus sweetly says, "Lo, I am with you alway." I am not afraid to go forward in the work, for if the Red Sea is there, its waters shall be parted, and I shall sing a song of deliverance as only such a test of faith can inspire.

The work is steadily growing in interest. I am continually finding new helpers, and new thoughts are given me by the blessed Holy Spirit. Some time ago while trying to form some plan for adding to our treasury, this thought came as a ray of light. Why not ask each ranchman, and the boys who own cattle, to brand a calf "W. C. T. U." and present it to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union? Are not "the cattle on a thonsand hills" the Lord's? and should we not have some of them for His work? At that time a ranchman and his wife were in our home; immediately I told him of the happy thought which had just come to me. He smilingly replied, "Well, they'll do it," assuring me that he would be one of the number. I have spoken to several, and they almost to a man say "I'll do it." Now, what think you of this? Wouldn't it be a fine advertisement for both the ranchmen and the W. C. T. U.? As the cattle grow and increase year by year what a help this would be to our glorious cause! Now if this department was a National one how this fund might be increased, for everywhere this class of men is noted for their generosity.

KINGMAN COUNTY RESOLUTIONS.

At the county convention of the W. C. T. U. neld at Cunningham October 9 and 10, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, First, That we acknowledge ourselves instruments in the hands of God for the accomplishment of every good work, and that to Him we return thanks for the interest manifested in the cause of temperance and the uplifting of humanity.

Second, That we will most faithfully and conscientiously do all we can to arouse, warn, and instruct the people of Kingman county to defend and retain the present constitution, which prohibits the traffic in intoxicating beverages.

Third, That we use our utmost endeavors to secure the nomination of only such men for political positions in county and city as we can conscientiously sustain by our influence,

Fourth, That we use every endeavor, and call upon all Christian people to co-operate with us in securing a better Sabbath observance.

Fifth, That we discourage the opening of post-offices or any other public houses of business where employees are paid for Sunday labor.

Sixth, That we condemn the notice and publication in our county papers of circumstances and events that are too obscene to be read or discussed by ladies, youth and children.

Seventh, That the juvenile department of the W. C. T. U. is one of the most important and powerful elements for the prosecution and success of temperance work.

Eighth, That local unions demand and secure, in all our public schools the teaching of scientific temperance in conformity to state laws, and that superintendents be appointed for this work.

Ninth, That the W. C. T. U. women, through that organization, and in every possible way, work to secure equal franchise for women with men, believing that only through the ballot will we be able to cope with the giant, intemperance.

Tenth, That in our county president, Mrs. A. P. Holloway, we have had a most faithful, energetic and efficient officer and co-laborer, and it is with unfeigned regret we accept her resignation of this position for a wider field of labor, that of district organizer. Our prayers and sympathy go with her.

Eleventh, That a copy of these resolutions be printed in the official papers of our union, namely: THE UNION SIGNAL and The Messenger.

Twelfth, That a unanimous vote of thanks be tendered the citizens of Cunningham, for the warm welcome and generous entertainment extended to the members of this convention.

PENNSYLVANIA.

LOYAL AND TRUE, SHE BRINGS HER BANNERS TO THE FRONT.

"Electric City" of the Key Stone state, Scranton, its gates, its hearts, and its homes to receive the ibboners of the commonwealth, on the 15th of The first executive meeting was held in the C. A. parlor, Tuesday afternoon. The delegates' meeting was held in the Adams Avenue M. E. h, Tuesday evening, the church being well filled. spirit of devotion and consecration which prevaded meeting, shed its sweet influence upon all the deliberions and decisions throughout the entire convention.

The first public session was opened Wednesday morning at 9:30 in the Academy of Music, the president, Mrs. Mary H. Jones, in the chair, supported by Mrs. Henrietta Forrest, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Olive Pond Amies, recording secretary, Mrs. Woods, Treasurer, and an able corps of vice-presidents and superintendents of departments.

The platform "was made to bloom like a garden," with tropical plants and bouquets of cut roses, smilax and festoons of white ribbon. A handsome portrait of our National President, wreathed in smilax and white ribbon, occupied a place of honor; the stars and stripes hung in graceful festoons from balcony and galleries, interspersed with the beautifully decorated banners of the different unions throughout the state; these were the brave, bright gladiolus, the oak and ivy, the brilliant, graceful golden-rod, the white dove of peace, birds, and apple blossoms, the bright boy soldier's face, and so many sweet and beautiful designs that it would be impossible to describe them. Bannerets bearing the names of counties were reared upon standards throughout the body of the hall, thus assigning all delegates their seats without any confusion. When the gavel struck the desk for the opening exercises, almost every chair was filled, and a sea of bright intelligent faces, smiled love and encouragement upon their worthy state officials.

A short devotional service led by Mrs. Dankel opened the exercises. The convention rose and sang, "Give to the winds thy fears." An hour was spent in routine business, when Mrs. Oberhollzer read an original poem, "A Blossom of Mother Love."

The feature of the morning was the reading of the president's first annual report. This was a masterly effort in all the best sense of the word; taking up each department she gave a most glowing account of the work done by the white-ribboners of Pennsylvania. The union has never been in such perfect working order; there is unity and unswerving loyalty throughout the state. One hundred and twenty-eight new unions have been organized during the year, and weak ones strengthened. The delegates in convention represent a constituency of over fifteen thousand paying members. I wish I had time and space to report this address with its many encouraging features and bright inspiring thoughts, but I can only say that at its close the convention gave a rising vote of thanks and the white-ribbon salute to the brave little woman who has so successfully guided our barque through the stormy sea that at the beginning of the year threatened to engulf it, but which, now, through the wise and efficient management of its officers, proudly rides the waves, with colors flying, and every worker at her post.

The afternoon session was opened with the usual devotional exercises, led by Mrs. O. B. Gause. Mrs. Forrest, corresponding secretary, then read her annual report. She gave some startling figures in her comparison of our standing and numbers ten years ago and now. She said that during the last decade we have increased at the rate of ninety-six unions per year, until now we have 1,030 organized unions, officered and in working order. In 1880 the state raised $143.24 for its work; in 1890 the state has raised $45,855.26. She gave a glowing tribute to our beloved state president, who, having refused the $1,000 accorded her predecessor, and which was also voted to her, has given her time and labor and has also donated $1,939.20 towards the funds of the union. A rising vote of thanks was given Mrs. Forrest for her indefatigable efforts in bringing the year's work to such a successful termination.

Mrs. W. H. Woods read the treasurer's report which was accepted with the thanks of the convention. After the noon-tide prayer the meeting adjourned for lunch, which was served every day in the Assembly Hall, and was a most delightful feature of the occasion.

The afternoon session was opened with the usual devotional exercises, after which Mrs. F. P. Nicolson read her report of jail and prison work, which was replete with items of interest. Next in order was the report of work among foreigners, by Miss Puella Domblazer. Great good is being accomplished throngh the untiring effort of this young woman, especially is this the case in the assistance rendered Nebraska during its amendment campaign. Mrs. J. M. Paul sends an excellent report of work among miners. New county presidents were presented and received the W. C. T. U. salute.

The evening session opened with the usual devotional exercises and a Bible reading, subject, "Christian Liberty," by Mrs. Clements. The Rockwell quartette delighted the audience with a song, "Among the Lilies" which was encored and called forth another sweet selection. A letter was read from Mayor Fellows, regretting his inability to be present in person to welcome the mothers, wives, sisters and daughters of the state to Scranton, he nevertheless wished to extend to them in the name of the city, a most cordial greeting; he said he knew "the work of the W. C. T. U. must be a good work for there were so many mothers engaged in it."

Mrs. Olive Pond Amies then extended a most eloquent and cordial welcome to the delegates and visitors; her address was sparkling with bright points and pleasant humor. The response was given in an equally elegant manner, by Mrs. Alfred P. Reid.

One of the brightest efforts of the evening was the collection address by Miss Rebecca Boyle; her bright humor extracted $80 from the audience. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, National superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, was then introduced, and delivered one of her earnest and logical addresses, which was listened to with wrapt attention for an hour.

Thursday morning opened with devotional exercises led by Mrs. C. H. Cool, then an hour of routine business, sending and receiving telegrams of greeting, Mrs. A. C. Law read her report of mothers' meetings. Mr. Tallie Morgan, editor of The People, was called to the stage and made a ringing address for our cause, and paid the highest tributes of honor to our work. Mrs. Mary F. Lovell, superintendent of scientific instruction, read an excellent paper, showing that strenuous efforts are being made to have the law—which Mrs. Hunt says is among the best of the states—rigidly enforced. Mrs. Hunt and Mrs. Lovell then conducted a school of methods. Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, of Elmira, N. Y., who had just been in attendance at the New York state convention, was introduced and extended greeting.

The afternoon session was principally devoted to the election of officers which resulted in the unanimous re-election of all the state officers. As they were escorted to the platform the entire convention rose and sang "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," with eyes and hearts overflowing with love and gratitude. During the balloting the Prohibition quartette, of Scranton, led by Mr. Tallie Morgan, sang several stirring temperance hymns.

The evening session was devoted to the Y's, and they, with their efficient leader, made a most pleasing program, Mrs. W. W. Rhoades, state superintendent, was presented with a handsome oxydized silver writing set, by the members of the Y. W. C. T. U. Miss Ida M. Schoch, the retiring state organizer, was introduced by Mrs. Rhoades, who presented her with a substantial testimony of appreciation of the Y's. The National President, Mrs. F. J. Barnes, was introduced and gave a most entertaining account of her visit abroad in relation to her temperance work. The Y banner was presented to Fayette county. Miss Schock introduced her successor, Miss Frances McKendrick.

By Friday morning many of the delegates in the western part of the state had been obliged to leave, in order to reach home before Sunday, but their seats were soon filled with visitors, the number of whom had increased with every session. Mrs. Conell, a returned missionary, who had spent seventeen years in Japan, was introduced, and entertained the audience with many items from that most interesting field of labor; by request she sang a sweet little ballad in the Japanese language. The election of delegates to the National Convention was then in order, and occupied the remainder of the morning session.

After the usual devotional services the afternoon session was opened by the presentation of distinguished visitors and clergymen, who responded with words of commendation and encouragement. One hundred dollars was appropriated to the Woman's Temperance Temple, in order to have the Key Stone state represented on the memorial tablet. The plan of work and resolutions were presented and unanimously adopted. They endorse and commend all the branches of work previously undertaken by the union, and recommend greater energy and activity with relation to the enforcement of the laws for scientific temperance instruction, and in order that our schools may have the benefit of the mother's voice in school laws and their enforcement, a resolution was adopted to petition the next Legislature to grant to all women of legal age the school franchise. This resolution called forth the most enthusiastic applause; a rising vote was called for, and the entire convention rose as if by magic. The visitors were then allowed to give expression to their sentiments on this question, and every one in the house arose. Mrs. Jones then said that if any one doubted the wisdom of this act he might remain standing and be counted, and by the way that body of people dropped into their seats, one might have imagined they were moved by electricity; this may have been the case, as they were largely Scrantonians.

Before six o'clock, all the business of the convention was completed, which is the first time in the history of the conventions of this state when all reports have been read and all business transacted as per program. This must be credited to the business-like methods of the presiding officers, which were the subject of complimentary remarks by every man who visited the convention. The leading papers of the city, the Republican, Truth and Times gave full and fair reports of all the proceedings, with notes and personals of general interest. The Evening Gazette, of Pittston, nine miles from Scranton, also gave daily reports. The tenor of all published reports was decidedly complimentary.

The convention closed with a grand gold medal contest, under the supervision of Miss Frances H. Jones. There were eleven counties represented by contestants, and all acquitted themselves most creditably. The medal was awarded to Miss Margaret Fitz Simmons Badger, of Philadelphia, with honorable mention of Master Willie Morris, of Luzerne county, which called forth the most enthusiastic applause.

The Saturday morning out-going trains were filled with happy, bright faced women, who were unanimous in the declaration that they had never attended such a harmonious and in every way delightful convention.

ANNABEL MORRIS HOLVEY,
State Sup. Press Work,

SUCCESSFUL "LEGAL SKIRMISH" AT FOSTER BROOK.

Our county organizer is fond of quoting this maxim of the W. C. T. U. "Moral suasion where we can, legal suasion where we must." Suffice it to say that in the case I am about to recount to you, all peaceable means had been employed in vain to stop what had become a most flagrant breach of our laws.

The town of Gillmor has had no license for the past ten years, but when our remonstrances were sent to Smethport in the spring the judge made the pointed remark that unless fewer complaints reached his ears of illegal selling in the valley, he might regret having refused a license. Although proceedings had already been begun against the law-breakers, this news served to strengthen the ladies in their determination to bring them to justice.

It was pretty well known that at least two men in the town were selling liquor and that two more were keeping a notorious gambling-place where whisky and beer were freely given away, and that another who had a billiard license, was habitually allowing minors to play in his billiard room. Several of the law-and-order-loving men of the valley promised us money and evidence if we would prosecute. And so, at one memorable meeting of our little band, nine women pledged themselves, the most of them with fear and trembling, to appear the next day at the office of the district attorney in Bradford to sign an information against the men.

And here let me mention a fact that contradicts most of our accepted ideas of woman's character, namely that from the time of the meeting of the union, when this courageous course was decided upon, until the men were arrested by the constable two days later, not a word of the matter got abroad. The children, and in some instances, even the husbands of the women were not informed. Could any body of nine men have done better?

The constable took the early morning for making his raid, and arrested some of the men before they were out of bed, and succeeded in capturing the entire five. The news was all over the valley in less than half an hour, and more than one man (suspects merely) proved himself guilty by running to the woods. One of these men was testified against later by some of the witnesses we had subpœnaed, and was indicted without his ever being arrested, and has since left the state. Two of the men were tried before a justice and bound over to appear at court. All five gave bail. They were very brave at first, and boasted that they "would give them women until the 15th of May to settle, and after that they'd have to take the consequences." Some of the patrons of the dens agreed to furnish bail for the good behavior of the arrested men, failing to see that in case the law was again broken, that the money and influence of these citizens would be arrayed against the side of law and order, and that it would be doubly hard to prosecute under such circumstances. Again, the case was in the hands of the commonwealth, and for the women to abandon the suit, would be putting themselves in the role of particeps criminis. Some twenty-five different men from the whisky side visited the district attorney, asking for a settlement. The defendants themselves, however, expressed no penitence, but indulged their spite by calling the white-ribboners vile names, and even flinging taunting remarks after them on the street. I am glad to say that this had not the effect of angering the women, but only of teaching them that it would be folly to show leniency toward such men.

If my space were not limited, I could recount many ludicrous stories of the attempts to subpœna witnesses, but will only say that we finally secured all we wanted. We employed one of the best criminal lawyers in the county to conduct the prosecution, and paid him a good round fee. Our cases came up early in the June term of court, and we sat in the court room the greater part of three days, waiting for them, and of some dozen cases which came up for trial in that time, all but one were the result of whisky drinking.

One of the defendants was a cripple, and the grand jury would not find an indictment. Our best witness on that case had been made drunk by the whisky men, and had to be sent home. Under those circumstances we could easily have had the bill sent back to be passed upon again, but the poor fellow was so penitent, and so badly scared that it was concluded best to let him go. True bills were found in all the other cases, and the men were found guilty in every instance. The man who had allowed minors in his billiard-room was fined $125 and costs. One man for selling whisky was given a jail sentence of three months and $500 fine. Another for keeping a gambling house and selling liquor was given a sentence of six months and $600 fine. The fourth who had been in town but a few weeks and plead guilty, had his sentence suspended.

Public opinion has been strongly against us and sometimes it seemed as if the Lord and those nine women were facing the whole world, but it has transpired that even at that time we had many friends we knew not of, and we all feel that the chaff has been blown from the wheat and our real, true friends stand revealed.

BERTHA W. HOWE.

ILLINOIS.

"All Illinois for God and Temperance" is veritably the genuine watchword of this grand state, for progress has marked every movement this past year, as it has in all the sixteen years of the history of her Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Of the 102 counties in the state, seventy-two are organized under county organizations with a full corps of officers; fourteen have presidents only and but sixteen are unorganized.

One hundred and forty-four new unions have been organized, which, after deducting eighteen that have fallen by the way, made a grand total of 728, with a membership of 14,673. The central and southeastern parts of the state have been the most active during the year, although all parts have done well. Bloomington has the largest union—250 members.

Over sixty-seven thousand dollars has been raised for local work, $4,000 for the Temperance Temple, and $350 for the Temperance Hospital; in all $71,350, a gain of $16,000 over last year.

Four unions are conducting successful restaurants, Chicago, Bloomington, Peoria and Rockford.

Fifteen thousand children have been provided for by the Chicago Central union in its day nurseries and kindergartens. Four thousand homeless women, many of them the despised of the earth, have found refuge in the "Anchorage Mission" and five hundred of them have secured good homes through its influence.

The excellent report of the corresponding secretary, Miss Helen L. Hood, well says on this point: "Gathering up what has been accomplished by our membership in the farm-house and in the city home, we can truly say, 'God has indeed fulfilled the promises because of our faithfulness.' When there has come the thought of the unjust criticism which has been so often passed upon us, that the W. C. T. U. is doing a political work, only, I have said: 'If the caring for helpless childhood, the opening of homes of refuge where tempted man and womanhood may come, the healing of sick bodies, and the spreading of the gospel as preached by the Master is "political work" then may the Lord give us ability, power, and strength to do ten times more such work.'"

The work of the state president, Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, has been most faithfully performed. She has visited fifteen districts, and thirty-three counties, and delivered 131 addresses. Aside from the work in her own state, Mrs. Rounds has visited four other states, to wit: Indiana, Wisconsin, Missouri and New York, in which she has given fifty-eight addresses.

The convention opened auspiciously on the evening of October 7, in the beautiful Court street Methodist Church, of Rockford, a city far-famed for its charming homes and natural scenery. The young women, to whom the opening session was entrusted, entertained their audience in a most acceptable manner, Miss Ida C. Clothier being the chief speaker. Besides the usual music and addresses of welcome and response, all of which were good, a pleasing number was the presentation of the handsome state banner to the Paris Y, the largest in the state, having a membership of 110.

On the morning of the 8th the business sessions opened, and continued for three days with unabated interest and attendance, a ponderous amount of work being despatched.

The white chrysanthemum, whose symbol is FAITH, was adopted as the state emblem.

It was decided to publish a state paper, to be called The Illinois Watch Tower, and to be issued twice a month.

The departments of scientific temperance instruction and evangelistic work received prominence in the discussions and plans of work. Mrs. Clara Combs, of Kemper, was appointed assistant superintendent of the former department, with the understanding that she give six months of the year to work among the unions and teachers of the state to secure better enforcement of the Instruction law. Mrs. Frances W. Leiter, of Ohio, rendered valuable assistance to this department, in a half hour's graphic description of the necessity of such a law and the manner in which it was secured in her state.

The resolutions on temperance in public schools and compulsory education, two of the most important passed by the convention, were as follows:

TEMPERANCE TEACHING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Thankful to God for the great advance made in this department during the past year, we pledge increased exertion along these lines:

1. Using our influence with school officers and teachers to secure thorough and systematic teaching of temperance from approved text-books, to all pupils in public and Normal schools; visiting schools to ascertain if such teaching is done, and encourage those doing it.

2. Securing efficient local, county and district superintendents who will do their work thoroughly and report it promptly to the proper officials.

3. Preparing the way for workers in this department among teachers and unions.

4. Working for the election of temperance women as school directors.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

WHEREAS, The future welfare and perpetuity of the state depends upon the intelligence of the citizens of the state, and whereas this intelligence is provided for and best secured by the free public schools of the state, therefore,

Resolved, That we put ourselves squarely on record in favor of compulsory education, and that we will do all in our power to enforce the laws of the state in this matter, and further

Resolved, That we favor and insist that the Bible be read without comment by the teachers at the opening of each day's session.

Exceedingly interesting and profitable discussions were heard on the topics: "How to Win Members," "How to Make Money," and "How to Conduct Meetings." These were introduced by appointed leaders, who were heartily and ably assisted by a large number of delegates.

Telegrams were sent to New York, Indiana and California state conventions and to a number of absent members, and similar attentions were received from a large number of conventions, local unions and good friends.

Aside from a large number of local visitors, there were present Miss Frances E. Willard and Miss Anna Gordon, Mrs. Clara Holbrook Smith, Mrs. Frances Leiter and Miss Ida C. Clothier.

The addresses by Mrs. Rounds and Miss Willard, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings were, naturally, the two grand feasts of the convention, and were listened to with the most marked attention and satisfaction, by the large audience.

The "Memorial Service for our Promoted Soldiers" was tender and uplifting, each delegation rising as the names from their district were called, and responding in brief but touching tributes. More than one hundred of Illinois' temperance soldiers have left us during the year.

Illinois' standard-bearers for the coming year will be the same as in the year past: Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, president; Miss Mary Allen West, vice-president; Miss Helen L. Hood, corresponding secretary; Miss Ruby I. Gilbert, recording secretary; Mrs. A. E. Sanford, treasurer.

Mrs. Wilkins, Mrs. Grout, Mrs. Southgate, and other well-known ladies of the Rockford union were untiring in their efforts to facilitate the business of the convention and add to the pleasure of the visitors. The best homes were hospitably opened to the 313 delegates, who left the city Saturday morning, impressed alike with the cordiality of her people and the wide scope of temperance work which the Illinois W. C. T. U. is compassing.

THE UNION SIGNAL, 161 LaSalle St., Chicago, Ill.

The Salvation Army.

"Think of the doctors, now dead and gone, who have knit their brows over the sick." Yes, and think, too, of the patients, the Chronic cases, the "given over" ones, those over whom the brows were knit in vain. The chronic diseases exhaust the resources of the physician, and the strength of the sufferer, who, given over as a hopeless case, has only to wait for death, the physician being able only to palliate his sufferings, or give temporary relief. The impression is becoming general, however, that there is a remedy for many of these chronic and "hopeless" cases, and that it is the Compound Oxygen Treatment of DRS. STARKEY & PALEN. But read for yourself what the Compound Oxygen Treatment has accomplished in chronic cases and the testimonials from patients given over by physicians. Read what Judge Kelley, Mrs. Livermore, and numerous others, have said about it. You will find it in our brochure, sent free, 200 pages, a Treatise on Compound Oxygen. It will give you records of many, very many cases and cures, with testimonials. Of course, there are worthless imitations, either under the same or different names, but all alike claiming to possess the properties of Compound Oxygen. None genuine but that manufactured by DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter St., San Francisco, Cal.

The corner-stone of the "Temperance Temple" was laid Nov. 1st. The corner-stone of Reed's Temple of Music, 182 and 184 Wabash Ave., Chicago, dealers in Pianos and Organs, was laid in 1842.

We call the attention of every white-ribboner to an advertisement appearing on the last page of this issue. The Easton Mfg. Co. purpose to place within the reach of every union a means of very considerably increasing their income. We are personally acquainted with the firm, know it to be perfectly responsible, and the article advertised we consider one of the best washing preparations for laundry and kitchen on the market. They refer by permission to Miss Mary Allen West, editor, and Mr. Geo. C. Hall, publisher of this paper.

MR. LEVI FELTON, Wilson, N. C., says My wife has suffered for over twenty years with periodical Headaches, and could never obtain relief except through Opiates, until she used Bradycrotine.

TO THE EDITOR: Please tell your readers that I received a well and serviceably bound 536 page complete cook book from the Buckeye Publishing Co., Minneapolis, Minn., in accordance with their offer, free of charge. I advise all your readers to send to them for particulars. The service they required was no trouble at all.

Yours, MRS. HELEN HENDERSON.

THE MORGAN MANUFACTURING CO., 431 Pitcher St., KALAMAZOO, MICH

Publisher's Notes.

Don't Fail

to notice elsewhere how you can get a framed picture of Miss Willard, free, by getting us short time subscribers. The frame has been selected for the picture. It fits it admirably; it is silver and white, contrasting, or rather harmonizing, perrably with the delicate water-color tints of the likeness. It is a true likeness, and one that will doubtless be found in twenty thousand American homes inside the next year. We offer agents an exceptional opportunity to make money in selling it. The outfit will consist of a picture inside a very heavy tube, together with a six-inch piece of the frame. It would be better to carry a framed picture whenever it is possible, as more orders will come for the frame in that case. We make special offers to all who really mean to thoroughly work their desired territory. It will not be like selling a book, the picture does the talking. You will have scarcely any of that to do. Ten thousand can easily be sold in December and we are only waiting to hear from you to assign you territory, etc. Miss Willard has hosts of friends and admirers among those who care nothing for the W. C. T. U. To have her picture in such homes, however, would be a constant reminder of the battle the W. C. T. U. so valiantly and unceasingly wage against home's arch enemy and destroyer.

Our Special Numbers.

This one—the Temple number—you should send to all your friends who doubt, who hesitate, who shake their heads over the grievous error of the W. C. T. U. in going into politics! Let them see that they have left politics and are going into the building business! Then there is the Convention number, November 27. That will tell about the Atlanta convention. Prices for both these numbers the same as for usual sized papers, viz:

10	copies - -	$ .20
1000	" - -	14.00

Next, stick a pin in the fact that we will get out an exact stenographic report of the convention. This will cost 25 cents and be worth every cent of it. We have enough orders already to warrant us in going to this expense, and so you may send in your quarters and learn all about what the Iowa folks said, and pretty near what they wanted to say, but didn't. The addresses of welcome and the responses, the exceedingly bright and apt introductions and interjections of Miss Willard and all the rest of the next to being there. Seems as if there ought to be forty thousand called for instead of two or three. There would, if all readers of THE UNION SIGNAL had once been at any National Convention. It's always amusing to watch the evolution in each new place, viz:

1st stage: - Complete indifference.

2d stage:—"Had to go to bring my wife home!"

3d stage:—"Hum! good talkers, those women!"

4th stage:—"Well, well! Bright? I should say so!"

5th stage:—"Say, what time does Miss W. or Mrs. L. speak? Any way to get a reserved seat?"

6th stage:—"Here, here, wife, hurry up; we'll be late; wouldn't miss that meeting for $5."

7th stage:—"I tell you, sir, if those women could be sent to Washington they'd knock those debaters silly. They know more parliamentary usage in a minute than any congressman in the country knows all day."

If you want any more "ths" add them yourself. This stenographic report comes the nearest to being at the convention that we know anything of. So send in your fourths of a dollar. When will this report be ready? Just as soon as clicking typewriters and deft type-setters, and lively presses can manage it. Say about November 21 or 22.

To All Who Love

THE UNION SIGNAL, we want your attention and friendly coöperation. During the next two months nearly 20,000 subscriptions expire. We want to hold them all and gain new ones. The year's experience teaches that we cannot hope to hold all those whose time expires in November and December—unless an extra earnest effort is made. A most attractive offer is published elsewhere for yearly subscriptions. Here is one for getting short term subscriptions. The new picture of the Temple, with the portrait of Mrs. Carse (the one who has pushed the building and all the plans so successfully), is now ready. Every one who sees it says: "How beautiful!" or "What a handsome picture!" or something of the kind. But, now, how can one describe such a picture in such a way that you will appreciate it? It cannot be done. When you get the picture with its delicate colorings—and the double attraction of the Temple picture in its own colors, and the excellent portrait of Mrs. Carse, you will straightway have it framed and hung where it will daily remind you that the battle for the home against the saloon is steadily going, even if it seems all the other way. We offer, then, the picture in two ways. First

For Ten Cent (five week) Subscriptions

We will send a picture free to any one who sends us a club of 5 ten cent subscriptions (with 50 cents) sent in at one time.

For Twenty-five Cent (3 mos.) Subscriptions

We will send the picture free for 2 such names with 50 cents.

We will also send the picture to any one who sends us 10 cents and promises to use their best endeavor to get us the trial subscriptions. The ten cents can be deducted from the first fifty cents sent in. If any one of your friends want the picture, it will be sent for an additional 15 cents. That is, a five weeks' (10 cent) subscriber would pay you 25 cents to get the picture included, or 40 cents if a three months' (25 cent) subscriber.

Lastly.

We will give 5 of the elegant framed aquarelle-tint pictures of Miss Willard to the five who send us in the largest number of trial subscriptions, under the above offers, before January 1, 1891. In the contest each 25 cent subscriber to count the same as two and a half 10 cent subscriptions. Now, we have a word in Chicago that is used on all sides; it is

H-U-S-T-L-E!

Slang often hits the nail on the head. Send for your sample picture with the promise asked, and get your little book, sharpen your lead pencil and go in (no, out) to win one of the beautiful pictures of Miss Willard, and future friends for all she represents.

"For the Healing of Nations."

Extract from a letter from Rangoon: "I prepare a monthly leaflet in Burmese and have found your Loyal Temperance Legion manuals very useful. The one on tobacco has led a prominent young Tamil to give up smoking and he purposes to translate it into Tamil." It is a pity the same literature cannot have a wider circulation here. There are many Christian men and even ministers of the gospel who are "offending little ones" in the use of the vile smelling weed. If men only knew how badly they smell we do believe they would be more tolerant of other folks' feelings. It's a healthy sign that many cashier's windows have a sign over them to the effect that cigarette smokers are requested to leave their nauseous favorites outside. Send for this manual on tobacco using (5 cents), not the one in Burmese but the one in America!

Strange indeed that A PLAIN THING like SAPOLIO should make everything so bright, but "A needle clothes others, and is itself naked." Try it in your next house-cleaning

COPYRIGHT.

What folly it would be to cut grass with a pair of scissors! Yet people do equally silly things every day. Modern progress has grown up from the hooked sickle to the swinging scythe and thence to the lawn mower. So don't use scissors!

But do you use SAPOLIO? If you don't you are as much behind the age as if you cut grass with a dinner knife. Once there were no soaps. Then one soap served all purposes. Now the sensible folks use one soap in the toilet, another in the tub, one soap in the stables and SAPOLIO for all scouring and house-cleaning.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

Stock in the Demorest Home, Mining and Improvement Company will pay large profits. There are also good opportunities to make paying investments in several manufacturing enterprises. For full information address

NEW AND CHEAPER LOTS
AT HARVEY.

In M. M. Brown's addition to Harvey, lying a little more than a quarter of a mile south of the present shops, with other factories and business going straight in that direction, having no other suitable space to occupy, as will be seen by reference to the town plat, mailed free on application.

The main business street of Harvey runs through the middle of this addition, which is situated about four short blocks south of the new bank, and within one block of where lots are selling on the same street for $800, and only four blocks from where they have sold for $1,500, and only across the street from the best of the 240 lots sold in the last 60 days, principally to the subscribers of THE UNION SIGNAL.

A person needs only to examine the plat to see the many advantages that these lots have, at an average price of about $350, which includes sidewalks, graded streets, water supply and excellent drainage, some lots being as low as $250.

Terms made to suit purchaser, with abstract and guarantee of title exactly the same as is given by the Harvey Company.

I own a lumber yard in Harvey, and will supply lumber on monthly payments, at cash prices to parties desiring to build, or will build and sell on payments.

I am now building twenty houses and expect to build more, and will supply work to a large number of workmen all winter.

I have no connection with the Harvey Co., and until a few weeks ago was a stranger to the place and all connected with it, but have recently made large investments there, believing it to be the most promising site about Chicago.

I have refused $5,000 for the best business corner in my addition for a saloon, but will accept $700 for it, to be used for any mercantile business; no saloons in this subdivision for any price.

Write for a plat of the whole town and all information.

I refer to any of your friends in Harvey, the Atlas National Bank of Chicago, or to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Special Notice.

After November 15 we will withdraw the subscription offer concerning THE UNION SIGNAL and Miss Willard's Picture!

The picture will be ready in November, when we will fill all orders received, and will then be ready to give out agencies to sell the picture by itself. The moment it is seen it will create a great demand, and we will have orders without doubt for before the close of the next six months. Therefore we want agents everywhere who will agree to show the picture, and offer it for sale at the regular price, $1. We will give a large commission and appoint only one agent to a place. We want only those to apply who really mean to act in good faith as agents. We made the low offers in connection with THE UNION SIGNAL to be sure and get enough orders for the original contract with Prang & Co. The picture is wonderfully cheap at $1. You can make all your Christmas money as agent for it if you wish to. Apply at once for the territory which you know you can give the proper attention to. We will then let you know what you can do to get a framed picture free with which to make the canvass a successful one. This is your opportunity. You need not fear lest the orders given through the subscription offers will interfere with a canvass by you. Not more than 2,500 will go out thus. Besides, "seeing is believing," and in this case, captivating also. Moreover there are thousands of people who admire Miss Willard, and yet have naught to do with THE UNION SIGNAL. The very sight of this lovely aquarelle tint picture will everywhere and always be a temperance object lesson and sermon. Send in your applications promptly.

Mary A. Livermore's Great Book

A Bonanza for Book Agents.

Mrs. Livermore's famous volume, "My Story of the War," is growing in favor every day, and it is believed that its sale will reach 100,000 copies this fall. Men and women agents are unusually successful with it. Rev. A. W. Collins, Cameron, Mo., says:

"I have never shed so many tears over one book as I have over this one. I have given several readings from it to personal friends who have called upon me. All were delighted, and we read and laughed and wept together, for the humorous as well as the pathetic in it. I have read a few chapters to old soldiers who happened into my study, and, without exception they sat and listened as if enchanted, while tears ran thick and fast down their cheeks, and when I concluded they exclaimed, 'Where can I get a copy of that book?'

"I have often asked myself, What is the real secret of this great book? The only answer I can frame that is at all satisfactory to me is that it is full of 'heart power.' It comes from the heart. The subject is great, the author is great, and of course the book could not but be great. Many times while reading this thrilling story I have said audibly, 'God bless Mrs. Livermore for writing it,' It is my heart-felt wish that a million copies of it may be sent out through this broad land. It will do good whenever and wherever read."

Book Agents are coining money with it, and lady agents are enthusiastic in their praise of it. The publishers are A. D. Worthington & Co., Hartford, Conn., and they will be pleased to send our friends full information. They pay the freight charges on all their shipments, no matter how far away their agents are.

REV. GEORGE F. MAGOUN, D.D., President Iowa College, Grinnell, Iowa, recently said:

"My experience as secretary of the Iowa Sanitary Commission had so prepared me to appreciate this rare story that after opening it I found it difficult to lay it down, even for a moment. Every word of the 700 handsome pages had to be read. It was largely done with swelling of heart and not a few tears. Did ever a gifted and eloquent woman have such a tale to tell before? Did ever a tender-hearted, patriotic, and right-loving woman of any land do such a work as is here recorded? Were there ever such memoirs of courage, sacrifice, great-heartedness, and love 'stronger than death' to be gathered up and enshrined by the heart and mind of one who was so largely a part of it all? Until sensibility to what is most affecting in real life and real woe is dead in men, Mrs. Livermore's book will be a noble one, a moving one."

Yes, my dear, my Marchal & Smith Piano is a beautiful Instrument. The tone is so sweet and pure, the action so fairy-like, and the finish so elegant that not another thing can I wish for. I wrote to the factory, and told them just what I wanted, and they selected it and sent it to me for trial, agreeing to take it back and pay all the freights if I did not like it. The Century Magazine in 1891.

The recent remarkable serial successes of this magazine,—the famous War Papers, Kennan's Siberian Articles, and the Life of Lincoln,—will be continued in the coming volume (the forty-first) by "The Gold Hunters of California," a series of separate illustrated papers on the gold fever of '49, telling of the discovery of gold, the movement to California (by survivors of various expeditions), life in the mines, the Vigilance Committees (by the chairman of both committees), and many other incidents of that exciting period, including a paper by General Frémont.

Another notable feature will be the publication of extracts from advance sheets of the Talleyrand Memoirs soon to be issued in book-form in Paris, the manuscript of which has been secretly preserved for more than half a century,—to be printed first in an American magazine.

Other interesting serials include "An American in Tibet," papers describing a remarkable journey, 700 miles of which was over ground never before traveled by a white man; "Personal Traits of Lincoln," by his private secretaries, Messrs. Nicolay and Hay; "Adventures of War Prisoners," experiences of Union and Confederate soldiers during the civil war; "American Newspapers," described by noted journalists; "American and English Frigates in the War of 1812"; "Indian Fights and Fighters," by officers who served with Custer, Mackenzie, Crook and Miles; "The Court of the Czar Nicholas," by an ex-minister to Russia; suggestive papers on the Government of Cities; a series of engravings of noted pictures by American Artists; the "Present-Day Papers," by Bishop Potter, Seth Low, and others. Fiction includes "The Faith Doctor," a serial novel of New-York life by Edward Eggleston; "The Squirrel Inn" by Frank R. Stockton, and novelettes and short stories by nearly all the leading writers, Joel Chandler Harris, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Brander Matthews and many others.

The November Number, which begins the new volume, contains opening chapters of several important serials, including General John Bidwell's account of "The First Emigrant Train to California" (1841), "An American in Tibet," "Early Victories of the American Navy," and "Colonel Carter of Cartersville," a delightful illustrated novelette by F. Hopkinson Smith. Also "Life in the White House in the Time of Lincoln" by Col. John Hay, "On the Andersonville Circuit" by an ex-Union prisoner, "How London is Governed," "The Printing of THE CENTURY," two complete stories, etc. Nearly one hundred illustrations. Ready everywhere Nov. 1st. Begin subscriptions with November; $4.00 a year, single numbers 35 cents. Subscribe through dealers and postmasters, or send remittance directly to the publishers.

I BELIEVE that she who, in the Bethlehem manger, gave Jesus to the world, will yet be the foremost agent in carrying Jesus to all the nations.—Talmage.

"WHAT is to be done in Ireland's great distress?" is a question constantly recurring at these times. Were the government to stop the distilleries and the breweries, the whole famine threatened people in Ireland would have enough and to spare of the staff of life. When her distilleries were stopped in 1809-10 and 1813-14—years of famine—the change for the better was so great that if these liquor factories had stopped and never again gone on, the state of Ireland at this hour would have left no room for complaint.

AT a temperance meeting where several related their experiences, a humorous Irishman was acknowledged to be the chief speaker. He had on a pair of fine new boots. He said: "A week after I signed the pledge I met an old friend, and he says: 'Them's a fine pair of boots you have on.' 'They are,' says I, 'and by the same token 'twas the saloon-keeper who gave them to me.' 'That was generous of him,' said he. 'It was,' says I, 'but I made a bargain with him. He was to keep his drink, and I was to keep my money. My money bought me these fine boots. I got the best of the bargain, and I'm going to stick to it.'"

AT the City Temple in London, England, the famous pastor, Dr. Joseph Parker, recently said: "It is high time that intoxicating wine was banished from the sacramental service. It has done incalculable mischief. I am also opposed to the use of the vile concoctions by which, in some instances, intoxicating wine has been displaced. For my own part I never touch them; I simply put the cup to my lips. Plain water is the right thing to take in this sacred service. To my mind one thing is certain, and that is that at the Lord's Table men should not be tempted to the cultivation or the renewal of impious and destructive habits."

IN an English exchange, a temperance worker thus describes a novel method for arousing the attention of idle people: "I have a notice board in front of my house—a private one—on which I tack posters of important meetings, diagrams, drink maps, pictures, sayings of eminent men, scraps of poetry, etc., etc. Some are exhibited one week, some for two, and it is astonishing the numbers of passers who stop and look. They closely inspect and read what is on the board. All classes are attracted, gentry, traders, mechanics, farm laborers, and even sots, so that a good diagram or a striking picture is as useful as an ordinary lecture, and really more so, because it catches the attention of so many who never attend our meetings."

FROM the very beginning of her ministry, Mrs. General Booth, lately deceased, was an unflinching advocate of teetotalism, and to her influence is due the acceptance of the rule absolutely excluding from membership in the Salvation Army any one who partakes of intoxicating liquors. Each man and woman, boy and girl of the entire force is a pledged hater of alcohol in every form. This pledge has been the means of cutting off the new recruits from old companions who loved the strong drink, and keeping them loyal to the Army of their adoption. "Mind, Herbert," Mrs. Booth said to one of her sons, "let my coffin be a plain one, for I want it to preach the same sermon as my bonnet." The unspoken sermon has been reverently listened to by hundreds of thousands of all sorts and conditions of men and women in all parts of the world.

BY degrees, Europeans are being convinced of the injurious consequences of wine-drinking upon the young. A certain number of children in Berne, Switzerland, were forbidden the use of alcohol in any shape or form, during eight months of the year, but during the remaining four months they were supplied with the usual quantity of wine diluted with water. The parents carefully watched the children throughout the year, and found that they slept better and longer, and appeared decidedly brighter during the eight months of abstinence than during the period of wine-drinking. In the recent International Alcohol Congress, held in Christiania, Norway, great prominence was given to the baneful effects of alcoholic liquors upon children, even the most persistent moderate drinker admitting that education and legislation are necessary on this point. It was resolved to watch the methods employed in the United States for teaching children the scientific effects of alcohol, and if possible, to secure the introduction of the same text books.

EASTON MANUFACTURING CO., EASTON, MD.: EVANSTON, ILL., Apr. 2, 1890.

GENTLEMEN:—Please accept thanks for the case of W. C. T. U. Cleansing Powder recently received. I will give sample packages of it to the members of our local W. C. T. U. at their meeting this afternoon, and request them to write you after using it.

We have found it most helpful in the laundry and kitchen, and shall want to use it constantly.

The per cent you offer our society, as well as the merit of the article, ought to introduce it to the White-Ribboners' homes everywhere. Yours sincerely,

Frances E. Willard.

The following resolutions were passed at a special meeting of the W. C. T. U. of Easton, Md.:

WHEREAS, We believe the "W. C. T. U. Cleansing Powder," manufactured by the Easton Manufacturing Co., of Talbot Co., Md., to be an article of high merit, and knowing the said company to be composed of reliable, enterprising, law-abiding and representative citizens of this place; and, whereas, the said Company has placed within the reach of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a means by which a much-needed and a most substantial aid can be secured, now, therefore, be it Resolved, That we, the members of the W. C. T. U. of Easton, Md., will use our influence to promote the introduction of the said powder, and that we urge all other unions to do the same.

Resolved, That we do hereby recommend these goods to the public generally as a useful and valuable article and that our friends be requested to save the wrappers and forward them to be redeemed through our secretary.

Resolved, That we consider the collection of the wrappers of the "W. C. T. U. Cleansing Powder" a suitable means of interesting our children in the temperance cause, and that they be encouraged to undertake and prosecute the work.

Resolved, That these resolutions be recorded upon our minutes, and that a copy of the same be presented to the President of the Easton Manufacturing Company. E. E. MULLIKIN, Secretary.

MRS. A. T. BUSH, President.
September 23, 1890.

The Easton W. C. T. U. is a Union of good standing, and we are sure they would not endorse any article unless it had merit. Not having tried the powder ourselves, we are unable at this time to give it our personal recommendation.

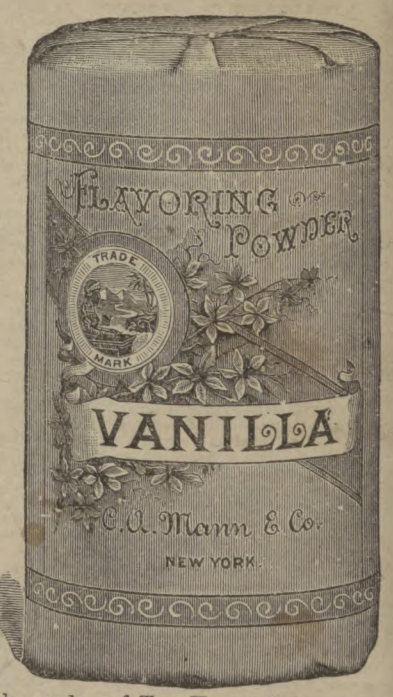
Flavoring Powders.

Inferior Flavorings,—who wants them? It takes only a few drops, either, to give a delicious finish to the taste of your cooking, or to completely spoil your efforts. Better see that those few drops are pure and concentrated then, since so much depends on it. But how to get them? Complaints of miserable, trashy Flavorings are heard on all sides. Some good cooks insist that the only way to be sure of getting a good quality of liquid Flavoring is to buy it in large bottles, holding from six to eight ounces. That's because it costs just as much to put up a small bottle, labels, corks, etc., as a larger bottle does, and liquid flavoring, if made of the best material, is expensive.



But then, this way of buying narrows the housekeeper down to one or two flavors unless her family is pretty large, for she naturally does not care to put all her capital into a variety of Extracts. How, then, can flavorings be put up in small quantities, to be as good as the best in large bottles? Our customers among the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL can tell you that we have answered the question satisfactorily with our Flavoring Powders. In fact, the Powders are better than the best liquid Flavorings, because more concentrated, and not dissolved in 90 per cent of its value in alcohol. We put up all flavors, in sizes ranging from one to sixteen ounces, and if you have not already done so, should be pleased to have you try them.

If your grocer does not keep them, send us 50 cents, and we will mail you an ounce bottle of our Lemon and Vanilla Powders to try.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

James Russell Lowell is slowly recovering his health.

The father of Peck's Bad Boy is now Governor of Wisconsin.

The Duke of Nassau took the oath as Regent of Holland, Friday.

The latest estimates give the majority against Prohibition in Nebraska as 38,602.

President Harrison's proclamation is out appointing November 27 as Thanksgiving day.

The complexion of the Kansas legislature makes the reëlection of Senator Ingalls impossible.

McKinley is defeated, and is receiving the "credit" of the Republican defeats all over the country.

Henry M. Stanley with his wife and her mother, Mrs. Tennant, landed in New York, Friday morning.

One thing to be thankful for—nobody charges this year's Republican defeat on the Prohibitionists.

According to the Chicago Tribune count, the next Congress will consist of 95 Republicans, 221 Democrats.

The annual session of the Society of Christian Workers was held in Hartford last week, Rev. A. R. Torrey presiding.

The Illinois Legislature stands 101 Republicans, 100 Democrats, and 3 Farmers' Alliance men, these three men, of course, holding the balance of power.

A subscription for relief of suffering in Ireland, taken at the meeting in Philadelphia, addressed by Messrs. O'Brien and Dillon, footed up $12,885.

Dr. Kelley polled a large vote in Tennessee, carrying three wards in Nashville, and throughout the state more than doubling the Prohibition vote of 1888.

In Nebraska, Boyd, Democratic, is elected Governor; the legislature is strongly Farmers' Alliance; Democrats come next in number, and Republicans third.

Lord Chief Justice Colcridge was stricken down in court, just after giving a decision; the attack was thought to be paralytic, but proves something less serious.

AN edition of the Atlanta Constitution has been seized for containing the announcement of one of its own gift enterprises.

MR. J. G. WOOLLEY is now in Boston, where he is engaged to work until March 1. His address is 38 West Newton street.

THE Louisiana Lottery is feeling so severely the effect of the new law in shutting its advertisement out of the mails, that it is trying to get round its provisions by advertising in Canadian papers. This device will probably fail as it has been tried on Mexican papers and they have been excluded from the mail.

INVITATIONS are received from Mr. and Mrs. John P. St. John to attend the marriage of their daughter, Lula, to Mr. Henry Louis Page, Wednesday afternoon, November 19, at Olathe, Kansas. Good wishes for the future of these young people are in the hearts of thousands of not only their own friends but the friends of the noble parents of the bride.

ACCORDING to the Pittsburgh papers the closing work of the Woman's Temperance Alliance (Non-partisan) was to vote down, after thorough discussion, a resolution in favor of Sunday closing of the Columbian Exposition, upon the ground that it had nothing to do with temperance. The W. C. T. U. differs with the Alliance in believing that the opening of the Exposition on Sunday is directly in the interest of the saloon; if it is thus opened it will be against the protest of every white-ribboner in the land.

MR. MOODY will open a series of meetings in Chicago, in connection with his Bible Institute work, November 23, continuing several weeks. He will be followed by Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, who is to remain through January, and possibly longer. All interested in Bible study and Christian work are cordially invited to attend the Institute for as long a time as suits their convenience. As far as possible they will be accommodated in the Institute Buildings. Those who desire accommodations or further information should write at once to R. A. Torrey, superintendent, 80 W. Pearson street, Chicago, or to Mrs. S. B. Capron, superintendent of the Ladies' department, 232 La Salle Avenue, Chicago.

MANY callers favor us with their presence these days returning from campaign work, going to convention or drawn hither by mutual attraction. Miss Vandalia Yarnum, of Pennsylvania, has been in the city a week, studying up its philanthropic work. She spoke in Moody's Church, Tuesday evening. Mrs. Barker, of South Dakota, spoke in Englewood Sunday evening and called on us Monday morning, as did Mrs. Beach, of West Washington, Mrs. Northrup, of Wyoming, Mrs. Blair, of Nebraska, and Mrs. Hoffman of Missouri. Mrs. Helen M. Gougar called on her return from Michigan, where she has made a splendid campaign; its result is seen in the doubling of Fisk's vote in that state. Most of these ladies are on their way to the National Convention.

MRS. C. M. WOODWARD, of Nebraska, writes November 7: "We now start in with clear sight and level heads, for National prohibition with a party behind, in front and all round it. No more evasion or equivocation permitted; every bridge is now burned. If you of the East do not know what to do with the 'non-partisan' nonsense at the National, just turn its representatives over to the Nebraska delegation. * * * I was in Lincoln yesterday, and cannot tell you how terribly in earnest our people are. Many who have never spoken before are discussing in good shape the whole situation, so confused and complicated, how much so very few good Republicans realized before the events of the last three days. Their overwhelming defeat will teach many men a new lesson."

WE call especial attention to the request of Miss Sudduth, editor of the department News from the Field, on page 10. A little reflection will convince all that the plan we have so earnestly advocated for several years is the one to secure interesting representative reports from the states, and give to each its proper share of space. This is impossible in any hap-hazard method of reporting; when each county reports its own work without any reference to the work of the state, there must be endless repetition of detail, and no broad outlook. If these reports were sent to a competent woman in the state, one thoroughly conversant with its work and workers, she could group the salient features of all into one harmonious whole, and thus present an impressive picture. This is what we wish to do, and two years' experience demonstrates that our plan will accomplish it. It has done so in the states which have tried it, and would do the same in all, if it were only given a chance.

THE issue of THE UNION SIGNAL for November 27 will exceed 210,000 copies, and all go to fill actual orders. It will contain a full report of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention, which is to be held at Atlanta, Ga., November 14 to 18, in which more than a national interest is being taken. THE UNION SIGNAL goes almost entirely to ladies—heads of families—and advertisers who wish to reach this wealthy buying class, and can secure space, will reap rich returns, as there will be no increase of the advertising rates for this large issue. As there will be no time for advertisers to write to Mr. C. D. Paine, our advertising manager, for terms, we give them here, that all, especially those who were disappointed in securing space in our Temple issue, can have an opportunity to take advantage of this exceptional facility for reaching a large constituency. Application for space must be made immediately to Mr. Paine at this office. Our regular advertising rates, which hold for this special issue, are seventy-five cents per line, ten per cent discount for four weeks; twenty per cent discount for thirteen weeks; fifty per cent for fifty-two weeks, making a five line advertisement for one year cost only $97.50 net.

A FRIEND from California thinks we give the W. C. T. U. too much credit in the matter of placing flags upon the school-houses. He says: "I may be mistaken, but I think that the first act of the kind dates nine years back, and that the actor was a woman prominent in the work of the Relief Corps. How it may have been in Kansas and Iowa I do not know, but there have been many cases of flag-raising over school-houses which cannot be accredited to the W. C. T. U. in other places. The Woman's Relief Corps may justly be counted as a great factor in the work of inculcating principles of loyalty and patriotism in the hearts of the school children of to-day." All of which we cheerfully concede and rejoice in the good work the Relief Corps is doing in this direction, and which we have never thought of discounting. As by our motto, "For God and Home and Native Land," the inculcation of patriotism is made a prominent feature of our work. We naturally referred to it when speaking to our children. Even if they would, the W. C. T. U. and the Relief Corps could not quarrel over instituting flag-raising on school-houses, for it antedates both organizations. I well remember such an occasion in connection with the High School in which I was teaching twenty-five years ago.

FROM far-away New Zealand comes a letter in which C. A. Baker, Esq., says that he sent to Sir John Hall copies of THE UNION SIGNAL, containing articles on woman's ballot. Sir John replied: "I am much obliged for the loan of the two copies of THE UNION SIGNAL. I have read the articles on female suffrage. They contain some useful hints, but do not show that the cause in America is in a hopeful condition. I trust we can do better in New Zealand, if we can only get a favorable opportunity for bringing the subject under the consideration of Parliament." A few days later Sir John in Parliament moved that the right of voting for members of the House be extended to women. After a discussion participated in by many leading members, the proposition was carried on division, by a vote of thirty-five to eleven. Thus New Zealand has outstripped America a long distance. Mr. Baker adds, that while Parliament was discussing this question, two women were conducting gospel meetings with glorious results, Mrs. Scott in the little town of Blenheim, where one hundred and forty-eight souls were led to Christ, and Mrs. Baeyertz, who was conducting meetings in both islands on her way to America. In Wellington, the capital, the churches were so crowded people could not obtain seats.

AT the October meeting of the business committee of the W. T. P. A., Mr. Hall, for five years our efficient business manager, tendered his resignation. This was unexpected and the committee, in several meetings held since that date, found no one to take his place, and so felt that a change would be unadvisable. They also felt that the matter should have the wisdom of the directors for its decision, and therefore called a special meeting of the board Saturday morning, when several out of town members could be present on their way to Atlanta. At this meeting the whole subject was thoroughly canvassed and the result is a contract between the board and Mr. Hall by which he is to remain with us as business manager and in charge of the advertising, for three years, devoting his whole time to this work and receiving therefor, in lieu of salary, twenty-five per cent of the net receipts of the advertising department. He has received very flattering offers to other fields, which would pay him better financially, but his interest in this work, with which he has so closely identified himself, decided him to remain here, a decision which we are sure will be gladly received by thousands of white-ribboners all over the land. The board also voted to open a subscription book department which will enable us to handle that class of books directly instead of through an outside agency, as at present.

STONE OF THE MOUNTAIN.

BY DWIGHT WILLIAMS.

Cut from the mountain fastness
A stone resistless rolls,
Down from the ether vastness
A hand its course controls;
No wail of sorrow breaketh
Along its path sublime,
And when the morn awaketh
It hath the joy of time.

The wrong it only smiteth
Yet not with noise and glare;
The evil it affrighteth
With love, and song, and prayer;
Oppressions fall before it,
Behind are vales of peace,
God's beauty shineth o'er it
With promise of increase.

The stone of olden story
Grows as a mountain wall,
The summit crowned with glory
Shines on the kingdoms all;
Look up, and see the banners
By countless hands swung out!
And hear the glad hosannas
Beyond the mists of doubt.

HEPSY AND THE MEDAL CONTESTS.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

Hepsy's ben an' gone an' took a new departure. She's ben readin' up about these here Demorest medal contests an' got it into her head that that's what Puddledock's a-pinin' for. I ain't a-goin' to say that that ain't so, but I declare I wish Hepsy'd stop mixin' her fingers up in every kind o' pie. If she'd jest stick to mince or punkin' like she did when we begun housekeepin', before these new-fangled notions come around, I'd be a leetle better pleased. But I've never ben onjust to Hepsy. I'm bound to own she never meddled much with my opinions an' I'm one o' the kind o' men that believes in woman's rights as fur as that's concerned. I generally give her the freedom an' liberty o' thought an' conscience I want she should give me. I've always ben a good husban' to Hepsy, an' there never was an amiabler couple than we be, an' I know it.

But as I was sayin' 'bout that there contest business—I wa'n't jest in favor o' Hepsy's takin' all that extry burden onto her shoulders, but take it onto 'em she did an' I didn't say much. Says she, "Adoniram Peabody, you jest listen to me. These here contests we're a-gettin' up," says she, "is worth a great sight more to many an' many a place than all the lectures an' pledge-signin's that can be got up. Lots o' temp'rance lectures ain't much more'n a string o' interestin' stories an' anecdotes an' so forth, that makes the people laugh one minute an' blubber the next. All the blubberin' that ever wet a gross o' pocket-handkerchiefs ain't no real practical good when 'lection day comes round. All the sentimental nonsense these here moral suasion temp'rance lecturers can stuff into the emotional part o' a man's natur' ain't very apt to make him vote right, now is it?"

I believe in moral suasion, but I didn't say a word. I wa'n't prepared to argue it out with Hepsy jest then.

Hepsy went on: "Now then, these contests, Adoniram, is what takes hold o' people,—there's a novelty about 'em that there ain't about a temp'rance lecture. Everyone's crazy to see who gets the medal, an' of course everybody'll go. There is that oncertainty about it that makes it interestin', you see. It stands to reason, don't it, that the pa's an' ma's of all the contestants want to go an' will go to see an' hear their children speak their pieces? All the brothers an' sisters an' uncles an' aunts an' cousins want to go too an' will go. So there's the first point, you see. Men'll turn out to sech a meetin' when they wouldn't kick off their slippers an' pull on their boots to go to a regular temp'rance lecture. An' Adoniram,"—(here Hepsy straightened up an' shook her finger in a mighty impressive way she's got) "jest you mark my words," says she, "when they once get there they get their money's worth o' good, hard, common sense prohibition! Not cry-baby stories an' experiences o' reformed drunkards, which I ain't sayin' is altogether out o' place, but I do say, husban'," says she, "that the plain, honest, straightforward truth o' prohibition comin' from them innocent boys an' girls in their clear young voices, is most mightily convincin'. A man's more apt to see the truth of a thing when his own boy that he loves better'n life almost, goes at it in such an honest, manly way an' speaks it off as if he believed every word of it, than he is when he hears the same doctrine preached by a stranger.

"I tell you, Adoniram," Hepsy wound up, "there's a powerful sight o' good in 'em, an' I'll bet before we're done with 'em, you'll wish you'd never seen twenty-one yourself, so's you could take part. Good land, I do!" says she, "but sech things wan't even dreamt of in our young days, though the need of 'em was plain enough."

So Hepsy went on with the contest business. We hadn't ever had none in Puddledock, an' there was consid'able interest showed concernin' it. Hepsy an' two or three other women had the young folks train an' practice in their houses. We had 'em to our house one night, an' I declare I couldn't concentrate my mind onto the Weekly Star worth a cent, though I sot out in the kitchen an' they was 'way in the settin'-room. To hear that leetle girl o' Jim Price's spin off a hull page o' prohibition in that earnest, honest way o' her'n, an' Sol Davis' boy get all roused up over his piece, was enough to distract any man's mind from readin' the paper.

Somehow, when the time come I had to go over to the hall, though I'd up and told Hepsy I guess I shouldn't waste no dime on hearin' a passel o' boys an' girls speak pieces, besides, I'd heard 'em anyway when they was practicin'. But Hepsy went on, cool as a cucumber, a-tyin' a new piece o' white ribbin in her button-hole an' said, "All right, Adoniram, don't let the fire go out," an' put on her bunnit.

I got ready an' went along over with her. I own I was a leetle cur'ous to see who else'd be there. Wal, the hall was full. There was, jest as Hepsy'd said there'd be, all the relaytives of the speakers. Even Jim Price, the saloon-keeper, was there to listen to his girl speak her piece. Old Deacon Jarvis, who everybody knows is in for high license, was there, 'cause his grandson, Archie Smith, was on the list; an' Horace Waters, one o' the excise board, was there, too, for to hear his boy speak.

The three ministers sot on the stage an' officiated about the prayer an' Scripture readin' an' sech. Strange how them white-ribbin women do make even the high-license preachers toe the mark an' come to their prohibition meetin's. I see Elder Stearns tryin' hard to look as if he wan't never a Republican an' never meant to be, when one o' them young ones was a-speakin' off a rousin' prohibition speech. I ain't never been ashamed o' my party yet an' it made me kind o' mad to see the Elder look so kind o' guilty. Hepsy says he's open to conviction an' mebby'll get under it if he comes to the rest o' them contests.

Wal, I was teetotally astonished at the way them young folks spoke their pieces. Sech fire! Sech life! Sech enthusiasm! Sech clear, plain speakin' of every word! I was surprised. But land! I wouldn't have Hepsy know I'd praised 'em up like that for nothin', for I ain't a Prohibitionist, as the hull town o' Puddledock knows, an' I ain't a-goin' to publicly uphold boys an' girls in speakin' sech strong Third-party pieces, but I was secretly tickled, I will own up, to see Jim Price set there with his hat on an' his mouth open when that smart leetle girl o' his'n went for license hot blocks.

I'm free to admit that there wa'n't a thing bold about any of 'em,—they jest went at it in a sort o' onconscious way that was mighty takin', an' the girls was as modest as they need to be.

It was a purty sight to see 'em all settin' there on the stage, eight of 'em, every last one of 'em with a white ribbin an' a pink rose-bud on (though I wouldn't have Hepsy know I thought so!)

Wal, the first contest was a success as fur as money went, at any rate. The young folks, it seems, are goin' to start a free readin'-room, an' they got sixteen dollars that night.

Jim Price's girl got the silver medal, an' Jim was tickled to death over it. Hepsy says with sech a girl as that, he won't ruin many more souls with that saloon o' his'n. She says it's got to go. Wal, if it does go, mebby I'll give that there medal business the credit, an' if it does, I'll write an' tell you all about it.

INVITED DANGER.

BY MRS. LOUISE S. ROUNDS.

It is said that Lord Macaulay prophesied that the United States would never live to celebrate their second centennial, the reason assigned being that no nation can long survive when the vicious classes are permitted to make its laws. There is much truth in this statement whether we accord to it the dignity of a propheey or credit it to so eminent a man. We have been told that our cities are fast becoming centers of dangerous, political power, in proof of which we have but to study the political trickery of Chicago, New York, St. Louis and other large cities in order to become convinced that the half has not been told us. It is an easy matter to trace political action from its source to its final result; law and common sense should invite the attention of our statesmen, if we have any, to the source of our troubles. It is hardly possible to bring forward a question of more vital interest to this government than that of our invited danger in the form of foreign immigration.

The drink problem, as also the question of capital and labor, is involved in this question of foreign born citizenship. There is a strong feeling, daily growing stronger, that we have reached, if we have not already passed, the point where promiscuous immigration is no longer safe or desirable. A great tidal wave seems to be bringing the world's humanity to our shores, until we stand somewhat appalled at the vision which greets our eyes at Castle Garden.

Of late an inadequately considered factor has entered into this transportation of "human ballast" which, as Mr. Powderly says, "loads and unloads itself," and that factor is the money there is in the business. At so much per head this "ballast" walks into and out of the great steamships, and is landed in New York to fall at once into the hands of vile politicians, who, understanding how to manipulate the laws of naturalization, proceed in hot haste to array these ignorant people, to say nothing of their moral degradation, in the garments of citizenship, and so with the privilege of making our laws. Mr. Powderly affirms that the Inman steamship company alone have 3,500 agents in Europe gathering up this human scum to be spread over this country. One agent said that he made it a point to seek out every man who had committed an offense and who might be easily persuaded to "leave his country for his country's good," and placed them on ship-board, bound for the United States, taking good care to pocket the not inconsiderable fee.

In spite of these facts and the threatened danger, many men are saying: "It is a good thing to have these men come here; they mine our coal and do our rough, hard work; they develop the soil and bring to light our hidden gold and silver."

Yes, the better class of immigrants do help solve the problem of our national resources of wealth, but what of that class who stay behind in our large cities to become irritant factors in social life, and who put blasts, not of powder, into coal and gold mines, but of social and anarchistic dynamite under the very foundations of our government?

We can better afford to wait a century for further development of wealth, than to have our national treasury run over with heaped-up gold secured at the expense of ruined American citizenship! The storm signal has been run up: if we do not heed the alarm we shall behold this fair land, with her dearly-bought institutions, civil and religious, sacrificed to foreign ignorance and Popish supremacy!

Some cry, "No danger," and laugh at the bare mention of the need of restrictive immigration laws, or compulsory educational laws. They say, with a proud, boastful air, "America can take care of all who come here." Most marvelous have been the powers of assimilation shown thus far by this country, thanks to the heroic efforts of good, true men to counteract the awful influence of this imported ignorance and viciousness, by increasing the means of religious instruction and privileges. The sums of money given each year by the Christian business men of Chicago for moral and religious work are simply enormous, but in spite of all their generosity the social ulcer enlarges, the dangerous element increases. What is to be done? The strain this country has endured for the last decade cannot with safety be kept up.

How long shall our shores be used as the "dumping ground" for the paupers and criminals of Europe? How long shall these creatures be permitted to make our laws, and how long shall the liquor traffic use this ballast to steady their pirate vessels through the sea of state and national politics, until they drop anchor in the ports of state Legislatures and the United States Congress! There is but one remedy: Either prohibit such immigration, or refuse it citizenship!

It is safe to say that the only reason why the "opium joints" of the Chinese are not legalized to-day, is because our Celestial visitors are not clothed with citizenship. Put the ballot into the hands of the Chinese, and their political market value can be easily determined.

With over two million voters in this country who cannot read their ballots, it would be a suggestive and profitable study to learn what per cent of these are of foreign birth, and compare them with the millions of Christian women, intelligent and native born, who are deprived of the rights of franchise, but are not debarred from paying taxes, nor sharing in the punishment which follows committed crime.

The thousands of wives and mothers who are neither ignorant, vicious nor paupers—no, nor foreign born—do solemnly enter their protest against this idiotic state of things, and demand better laws and a better adjustment of political forces. "We, the people," under the pressure of a cleaner civilization, must come to mean women as well as men, and the prophecy of Lord Macaulay will be proven false, when intelligent and good men and women shall walk hand in hand, natural and mutual lovers that they are, to the ballot box, and beyond, even to legislative halls! High church councils, also, will hear the rustle of their garments, and their soft footfalls take the place of the squeaky tread of some men whose "displacement" and retirement may work a blessed and befitting change! Money, not Christ, is king to-day in this nation, policy and not principle the watchword of our politicians.

No wonder the fears of the thoughtful are aroused, the efforts of good people redoubled with almost frantic zeal. Unless a change soon comes, we shall awake too late, to find our enemies have bound us hand and foot and are laughing with demoniac glee over our humbled, helpless condition.

When the day of national retrospection and remorse shall come, as come it will, we shall say as did one of keen perception long ago:

"Of all our woes, those most do we deplore,
Which our own sins have brought within our door."

WHAT THE "ORIGINAL PACKAGE" DECISION DID NOT DECIDE.

BY JUDGE DAVID M'CULLOCH.

II.

In a former article an attempt was made to analyze the decision of the Supreme Court in the "Original Package" case, and to follow the course of reasoning employed by the justices in arriving at their conclusion. Having, in the manner therein stated, cleared away every doubt, and strained out every gnat that seemed to disturb the clearness of the judicial waters, the only thing left was to apply the law, as thus determined by them, to the facts of the case as certified to them by the trial court. If in doing so they should seem to have swallowed not only one but a whole caravan of camels, the fault could not be laid at their doors, but properly at the doors of those who had made up the statement of facts.

To illustrate this point, let it be noted that upon the question of the relations existing between intoxicating liquors and other articles of commerce, there is a sharp conflict of opinion among the judges. This is a question of fact, upon which the report of the case as sent up from the State Court is wholly silent. How can it be settled should it become material to the decision of the case?

In the more recent case of Minnesota vs. Barber, relative to the dressed beef controversy, the court says, "If a fact alleged to exist, and upon which the rights of the parties depend, is one within common experience and knowledge, it is one of which the courts will take judicial notice." In the present case both the majority and the minority appeal to this class of evidence, in support of their respective positions.

The majority say: "That ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale and beer, are subject to exchange, barter and traffic, like any other commodity, in which the right of traffic exists, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress and the decisions of the courts, is not denied."

From this concession, or possibly assumption of fact, the conclusion is arrived at, that they are likewise the subjects of legitimate commerce between the states. The question is then put, as the main point in the case, "Can a state, in the absence of legislation on the part of Congress, prohibit their importation from abroad or from a sister state?"

Before this question could be answered in the negative, in the case in hand, it must have been made to appear, first: that the beer in question was a subject of legitimate commerce between the states; and secondly: that, at the time of its seizure, it was the subject of a then pending interstate commercial transaction. The first point was disposed of by the majority, in the manner already indicated. It is evident, therefore, that the argument of the majority in support of their opinion rests wholly upon this assumption of fact, that ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale and beer occupy a place in the commercial world, of equal dignity, before the law, with wheat, corn, beef, clothing and other necessaries of life. If this assumption should prove false the whole argument would fail.

They, however, concede that not every article of value is the subject of legitimate commerce, but that there may be exceptions to the rule. Quoting from the opinion of the same court delivered by Mr. Justice Matthews in the Bowman case, they say: "Articles in such a condition as tend to spread disease are not merchantable, and not legitimate subjects of trade and commerce, and the self-protecting power of each state, therefore, may be rightfully exerted against their introduction, and such exercise of power cannot be considered a regulation of commerce prohibited by the constitution."

And in the present case, the Chief Justice, speaking for the majority, says, "Undoubtedly it is for the legislative branch of the state governments to determine whether the manufacture of a particular article of traffic, or the sale of such articles will injuriously affect the public, and it is not for Congress to determine what measures a state may properly adopt as appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety; but . . . . the responsibility is upon Congress, so far as the regulation of interstate commerce is concerned, to remove the restriction upon the state, in dealing with imported articles of trade within its limits, which have not been mingled with the common mass of property therein, if in its judgment the end to be secured justifies the required action."

This language seems to mean nothing less than that, while the state legislature has the right to prohibit the manufacture and sale, within its own borders, of such articles as it may find to be deleterious to the health, the morals, and the safety of its own people, yet, if such articles are imported from abroad or from other states, and are universally recognized as articles of commerce, then, no matter how noxious they may in fact be, it is for Congress and not for the states to exclude them, if in its judgment the end to be secured justifies and requires such action.

Therefore, having already assumed that ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale and beer, are recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress and the decisions of the courts as articles of commerce, the majority of the court conclude that the police power of the state cannot reach far enough to prevent their introduction and sale in unbroken or original packages.

From this position the minority strongly dissent. The principle they contend for is, that "the police power extends not only to things intrinsically dangerous to the public health, such as infected rags and diseased meat, but to things which, when used in a lawful manner, are subjects of property and commerce, and yet, may be used so as to be injurious to the life, the health or the morals of the people;" that the legislature cannot divest itself of the police power, and that no part of it has been delegated to the Congress of the United States. In support of this position they refer to a long list of cases decided by the same court, and quote largely from the opinions of the justices, who rendered the decision in the License Cases, above referred to, to the effect that intoxicating liquors may, by state legislation, be excepted from that commerce which would otherwise have a right to enter the state.

While the majority plant themselves upon the alleged fact "that spirituous and distilled liquors are universally admitted to be subjects of ownership and property, and are therefore subjects of exchange and traffic, like any other commodity in which the right of property exists," the minority reply in substance, admitting that to be true, "yet a common experience has shown that the general and unrestricted use of intoxicating liquors tends to produce idleness, disorder, disease, pauperism and crime. The power of regulating or prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors appropriately belongs, as a branch of the police power, to the legislatures of the several states, and can be judiciously and effectively exercised by them alone, according to their views of public policy and local needs, and cannot practically, if it can constitutionally, be wielded by Congress as a part of a national and uniform system."

In support of these views they quote the following vigorous passage from the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, in the License Cases: "It is not necessary, for the sake of justifying the state legislation now under consideration, to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism and crime which have their origin in the use or abuse of ardent spirits. The police power which is exclusively in the states, is alone competent to the correction of these great evils, and all measures of restraint or prohibition, necessary to effect that purpose, are within the scope of that authority."

Therefore, admitting the law to be as contended for by the majority of the court, as to all proper subjects of commercial intercourse between the states, it is manifest there is a serious conflict of opinion between the judges, as to the status of intoxicating liquors before the law. The majority contend that inasmuch as they are universally recognized as articles of commerce, it is for Congress and not for the states to decide whether or not, and under what conditions, they may be admitted. The minority contend that, because of their known deleterious effects upon the health, the morals and the safety of the people, they are the subjects of police regulation, and therefore it is for the states and not for Congress to determine whether or not under any circumstances they may be admitted.

Here seems to be a territory which has as yet not been fully explored. An appeal to history might settle the dispute. If, in the trial of some future case, it should be made to appear that the historical basis, upon which the majority rest their opinion, is not well sustained, and should it further appear from the history of legislation upon that subject, that the traffic in intoxicating liquors has, from a very early period, been made subject to police regulations of a restrictive and prohibitory character, to which the ordinary necessaries of life have not, it is not beyond the reach of possibility that the court might find room to review its late decision.

In order to overthrow the decision of the Supreme Court of the state of Iowa, it was necessary, also, that the Supreme Court of the United States should in some way be apprised of the fact that, at the time of its seizure, the beer in question was so circumstanced as to be the subject of a pending interstate commercial transaction. The trial court found the fact to be that the beer in question had been manufactured in the state of Illinois, that it had been shipped by the manufacturers to their own agent residing in the state of Iowa, for the purpose of being there sold by them in violation of the laws of that state. A question might here arise whether or not such a transaction rises to the dignity of a commercial transaction between states, over which Congress and not the state legislature has appropriate jurisdiction.

In the early days of the controversy, the question arose whether the transportation of the article in question entered, as an element into that which Congress, under the name of commerce, had the power to regulate, or whether commerce did not consist wholly and exclusively in the dealings between residents and foreigners, or between residents of different states. It was decided that commerce did not consist wholly in the interchange of values, but that the transportation of the article from place to place was also included within that term. But the question might still arise whether or not commerce, either foreign or interstate, might consist of transportation alone, where there was no mercantile transaction between foreigners or residents of different states involved in the transaction.

It will doubtless become a question of the gravest importance, in the near future, as to the point of time when, and the circumstances under which, an article manufactured or produced in one state, but intended for shipment into and sale in another, becomes an article of interstate commerce. In view of the fact that all our interstate commerce is now, or is likely soon to be placed under the power of an interstate commission, it is a matter of as great importance to the public, that the beginning of its jurisdiction, as that the end of it, should be well defined.

The city of Keokuk is so located that its markets command a local trade with three states. The question may some day arise, whether the market gardeners, the farmers and the coal-miners of Illinois and Missouri, who carry their own produce in their own wagons to the markets of Keokuk, are so engaged in interstate commerce as to be under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, while those of Iowa are not. If, in such case, the resident of Illinois or Missouri could sell his produce in the markets of Keokuk without reference to, or in defiance of the police regulations of that city, while the resident of Iowa must conform thereto, it would present the strange spectacle of there being one law for the home born, and another for the alien in the same city.

Or if Gus Leisy & Co. had erected a brewery exactly on the line between Missouri and Iowa, if they had brewed their beer on the Missouri side, and delivered it through the partition wall, to their agent, John Leisy, on the other side of the line, to be there sold to the thirsty Iowans, in violation of their prohibitory law, would that have been such a commercial transaction between the states, as is contemplated by the constitution of the United States? If not, would the character of the transaction have been any different, if they had erected their brewery a half mile south of the line and carted their beer to an "original package" house, kept for them by their agent, John Leisy, a half mile north of the line? If not, would it have been any different if they had located their brewery on the east side of the Mississippi River, and their "original package" house on the west side, and if they had delivered their beer by boat, instead of by the cart? If not, would it have been any different because the distance between Peoria and Keokuk intervened, and the transportation was by rail instead of by cart or boat?

Where is the starting point of a commercial transaction between the states? This question is not answered by the decision in the "original package" case. In the Kidd case, as we are informed by the opinion of the majority, it was decided by the same court that, under the Iowa law, "intoxicating liquors may be manufactured and sold within the state for mechanical, medicinal, culinary or sacramental purposes, but for no other, not even for transportation beyond the limits of the state," and that this provision of the law was not an undertaking to regulate commerce among the states. It would seem to follow from this that, while the beer in question was in process of brewing, even with the intent to ship the same for sale into the state of Iowa, it had not come within the jurisdiction of the laws of Congress, relating to interstate commerce. When did that jurisdiction first attach to the beer in question? It is assumed that it did attach at some point, between the completion of the brewing, and the moment of its seizure, but the decision fails to inform us by what particular act, or at what moment of time it came within the scope of that jurisdiction. Here seems to be another field of research not yet fully explored.

The Supreme Court seems also to have decided that the markets of every state are open to all the world, to deal in imported intoxicating liquors, so long as the sales are made in the "original packages." Another pertinent question therefore is: What is meant by the term "original package"? If the right to import carries with it the right to sell the imported article, why should the importer be troubled about the package in which he must sell it? That expression seems to have been first made use of in a case involving the rights of an importer of foreign goods. The package in which they had arrived from foreign ports had not been broken. It was a very convenient form of expression for the court, in connection with the case in hand, to say that while the goods remained in such original package, they were under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; but that whenever such package was opened for the purposes of sale, the contents became so intermingled with the general mass of property of the country, as to become subject to the laws of the state. The general principle intended to be announced doubtless was that, so long as the import remained in the hands of the importer, in the same condition, as to its capability of identification, as it was when it arrived in the country, and was so kept as an article of merchandise for sale, it should be still considered as within the domain of commerce. But it can hardly be supposed that the court, by so saying, intended to lay down an inflexible rule, that the imported article must necessarily be put up in some kind of a package.

Interstate commerce is not carried on in packages to the same extent that foreign commerce is. It embraces everything in which the people of this country deal with each other, and is largely carried on in bulk without packages of any kind. It takes in locomotive and traction engines, railroad cars, grain separators, agricultural implements, grain, furniture, live-stock, hay, fruit and minerals by the car, and agricultural products as they come from the field and garden. Is the market woman who carries the products of her garden, her dairy or her hennery from the Illinois side to the markets of Keokuk, engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the constitution? In the same wagon she may have milk in the can, butter in the roll, potatoes in the sack, eggs in the basket, and asparagus or onions in the bunch. Are not all these to be regarded as original packages?

If they are, why cannot she sell them in the markets of Keokuk free from the police regulations of that city? Such questions as these might seem frivolous, were it not for the circumstance that the case under consideration was based upon a state of facts of no greater importance than these.

Gus. Leisy & Co. had put up in their brewery at Peoria certain cases, each of which contained two dozen bottles of beer well corked, each cork fastened with a metallic cap, sealed and covered with tin foil, and each case sealed with a metallic seal. These sealed cases had not been opened when the constable arrived by whom they were seized. Possibly he was on the alert, watching for some infraction of the law, but it is not at all improbable he had notice from the importers that they had just brought into the state a shipment of beer, already prepared in such a way as to make a good test case for the courts. It may have been their intention to procure a decision to the effect that these quart bottles, well corked, sealed and covered with tin foil, should be considered the original packages instead of the cases in which they were packed. But no such decision was obtained, and that question is still open for discussion.

HAS GOD FORSAKEN HIS PEOPLE IN CHINA?

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A few days ago I was present, as a spectator, at a large meeting of native Christians in this capital, called together under the auspices of the Prohibition of Opium Society of Peking. In the course of the proceedings, there arose in the body of the mission chapel, a Chinese Christian, whose venerable appearance indicated that he was nearing the close of his earthly warfare. In earnest tones he suggested that the followers of Christ in Peking should issue a call to Christians of other countries to humiliation and prayer on account of the traffic in opium, which curses beyond description the people of his native land.

"The heart knoweth its own bitterness." Christians in Western lands, either through ignorance, thoughtlessness, or consciences seared by listening to the unsanctified judgments of the world, may think lightly of the opium traffic, but it is no light matter to the Lord's people who have been gathered out of heathenism in China. There is no variation in their estimate of this devouring abomination. Everywhere the attitude of Chinese Christians towards the opium habit and traffic is one of firm and uncompromising condemnation.

Not only does the Chinese Christian have to bear the taunt of having adopted the religion of "the foreign devils who are making China into a hell by their opium," but he has also the bitterness of seeing the little Christian Church decimated by the infernal drug. Whole families sometimes go back into heathenism under its influence. In other cases the wife and mother alone remains true, widowed and childless while her husband and sons are yet alive, more bereaved than if she had buried them. In some instances, the womanhood of the deserted wife is further outraged by having to witness her fallen husband's marriage with another. A month since at a meeting of the Christian Women's Anti-opium and Temperance Union of Tien-Tsin, the proceedings were broken by sobs and crying, as the Christian wives and mothers recited their experiences of the ravages of the opium fiend.

Is God deaf to the wails of sorrow and double bereavement that continually arise from His people in China? Has He suddenly changed His attributes and forsaken them? Verily, no! God will avenge the slain of His people, and in the day "when He maketh inquisition for blood" it will be better for the backslidden opium slave than for the apologetic and therefore guilty accomplices of the guilty principals in the stupendous crime that is now being perpetrated in China through British-Indian opium. "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in Me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea."

Who will say that humiliation and prayer are not needed in Great Britain and India, together with fruits meet for repentance?

In a conversation with some missionaries at Peking upon converted opium smokers, one of the missionaries mentioned a case at which another missionary remarked, "It is only safe to talk about such reformations when the persons are dead." Converted opium smokers justly call forth rejoicing both here and on missionary platforms in Great Britain, but in such instances it is necessary to rejoice with fear and trembling. In the English mail steamship that brought me to China (unhappily along with fifteen hundred large chests of opium from India), was Mr. Macgowan, of Amoy, returning with his family to the scene of his nearly thirty years' labors; and also six other missionaries. In Mr. Macgowan's recently published missionary book, "Christ or Confucius, Which?" he narrates the deeply interesting story of a converted opium smoker, who is now one of the principal native preachers in the Amoy mission. He says: "The man is a miracle to me, and yet I never think of him without a dread feeling of anxiety that I cannot control. Is he really forever free from that awful opium? For thirty-four years it held him in its grip. It controlled his life, and destroyed his manhood, and absorbed his will so completely, that he had no thought of resisting it. Has it, indeed, given up its mastery over him? It would seem so; and yet some of its roots may still be imbedded far down in his nature, and some day, in a moment of weakness or temptation, these may again assert their power, and he may once more fall under the awful and mysterious fascination with which opium charms its victims. My hope that this may not happen is entirely in the grace of God. No power of will, no selfish thought of life, no human affections will save him. Nothing short of divine power can keep him a free man."

Can we be surprised, then, at the depth of feeling in the native church upon this monster evil? That Chinese Christians desire a war of extermination against opium is illustrated by the pledge of their Prohibition of Opium Society at Peking and elsewhere. Its members "promise to be faithful unto death," not to eat, smoke, cultivate, nor help others to cultivate, nor to trade or assist others to trade in opium; and "with all my heart and strength to use every righteous method to destroy the evil and injury of opium taking, and to exhort others to do likewise."

Such indications of the intensity of feeling among Christian converts in China should be as the voice of God to their brethren in Great Britain, that while they send the gospel, they will insist upon the poisonous deluge of British opium being stopped at its Indian source. Let not the streams of salvation and damnation, of blessing and cursing, flow any longer together into China, while the latter might be speedily ended, under the blessing of God, by a supreme effort on the part of His church in the lands of the guilty aggressor.

The evils which Great Britain has inflicted upon China by the opium traffic are too immeasurable to allow of adequate compensation being offered. The victims of wholesale massacre are beyond compensation. If it is too late for the British nation to do an act of justice in this respect, it is not too late for it to act righteously in the present, and thus perhaps avert the judgment which the crimes of Britain towards China richly warrant and deserve.

It is presumption to pray for a revival of religion in China, if by our silence we still connive at the destruction of her people. "To obey is better than sacrifice." Nothing will do so much to prepare the way of the Lord in this many-millioned land as humiliation, prayer, and action in Great Britain to destroy China's greatest curse.

Yours for God and righteousness,

Peking. ALFRED S. DYER.

LONDON LETTER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I arrived at Liverpool from New York on August 15, and was thankful to reach my home and family in London after my eighteen months' absence in America, Australia and New Zealand. A great meeting was held at Victoria Park Tabernacle to welcome me home. Sir Charles Russell, M. P., the famous Queen's Counsel, presided, and made an able speech; addresses of welcome were also delivered by E. H. Pickersgill, M. P.; George Howell, M. P.; Robert Rae, of the National Temperance League; Dr. Dawson Burns, Dr. John Moir, and other friends. A vote of thanks, of a more solid kind than is often accorded to temperance workers, was presented to me in the form of a purse of gold. It is encouraging and gratifying to have such a mark of appreciation shown of our arduous life work of fighting the powers of darkness.

Many changes have taken place during my absence from England. A great stride has been taken in the direction of the emancipation of the workers from the tyranny of sweating monopolists. The unskilled laborers are chafing against their joyless surroundings and grad-grind existence. The long hours of toil, low wages, narrow, crowded streets and grimy houses, with often scanty food, are creating a divine discontent among the masses of our people, which is culminating in what future historians will call "The Revolt of Labor." Strikes have been common, some of them, I fear, have been unwise, but the most notable, and the most successful, the dock laborers' strike of last year, was a righteous rebellion against unbearable conditions.

I addressed some of the meetings of the dockers when they were forming their union in 1888. Poor fellows! they often had to fight like wild beasts outside the dock gates for a ticket which gave the man who forcibly secured it the right to engage in the hard labor of loading and unloading vessels for a wage of eight or ten cents an hour. As a result of the strike, the dockers are now paid sixpence, or twelve cents an hour, and the sub-contractors, or middle-men, have been abolished, and the laborers have organized their union all over the country. A cheering sign of the times in this connection is the fact that most of the new labor leaders are total abstainers. Mr. Tillett is a member of the same Good Templar Lodge as myself. John Burns, the Boanerges of labor, is also an abstainer, and always urges upon his audiences the importance of abstaining from drink and gambling. Tom Mann, the president of the Dock Laborers' union, is a total abstainer, while the assistant secretary, Mr. Clem Edwards, is a young man who signed the pledge some years since at one of my meetings in Wales. Then on your side you have Mr. Powderly, of the Knights of Labor. The influence of these men is telling powerfully in favor of sobriety among the people, and is a good augury for the future of labor. The complex social problems of our day will not be solved over beer barrels by alcohol saturated brains. Men of moral character and sturdy integrity are needed, and such men are being produced by our movement.

Another cheering step in advance has been taken. For the second time the compensation proposals of the present effete government have been defeated. The liquor traffickers almost exclusively support the Tory party, which now holds the reins of office; the government were anxious to give a quid pro quo to their friends, and so have twice introduced their compensation scheme into the House of Commons, and each time they have had to ignominiously surrender to public opinion, and withdraw the objectionable proposals. The agitation has done immense good in educating our people on the real position of the liquor traffic. The licensing magistrates now realize that they have power to refuse to renew a license if they are of opinion that the people do not wish for it to be granted. During the recent licensing sessions a large number of renewals have been refused in various parts of the country, and the disestablished liquor sellers have had no compensation. We seek, as a first step to prohibition, that this power, now vested legally in the hands of irresponsible magistrates, shall be vested in the people themselves in each licensing district. I advocate that women as well as men shall have power to vote at local option polls. The question affects women even more closely than men, and if the people are to vote directly upon the question, "Shall we have drink saloons or no?" let each adult person in the district record his and her vote.

The winter campaign is now being carried on; while we agitate for power to crush out the open sale of the devil's drug, alcohol, let us not neglect our educational propaganda. The delusions relative to the supposed virtues of intoxicants are still deeply rooted and widely spread. Exclusive attention to one aspect of the question only will not accomplish our aims: the educational and political must go hand in hand in our agitation. Do not let us underestimate the strength of the enemy; he is strong, wealthy, unscrupulous and cruel. Appetite and passion, sensuality and selfishness, greed and the devil, are on the side of the hellish traffic. But truth and righteousness, home and love, time and God, are with the temperance reformers. Let each of us bend more earnestly to our work "For God and Home and Humanity." Waver not in the conflict, faint not in the service, for "in due season we shall reap if we faint not." Despite the strength of the liquor interest, we can say of it in a poet's words:

"Your hoards are great,
Your walls are strong,
But God is just.
The gilded chambers
Built by wrong
Invite the rust."

W. C. T. U. WOMEN IN AN "ORIGINAL PACKAGE" HOUSE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It may interest your readers to know how the women of Kansas feel about the late decisions of the Supreme Court and of the United States Circuit Court, the first of which allowed "original packages," or saloons to come into our state against our prohibitory law, and the latter of which proclaims the law annulled by that first decision. Of course, we cannot but know that underneath these decisions there are reasons which have their foundation in the power and economic influence of the National Liquor Traffic. It is a part of the warfare of the saloon influence after all that can be said to explain or excuse it. Its real cause lies just there and nowhere else.

Two days after this last decision had been made there was a saloon opened in Lawrence. Last summer when the liquorites came, they were careful to bring their bottles each in a small package by itself, but bolder grown they now bring whisky, wine and beer in bottles of all kinds and sizes. The women met in prayer-meeting the same morning, feeling powerless, but knowing that whatever they did, prayer was the first step. We resolved that as these places had been forced upon us, against our laws and against the sentiments of our citizens, we ought at least to have a watch over them, that they should do no more injury than possible. We wished also to protest against the iniquity—against the crime that opened the saloons again, to corrupt our youth and debauch our people—we called a mass-meeting on Tuesday night, which was large and very enthusiastic. There was a great deal of feeling, and it was with difficulty that the people restrained themselves from throwing the "agent" and his wares into the river.

Wednesday morning the women met again in prayer. This was a very solemn service. We debated whether to go to the saloon or not, but finally thought best to go and talk with the men that were there and see if some influence could not be brought to bear against the business. About fifteen women went, headed by our president. The man brought seats and invited the women in. A crowd soon gathered around the door and the leader talked to the young men in a very impressive manner. Then one woman prayed, and we sang "Jesus, Lover of my soul." The saloon keeper or "agent" said: "You can talk or pray (I pray myself), but you can't sing, I won't have no singing and fun makin' in here. It's disturbin' the peace." Think of that man who was a moral law breaker, talking to us about not "breaking the law." (One of the ladies had her little boy nine years of age with her but this "law-abiding" citizen would not permit the child to stay with his mother as it was "'gainst the law" for him to allow boys under twenty-one years of age in his place. "He never 'lowed no boys there." He was arrested two days later for selling to a minor and is now out on a three hundred dollar bail.)

One of the ladies said: "How can you help yourself if we choose to sing?" "I'll have you arrested, right away." "Oh! well, then, we'll sing, and you can have us arrested." So they sang, "Rock of Ages." The man went out and tried to get several persons to go for the marshal, but not a soul would stir, and the utmost quiet prevailed. Then the agent said: "You can go now; I don't want you here no longer;" but the ladies concluded they would not go. They were free-born citizens and that was a public place, and a place of danger for the boys, and the mothers concluded that they would stay and they did. They stayed all day. Several citizens sent them food. The mayor of the city sent the marshal to stay as long as the women did, and to say that whenever they saw fit to go there again he would see that they were protected. It caused a great deal of excitement in the city, and did what the Crusade did, made people think, and when people think about any great evil, it does good. About five o'clock the women thought best to go home. They said to the man: "We suspect you would rather have given ten dollars than to have had us here to-day, wouldn't you?" "Yes," he said, "it has injured my business. The respectable people won't come here while the women are here. You see nothing but the bummers and darkies have come here to-day." And that was so; we cannot tell where this is to end, but if we can do nothing more, we can protest and let the world know that Kansas people regard the "original package" business as an outrage. A W. C. T. U. WOMAN.

OUR NATIONAL DISGRACE.

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—Among Christian countries of the civilized world to-day there will be found few more poorly governed than the District of Columbia.

The District has not the ordinary Sabbath laws that most other Christian communities have. There is no law to prevent ordinary manual labor on Sunday, even on the streets of our national capital. Then the District and Washington especially are rum-cursed. One thousand two hundred and seven liquor licenses have been granted by the Commissioners since the first of last November; 743 are retail licenses, and 464 are for wholesale. For these licenses $85.900 have been paid. This blood money goes into the treasury of the District. It is not a misnomer to call this revenue blood money, for the liquor traffic has wrought destruction at the national capital as elsewhere. One of the local papers recently reported 175 arrests in Washington, in forty-eight hours. The article stated that among those arrested were thirty-nine minors, while twenty-four victims were simply locked up for intoxication. This paper also stated that the police court cells were crowded, and that the black holes refused to hold all the prisoners. What a picture this is for the capital of the greatest republic on earth, and what a comment it is on the effects of high license!

Congressman Belknap, of Michigan, who is on the invalid pension committee, said to me just before the adjournment of Congress, that the greatest trouble that this committee have had this session was to devise some plan or law by which the wives and families of old soldiers who are habitual drunkards, may receive the pensions allowed by the government. "We have it now," said he, "in the hands of a sub-committee, and hope to devise some plan." Then he went on to tell me how sad it was that a great many pensions were paid out to old soldiers at Washington, who were robbed of them by the Washington saloon-keepers.

"It is pitiable," he said, "to notice that on each pension day when the old soldiers are paid off, the saloon-keepers will walk on the other side of the street, and as they see an old man come out of the building near the pension department, they lock arms with him and lead him away, and after they have got him to take one drink, they can get his money."

Yes, this is a pitiable picture. But what of the honor of a government that knowing these facts will still license these villains to deal out their deadly poison, and thus rob these poor old soldiers? Surely then the best plan to help the wives and families of these soldiers would be to abolish the saloons.

When two of the three commissioners of the district appointed by President Harrison sign a license, a saloon has a legal right to exist, and although the saloon-keeper, to whom the license is given may afterwards violate every law on the statute books of the District, the commissioners have no power to revoke his license. This is irrevocable, although he sells liquor to minors, and on Sunday, and in fact is guilty of any or all crimes. There certainly ought to be a law giving the commissioners power to revoke a license when its conditions have been violated. The commissioners themselves desire such a law. Commissioner Douglass started out this year with the laudable intention of diminishing the number of saloons, and it is a fact that over one hundred and thirty licenses were issued which did not receive his signature. Commissioner Hine, an ex-attorney of the liquor dealers, is regarded as their friend, and his signature appears on about every license that has been issued. The new commissioner, Mr. Ross, has not had an opportunity to make a record as yet, as most of the licenses were issued before he was appointed.

Pennsylvania avenue, leading to the Capitol, is lined on both sides with saloons, and they are plentifully scattered throughout other parts of the city.

The thinning out of a few of them would not seem to make much material difference, what is needed is the complete annihilation of the liquor traffic in the District.

As slavery was first abolished in the District of Columbia, it would be well to see what the moral effect on the whole country would be by the overthrow of the liquor traffic there. IDA HINMAN.

Our Book Table.

WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

This volume has been on our table for several weeks, but has not received earlier notice because we have been testing it. The result of this testing is the firm conviction that we cannot keep house without it. While losing none of the features which made the Unabridged peculiarly "American" it presents new ones which prove it to have broadened out to meet the changed conditions which are fast making English the world-encircling language, and thus entitle it to the new title, "International."

While it is, in a sense, a revision of the American, it is a revision which involved as much work as the preparation of an entirely new dictionary would have done. For ten years, under the supervision of Dr. Noah Porter, a large corps of experts have worked ass duously in revising and making the book as nearly perfect as possible.

Loomis J. Campbell was at the head of this corps, ably seconded by Walter Allen, while Asa George Baker, Zenas W Bliss, Robert Dawson, Dorsey Gardner, Julia H. Wilson, Francis L. Palmer, and many others aided in their special departments. Edward S. Sheldon, of Harvard, supervised and readjusted the work of the last edition to meet the demands of modern philology. Professor August Fick, of the University of Gottingen, prepared a select table of the Indo-German's radicals of important English words and traced their historical development. Rev. Samuel W. Barnum, and Professor Samuel Porter had charge of the department of Pronunciation. The definitions in Anatomy were revised by Professor Sidney I. Smith, of Yale; those in Architecture and Fine Arts, by Professor Russell Sturgis, of the College of New York; in Biology and Physiology, by Professor Chittenden, of Yale; in Law, by Francis Wharton of the Department of State, Washington; in Mineralogy and Geology, by Professor Edward S. Dana, and in other departments by equally well informed experts, making it sure that definitions in all of them are up to date, and in accordance with the latest dicta of science. Professor Henry S. Beers has carefully elaborated the Dictionary of Noted Names of Fiction; Professor Hadley's "History of the English Language" has been brought down to date, and in other ways made more valuable by George Lyman Kittredge, of Harvard. One of the most interesting studies is that of Professor Fick, into Indo-Germanic roots in English, by which he brings out many interesting points in philology and in history. Indeed, outside the distinctive work of a dictionary—defining and pronouncing, the International contains enough valuable matter to make it a necessity on every scholar's table.

Coming now to the tests in the work of defining, the first thing which impresses us is the fullness with which the etymology of words is given, making it an easy thing to become acquainted with the whole history of a word and of its uncles, its aunts and its cousins. Synonyms are given with equal fullness; indeed, there is so much interesting reading between the covers, that the proverbial man-reading-a-dictionary is not to be laughed at.

One of the most noticeable features is the presence of new words which have never before appeared in polite society—on paper; for example, that expressive word given us by the war, "skedaddle," which is set down as "of uncertain etymology." The very word "slang," now deemed indispensable, was not admitted into the dictionary a score of years ago; here it is given, as "said to be of Gypsy origin, but probably from Scandinavia, akin to sleng (Norway), a slinging— slengja-kjeften, literally "to sling the jaw." As the publishers say, the treatment of words and phrases which in some degree belong to the current speech of the day, but have no justification on strict philologic grounds, is one of the most perplexing problems with which a lexicographer has to deal. His function is to record what the language is, rather than what it ought to be. New words are being coined continually; of this new coinage a part quickly perishes, a part becomes classic, and a part remains on the doubtful border land. The difficulty is greatest in treating the latter class, though it must be confessed lexicographers, as well as common people, have often been greatly disappointed in finding words they were sure belonged to the first class, push their way into the third, or even the second class.

The treatment of these new-comers by the International, while conservative, is still much more generous than was ever accorded them before. Especially is it kindly to Americanisms, believing that the Londoner reading Bret Harte, and the Melbourne merchant studying the reports of the New York Stock Exchange, have the right to expect in a dictionary help in interpreting the idioms found there. Another new departure is the introduction of women's names into its Biographical Dictionary. Mrs. Browning. Mrs. Somerville, Clara Barton, Mrs. Emma Willard, Frances E. Willard and many others being found there. The more thoroughly we examine the International the more fully do we accept the statement of its publishers, Messrs. Merriam & Company, that it adequately represents the vast and varied advances in all departments of thought and knowledge, and is worthy to serve as the convenient, truthful, sufficiently popular interpreter of the English language in its present development.

NO TRUTH so sublime but it may be trivial to-morrow in the light of new thoughts. People wish to be settled; only as far as they are unsettled is there any hope for them. Life is a series of surprises. We do not guess to-day the mood, the pleasure, the power of to-morrow, when we are building up our being. Of lower states,—of acts of routine and sense—we can tell somewhat; but the masterpieces of God, the total growths and universal movements of the soul, He hideth; they are incalculable. —*R. W. TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Now that the corner-stone is laid, we are more desirous than ever that every friend of the Temple should have a mite-box in which to gather their own and their friends' pennies. Only a small number of our 200,000 white-ribboners have as yet secured one. We have given out 25,000, and have now entered upon a second installment of the same number, which were received yesterday. The first 25,000 boxes, if each person who holds one drops a penny into it each day, should aggregate in a year, $91,250. You can secure a Temple mite-box, bulletin and descriptive card by sending a two-cent stamp to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse. 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago.

It was indeed a great disappointment that we could not have present with us at the laying of the corner-stone, the central figure of the Crusade, our beloved Mother Thompson, but her own delicate health, as well as the severe illness of her daughter, prevented her from coming. Our white-ribboners, however, continue to hold her in loving remembrance. A constant stream of gifts keeps coming in for the memorial tablet in her honor. The W. C. T. U's of Union, Me., Pleasant Hill, Mo., Peekskill, N. Y., and Pittston, Pa., each send $1 to the fund. The Berlinville, Ohio, W. C. T. U. also send $1. They add: "We hope soon to also testify to our love for Mother Stewart in the same way." The following individuals have each forwarded $1 to the fund: Mrs. Carolyn A. Leech, Louisville, Ky., Mrs. S. T. Davis, Nebraska City, Neb., and Thomas and Martha J. Baker, Farmington, N. Y.

There was surely poetic justice in the providence which permitted our good friend Jane E. Weeden to bring in the last Baby Band—it was from the Crusade state too—(Medina, Ohio,) on the day of the laying of the corner-stone, and place it in the copper box before it was sealed and the great stone closed down upon it for the centuries or until Christ comes. Through Miss Weeden's efforts thousands of names have been secured on the Baby Band lists. And she has nobly won the honor of placing the last list in the corner-stone of our beautiful Temple. Many lists came in too late to be placed in the corner-stone, but we will keep them and place them in the cap-stone, as we have made arrangements with the builders for a receptacle to be made in it, in which we can place a small copper box for this purpose. So our good white-ribboners, who are unselfish enough to work on this line, can keep at raising Baby Bands for another year. Twenty-eight dollars comes from the Quincy W. C. T. U.; this includes money for a Baby Band numbering 102, raised by Miss Irene H. Smith.

Gifts too sacred for any other purpose are constantly finding their way into the gift fund of the Temple. A father, Mr. Henry Wood, Sycamore, Ill., sends $5 in memory of his bright, talented, temperance boy, aged twenty, who had dedicated his life to foreign mission work, and would have entered the Sophomore class of Beloit College this year, had not the Master called him to higher service, September 18. 1890. A mother, Mrs. I. E. Grigsby, Pittsfield, Ill., sends $4.50. She writes: "I touch this money as something sacred. It was my precious little daughter Edith's, who has been dead three years. She saved it in her nest egg bank for the purpose of buying Christmas presents for her friends. 'Tis too sacred for any other purpose than the Temple." Mrs. Ellen Lovelace, London, Ky., sends $7.31, the contents of her two children's (Pearl and Harry's) mite-boxes—dear little Harry "died August 12, and is now in the Temple not made with hands." She lovingly took up the work of completing the filling of his mite-box. A noble white-ribboner, Mrs. Sarah J. Styles, of Elgin, Ill., died lately; she was a tireless worker for temperance, although sixty-seven years old. In writing of her Mrs. G. W. Potter says: "It had been her intention to see the corner-stone of the Temple laid. A beautiful and touching farewell letter was read at our annual meeting from her, in which was enclosed money for the union, the balance to be sent to the Temple fund. She hoped to recover from her illness, but disappointed in her expectations of beholding our Temple, she said, 'I shall behold it with immortal eyes.'"

A perfect tidal wave of gifts has been sweeping in the past week. How it would rejoice our hearts if it would only continue. Let every white-ribboner determine it shall. The Macomb W. C. T. U., eleventh district, Ill., sends a check for $100. Mrs. Driesbach says: "The money has all been raised by the labor of our hands;" the Plymouth, Mass. W. C. T. U. sends $20 40; the Dowagiac, Mich., W. C. T. U., sends $75 which completes their $100 gift; Mrs. Gray in sending it says: "It is one of the proudest acts of our lives to be able to contribute a hundred dollars for such a good cause; say to other unions who are fearful of raising money, that it is not hard, when all work together with a will. We raised $60 of this money by a lunch counter at the fair last week. Hillsboro county W. C. T. U., of Ohio, sends $25, their last installment on a gift of $100 pledged by Mother Thompson, for that county at Nashville, Tenn., on the occasion of the first presentation of the Temple plan to the public. Worcester, Mass., W. C. T. U. sends $25, their last installment on a pledge of $100. A first installment of $10 on a pledge of $100 has been sent by the Watson B. Smith W. C. T. U., of Omaha, Nebraska, in memoriam of Watson B. Smith, the martyr; the Yorkville, Ill., W. C. T. U. send $10 on a pledge of $100; $36.35 is sent by the North Adams, Mass., W. C. T. U. on their pledge of $100; the Petersburg, Ill., W. C. T. U. send $10 on a pledge of $100; the W. C. T. U. Town of Lake, Ill., send $10.50 on their pledge of $100; the Leonard, North Dak. W. C. T. U. send $41.20 on a pledge $100.

Our Children.

WHICH OF US FELLOWS?

BY MRS. JAMES WELLS.

[Written for a member of the Loyal Legion to recite at one of Sam Small's meetings.]

VOTERS!

Which of us fellows do you intend
Shall stand in the footprints of ruined men?
Must we wreck all the good in our lives, do you think,
In the cruel waves of a sea of Drink?
Have we got, then, to enter a life of woe,
Because of your votes? Ah, no! Oh, no.
Must that little boy make a great mistake,
And make hearts quiver, and ache, and break?
Must there be just so many drinking men?
And which of us boys are to be them, then?
If you vote for saloons, I verily fear
You've got to support them; so now, look here:
Which of us boys are you going to give
To ruin and death, that saloons may live?
Or, is it the fellows that did not come ?
Or the babies, asleep in their cribs at home?
Or is it the baby that's not born yet?
It seems to me that some men forget
How the Savior, Christ, in His cradle lay.
And that children are His by right, alway,
We have a right to be happy, all:
But—which of us fellows have got to fall?
Which of us children do you intend
To make stand in the footprints of ruined men?

FALL INTO LINE.

BY R. W. BRAINERD.

"I'm 'stonished at you, Mabel Sieman," called out Jack, rushing into the cozy sitting-room, where Mabel was busy dressing a doll for little sister Jennie, "so I am 'stonished!"

"Why, Jack, how you clip your words, and what a bluster you are making. What is it all about?"

"All about!—guess you'd clip your words and bluster, too, if a feiler'd tell you it was wrong to do this, and hurtful to do that, and wicked to do t'other thing your father and your school-teacher, and your Sunday-school teacher do every day!"

Mabel looked puzzled, and Jack continued: "Fred and the other fellows have been telling about a pledge their teacher wants them to sign, never to use tobacco in any form, and she says all the girls are pledged, and are going to try to make us boys throw away our cigarettes and sign the pledge, too,—just as if boys were going to sign a lot of girls' pledges!"

"Do you think it will hurt you to throw away cigarettes, and promise never to use tobacco, Jack?"

"Hurt! I guess it will hurt. How'd you like to make Jennie throw away her dolls, and promise never to play with dolls again? There's lots of fun in smoking, anyhow, and I guess 'twould hurt you to give up such fun as we boys have."

"Well, what if that kind of fun hurts more than it is all worth?—dolls are not poisonous like tobacco; if they were, do you think I would dress them and give them to Jennie?"

"Humph! if there was so much hurt in it father wouldn't smoke, and mother says he has smoked ever since I was 'knee high to a grasshopper.' "

"But, Jack," said Mabel, "father wouldn't like you to smoke."

"Guess if he cared much he'd be careful to set a good example," persisted Jack. "Guess if smoking was such an awful thing, Mr. Hawley wouldn't smoke cigars, nor Mr. Murfrees, either."

"Not our Bible teacher and our superintendent, Jack!"

"Yes, just our Bible teacher and our Sunday-school superintendent. I've seen them smoking lots of times when they didn't know us boys were within gunshot, and ever so many of your good folks smoke cigars and cigarettes, and it don't hurt them. I'd like to know why it's such an awful thing for us boys to smoke a cigarette now and then? Guess you can't answer that," said Jack triumphantly.

"No, Jack, I cannot answer now," said Mabel, her eyes and voice full of tears, "but if you will talk with Mr. Hawley about smoking, I will be contented to see you do as he advises you about tobacco."

"All right, Mabel, I'll do it the first time I see him, and tell you all about it—there goes Fred!"

Jack disappeared in a twinkle, leaving Mabel to her thoughts. Her hands dropped despairingly as she sobbed aloud: "What can we girls do when the fathers and Sunday-school teachers will neither help nor teach by their example?"

Mr. Sieman sat reading his evening paper and smoking a cigar, when something in the tone of Jack's voice coming through the open door attracted his attention.

"Tell you what 'tis, Mabel, don't know but you'll get all the good folks on your side, yet. I told Mr. Hawley we boys thought there was lots of fun in smoking, and asked him if he didn't, and if he thought there was any harm in it. You just ought to see how he stared at me. I almost laughed to see him. At last he said, 'I hope you don't smoke, Jack.'

"'Of course I do, now and then, why not?' I said. 'Father and ever so many of the teachers smoke cigars, and if smoking is good for you, why will it hurt us boys, I'd like to know?'

"Mr. Hawley just looked at me as solemn as the grave, and said, 'I wouldn't smoke if I were you, Jack. I don't smoke much, and wish I never had learned to touch tobacco.'

"I told him I didn't mean to smoke much, no more than he and Mr. Murfrees did, and I didn't suppose they'd do what they knew was wrong.

"'Well, Jack,' said he, 'it is not right, and I'll promise you that I never will use tobacco again.'

"'Are you going to sign the pledge?' said I.

"'What pledge?' said he.

"'Why, the pledge Miss May wants all the boys to sign, never to use tobacco in any form.'

"'Yes, Jack, I'll sign it,' said he, 'let's go right over and see Miss May now,' and so we went to Miss May's house, and Mr. Hawley told her he had come to sign the anti-tobacco pledge. And Mabel, you ought to see Miss May's eyes shine! They fairly sparkled when she said that was the best New Year's gift she ever had, and then she looked at me, and do you believe I just put my name right down under Mr. Hawley's, and I never knew how well Jack Sieman looked written out as an anti-tobacco name."

"O Jack, I'm so glad, and now the other boys will fall into line."

Mr. Sieman still held the paper before his eyes, but all he saw on the page looked like this: "Fall into line, fall into line." "Yes, yes," he said to himself, "that is what they all do, fall into line, and what kind of a line is it to be? Granny Nuft gave me a new pipe to smoke in honor of the new baby, and I fell into line, and now Jack sees his father and teachers smoke, and he falls into line. Thank God! he is frank and noble enough to fall into a good line, if he is led aright."

Mrs. Sieman looked up from her sewing to see why the paper so suddenly dropped, and saw with surprise a bunch of cigars taken from a shelf near by and dropped on the blazing coals.

There were no words spoken then, but the prayer that night had a note of thanksgiving in it and a cry for strength to overcome all evil.—The Woman's Magazine.

IN FOR IT.

BY JAMES CLEMENT AMBROSE.

When I was a boy, I knew a boy who was chock-full of the feeling which some boys still keep hold of. He felt sure that his father was a great deal more careful of him than there was any use in, always cautioning him to keep out of just what he most wanted to get into. He was not above nine years old, but:

Humph! Pity 'f he didn' know 'nough to take care 'f himself! Some boys, o' course, might lose the best finger they had on the Fourth, get drownded any day, or stepped on by Dan's horse in the dark, but their name wan't Jim—that's what aileded 'em! 'Twas well 'nough for th' old folks to take int'rest in the boys 'bout three times a day—meal times—but guessed he knowed when 'twas bedtime, how high to climb for hick'ry nuts, an' whether 'twa'n't safe for a three-foot boy to fool round a four-foot hole in the bridge; knowed like a book when the pistol wa'n't loaded—how many kids the canoe would carry, what he'd do if it spilled 'em out—bet he could tell when the tavern-keeper's brindle dog was goin' to bite—an' feel it in his bones jus' the minute his cousin Anse needed threshin'.

Jim's father had warned him on most of these points, and his Uncle Josh had warned him on the threshing point. But he stuck up his nose like a calf full of clover, and persisted in trying most things for himself, believing he could hold fast that which was good, besides holding down his cousin, till by and by his big uncle took hold, and the tavern-keeper's dog kept enough of his pants to make room for a patch.

The gentleman Jim called father had a flouring mill on the Fox river at Elgin, in Illinois, the power it ground by coming from the mill-pond a half mile up stream through a race-way, whence it flowed smoothly along the flume under the mill, dropped into the buckets of the overshot wheel, then hurried on with a bound and a bubble to join its fellow waters through the tail of the flume, apparently tickled to think it had been useful yet was not wasted.

The tail of the flume was covered with planks four or five feet above the water, but left without railing of any kind to keep boy or beast out of trouble. Jim, however, had been hedged thick and high with parental caution against the waters reeling off the floor of the flume topsy-turvy and every other turvy, till they had scooped out the giant's bath-tub in the sand with "pitching in" to regain the center of their old bed. And of course that caution had made Jim all the more ambitious to experiment with "the old thing."

Well, one afternoon in fishing-time Jim and his barefooted chums sat sunning themselves behind the tall stone mill, with the dust of the grinding frosting their shoulders, when a wooden pail with eight or ten feet of small rope attached struck their eye, and invited them to look into its capacity for fun. By virtue of being the proprietor's hopeful, Jim assumed command.

"Fellows," said he, "le'me show you a trick!"

So he did. Haughtily giving the rope a twist or two about his small wrist, and catching tight hold, he led the way to the spot where the flume let go of the waters, boasting as he traveled:

"Maybe some on ye think I can't hold it, eh? I'll show you, show father, too, as boys kin do some things well's ole men. He talks to me jus' like I were a baby: 'Now, Jimmy, dear, stay with your ma; don' meddle wi' the matches; don' climb out the roof; don' go near the water; that's a good boy!' Out the way there! Here she goes!"

Quick and flat Jim lay hugging the flume's roof with his little stomach, throwing back his chip hat and stretching back his bare toes, while his blue eyes peered straight into the jumping waters, and he laughed as he thought how he'd hold 'em back. Spat went his bucket onto the foam, spun like a top the length of its rope, then tipped, dipped, filled, pulled.

Too quick for telling, splash and sprawl went something, and scream went the boys on the bank, seeing nothing but a "towhead" chasing a wooden bucket toward the middle of the stream. Once it had him well in, the bucket let go the boy, and Jim went sailing with a revolving side motion, both hands at right angles—"showing the fellows a trick"—till, fifty feet away, one revolving hand touched bottom. The wash from the plunge of the flume had formed a sand-bar there. Then once more the current turned this wheeling boy—another "overshot wheel"—and his toes scratched gravel at only knee-deep. Scrambling to his feet in mid-stream, little Jim stood and wiped his face, gurgled, and looked sad. The laugh had left him, and his brag had gone to sea in the bucket; Fox river had washed the conceit out of one boy in a minute.

Meantime the chorus of kids crying, "Boy drowned!" had halted a man, and the man cut the halter off a skiff, and the skiff shot out to the bar, and the bar gave up the "trick" boy; and when the trick boy again climbed the bank, he looked at his clinging cotton trousers, and heroically confessed to his staring little audience:

"Say, fellows, I've changed my mind; father did know a thing or so, didn't he? He knowed flume-tails were a good spot to fish for pond lilies in pants. Jus' one lightnin' trip through that whirlwin' o' suds sozzled some o' the goose outen this chicken. 'F he won't lick me this time, I won't lick Anse nex' time he oughter be. Guess, boys, my mother don't know I'm out, an' I better go tell 'er."

And with that, the dripping Jim ambled off to his mother just as his father, hearing that his boy was in for it, rushed out the back door of the mill with a leap of fifteen feet, and had to be carried in again. So Jim missed the whipping that time, but did "catch on" to some respect for the advice of the old folks.

Ah, how much my boys to-day are like "Jim," the boy who grew to be their father!

CHILDREN'S WORK AT THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

I am just starting for Atlanta, and have not time to write a letter half as long as it ought to be with such a big title. But I do want to tell you little people, and you lads and lasses, to be on the lookout for nice things being planned for you to do in connection with the Great Fair. I cannot tell you just what these plans are, because nobody knows for sure until after they are adopted by the National Convention at its meeting next week in Atlanta. But the fact that Mrs Helen G. Rice, General of the Juvenile Army, Anna Gordon and Alice Guernsey, are making them, makes it sure they will be good plans. In the Columbian Exposition we wish to show the world the best things America has, and it cannot have anything more precious than our boys and girls. We cannot bring you all here and stand you in a row for folks to look at, and we would not if we could, for we would ever so much rather see you at your work or your play, but in some way we are determined to let the folks who come to the Exposition know what brave boys and girls we have in America. So be on the lookout for the news from Atlanta. I shall be there on the watch for it, and will tell you just as soon as I come back.

While we are down there planning for the work another year, will not every one of you remember each night as you pray, to ask God to help us plan the very best things and do the very best things to help on the temperance cause. Lovingly, CAPTAIN MARY.

THE W. C. T. U.

BY EVA EMERY DYE.

Like the old Crusader on Saracen hills,
The heart of our Union exultingly thrills;
Hope, health, and the promise of conquest are ours,
We plead not for ease nor for couches of flowers,
For the war we've enlisted, we're armed for the strife,
And the battle that ends but with ending of life.
The shots may be falling in tempests of flame,
Some heroes may leave but a grave and a name,
But our ranks close up and our lines march ahead,
With a smile for the living, a sigh for the dead.
There are foemen to fall at the stroke of our steel,
There are wrongs to be righted and sorrows to heal,
There are millions that cry for delivering hands
To shatter oppression and break off their bands.
There are nations to conquer and kingdoms to win,
A cry of entreaty rolls under the din
Of markets and cities and railways and ships,
Humanity calling with livid white lips
For the white-ribbon army to march in its might,
To scatter the darkness and bring in the light.
O comrades, my comrades, the world is awake,
The seas in commotion heave higher and break
On the time-worn shores of convention and form,
As tidal waves tell of the on-coming storm.
Men, men is the cry, and women of worth,
To march in the vanguard of truth on the earth,
Whose pennons shall gleam ever bright in the sun,
Till the conflict is ended, the battle is won.
Though we seem but a handful we hear the firm tread
Of the army of Progress, aye marching ahead,
And our feet fly to join them, we fling away fears,
Not drafted we go, but as bold volunteers.
Around and about us the drum-beat is heard,
To new resolution the nation is stirred,
The tents have been struck and the banners unfurled,
Our ranks are out marching wide over the world.

CHILDREN OF THE VANDERBILTS.

A little child is always an object of interest. There is something about its curly hair, its roguish eyes and dimpled cheeks that commands the admiration of men and women, whether married or unmarried. But a child who is worth more than its weight in gold is doubly interesting. Such children are very numerous in New York, and their care and training form one of the most interesting studies of the day. Within that charmed circle that begins at Fifth avenue and stretches round Murray Hill towards Central Park and back again, there are scores of tots who within fifteen or twenty years from now will be fabulously wealthy.

The education and training of these little children of Crœsus is peculiar. Let us begin first with the Vanderbilt family. The very name of Vanderbilt is a word to conjure with. Cornelius Vanderbilt, the head of the house, is the father of six children. Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard, who was Margaret Vanderbilt, has three daughters and a son. Mr. and Mrs. William D. Sloane, the latter also a daughter of William H. Vanderbilt, have two daughters and two sons. Miss Lila Vanderbilt, who became Mrs. Seward Webb, has two children. Mr. Hamilton McK. Twombly, whose wife was Miss Florence Vanderbilt, has two pretty little tow-heads, who are being brought up by eating from gold-lined spoons.

Although all the members of the Vanderbilt family entertain on a magnificent scale, they never permit their children to remain up late at night, are extremely careful in their education, and, in a word, are fitting them for life as well as any mother or father could do. It is one of the rules in all the houses of the Vanderbilts, that the children shall go to bed early and rise early. The little boys and girls are up before seven o'clock in the morning. Their nurses immediately take charge of them, see that they are properly bathed and dressed, and then they go down to breakfast, which is served at half-past seven o'clock. It is an unpretentious meal, with plenty of fresh milk, eggs, oatmeal, and a bit of steak or a chop that will add strength to their physique and color to their cheeks. After breakfast there is an hour of study. There is something for these little ones to do at all times during the day. They go through their studies systematically, and then about half-past nine are taken out for a walk. They are allowed to romp in the streets and in the parks to their hearts' content. At eleven o'clock they are brought home, and a light luncheon of milk and bread is served, after which there are more studies—either French, German or drawing—and then another breathing spell—it may be horseback riding, or a drive out through the Park and along the country roads. Back they all come about four o'clock, and there is another hour of study, and then they are through for the day. They are allowed to do just as they please until tea time, when, after their meal, they spend a pleasant hour or so with their fathers and mothers. Promptly at eight o'clock they are all in bed to sleep soundly.

So it is not strange that all the children of the Vanderbilt family are further in advance of their little friends in the matter of education. For they study, study, study, all the time. They are all fond of music, and most of them can play on the piano. The girls are learning to play on the harp, and the boys are famous among their friends as violinists, and banjo players. If you were to see these children on the street, you would not for a moment suspect that they were other than the children of parents in ordinary circumstances. They make no display at elaborate dress. The eldest of Cornelius Vanderbilt's daughters is dressed plainly in little, pretty, cheap dresses without any braid or ornamentation. She wears snug-fitting cloth jackets, and the little cap that sits gracefully on her head could be duplicated for a couple of dollars.

Of all the rooms in the Vanderbilt mansions there are none quite so cozy and comfortable as the children's playroom. Each of the Vanderbilt houses has a big room specially built for the children. There is a piano in it, an organ, all sorts of toys, and altogether it is one of the most delightful places imaginable. It is supposed by some people that the Vanderbilts devote all their time to society. This is not true. They devote a fair portion of their time to educating their children, to seeing that they are properly attended to, and are growing up to be good men and women. As soon as they arrive at the age when they know the value of money, they are given small allowances and permitted to spend this money as they please. They have everything to make children happy. They have their own ponies, dog-carts, and boats, and they go to dancing-school, to swimming-school, are taught how to fence and box, ride horseback, in fact, there is no pleasure that money can purchase they have not at command.

Thus pass the days until Sunday comes. The Vanderbilts are all religiously inclined, and early on Sunday morning the children are washed and dressed and sent to Sunday-school. At church time they go to their father's pew and sit there with him and their mother during the service. In the afternoon they go to Sunday-school again. They are never allowed to use horses or carriages, nor to go out, except for a short walk as a matter of exercise. The day is spent very quietly. They have an early tea, and in the twilight, the children gather in the music-room while one of the ladies plays the piano or organ Cornelius Vanderbilt, William K., Elliott F. Shepard and the ladies of the families join for an hour or two in song. The boys sometimes bring out their violins, the young girls play their harps, and there is an hour or two of the most delicious music that one could imagine. They sing hymn after hymn, and when the twilight fades away the little ones are put to bed, to get up the next morning with the glow of health upon their cheeks, and begin their week of study and play, that shall fit them to become strong men and women, to administer wisely upon the vast fortunes that will soon be theirs.—Selected.

A CHILDREN'S SLEEPY HOLLOW.

BY MRS. L. H. THORPE.

As the autumn evenings grow cool, and the forests don their gold and crimson burial robes, there comes, to mothers, with the breezes that already have in them a suggestive nip, the wish for something practical with which to brighten the nursery in which the little ones must spend so much of the approaching winter.

If the arious ways of preserving the beautifully tinted autumn leaves have been tried, they have been found to fail, as after a few weeks, at most, they shrivel and fade. Neither are plants for the sunniest windows practicable, as the children themselves require all the sunshine the nursery can afford. So I want to tell our UNION SIGNAL mothers about our "Sleepy Hollow," which if not a "joy forever" was at least, while it lasted, a "thing of beauty" and an unfailing source of amusement to the wee ones.

Procure a box, of any desired size (ours was about four feet in length, two in breadth, and one and a half in depth), paint it, fill with rich mould, and it is ready. Next take all the little ones, with baskets and knives, to the woods for ferns, mosses, lichens, etc. They will be sure to find pretty stones and shells, which will be useful in furnishing their box. My children were so fortunate as to find one of those nodules called a geode, which when broken open proved a perfect cave of crystals. This was placed in one corner of the box. With bits of broken mirror, a winding stream, bordered with moss lichens, and "here and there" a few pebbles, or shells, and "here and there" a bluff formed of some pretty colored stone, we were ready for the ferns, of which we found six varieties in our woodland. The ferns filled all the spaces not already taken up, a tiny vine was planted by the cave, then all the tops of the ferns were cut off, the whole given a good sprinkling of warm water. The children were told to watch and see how the baby ferns would act when they came up in the house. In a few days Robbie came to mamma with the astonishing news, "They are every one coming up with their umbrellas tucked under their arms just like they do out of doors."

Sleepy Hollow brook not only amused and entertained the children all winter, but it also gave them a love for nature which books alone could not have done.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING NOVEMBER 23, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 23:33-56; Isa. 49-54.)

Sunday, 23; Luke 23:33-56. Verse 33, Five days before this, shouting multitudes, proclaiming Him to be the Messiah, made up the triumphal procession when Jesus entered Jerusalem. Who can rely upon popular applause; for, doubtless, some of these same people helped to make up the rabble that cried out for our Lord's crucifixion, and then followed Him with insults to the place of His death. Verse 33, A corrupt people will show no more respect for the most Christ-like and unselfish reformers than they do for their worst criminals. Verse 34, Christ's self-forgetfulness appears by His prayer for his enemies, at the time of his greatest agony.

Monday, 24; Isa. 49. Verse 4, Many were the discouragements that Christ had, yet His faith never wavered; and as His cause was in the hands of God, He was certain that it would ultimately triumph. Verse 16, It is not our love to God that saves us, but God's love to us. We are truly saved when we can say, "We have known and believ d the love that God hath to us." I John 4:16.

Tuesday, 25; Isa. 50. Verse 1, All the sufferings of Israel were the necessary fruit of their own sins. God puts away those who have sold themselves unto transgressions. Verse 2, If we are in bondage to sin, we need not despair, if we are ready to repent and trust in God, for He is able to deliver us. Verse 10, "A godly man's way may be dark, but his end shall be peace and light. A wicked man's way may be bright, but his end shall be utter darkness."

Wednesday, 26; Isa. 51. Verse 1, God always speaks words of encouragement to His faithful children. However long Israel may be in exile, He is able to rescue them at last. Verse 8, Instead of the wicked being able to destroy the church, they shall themselves be destroyed.

Thursday, 27; Isa. 52. Verse 2, When the church is in bondage to sin, it is in a state of captivity. It will not be allowed to remain there, but will come forth more glorious than ever. Verse 13, Read carefully from this verse to the end of chapter LIII. The correspondence with the life and death of Jesus Christ is so minute, that it could not have resulted from conjecture or accident. It is really an invincible proof that Isaiah was inspired of God and that Jesus is the Messiah.

Friday, 28; Isa. 53. Verse 4, When Mr. Moody first went to London to do evangelistic work, the ministers asked him to write his creed. He replied, that they would find it in Isaiah LIII. We do well to hold fast to this creed. Verse 12, God knew the kind of a Saviour man needed; and all the minute particulars are provided for in our Lord's life and death, so that He might be man's complete representative and atoning substitute.

Saturday, 29; Isa. 54. Verse 2, By the introduction of the Gentiles into the gospel kingdom, the membership of the church is far more numerous than it was under the old dispensation. Verse 5, Our God is now the God of the whole earth; but let us pray and work for the time when loving, loyal hearts, the world over, will recognize Him as such. National distinctions will then fade away, and the best days for the church and for mankind will begin.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Our Reasons for Thankfulness to God. I Cor. 15:57.)

1. Any one who reads the letters of Paul, in the New Testament, with this thought in view, will be surprised that he found so many things to be grateful for. As we advance in years and in growth in grace, we more and more feel that a chief reason for thankfulness are those spiritual victories that we obtain; and by which our hearts and lives are brought into more perfect union with our Saviour.

2. We never should allow the Thanksgiving season of the year to pass, without considering our blessings of civil and religious liberty. It does us good to look at our nation from a grateful, religious point of view. Then we should consider all the material blessings which we have received, and all those things of home and earthly good which ought to have made us much happier, doubtless, than we have been.

3. We should note the progress made in reforms, and in the kingdom of the Gospel. Victories have been achieved which should inspire us to look forward to the last great victory, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and He shall reign forever and ever.

For presidents of states and superintendents of departments, see Annual Leaflet, which will be sent by Mrs. Buell on application, inclosing a two-cent stamp.

He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil, he shall dwell on high; his place of defense shall be the munitions of rocks; bread shall be given him, his waters shall be sure.—Isaiah 33: 15, 16.

THE AMERICAN SCHOOL.

To-day in several states the political storm center is over the school-house. Notably is this the case in Wisconsin and Illinois, political parties are divided by a school question, and men who most bitterly donounce taking temperance into politics are most ardent in making this a political issue. Here, in a nutshell, is the situation: tax-payers, who by law are compelled to sustain public schools, and for the most part willingly do so, have discovered the folly of having compulsion stop at the very point where it becomes most effective, the school-house door. They are compelled to build school-houses, to furnish and warm them, to employ teachers; but all this avails nothing if the pupils do not come to be taught. Carelessness or cupidity of parents, or the idle, vicious whim of children is able, by absenteeism, to make all this grand machinery of no avail so far as a large number of future citizens is concerned.

Now the public schools either are or are not accomplishing their mission, preparing for citizenship. If they are not, they should be abolished, and something better substituted in their place; if they are, every child in the state should be benefited by them. This common sense doctrine leads naturally to so-called compulsory educational laws, which are the ostensive cause of the storm which now gathers around the school-house.

The opposition is hard to analyze. Sometimes it is spoken of as the "German element," but this can hardly be the case, for Germany is, par excellence, the land of compulsory education. Sometimes the "Lutherans" are the center of this storm-cloud, and in some opinions, the Catholics; yet neither view is correct; though opposition comes from all these sources it is not fair to charge any nationality or sect as a body with it, for our public school system has stanch friends among Germans, Lutherans and Catholics.

This opposition is, we believe, based largely upon misunderstanding of the law; demagogues have taken advantage of the ignorance of English among many voters to set up a man of straw and persuade their dupes that it is the live issue. They are convinced that "compulsory education," though it extend no further than requiring children to attend school sixteen weeks a year, in a school where instruction is in English, is an infringement upon their liberties, to be resented and resisted to the bitter end. The feature of the Bennett law which is most fiercely opposed, is the provision that this attendance must be upon a school where reading, spelling and other common branches are taught in English; they fight for the change into "a school where these branches and English are taught," thus narrowing the battle down to the difference between the preposition and the conjunction. By such a narrow issue are great political parties divided; on that little "in" Governor Hoard took his stand and, thus standing, defeat is more honorable than is victory to his opponent, for on this seemingly slight difference rests the whole question between American and foreign schools, between training for American citizenship and training for subserviency to foreign ideas and perhaps a foreign power. The narrowest, most bigoted parochial school would be willing to teach English as one branch, while carrying on the bulk of its work in German. What Americans demand, and what would not be so much as questioned in any other nation is, that the instruction in the schools where its future citizens are being trained shall be in the language of the country conferring the boon of citizenship. It is amazing that the right of the state to make such a requirement should ever have been questioned; that it is thus questioned is the strongest possible proof of its necessity. For were all the voters able to read English, the opposition to this reasonable demand would never have gained such headway as it has. Pothouse politicians have taken advantage of their inability to read English to hoodwink voters into believing all sorts of lies about the legislation they wish to defeat. The Chicago Daily News did a wise thing the week before election, in devoting two pages of one of its issues to printing in German the exact wording of the Illinois law, its exposition by Dr. Edwards, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, and refutations of many assertions made concerning it.

The opponents of the law employed saloon tactics—indeed, the saloon element is solidly against it—by sending to every candidate for legislature a demand that he pledge himself to repeal the law as the price of their votes. Many gave the desired pledge, and after thus stultifying themselves were thrown overboard by those who had led them into the trap. "Served them right," was the universal verdict.

The Illinois Woman's Alliance, always ready to take a hand in any fight involving the rights of women and children, was very active in working for compulsory education as necessary to secure to children their right to a common school education. It therefore felt called upon to take up the hatchet in its defense when assailed, and did so by sending broadcast these answers to the assertions made by the enemies of the measure:

"1. That the state which reserves the right to place its citizens at the cannon's mouth in its defense has the right to establish a minimum standard of education for its preservation, and to appoint officers to see that all schools come up to that standard.

"2. As the language of the country is English, care must be taken in arranging the standard of education that no child leaves school until able to read, write, and speak the English language. This is necessary for the protection of the child.

"3. The state must demand of all who would be employed in the public-school service an avowed belief in the necessity of the state to perfect and to maintain the public-school system. This should apply especially to members of school boards.

"4. There should be no interference with private schools, except such as is necessary to keep them up to the standard.

"5. The public-school service must aim to secure the best teachers that can be trained, the best methods that can be devised, and the best text-books that can be written.

"6. It is an evidence of the patriotism of the people that the school question has entered the political arena. We welcome it as a political issue, for it will unite the people in the maintenance of a vital principle—the education of the children."

Another phase of the battle now raging around the school-house relates to the reading of the Bible in public schools. Although it has not yet assumed the prominence occupied by the question of compulsory education, we believe the time is coming when it will. There is a great difference of opinion, even among Christians, upon this subject, but the principles involved are eternal.

Wisconsin, by the famous decision of its Supreme Court assumed an attitude toward the Bible and the worship of God never taken by any other state or nation, except by France during the short, volcanic era of her bloody revolution. This decision, in effect, rules the Bible out of all public schools, its use there, either for reading or as a text-book, being pronounced unconstitutional; the basis of the decision is section 18 of Article 1 of the state constitution, which guarantees to every man the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and that he shall not be compelled to attend, erect or support any ministry against his consent. "No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies, or religious or theological seminaries." Section 13, Article 10, provides that no sectarian teaching shall be given in any school supported by public money.

To base its decision on the constitution, the court was obliged to hold, 1st, that reading the Bible without note or comment in school was "sectarian instruction;" 2d, that it is or may be a violation of the rights of conscience guaranteed by the constitution; 3d, that reading the Bible in school makes it a "place of public worship" within the meaning of the constitution, and 4th, that such reading converts the school into a "religious seminary." The simple statement of these points shows their weakness.

The question largely turns upon the point whether the Bible is a sectarian book or not. If it be so, it must stand for some sect and against others; but for what sect does the Bible stand and what religious sect is not professedly based upon the Word of God? Catholic and Protestant alike acknowledge the authority of the Scriptures and every sect in Protestantism traces its tenets to the same source.

W. A. McAtee, D. D., in his review of this decision, puts the case admirably, and by throwing the argument into the form of a syllogism, shows its fallacy. "Major premise: Sectarian instruction in common schools is forbidden by the constitution. Minor premise: Some parts of the Bible may be used for sectarian instruction. Therefore, the use of the Bible as a whole is forbidden in the common schools."

The premises do not contain the conclusion, hence the fallacy is plain. He illustrates this by a parallel syllogism. "Major premise: Partisan instruction is forbidden by law in the State University. Minor premise: Some parts of the constitution of the United States may be and have been used for partisan instruction. Therefore, the use of the constitution of the United States as a whole is forbidden by law in the State University."

The truth is that sectarianism has no other such foe as the Bible; read without note or comment, it is the great unifying force in Christendom.

Back of the constitution of Wisconsin upon which this strange decision is based, superior in authority because antedating it as the fundamental law, and not to be annulled by any later enactments, is the ordinance of 1787 with its well known condition: "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." The act establishing the territory of Wisconsin distinctly states that "the inhabitants of said territory shall be subject to all the conditions, restrictions and prohibitions" of this ordinance.

Does any one doubt that the religion and morality for whose teaching schools were to be forever encouraged, was the religion of the Bible?

There is no standard of morality except the Bible, hence no authoritative teaching of morals in our public schools or anywhere else, where the Bible is excluded. And teaching morality is the great need in our schools to-day. Without such teaching they are training a dangerous class of citizens, for villainy educated is more dangerous than when it is ignorant. And in a republic educated indifference is equally dangerous, giving the state masses of voters whose moral sense is so dull they cannot appreciate a great moral issue, or at all realize their responsibility as citizens. These are the stay-at-homes election days, who turn over the government into the hands of saloon bummers by their failure to exercise the highest duty and privilege of citizenship.

Prompt obedience to rightly constituted authority is the lesson Young America most needs to learn, and this must be preceded by reverence for authority. The party to which we belong recognizes God as the ultimate source of all rightful authority; until He is so recognized, this needed lesson will never be learned. God's Word shut out of its schools by act of a state, there remains not only no acknowledged standard of morality but the foundations of authority are overturned.

Experience proves this to be so. The systematic effort to put the Bible out of schools commenced about fifteen years ago; the increase of juvenile law-breakers, truthfully registering the increase of disrespect of authority during that time is appalling, and in great measure is manifestly traceable to shutting God out of the public schools. No wonder that the mother-heart, which lies so close to childhood, discerns this danger and in many places, notably in Chicago, is moving for the protection of the children by throwing around them the safeguard of the influence of God's Word read and reverenced in the public schools. Politicians may sneer, and even ministers may be deceived by policy, but the instincts of the mother-heart are true and will prove good statesmanship. School is but the broader home, and its protection stands next to that of the home as the duty of the state. It is, therefore, no unfortunate thing to have the political storm center over the school-house, if thus the people are aroused to their duty in guarding the interests of the school.

THE ELECTIONS.

We have scarcely ever known so much interest manifested in any off year election as in the one last week. And there was good cause for this; seldom has there been one involving so many and such broad issues. Outside of Nebraska and South Dakota, where our interest as white-ribboners centered, the issues were such as might well arouse interest beyond political circles. McKinleyism, Quayism, and bossism in general were on trial before the people and their verdict was most emphatic. The sweeping Democratic victories all over the North do not mean that the mass of voters there have repudiated the grand principles upon which the Republican party was founded; could a vote be taken upon them to-day the old-time majorities would be rolled up; the defeat simply shows that the people are breaking away from political leaders, and are thinking for themselves. Their thoughts may not be as wise thoughts as they will be two, or four or six years hence; but the very fact that they are thinking and voting for themselves is a hopeful sign.

The great farmer element believes, whether right or wrong, that the McKinley Bill works injustice to it, and rebukes the party which crystallized it into law, by voting with its opponents. Had the farmers' eyes been fully opened, as they will be in a few years, they would have given their strength, not to the Democratic party, which is no more their friend than the Republican, but to the Prohibition party, which stands not only for the desired reform in tariff, but for the abolition of the liquor traffic which lays heavier burdens upon the farmer than does any tariff. The break this year has done much to free from party ties, and a cool, clear-headed study of the situation, such as was not possible during a heated campaign, will bring to many the conviction that jumping from the frying-pan into the fire affords no relief, and by next election good men and true, by thousands, will cut loose from all entangling alliances with old parties and step bravely out upon a Home Protection platform.

An encouraging feature is the large increase in the "vest-pocket vote." Never was so much scratching of tickets known, as in this election, and this is a good omen, showing that men are voting upon their own convictions, not at the behest of hide-bound partisanism. Of course we should prefer to have everybody vote a straight out ticket based on a platform embodying our principles, but until they are ready to do this, let the scratching go on; pile up votes for the best candidate, and rebuke the unworthy one by leaving him in the lurch.

Most significant is the result in Pennsylvania, where Quay's candidate for Governor was defeated. This is the people's protest against Quayism with its defiant corruption. This Republican defeat in the stronghold of Republicanism is a Nemesis avenging the slaughter of her children; the party which submitted prohibition to popular vote and then slaughtered it, has now received its reward for that treachery. Massachusetts, Michigan and Nebraska all slaughtered prohibition at the dictates of the politician, because the introduction of this issue would "hurt the party." They now have their reward. The mills of the gods have ground more rapidly than usual this time, but they have ground exceeding small.

In Illinois the Republicans saved themselves by espousing the cause of the "little red school-house;" that is an object dear to every Illinoisan's heart, and the attack upon it by the Democrats through opposition to the compulsory educational law, overbore in a measure minor issues.

The same fight raged with increased violence in Wisconsin, and brave Governor Hoard, who led the forces for the school-house, is defeated; the legislature, however, is Republican, and that will probably save the Bennett law.

Our hearts are very sore over the defeat of woman's suffrage in South Dakota, both on account of the principle itself, and because of the effect upon prohibition, for experience has demonstrated the necessity for woman's ballot in enforcing prohibition.

It has seemed next to impossible to secure returns of the amendment vote in Nebraska, the great party papers ignoring this issue as did the party platforms of Nebraska. As the case now stands, prohibition is lost. Mr. H. C. Bittenbender, of Lincoln, Neb., gives these reasons for the result:

1. The double resolution-prohibition-license was a compromise, and no compromise with sin ever won.

2. The Republican party spurned the child of its own creation, and repudiated its own past action.

3. Political dissensions, caused by labor and alliance reforms, disturbed party lines as never before, and the excitement drew attention from the prohibition issue.

4. Omaha hoodlums and broadcloth hypocrisy drove from the polls or disfranchised by intimidation, seventy-five per cent of the Prohibitionists.

5. The Nebraska form of ballot, one long ticket, and the old parties, through their leaders, printing both "for" and "against" both amendments, confusing the voter, added largely to our defeat.

Our dispatches show that mob law reigned in Omaha election day, the thugs, incited by the incendiary editorials of the Bee and the World-Herald, thronged the streets, pelting children with rotten eggs, shooting at women, knocking men down, and assaulting ministers; Prohibitionists were arrested on trumped up charges, refused permission to communicate with their friends, and all sorts of outrages committed. Policemen usually sided with the rioters. If majorities gained by such flagrant outrages will stand, the amendment is lost; with fair dealing and a fair count, we believe it would have been won.

SPEAKER REED IN THE WEST.

During the campaign just closed, Illinois and other western states were favored with a visit from the Hon. Thomas B. Reed, Speaker of the National House of Representatives. This distinguished statesman, as is well known, has his home in the prohibition state of Maine. During his late visit he made speeches in the intensely anti-prohibition states of Indiana and Illinois, as well as in the prohibition state of Iowa. The chief design of these speeches seems to have been to demonstrate to the people, for the purpose of securing their votes, how faithfully his party had redeemed its pledges made at its last National Convention. There was one point in its platform, however, in regard to which the Speaker was ominously silent. It was that which declares that temperance and morality are the first concerns of all good government.

It is a notorious fact that upon this point there is a radical difference in the sentiments of his party in Iowa and other prohibition states on the one hand, from its sentiments in such states as Indiana and Illinois on the other. The temperance people would have been very much gratified if this distinguished party leader had given the country the benefit of his experience, as to the wisdom or folly of prohibitory laws. Never did any man have a better opportunity for so doing. At Peoria he was surrounded by the representatives of the great Whisky Trust [its president being named as one of the vice-presidents of this meeting], while in Iowa he was face to face with the friends as well as the foes of prohibitory legislation. But upon this great question he remained silent, and therewith we must for the present rest content.

Upon the question of suffrage, however, the Speaker when at Peoria uttered sentiments well worth treasuring up and remembering. While setting forth in eloquent terms the wrongs inflicted upon the colored voters of the South he said:

"The true doctrine of the control of the affairs of all the people by the people is established by common sense and this principle fails if the essentials are not carried out in their fullest detail. It will not do to say the people are ruled by the people when a portion of them are left out. Whenever a vote is cast it should be counted, and counted as it is cast. Is there anybody here who desires to disagree with me on this point? I want to ask you if it is wrong for the Legislature to make laws to secure fair elections? It is a fundamental principle of this country that it is ruled by all the people. It will not do to turn that power over to a few superior beings—men who edit independent newspapers. Nobody ought to be left out. It is obviously wrong to leave anybody out. No matter how poor or despised the man is, he ought not to be left out. It is the pride of this country that we protect those who are too weak to protect themselves. Yet the rights of some people are usurped, and in order to note this condition you have only to keep your ears and eyes open. . . . . Punishment follows swift on crime. 'Be sure,' say the Scriptures, 'your sins will find you out.' If this nation permits injustice to any class within its borders, sooner or later the sin will find us out, and we will pay for it as we paid for the sin of human slavery."

Such sentiments as these are worthy the head and heart of a great statesman. They are substantially the same that Prohibitionists have been teaching for years. When, for one moment, it is considered that in the state where they were uttered, women have substantially the same civil rights as their husbands; where they may own and control property both real and personal, and take the income thereof the same as their husbands; where they may take to their own use their own earnings; where they may contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, the same as their husbands; where they are equally liable with their husbands for the expenses of the family; where, in fact, their duties and responsibilities are in almost every respect the same as those of their husbands, could the distinguished statesman give any good reason why his argument should not apply to them as well as to men, whether white or colored? With these new rights, duties and responsibilities resting upon them, can any good reason be given why they should not have an equal voice with their husbands in the choice of those who shall make and execute the laws by which they shall be governed, and by whom their property shall be taxed for the support of public institutions?

And when it is further considered that it is the wife's home that is invaded and rendered desolate by the intrusions of the liquor traffic, can any good reason be given why she should not have a voice equal with that of her husband in expelling the intruder?

Protection is now on everybody's lips—protection for the farmer, protection for the miner, protection for the manufacturer, protection for the disfranchised voter, protection for everything and every interest except protection for desolated homes, broken hearts and ruined manhood. We trust that when Speaker Reed shall have returned to his prohibition home in the far distant east, he will not forget what he said on the subject of universal suffrage to the people of the states of the West.

The Watch-Tower.

Learn, but not the less bethink thee
How that all can mingle tears;
But his joy can none discover,
Save to them that are his peers;
And that they whose lips do utter
Language such as bards have sung—
Lo! their speech shall be to many
As an unknown tongue.
And that if thy love's deep current
Many another's far outflows,
Then thy heart must take forever
LESS THAN IT BESTOWS.

These lines come with the pathetic note: "Please put them in THE UNION SIGNAL. I have just signed the pledge, and write poems and read to keep me out of bad company."

"Night is over, Heavenly Father,
I would bend my knees and pray;
Help my weakness, guide me safely,
Watch and help me all the day,
Take away my love for sin,
Let Thy spirit rule within.

"Night is over; some poor children
Have been homeless, sleepless, ill,
God has let me rest so sweetly
In my chamber warm and still,
Lord, I thank Thee for Thy love,
Raise my morning thoughts above."

Another white-ribboner, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Reed, of the Central union, Chicago, has made he rmark in the literary world. For years she has been employed upon the study of the sacred literature of India and has just published the result of her studies in a volume entitled, "Hindu Literature, or the Ancient Books of India." Her book has elicited cordial commendation of Prof. Max Muller and Sir Monier Williams. who did her the high honor of revising the chapter on Krishna. Mrs. Reed has been invited by the American Institute of Philosophy, one of the most scholarly association of men in America, of which Dr. Deems is president, to deliver a lecture on Krishna. Mrs. Reed is one of the leading members of the Illinois Woman's Press Association, before which she read one chapter of this book before publishing, to the great delight of all hearers.

It is suggested that if the local union would invite the editors and their wives to a nice lunch, it would not hurt their outlook in the least. This should be an annual custom. Nothing softens asperity and dissipates imaginary difficulties like a cordial handshake and kindly talk.

A white-ribbon woman dreamed. She roamed vast regions of space, threading her way, as a spirit might do, among "other worlds than ours." She paused in her free, swift journey to look at the planet earth, and she saw that all around it was coiled a great black serpent, which she knew was Intemperance. Then there arose in the woman's soul a mighty impulse of pity and of desire to save. With lofty courage she approached the creature, but its head was hidden from her on the other side of the globe. Then she cried, "I cannot cut off its head, but I can wound it;" and taking a dagger from her side, she plunged it to the hilt in the body of the reptile, saying—with all the starry host for witnesses—"One day, some other will cut off the head, and destroy the enemy, and the work will be easier, because I have done what I could."

ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

EXPLANATORY.

The department of News from the Field is one which has grown with the growth of the W. C. T. U. It was introduced in the first issue of THE SIGNAL, January, 1880, and retained when THE SIGNAL grew into THE UNION SIGNAL, in January, 1883.

It began with one page, in coarse, leaded type, soon increased to two pages, then to three, and in March, 1883, the material had become so abundant that a smaller, solid type was employed, giving space for at least a third more matter.

It being necessary to confine this department to three pages, and the number of reports being in excess of the space, it was determined, about two years ago, to inaugurate a new feature—reports from states by some one appointed for that special work. Another imperative reason for the change was to secure more condensed and attractive reports, and provide for a more equable representation of the states. Accordingly this plan was presented to the National Executive in 1888, and unanimously indorsed by the state presidents, a majority of whom succeeded in securing the appointment of a UNION SIGNAL Reporter. It was hoped that ere this all the News from the Field matter might be arranged in state reports, thus giving the paper much more of a National character, and facilitating the work of the editor of this department. There are still eighteen states that, according to our latest information, have not selected state reporters; all such are most earnestly invited to do so, and in order that there may be no mistake, we publish below a list of those states having no regular reporter, also those having reporters. If there is an error in the list, it will be most cheerfully corrected.

Every local, county and district union in the states which have regularly appointed reporters is requested to make a note of the name and address of the reporter, and send to her instead of to THE UNION SIGNAL, brief, fresh reports of meetings, workers, and items of temperance interest in its immediate locality. The state reporter will prepare a general report each month, or as often as she may have material sufficient, and send promptly for publication. RHODE ISLAND.

HARVEST DAYS.

The days have come and gone until the circuit of the year is complete, and once more the W. C. T. U. of our little state has celebrated the Feast of Ingathering "when we have gathered in our labors out of the field."

The place of meeting was at Central Falls. The large Baptist Church was tastefully decorated with our banners and shields, and also with potted plants and flowers. Back of the pulpit hung the beautiful silk flag given by Mrs. Barney to represent our state W. C. T. U. at the Paris Exposition. "Welcome" greeted us in gilded letters as we entered the door, and was reflected in a floral piece on the platform, and even repeated itself on a doormat in the vestry. And this cordial greeting was vivified and made real, first by Mrs. Brinton, in behalf of the union, and then by the hearty words of the pastor who welcomed us, not only to the church, but also to the hearts and homes of the people.

It was very pleasant to meet again thus, and Mrs. Chase expressed the feelings of the convention in her well-chosen words of response. But a cloud overshadowed the brightness, for the empty chair of our president caused every heart to turn in loving sympathy to her who was sitting alone at home in the shadow of a great affliction, mourning the loss of her life companion who had passed away only five days before. Added to this was the knowledge that she who has led us so faithfully will lead us no more, for God has called her to other work, and at the last executive meeting she presented her resignation, to take effect at this time.

But the work of the convention must go on, and Mrs. G. F. Martin, our first vice-president, who has held the office thirteen years, was called to the chair, and presided with dignity and ability during the entire sessions.

Our bright and cheery corresponding secretary brought in her report brimful of work done in all parts of the state. That her hands have helped in the sowing, and that her heartfelt, hopeful presence has encouraged the workers, is plain to us who know her, when she tells us that she made one hundred and three addresses before local unions, county conventions, Sunday-schools, outdoor meetings, etc.

I will gather just a few seed thoughts from among the sheaves. The unions are coming to realize more and more the importance of circulating good reading matter. North Tiverton, with thirteen members, takes twenty-five copies of the Outlook. North Scituate sent three dollars and thirty names for a three months' subscription to The Voice. Valley Falls obtained twenty one trial subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. This last was done by one member through her Sunday-school class of boys, who thus introduced our National organ, with its rich fund of thought and instruction, into homes that it would be hard to reach in other ways. Apponaug supplies every family represented in the Sunday-school with the Home Guard; and Carolina sends this same bright, helpful paper to every family in the village. Richmond and Hopkinton union has boxes of literature at the post-office, railroad station and store. Clark's Mills takes charge of the public library, and Slatersville and Wanskuck Y's have loan libraries. The Bristol Y's have placed an illustrated leaflet over the water pail where the men in a factory come to drink. Passers over the bridge at Valley Falls may still read the sentence placed there during our campaign days: "License is a pernicious delusion." But the statement is no longer needed, for every city, town and village in our state bears witness to its truth.

Perhaps our cook books, with their health hints and practical recipes, can come under the head of "good reading matter." Riverside is our banner union in this work, one member and her Sunday-school class having sold one hundred and twenty-six copies. Valley Falls comes next with eighty-eight copies, and others follow on with goodly numbers. One of these books has gone to California, several to Pennsylvania, and two to the sunny land of Bermuda.

Work among the young people is on the increase. The Westerly Girls' Club, organized with the aid of Mrs. Harris, numbers one hundred members. The one at Pawtucket has twenty-five. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Providence still grows and flourishes. Arlington has sixty-six names enrolled in its Loyal Temperance Legion. Bands of Hope are doing their work in many places.

West Greenwich has pledged nearly every child in the Sunday-school.

Good work in the evangelistic department has been done in some places. East Greenwich has held eighteen gospel meetings, besides mothers' meetings, cottage meetings, and social purity. Newport has had fifty-three gospel meetings, has established a Mission Temperance Sunday-school, and sustains a Sunday-school on the training ship, the fruits of which are already apparent in the conversion of thirty-eight boys. And the Y's are not behind. They hold services every week, and two of their number read each week at the hospital, and supply singers there on the Sabbath. The South Portsmouth Y's visit the almshouse every month and remember its inmates at Christmas. Other unions do more or less; but ought we to be satisfied? Should we not do better work in every department if we realized more fully that salvation from evil habits and from every sin, must begin within? It is the cleansing power of the gospel of Christ that must purify the world.

Providence and Johnston were represented at the state fair, and labored faithfully at their booths.

North Scituate has a temperance literary society, which met every Saturday night from November to June. Pawtucket holds franchise meetings weekly.

As our members broaden in the work, they look beyond the needs of our own state, and reach out helpful hands wherever they may. Middletown has obtained two hundred and six signatures to the World's Petition, and sends ten dollars to Nebraska. Others also have given their mite to help in the great struggle there. Phenix has raised $100 for the Temperance Temple, and Portsmouth has thirty mite-boxes out trying to raise the same. Demorest prize medal contests have been successfully held in many places. The Y's of Providence, with their one hundred and sixteen active members conducting a tea-room, loan library, and Rest Cottage, are an inspiration to us all. Four new unions have been added. These are only suggestions of some of the lines of work which have been pursued in our state during the past year.

Our treasurer's report was full and accurate, and we are glad to say that the deficiency in our treasury, which she announced, has been made much less by the generosity of the convention, which raised $336.

Our recording secretary, Mrs. Eva H. Smith, had no report of her own work to give, but surely one who so clearly and faithfully reports the work of all our executive meetings, deserves our cordial thanks. Miss E. M. Francis reports over 200,000 pages of literature sent out, not including copies of THE UNION SIGNAL, Outlook, and temperance books.

The convention was designed to be a sort of reunion. Mrs. J. K. Barney, our beloved honorary president, was with us at every session, and each day gave one of her inspiring Bible talks. It was good to have her there, and also our ex-state organizer, Mrs. H. D. Walker, who always brings help and good cheer; Miss A. M. Browne, who served us for several years as recording secretary, was also present, and Miss Carpenter, who has been laboring in Massachusetts since she left our state.

The missing names on our roll-call were tenderly dwelt upon by Mrs. Moore. Fifteen have been called from the work here to come up higher.

Instead of our president's annual message, which has always been so helpful in its outlook and inlook, we had but a few written words full of love and tenderness, assuring us that it was with no thought of discouragement that she severed the ties that have bound us together.

When the time came to choose her successor, the informal ballot brought forward three names. These all held the confidence and esteem of the convention to such a degree that it seemed their pleasure to elect the three. But as only one could hold the office, their choice fell upon Mrs. M. A. Babcock, one of our vice-presidents, and a faithful worker in the cause.

The places of two retiring vice-presidents and one superintendent were supplied, and the other officers were reëlected for the coming year.

The convention, by resolution, unanimously reaffirmed our allegiance to the National W. C. T. U. A resolution of thanks to the union, church, homes and hearts that had so cordially received us and so amply provided for our wants during the three days sessions, was passed. And we trust that a resolution was framed in each heart to consecrate ourselves more fully to the work of the Master.

The evening lectures were by Miss Phelps, of Canada, Mrs. J. K. Barney, and Mrs. Rice, of Boston, Mass. These names alone are sufficient to indicate the treat we had.

A few words about our retiring president, Mrs. E. S. Burlingame, will be of interest to all. A native of Smithfield, R. I., she was educated in Providence, graduating from its high school at fifteen. After a course at the Normal school, she taught in the city for five years, and married at the age of twenty-three. She then went to Wellsborough, Pa., where her husband was principal of an academy, afterward to Whitesborough, N. Y. In a few years they removed to Dover, N. H., returning to Rhode Island in 1874. She has always taken an active interest in the work of her church, and at an early age edited The Myrtle, which was the Sunday-school paper of the Free Baptists. She was also a constant contributor to the Morning Star and the Little Star, besides sending occasional contributions to other papers. Three years ago she became editor of the Missionary Helper, which position she still holds.

Her record as an active temperance worker begins at Dover, where, as the result of a lecture by Dr. Dio Lewis, a praying crusade was instituted, and she naturally took the lead. No permanent organization followed the movement, but it resulted in much good at the time, and later, when the white ribbon army was enrolled at Hillsboro, these women were ready for the work. Mrs. Burlingame has held office in our state union for eleven years and a half, five and a half as corresponding secretary while Mrs. Barney was at the head, and six as president. During these years the local unions have increased from eight to sixty-five, and the work is thoroughly organized. When the needs of the hour called for a state paper, she became its chief editor, and under her management the Outlook has grown and developed until we are proud to own it as "our paper." In the prohibitory campaign she showed a reserve power equal to every emergency, and a devotion and consecration that put self and physical needs wholly out of sight. When the crisis was over prostration followed. After a two months' rest she resumed her labors and has been untiring in her efforts to "strengthen and stablish us in every good word and work." But weary head and diminished endurance show how great the strain has been. Only an entire change can wholly restore her.

During the summer months the call came to address a meeting of the Free Baptists at Ocean Park. The address enthused them as her words always do those who hear them, and opened their thought to a new departure in the work. They added to their Woman's Missionary Society a new department, called Practical Christian Living, and invited her as their representative to travel through the country addressing the quarterly and annual meetings of their society, on the relation between the highest development of woman and the salvation of our race. Temperance and other reforms will be treated in their relation to missionary work. It was a good offer and would give her the change of occupation which she so much needs and perhaps extend her life of active service for many years, yet she hesitated long before deciding. It meant the severing of so many associations which are dear to her as to us who have worked with her, and she could not bear the thought of separation. But after careful, prayerful consideration, it seemed a duty to her to respond to the call, and so she goes out from among us bearing with her the best wishes and prayers of every white-ribboner in the state, and of many outside our ranks who have been helped and uplifted by her words and life.

The following resolution was passed by the convention:

"Resolved, That we recognize with gratitude the efficient and valued services of our retiring president during all the years she has led us; and while we greatly deplore our loss caused by her retirement, we bid her Godspeed and wish her abundant success in the new field of labor to which the Master has called her."

One visible bond of union still remains. As superintendent of the legislative department, she will still be a member of our executive board. We hope to see her often with us, and know that any urgent need will bring her to us.

But while the loss seems so great to us, we turn with a cordial welcome to her who has been called to assume the cares and responsibilities of leadership. She will have our hearty support as we shall labor together.

"One in our faith and one in our longing
To make the world within our reach
Somewhat the better for our living,
And gladder for our human speech."

WARREN COUNTY.

The annual convention of this county convened at Sugar Grove, September 17 to 19. Notwithstanding Sugar Grove is an inland town some nine miles from the nearest railroad, forty-three delegates were present, and a number of visitors were in attendance.

The various departments were all represented, either by letter or in person. The day sessions were held in the M. E. Church, Mrs. Chas. Lott, presiding. There were few changes made in the corps of county officers; Mrs. Lott was reëlected president by a unanimous vote. The reports of the superintendents were highly satisfactory, and the outlook for the current year is very encouraging. It was decided to hold a semi-annual convention in May to compare notes as to "How goes the battle?"

Wednesday evening the Y's entertained their white ribbon guests at the United Brethren Seminary, with an excellent program, consisting of recitations, vocal music, etc.

Thursday evening Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, of Batavia, N. Y., delivered a powerful address in the seminary chapel, subject, "Gospel Temperance." Mrs. Weaver is vice-president and superintendent of evangelistic work of New York state. A woman of commanding presence and remarkable oratorical powers, her practical and applicable exegesis of Scripture, with illustrations from her own experience and personal observation, was listened to with marked attention by a large concourse of people. A Quakeress by birth, she retains much of that simplicity of dress and manner characteristic of the sect. Likewise her speech; no flowery metaphor or fine metaphysical flight, leaving her hearers in doubt as to the meaning she wished to convey, characterized her discourse; instead it was earnest, urgent, forcible, and to the point.

During a lull in the business proceedings Thursday afternoon, Mrs. Lott presented to the convention, Baby Frances Willard Morrison, the two-year-old daughter of Mrs. C. M. Morrison, our efficient county superintendent of literature. On motion of one of the ladies she was accorded the privileges of the convention, and was tied with the potent white ribbon.

Warren county W. C. T. U. will soon lose by change of residence, one of its most earnest and zealous workers, Mrs. W. B. Renwick, of Kinzua, former county superintendent of juvenile work. Her departure will be deeply regretted by her co-workers. Mrs. A. B. Miller, of Warren, ably presented "Our Papers," THE UNION SIGNAL and Bulletin. Had her zeal met with adequate returns, every lady present at the convention would have been a subscriber to one or both of those most desirable papers.

MRS. E. VIOLA MASON.

CLARION COUNTY CONVENTION.

The county W. C. T. U. held its annual meeting at Rimersburg, September 18 and 19, and was well attended by delegates, visitors, the members of the local union of the place, and others interested in the cause, Mrs. Beck, county president, in the chair.

Mrs. Olive Jones gave the address of welcome, Miss Trainer, of Edenburg, the response. Both did credit to their unions, their subjects, and to themselves.

One very encouraging feature of the convention was the interest and active part taken by several ministers of different churches. Their sympathy, hearty appreciation of the work done by the W. C. T. U. all along the line, were very helpful. The names of these ministers who encouraged us so much are, Rev. Mr. Stewart, Rev. Mr. Bashline and Rev. Mr. Deitrich, of Rimersburg; Rev. Mr. McDowell of New Bethlehem; Rev. Mr. McDonald, and Rev. Mr. Beck, of East Brady. Would that all ministers of the gospel were as fearless in denouncing the evil of intemperance, and as enthusiastic in encouraging the efforts of the W. C. T. U., as were those who attended our convention.

Mrs. Beers, president of Jefferson county, read a very interesting paper, and gave us an instructive talk on scientific temperance instruction. Mrs. Beers understood her subject, and handled it well. Other good papers were read. Mrs. Mair, of Allegheny, was there, and with her kind, winning ways and wise counsel, did much to promote the interest of the convention.

Friday evening was devoted to the Loyal Legion. The exercises, consisting of singing, recitations and dialogues, led by Mrs. Bashline, were highly entertaining, and very creditable to both the children and instructors.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. Beck, of East Brady; vice-president at large, Mrs. Bashline, of Rimersburg; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Paup, of Lickingville; recording secretary, Miss Hosey, of Rimersburg; treasurer, Miss Keatley, of Edenburg. Since the convention we have lost our president, through removal to another county. This is a great loss to us.

The choir deserves mention for the good singing during the evening sessions. Last, but not least, the friends and citizens of Rimersburg deserve the heartfelt thanks of the convention for the very kind and cheerful entertainment received by the delegates and visitors, the remembrance of which will always be pleasing.

MRS. MARY PAUP, Cor. Sec.

CRAWFORD COUNTY.

Our ninth annual convention was held at Townville, September 23, 24 and 25. In the matter of attendance, both of delegates and visiting members, in interesting reports, papers and lectures the meeting was one of the best ever held in the county.

The convention was called to order Tuesday evening by the president, Mrs. M. B. Ross. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. J. D. Wyman; the address of welcome was made by Mrs. M. A. Bandley, and the response by Miss Nannie Burwell. An original poem entitled "The White Ribbon" was recited by Mrs. S. K. Best, of Springboro, and received the hearty commendation of every one present. The president's annual address followed; it was exceptionally good, and was the event of the evening.

Wednesday was largely devoted to the reports of superintendents of the various departments; each reported marked progress in her special work, which showed the interest in these subjects to be increasing. The department of franchise being a new one and no report, Miss Burwell, the superintendent, read a paper on this subject which was enthusiastically received. Mrs. S. A. McClees, of New York, National superintendent of soldiers' and sailors' work, was with us in the afternoon and talked to the children of the public school, all of whom were present, and answered the questions from the question-box. In the evening she lectured to a large audience on her special work.

Thursday morning, an hour and a half was spent in devotional exercises and conference meeting. Then followed a Y conference, led by Miss Reniff, of Springboro. The questions discussed were: How to interest young men in Y work; How to create a greater degree of interest among the young ladies? Is sweet cider included in the pledge?

In the afternoon a paper by Mrs. F. H. Selden was read; subject, "What is the State Doing for Our Children?" A telegram of greeting from state officers was received and read by the president; a suitable response was promptly returned.

Election of officers for the ensuing year resulted in the unanimous reëlection of Mrs. Ross for president; Mrs. J. D. Wyman was elected vice-president; Mrs. Bullock, corresponding secretary; Mrs. S. C. Brooks, recording secretary, and Mrs. C. Wallace, treasurer.

The convention closed in the evening with a gold medal contest, participated in by eight young ladies, each wearing a silver medal. The prize was awarded Miss Gracia Dunn, of Meadville, who contested for the grand gold medal at the state convention.

NEW YORK.

STATE CONVENTION.

The seventeenth annual convention of the New York State Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in Park Church, Elmira, October 7, 8 and 9.

This church, Rev. Thos. K. Beecher, pastor, is one of the most complete in all its appointments that we have ever seen; built of stone and brick, its massive architecture is well displayed by the fine park in which it stands. Its large and beautiful auditorium, with its perfect acoustic properties, lecture-room and parlors, made it an ideal place for holding such a convention. The auditorium was effectively decorated with flowering plants, while from the galleries hung the many banners, artistic and chaste in design, of the state, county and local unions, and those of several of the departments. On the front of the organ was a large banner inscribed with "The Lord gave the word and great was the army of women that proclaimed it." Nothing more appropriate could have been devised.

On Monday evening preceding the convention, "A time of blessing" was held in the First Methodist Church, conducted by Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, state superintendent of evangelistic work, and "although the rains descended and the floods came," the room was full, and God was there in His mighty power.

On each morning, an evangelistic meeting was held at 8 o'clock, led by Mrs. Weaver, and many women found their way to these meetings, and were strengthened and refreshed for the day's labors.

There were present at the convention more than four hundred delegates, and as we looked into their faces, how our hearts swelled with gratitude and joy that we are called to be fellow-workers in this Empire state. As we looked over the convention we saw many new faces, and missed many familiar ones, and a glance at our programs reminded us that we were called to mourn the absence of five who had been prominent in state work, three of whom were with us in our last convention—Mrs. E. M. J. Decker, former state treasurer, Mrs. A. G. Nichols, former superintendent of the department of unfermented wine, and three vice-presidents, Mrs. G. T. Price, of Otsego county, Mrs. F. V. Douglass, of Suffolk county, and Mrs. Rachel Goodier, of Oswego county. But we mourn not as those without hope, for we know they are only "promoted soldiers," and we shall meet them again.

The reports of the superintendents of departments showed that good work had been accomplished during the year. We could wish that we might give a summary of each report, but that is impossible, but they will be printed in full in the state minutes, which can be ordered from state headquarters, 10 E. 14th street, New York City; price, 15 cents.

One marked feature of many of these reports was, that the superintendents had been studying how their departments could be used to make sentiment in favor of constitutional prohibition, a question to be voted on next April, and presented plans for methods of work.

The banners given by the president to the counties having made the largest increase in membership during the past year were won by Wayne, Jefferson, New York and Onondaga, while the Y's of Warren county won the banner for the largest increase in membership. The presentation of these banners was one of the pleasantest and brightest things in the convention, and added greatly to the enjoyment of all present. It is well to state here that Wayne is one of the counties where the "non-partisan" wave struck, causing one union to divide (but the original union has a larger percentage now than it had before the secession), and it seems to have done good, for here the county got a banner for the largest increase in membership.

Among our 800 unions in this state we have had reported to us only two unions that in the past year have withdrawn from our ranks; only two out of 800; that doesn't look as if we were going to pieces very fast.

The address of the president, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, contained a careful survey of the work of the past year, and many excellent suggestions for the coming year. She recommended the adoption of two new departments, school of methods and physical culture, and entered quite fully into plans for the amendment campaign. Her address was received with enthusiasm, and she was asked to embody her plans for amendment work in a leaflet for general circulation.

The treasurer's report showed that $6,687.59 had been received in state treasury this year from all sources, and that $2,091.03 had been sent to the National, one-half of our receipts from dues, and still there remained a deficit of about $961, beside an indebtedness from the state fair work. This deficit and indebtedness were nearly all raised by popular subscription on the last day of the convention, Mrs. Burt donating the amount remaining due her on salary for the past year, $261; Mrs. Gardenier donated the amount due her, $100, and Mrs. Tenney $50 of what was due her; the remainder was subscribed by the counties, local unions, and individuals.

The corresponding secretary's report showed the unions in good working order, and prepared for further service.

Number of local unions, W's, 771; Y's, 101.
Number of paying members, W's, 18,926; Y's, 1.984.
Number of honorary members, W's, 2,716; Y's, 763.
Total amount of money raised, $63,713.59.
Number of public meetings, 3,507.
Number of evangelistic services, 3,547.
Number of copies of THE UNION SIGNAL, 6,738.
Number of copies of Woman's Temperance Work, 4,066.

This is only a brief summary, but the full report, together with the president's address, will be found in Woman's Temperance Work and the state minutes.

On the first evening of the convention we had addresses of welcome from Mrs. B. B. Colburn, president of Chemung county W. C. T. U., which entertained the convention, and Rev. Thos. K. Beecher, pastor of Park Church, with a response by Mrs. Sarah A. Kenney, of Troy. These were followed by an address by Rev. Annis F. Eastman, of Canandaigua, a Congregational minister, whom Mr. Beecher, a few months ago, assisted in ordaining.

The second evening Colonel Bain well sustained his reputation as an orator of the highest type, and the crowded church testified their appreciation of his address by frequent bursts of applause and a fine collection.

The last evening was given over to the Y's. A short program had been arranged by the state superintendent, Mrs. C. J. A. Jump, which was followed by an address by Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, who charmed her audience as she always does, because of her winning ways and sincere devotion to the cause of young women in the temperance reform.

The old officers were all reëlected, and thus, the "old dispensation has become the new."

The president and corresponding secretary were appointed to prepare a plan of work for amendment campaign, to be first approved by the executive committee. A plan of finance was recommended. That each member of the local union be asked to earn, solicit or give fifty cents for a campaign fund in addition to regular dues, one-half be sent to state treasurer for a state campaign fund, the other half to be retained for local work. The plan of work presented by the superintendent of juvenile work was adopted, and we all went home, having gained fresh enthusiasm, and with so much work planned and about to be planned for us, that we believe the coming year will see the most work accomplished, the most members gained, and the most good done of any year since we were organized.

ELLA A. BOOLE, Cor. Sec.

NIAGARA COUNTY.

The thirty-fourth quarterly meeting of the white-ribbon army of this county has just been held at Middleport with marked success. Kind hands had made everything ready for us, and the meeting opened with a consecration service, led by Mrs. Milliman, which made us ready for the work before us, filling our hearts with the spirit of the Master, and helping us to realize that we "can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth us." A few words of welcome from Mrs. R. C. Allen, of Middleport, were hearty and cordial, and her welcome was echoed by the pastors of the various churches. Much routine work was done, and "progress" was reported from nearly all local unions, with promises of more work during the coming days, when the amendment campaign shall be upon us.

A paper on "The Duty of the W. C. T. U. to the Children," by Mrs. M. B. Cushman, was both earnest and thoughtful, and called forth some discussion and many helpful thoughts. Another paper on "The Needs of the Hour," was read by the corresponding secretary, and upon vote of the convention was requested for publication. The convention voted to send twenty dollars to the state treasury to help lift a state debt, and in addition to this nearly one hundred new subscribers to our state paper were pledged. This county is very much alive.

The speaker of the evening was Miss Celia Hutton, president of Yates county, who appealed to the Christian voter to take a proper stand in the amendment campaign, and help to rid our state of this curse, when the time comes that the question is submitted to a vote of the people. Miss Hutton is one of our brightest women, and is making new friends wherever she goes. Possessed of a pleasing appearance and a good voice, filled with an earnestness that cannot fail to carry conviction, she will do most excellent service in working for the amendment. We are glad she came among us, and shall hope to hear from her again in Niagara county.

Our county sends as delegate to Atlanta, Mrs. Emma S. Dietrick, who has planned to visit all local unions on her return and give a report of National Convention. A collection is to be taken at each meeting, half of which will belong to the local union, the other half to go into the county treasury to help defray the delegate's expenses.

After all business had been transacted, the entire program being carried out, the convention adjourned to meet at North Ridge in February. Many kind words were said concerning our entertainment by the Middleport union, who had provided most bountifully for us in every way, and this meeting will long be remembered as one of the best ever held.

FRANCES W. GRAHAM, Cor. Sec.

SARATOGA COUNTY CONVENTION.

The annual county convention of the W. C. T. U. was held in Saratoga Springs, August 26 and 27. Encouraging reports were read by the secretaries and treasurer. The president of the county, Mrs. Grace Andress, of Gansevoort, read an excellent report.

One of the pleasant features of the convention was the presentation of a purse of money by the Saratoga union to Mrs. W. I. Pond, the retiring president of that union. Mrs. Emmons, secretary of the Lecture Bureau, gave an address in the evening which was well received. The pleasure of the evening was much enhanced by the recitations given by Mrs. Emmons' two little girls.

All the officers were reëlected except the vice-president, Mrs. Z. Skinner was elected in place of Mrs. Brooks. The convention voted to have four meetings this year.

COUNTY CORRESPONDING SECRETARY.

MISSOURI.

FIFTH DISTRICT NOTES.

The unions of the fifth district are preparing to establish an "Open Home" for friendless women and children. To this end they have a Friendly Inn at 709 Wyandotte street, Kansas City, Mo., where home meals are furnished.

The proceeds of this are to be used in establishing the Home. Mrs. Helen B. Harford, one of our state organizers, has been doing much work. She has, during the hot weather, rendered efficient service in Kansas City, organizing the Kensington, Fiske, and Coleman unions. She had appointments in Johnson county, from October 17 to the 31st. She has just returned from Nebraska, where she has been assisting in the campaign.

The unions in my district were never more active than now. Nearly all departments of work adopted by our state are being pushed with energy. We want to bring Missouri to the front in the temperance work.

M. P. COLEMAN, Pres. Fifth Dist.

POLK COUNTY CONVENTION.

The Polk county W. C. T. U. held their fourth semi-annual convention at Bolivar, October 15 and 16, with a good representation of the local unions, and several ladies from abroad, prominent in the work, were in attendance.

Mrs. Jennie L. Wardan, of Osceola, gave some valuable talks on the need of more temperance teaching in the Sunday-school. Mrs. P. S. Beggs, of Springfield, gave a very impressive lesson, showing how little effective work could be done by missionaries, while rum constantly flowed into the dark continent. Mrs. R. Hall, of Stockton, gave at each session one of her impressive Bible readings, which inspired us to press on and never grow weary doing God's work.

Several papers of interest were read, viz: "Method of Securing a more Effective Scientific Temperance Instruction Law," "Medal Contests in Connection with Juvenile Work," "THE UNION SIGNAL and its Value in our Homes," "Practical Education," "Coöperative Housekeeping," and "Evangelistic Work." Each brought out interesting discussions.

The church was beautifully decorated. The clergy gave us their assistance and coöperation. At both evening sessions the church was densely crowded, the attraction being the address by Mrs. Zerelda Wallace, of Indiana. Her lectures are always earnest, sincere and outspoken, amusing and often eloquent. Long may she live to proclaim justice to woman and humanity. Special prayer was offered for our state work and our brave leader, Mrs. Clara Hoffman. Our treasurer's report showed that there have been expended in county work $40 in the last five months. Excellent music was furnished by the Bolivar M. E. Church choir. Strong resolutions pledging to support our state and National policy were unanimously adopted. Altogether this was the largest and most enthusiastic county convention ever held by our W. C. T. U.

MRS. MARY E. JONES.

DEPARTMENT OF NARCOTICS.

I have sent out hundreds of the petitions to the Emperor of China; also circulars about smoking in sleeping cars. Now I ask a few questions. Has every W. C. T. U. woman signed the petition and written to the sleeping car companies? Has every W. C. T. U. woman reported all she has done in the Department of Narcotics? If one has failed to do her duty in this respect, please, please, do not delay. Send to me for circulars and petitions.

I have been requested by a number of state superintendents to give notice in THE UNION SIGNAL where our workers can get narcotic literature. I keep all the literature published. Send for twenty-five cent package containing over 200 pages on this subject.

MRS. E. B. INGALLS, Supt.

4119 Westminster Place, St. Louis, Mo.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' DEPARTMENT.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Because of necessary absence from the National Convention, I must make my plea for more energetic work in the "Veterans' Branch" of this department and the "Flag for Every School-house in the Land" movement, which has been put in my hands by the National officers, through THE UNION SIGNAL. The former work is carried on by means of literature to be had on application to my address, prepared especially for them; "The Soldiers' Shield and Buckler," and the "Open Letter to Every Veteran in the Land," should be widely used among them.

The time to help them with these ministries is very, very short. With such an organization in our land, why need one of the dear soldier boys go to his grave without these gospel folios, bearing to him the eternal truth, "Christ is risen"? Why need one of them lay down the laurels he so bravely won in battle in the slums of the saloon? Why should we not by "The Muster Roll" cry out to every veteran in the land for help and defense against the outrage of the licensed saloon system which as a lion stands over against every home, ready to devour our loved ones? At such a call from the loyal American women of the land many of them will respond, and again draw the sword in protection over us.

The "School-House Flag" movement has already demonstrated its value as an object lesson, especially when it is thus made to represent our pure principles. The rapid influx of a mixed population with foreign ideas of government, Sabbath observance and personal liberty, makes the problem of National perpetuity a serious one. I believe that the raising of these flags, and the attendant ceremonies, will do much to educate the children of the United States, especially those of foreign birth and influence to purer principles, and help them to become better citizens.

The movement is well begun; let it be pushed rapidly forward to complete success. The program I have prepared, and which accompanies all packages of my literature sent out (entire set 15 cents), can be rendered by any union by local talent, and not only secure the needed funds for the purchase of the flag, but create much enthusiasm and win favor for our work. The flags cost from $7 to $15 according to size required. Let us, simultaneously, North and South, by this means, stimulate a nobler, truer, broader patriotism in the minds of youth.

Yours in the work,

MRS. E. S. MOFFAT.

Quick Work.

Twenty minutes for refreshments. More than a minute consumed in getting to the lunch counter, and at least three minutes more gone before you get what you want. That's modern haste for you. If you tell a busy man anything now-a-days you've got to keep on the jump with him and give him the essential points without any fluffs and frills. So you will understand why you are invited to skip from one to another of the following points:

Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen Treatment has restored thousands of invalids to health. Thousands gratefully admit it. You may know who have been cured, where all these restored men and women live, and what were the diseases removed, if you will ask Drs. Starkey & Palen for their 200-page book, which will be sent entirely free of charge to any address. For over 20 years the Compound Oxygen Treatment has been doing this good work. And there is every good reason why it should be good and lasting in its results. In the first place, Drs. Starkey & Palen are skillful physicians—in the second place, they are experienced chemists—in the third place, their Compound Oxygen Treatment is blood-food. It is instantly and easily available. Circulation appropriates it and every hungry need has its aliment. Nature responds—You take heart again and best of all—you get well If you want the names and addresses of those who have already been cured by the use of the Compound Oxygen Treatment, you may have them by return mail if you send your address to DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, No. 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter St., San Francisco, Cal.

Our Advice
to use SAPOLIO: It is a solid cake of scouring soap, used for cleaning purposes.

And in my home her brightness shed;
She faintly smiled and murmured low,
"If I can have SAPOLIO."

SPLENDID PROGRESS.
Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.
PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

Publisher's Notes.

Our Special Editions.

The Temple number (November 6), was a beauty, and there has been a great demand for it. It has been called for on all sides. Chicago people take great interest in this edition. The poem by Mrs. Lathrap is universally admired and the corner-stone laying is written up "con amore." Then the Convention number that is coming—it will be the largest issue ever sent out, 210,000 copies, taking a full carload of paper. It will have twenty, possibly twenty-four pages, and will go to a great army of women who know but little of the W. C. T. U. We hope to influence them in its favor. This attempt will cost us over $1,000; are you ready to HELP along at your end? How? Why, use the special editions to show that whether amendments are voted up or voted down the women of the W. C. T. U. are relentless foes of the saloon.

Its Fight, Fight, Fight or Die.

Do clouds darken, and the enemy grow more and more imperious and insolent?

Then lift up your heads, the King of Glory is coming, and we are fighting His battle. With Him will come light, purity and power resistless. Then look around you and lend a hand. Let your friends know how the battle is going, and the first thing you know they will put on the armor!

Next, stick a pin in the fact that we will get out an exact stenographic report of the convention. This will cost 25 cents and be worth every cent of it. We have enough orders already to warrant us in going to this expense, and so you may send in your quarters and learn all about what the Iowa folks said, and pretty near what they wanted to say, but didn't. The addresses of welcome and the responses, the exceedingly bright and apt introductions and interjections of Miss Willard and all the rest of the next to being there. Seems as if there ought to be forty thousand called for instead of two or three. There would, if all readers of THE UNION SIGNAL had once been at any National Convention. It's always amusing to watch the evolution in each new place, viz:

1st stage:—Complete indifference.

2d stage:—"Had to go to bring my wife home!"

3d stage:—"Hum! good talkers, those women!"

4th stage:—"Well, well! Bright? I should say so!"

5th stage:—"Say, what time does Miss W. or Mrs. L. speak? Any way to get a reserved seat?"

6th stage:—"Here, here, wife, hurry up; we'll be late; wouldn't miss that meeting for $5."

7th stage:—"I tell you, sir, if those women could be sent to Washington they'd knock those debaters silly. They know more parliamentary usage in a minute than any congressman in the country knows all day."

So send in your fourths of a dollar. When will this report be ready? Just as soon as clicking type-writers and deft type-setters, and lively presses can manage it. Say about November 21 or 22.

Don't Fail

to notice elsewhere how you can get a framed picture of Miss Willard, free, by getting us short time subscribers. The frame has been selected for the picture. It fits it admirably; it is silver and white, contrasting, or rather harmonizing, perfectly with the delicate water-color tints of the likeness. It is a true likeness, and one that will doubtless be found in twenty thousand American homes inside the next year. We offer agents an exceptional opportunity to make money in selling it. The outfit will consist of a picture inside a very heavy tube, together with a six-inch piece of the frame. It would be better to carry a framed picture whenever it is possible, as more orders will come for the frame in that case. We make special offers to all who really mean to thoroughly work their desired territory. It will not be like selling a book, the picture does the talking. You will have scarcely any of that to do. Ten thousand can easily be sold in December and we are only waiting to hear from you to assign you territory, etc. Miss Willard has hosts of friends and admirers among those who care nothing for the W. C. T. U. To have her picture in such homes, however, would be a constant reminder of the battle the W. C. T. U. so valiantly and unceasingly wage against home's arch enemy and destroyer. NEW AND CHEAPER LOTS
AT HARVEY.

In M. M. Brown's addition to Harvey, lying a little more than a quarter of a mile south of the present shops, with other factories and business going straight in that direction, having no other suitable space to occupy, as will be seen by reference to the town plat, mailed free on application.

The main business street of Harvey runs through the middle of this addition, which is situated about four short blocks south of the new bank, and within one block of where lots are selling on the same srreet for $800, and only four blocks from where they have sold for $1,500, and only across the street from the best of the 240 lots sold in the last 60 days, principally to the subscribers of THE UNION SIGNAL.

A person needs only to examine the plat to see the many advantages that these lots have, at an average price of about $350, which includes sidewalks, graded streets, water supply and excellent drainage, some lots being as low as $250.

Terms made to suit purchaser, with abstract and guarantee of title exactly the same as is given by the Harvey Company.

I own a lumber yard in Harvey, and will supply lumber on monthly payments, at cash prices to parties desiring to build, or will build and sell on payments.

I am now building twenty houses and expect to build more, and will supply work to a large number of workmen all winter.

I have no connection with the Harvey Co., and until a few weeks ago was a stranger to the place and all connected with it, but have recently made large investments there, believing it to be the most promising site about Chicago.

I have refused $5,000 for the best business corner in my addition for a saloon, but will accept $700 for it, to be used for any mercantile business; no saloons in this subdivision for any price.

Write for a plat of the whole town and all information.

I refer to any of your friends in Harvey, the Atlas National Bank of Chicago, or to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Holiday Goods.

Our Holiday supplement is now ready, but we will not send it out to our subscribers till the issue of November 27, which will be the Convention number, and will number

210,000 Copies.

If you want to make a nice lot of money selling these goods, write at once for agents' terms and descriptive circular. Read this postal card. It is a sample of many having the same import:

Are you handling Christmas cards, etc., again this season? If so, please send me circular and price list. I was much pleased with the cards I got from you last season, so were my customers, and I wish to deal with you again this season if you are handling them. I am only a bed-ridden invalid, keeping notions to sell here in my room. My purchases may, perhaps, be somewhat larger than last year. Respectfully,

E. I. F.

To All Who Love

THE UNION SIGNAL, we want your attention and friendly coöperation. During the next two months nearly 20,000 subscriptions expire. We want to hold them all and gain new ones. The year's experience teaches that we cannot hope to hold all those whose time expires in November and December—unless an extra earnest effort is made. A most attractive offer is published elsewhere for yearly subscriptions. Here is one for getting short term subscriptions. The new picture of the Temple, with the portrait of Mrs. Carse (the one who has pushed the building and all the plans so successfully), is now ready. Every one who sees it says: "How beautiful!" or "What a handsome picture!" or something of the kind. But, now, how can one describe such a picture in such a way that you will appreciate it? It cannot be done. When you get the picture with its delicate colorings—and the double attraction of the Temple picture in its own colors, and the excellent portrait of Mrs. Carse, you will straightway have it framed and hung where it will daily remind you that the battle for the home against the saloon is steadily going, even if it seems all the other way. We offer, then, the picture in two ways. First

For Ten Cent (five week) Subscriptions

We will send a picture free to any one who sends us a club of 5 ten cent subscriptions (with 50 cents) sent in at one time.

For Twenty-five Cent (3 mos.) Subscriptions

We will send the picture free for 2 such names with 50 cents.

We will also send the picture to any one who sends us 10 cents and promises to use their best endeavor to get us the trial subscriptions. The ten cents can be deducted from the first fifty cents sent in. If any one of your friends want the picture, it will be sent for an additional 15 cents. That is, a five weeks' (10 cent) subscriber would pay you 25 cents to get the picture included, or 40 cents if a three months' (25 cent) subscriber.

Lastly.

We will give 5 of the elegant framed aquarelle-tint pictures of Miss Willard to the five who send us in the largest number of trial subscriptions, under the above offers, before January 1, 1891. In the contest each 25 cent subscriber to count the same as two and a half 10 cent subscriptions. Now, we have a word in Chicago that is used on all sides; it is

H-U-S-T-L-E!

Slang often hits the nail on the head. Send for your sample picture with the promise asked, and get your little book, sharpen your lead pencil and go in (no, out) to win one of the beautiful pictures of Miss Willard, and future friends for all she represents.

Signal Notes.

THE British Medical Journal sounds a note of alarm at the threatened destruction of the Greek nation by alcohol—that arch enemy of all mankind. The history of the attempt of the Hellenic people to stay the ravages of strong drink is an extremely interesting and pathetic one. The Athenian lawgiver, Draco, sentenced drunkards to death. Pittacus ordained that drunkenness should entail a double crime. Locrian sustained the same legislation, making an exception for those who had the authority of a physician's prescription. Dr. Joannes Phustanos is advocating the formation of temperance (moderate drinking) societies on this classic ground. This is one step, but a very short one towards the goal—total abstinence.

"LET the man who introduced intoxicating liquor into China be exiled from beyond our frontier, and let him never be permitted to return." So spoke the sage Emperor who ruled the destinies of the Celestial Empire four thousand years ago To his wholesome warning and brave example is due the comparative sobriety of the Chinese people. Hundreds of centuries later, when Great Britain attempted to persuade the Chinese government to legalize the opium traffic, the Emperor's noble reply was, "It is true I cannot prevent the introduction of this poison. Gain-seeking and corrupt men will, for profit and sensuality, defeat my wishes, but nothing will induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people." Later, this brave emperor was obliged to submit to the legalization of the traffic, under the point of the bayonet, but the war was a convincing token of China's standing protest against the infamy. It is hard to distinguish between "Christian" and "heathen" nations in these greed-devouring times.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR, being once asked why he took so prominent a part in the temperance reform when untouched by its evil influences himself, replied: "At the entrance of one of our college chapels lies a nameless grave; that grave covers the mortal remains of one of its most promising fellows—ruined by drink. I received not very long ago a letter from an old schoolfellow, a clergyman, who, after long and arduous labor, was in want of clothes, and almost food. I inquired the cause; it was drink. A few weeks ago a wretched clergyman came to me in deplorable misery, who had dragged down his family with him into ruin. What had ruined him? Drink! When I was at Cambridge one of the most promising scholars was a youth, who, years ago, died in a London hospital, penniless, of delirium tremens, through drink. When I was at King's College, I used to sit next to a handsome youth, who grew up to be a brilliant writer; he died in the prime of life, a victim of drink. I once knew an eloquent philanthropist who was a very miserable man. The world never knew the curse which was on him; but his friends knew it was drink. And why is it that these tragedies are daily happening? It is through the fatal fascination, the seductive sorcery of drink, against which Scripture so often warns. It is because drink is one of the surest of 'the devil's ways to man, and of man's ways to the devil.'"

MISS JESSIE ACKERMAN, who has been traveling in the East, lectured at Brisbane recently, giving an interesting account of her experiences. She reported that at one place visited by her in Japan there was a school, belonging to a Japanese with whose history she became acquainted. A Japanese formerly carried on a very large brewery at that place, but somewhere he heard for the first time of the Gospel. It impressed him very much, and he thought a great deal about it. One of his neighbors had also heard about the Gospel, and they got a Bible, studying it together. As they read it they became convinced that it was the true religion, and they embraced Christianity. After a time the brewer thought it was hardly consistent in him to carry on a brewery, and he gave it up. A desire then seized him to do something for the people, and a suggestion was made that he should turn the brewery into a school. This he consented to do. A floor was put to the brewery, and portions partitioned off in the upper story for dormitories for the pupils. In the back part, the school and chapel were established, the latter seating about 600 or 700 persons. A difficulty met them, however, as they had no altar or seats for the chapel. The missionary who had been sent for suggested that the vats should be made into seats. That was done. The wine-press was still standing, and it was converted into an altar. The furnishing was thus completed.

Why is it that the

can and does pay its losses promptly and in full, and furnish insurance at less than one-half the cost of a similar policy in an Old Line Company?

1. Because the Old Line Companies charge a great deal more for insurance than is necessary, as proven by their own experience.

2. Because the members of the Total Abstinence Life Association of America are persons of correct habits and clean lives, and therefore much better risks than the average.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The monetary disturbances on Wall street are subsiding, and it is believed that a general panic has been narrowly avoided.

Another white-ribboner on the Columbian Exposition Commission is Mrs. J. M. Smith, of Wisconsin. She is an active member of the Mineral Point Union.

The body of young Abraham Lincoln was, on the 14th inst., laid to rest beside his grandfather, in the crypt of the National Lincoln Monument, at Springfield, Ill.

A powerful revival of religion has been manifested at Oberlin, O., under the preaching of Rev. B. Fay Mills. Most of the Oberlin College students who were not already Christians have accepted Christ.

The Congress of the new Republic of Brazil convened Nov. 15. President Fonesca delivered his message, reviewing the work of the Provisional Government and formally transferring the powers of the government to the Chambers.

Mr. C. S. Barnett, county and city superintendent of schools, Eureka Springs, Arkansas, writes for a quantity of the Young Crusader Lessons in Civil Government, saying they are the best thing in that line he has found—a suggestion to other superintendents.

"In Darkest England," General Booth's new book, has been published, and has awakened an intense interest in London's paupers and criminals. General Booth claims that the physical conditions must be changed before much can be accomplished for their spiritual salvation. Funds for the furtherance of this project are pouring in from many directions.

The National Convention opened auspiciously Friday morning. The meetings of the executive committee and the National superintendents, Wednesday and Thursday, were harmonious, and did a great amount of business. Plans were formulated which, if successfully carried out, will result in a very effective year's work. The weather is delightful, and everything promises the finest convention of years.

Mrs. Hitchcock of Nebraska writes a hasty note from Kansas City, en route for Atlanta: "Amendment lost, but we are not discouraged. Our women were brave and true, but shorn of their strength because they could not vote. In most places the good women were at the polls all day and did what they could. The work done in the campaign will not be lost but will bear fruit in the coming years."

Speaker Reed lays the responsibility of the political "land-slide" at the door of woman. He says: "I am inclined to think that the most important factor in the result of the election was the women of the country. It is the women who do the shopping, who keep the run of the prices, who have the keenest scent for increased cost. They heard in every store the clerks behind the counters explain how this article or that could not be sold hereafter at the former price, because of the McKinley Bill; they went home and told their husbands and fathers, and their stories had tremendous effect at the ballot box."

THE first gymnasium or college for women in Rome is to be opened the first of April, 1891. This is in accordance with the order of the Cultus Minister Boselli. The grade and character of the new institution is to be that of the technical schools, and the object is to enable young women to prepare themselves to enter the universities.

THE motto adopted by the Daughters of the American Revolution, of which organization Mrs. Harrison is president, is "Amor Patriae"—"love of country;" the insignia either a teapot or spinning-wheel; and the figure of a maid of 1776 as the device upon the badge. The association's aim is to perpetuate the record of the historical deeds of women of the Revolution.

THE Democrats in Jasper County, in Missouri, nominated Mrs. Annie Baxter as their candidate for county clerk, and last week they elected her to the office by some seven hundred majority. There is no doubt that she has the right to accept and administer the office. The "male citizen" requirement of the Constitution of the state was stricken out some time ago, and this makes her eligible notwithstanding her sex.

ONE great trouble about enforcing the prohibitory law in Kansas has been that so many men convicted under its provisions have been pardoned by the Governor. This has occasioned much complaint, and the blame has all been laid at his door. Investigation proves that petitions for pardon are signed by very many men who ought to know better. The W. C. T. U. secured the passage of a law requiring the publication of such petitions with signatures in county papers, with an opportunity for protest. This will put a stop to reckless signing of petitions because "some one asks you to."

MRS. M. E. STEVENSON, superintendent of Sabbath Observance for Pennsylvania, is to issue an eight page paper quarterly, in the interest of her department. It will give the news of the wide and growing movement in behalf of the Sabbath Rest in the United States and throughout the world. It will endeavor to be helpful to mothers in training their children to love and observe the Sabbath, and to pastors and pastors' wives in their labors for the Sabbath among their flocks. It asks the friendly help of the lovers of the Sabbath, in its effort to reach women of all classes and everywhere. Price ten cents a year; 12 copies one dollar. Address Mrs. M. E. Stevenson, 1520 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE editor of the Christian Union grows excited over the free sale, in our country, of acids for removing ink-stains, because they are used by evil men for dishonest purposes. It says: "A little bit of the thou-shalt-not policy of Russia might make a useful ingredient in the devil-take-the-hindmost policy of our democracy. Under a paternal form of government, the sale of such a mixture as this would probably be prohibited." This is the same editor who speaks and votes in favor of licensing the liquor traffic. Prohibit the sale of the diabolical ink-eradicator! but let the innocent traffic in character eradicators, and God's image-destroyers, and soul-cursers, go on! That is the moral law of the Christian Union. So says the Christian Statesman.

JUDGE TULEY, of Chicago, has made a decision which at one sweep wipes out the constitutionality of state or municipal laws regulating gambling. He says: "The city charter grants no power to the city to regulate gambling and gambling places; the only power granted to the city is the power to suppress gambling and gambling houses. The power to prohibit and suppress does not give power to permit or regulate." The principle upon which his decision is based is, that neither the state legislature nor the city of Chicago possesses the power to regulate what is inherently a vice and a crime against society; it has only the power to prohibit. This principle, applied to the saloon, is exactly the doctrine we Prohibitionists hold, and believe that it applies equally well to the three congeners, the saloon, the gambling den and the brothel.

THE W. C. T. U. of Steubenville, Ohio, conducted a very spirited and successful crusade against indecent shows, with which their town had been cursed. Traveling companies would come there, fill bill boards with vile pictures, advertising these shows for men and boys, tickets only ten and five cents, their money being made from liquor freely sold in the hall. The women protested to the owner of the hall to no effect; next they succeeded in making the company cover up the indecent pictures on the bill boards. Meanwhile public sentiment was being worked up, and the press gladly aided in the work. Still the shows went on; the women determined to make one more effort: they kept their own counsel, quietly bought tickets and went to the show and went again. This finished the business, as no man wished any pure woman to see him there, and the thing was driven from town.

A GENTLEMAN writing to the Inter-Ocean makes the same charge against the Pullman car "saloon" the W. C. T. U. has so often made: "Among the many annoyances of traveling in a Pullman car none is worse to bear than the 'saloon.' Last year I took a trip to California and back by way of Tacoma and St. Paul. The through trains carry liquor and it is sold and drank to intoxication, and what with the noise, profanity and gaming, I determined never to spend any more money to secure a sleeping berth when the porter is unable to secure quiet. It was my misfortune to be located near to the 'state-room,' which was occupied by a quartet of drinking and card-playing, swearing fellows (one an editor of a Minneapolis daily), and twice did I call for the porter asking him to stop their noisy, boisterous conduct, but he said he could not."

A COUNTRY union in Ohio has exhibited an unusual amount of grace, grit and gumption—W. C. T. U. characteristics. It is in a farming community, where there is no town except the "church, school-house and blacksmith shop" at the cross-roads. It held its meetings in the church every two weeks, and once a month they "staid to supper," and had exercises in the evening, charging ten cents for supper and evening entertainment. After awhile a non-partisan breeze blew over that way, and caused the church to be closed against the temperance meetings. They were then transferred to the school-house, but the same influence soon closed it. What did this irrepressible union do but arise and build—not a thirteen-story Temple, but a very comfortable hall which is now all paid for, and they have bigger meetings than ever, with none to molest or to make them afraid.

A MISSIONARY in India writes as follows concerning the effect upon their work of drinking by English and Americans, who are all counted as Christians by the natives. Frequently converts who did not dare touch liquor while belonging to their own caste, on becoming Christians feel free to indulge in the habit. They say: "English Christians drink, Christians smoke, why should not we?" and the missionaries' mouths are closed. The effect of liquor upon these people, and the increasing amount used by them, is something fearful. Besides the drinking, there are several substances smoked by the natives, which are as pernicious and far more rapid in results than alcoholics. A strong plea comes to us for one of our best women to go to India and remain several years to train workers. "Send a good woman who will devote all her time and energies to this work for a few years. There are many here who could help, but they cannot lead." Mrs. Leavitt makes a plea in the same line. Her plan is to have the women come here to be trained in our training school that is to be.

THE Sabbath Association of Illinois held its third annual convention at Chicago on Nov. 11 and 12. Among the most notable addresses were "The Civil Sabbath," by Hon. C. C. Bonney; "Sunday Recreation," by Rev. E. P. Goodwin, and "Sunday Closing of the World's Fair," by President W. C. Roberts, D. D., and Rev. Dr. Herrick Johnson. "The Sabbath and the Saloon" was treated of by Rev. Dr. J. B. Helwig. He quoted largely from the deliverances of the United States Brewers' Association. They claim, in the interests of beer, "personal and political liberty." They say that "Saturday is pay day and Sunday is rest day," and that therefore, in the interest of business Sunday should have unrestricted sale of beer. Sixty-five per cent of brewers and seventy-five per cent of saloon keepers are foreigners, and of that class of foreigners who have not been accustomed to the Christian and American Sabbath. The real issue is, shall beer brewers and sellers determine the character of the Sabbath for the United States, or shall the better element say what shall be the character of the day so essential to all civilization?

A PARABLE.

BY EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

I mourned, because the work my hand had wrought
Was, in a moment, unto ruin brought;
When one, whose steadfast faith no doubts could shake,
Unto my soul these words of courage spake:

"In the quaint records of the cloister cell,
The ancient monks this simple story tell:
Ponder it well, and learn how God o'erthrows
The crafty malice of His impious foes.

"When the great Voice first scattered ancient night,
The new-born earth swung empty to the light.
No valleys decked with blossoms, white and red,
No leafy shades, no living verdure spread.

"Then spake Jehovah, be His name adored,
Unto the angels, waiting for His word,
'Go scatter seeds upon the plains below
Of all the plants that in my garden grow.'

"Swift as the wind they bore, at His command,
The seeds of life and beauty thro' the land;
The Rose of Sharon, and the palms that rise
Beside the golden gates of Paradise.

"Satan beheld the work, and proudly thought
To bring the counsels of the Lord to naught;
So, when the angels winged their homeward flight,
He hid the seed beneath the soil from sight.

"Next morn, behold! a miracle was seen,
Broidered with lilies stretched the meadows green;
Hills rose in verdure to the leafy wood,
And the great Voice pronounced it 'very good.'"

O ye who sow with patient, toiling hand
The seeds of truth and virtue thro' the land,
Though in the furrow tears may fall like rain
It shall but haste the springing of the grain.

The powers of darkness for a time may try
To hide the harvest from your watchful eye;
God's seed is vainly buried; swifter still Comes to the earth the fruitage of His will.

Evanston, Ill.

"NAKED LAMPS."

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

I.

It was a morning late in November, in fact, the morning after Thanksgiving, and the sun was just beginning to brighten a cold gray sky.

A little mining village in Northern Pennsylvania was arousing itself with the rest of the laboring world, and lights gleaming from many a window told of early breakfasts before the long day's work began.

Two or three irregular streets which seemed to lead nowhere, with small, unattractive houses on either side, made up the village, whose dinginess was partially concealed by a light fall of snow. If you had cared to follow the black line of the traveled street, you would have discovered numerous saloons at the corners and wedged in between the homes, also lighted. Here you would have seen men, rough-bearded and red-faced, rolling out beer barrels, and clearing away signs of last night's debauch, that they might be in readiness for early customers. And soon it was time for them, apparently, since men appeared here and there, ready to start for the "breaker," which rose, huge and black, against the western horizon.

At length the door of one of the more decent looking homes opened, and three persons, evidently father and sons, came out. The first was slow, stolid, with hands in pockets and pipe in mouth, a typical Irishman. The brothers were bright, strong fellows, the younger a mere boy.

They paused a moment to laugh and talk with a young girl who stood in the doorway. "I'll not be home again till Christmas," said she, "so you'd better be decent if you want presents from me."

"I'm dacent, Nora, an' ye'll get me the nice present. It's Mike that torments ye," said the boy. Mike gave his younger brother a push which started him down the hill at a lively pace, and then gathered a handful of snow to throw at Nora, who dodged the well-aimed missile by retreating and closing the door.

"I wish Dennis didn't have to work in the mines," said she, clearing a place on the window to look after him. "He should be in school, for he's a bright boy, just as bright as Willie Burt."

Her mother, who was pattering back and forth with bare feet, clearing away the remains of their early breakfast, paused to say: "There's naught but the mine. It's glad and thankful I'd be to kape him above ground."

Two girls younger than Nora sat near the window, watching her and mentally appropriating the neat "new-market" and hat with gay feathers which she had taken from a peg behind the door.

"When I'm two years older I'll have me a place, and buy me a hat," said Bridgy with a decided nod. The girls, the entire family in fact, were proud of Nora; proud of her bright, quick ways, her success in pleasing those for whom she worked, and the refined manner and style of speech she was gradually assuming.

"I'll fix me hair over me forred just like her," said Maggie, with eyes bent upon the deft fingers arranging fluffy bangs before the little tarnished looking glass.

"The lady ye works fer 'll be frettin' if ye doan show yer face the marnin'," said her mother.

"I'll get there time enough, don't you fear. They're not up so early as we; besides, there's plenty cooked after the big dinner."

"W'at iver was it fer?" asked the grandmother who sat by the fire, her wide white cap border quivering as she rapped the ashes from her pipe.

"It's the way they keeps Thanksgivin' Day, granny," replied Nora. "Mr. Burt's folks is kind of foreigners like. They come from a place they call New England."

"Cross the wather?" asked Mrs. McCree. Nora hesitated.

"I don't just mind, but it's where the Indians live. Mrs. Burt—she's a lady, she is—she told me how the white folks come to that place in a ship—it must be many years sence—and they did buy land of the Indians. Whatever they was I can't just tell;—wild folks, I'm quite sure—but she told me there was a cold winter with but little to eat, and they was in awful trouble indeed. Then they prayed to the Lord, and the folks where they lived before sent a big ship full of things to eat; so then they had a big dinner. And every year sence, they have turkeys, and chickens, and all the rest, as if it were Christmas, and remembers all they have to be thankful fer besides."

"It's the fine thing fer them that has," said her mother. "I've wondered why the mines sthopped at all fer the day, givin' it up to drink and fightin'. I've naught to do with 't."

Nora laughed, and sat down, still holding her hat.

"Mrs. Burt said to me that everybody should have Thanksgivin' days. She said, 'Remember, Nora, what you told me about the coal.' You see it was this way. She kept sayin' would I be careful to keep the dampers shut when we didn't want the oven, and I'd be forgettin'. So I says: 'Ye mind the coal more than any lady I ever worked fer.' She laughed then and says she: 'We had to pay such a high price fer it in New England, seven or eight dollars the ton, we had to be careful, and it's a habit with me.' So then I says, 'We has to pay nothin' at all fer ours, but just the pickin' of it up along the tracks, and from out the culm.' So that was what she did mean, fer she wondered over its cheapness. So she says, 'Be thankful fer the coal ye get so cheap.' Then I says, 'Maybe it's cheap, but when there's accidents in the mines we thinks it's a high price we pays.' That's just the words I says."

The old grandmother groaned at this, and Mrs. McCree said, "It's the thrue word ye spoke, Nora. But in them furrin parts it's likely she niver knew. She niver lost 'er feyther down to the Avondale, an' 'er husban' niver had the face of 'im blowed full of powther from the blast."

"No; she's awful curious about the mines," continued Nora, forgetful of time in the interest of her theme. "You'd laugh to hear the foolish questions. She would know all about the breakers, and the boys that pick out the slate when the coal comes thunderin' down. And what was the shaft, and how did the men go down to their work? And what was the long black hill by the breaker where the donkey wint back and forth, back and forth all the day? She could never believe 'twas but the waste coal what the donkey brings out by the cartload. And she says, 'A Yankee would use it fer somethin',' she knew. You never see how she listened and asked questions; so curious." Nora had cleverly mimicked her mistress as she talked, much to the amusement of the girls.

"What fer a place had she been livin' in, to be that simple?" asked her mother contemptuously; while the grandmother's eyes twinkled through her wrinkles, and her cap border vibrated as she chuckled and mumbled.

"She's not simple at all," said Nora, quickly. "It's only that they have no coal in the country she come from. You should hear her talk. I was tellin' what she said about shuttin' dampers. Well, do you know, she said we'd have Thanksgivin' days had we a'mind, because there's dampers to other things besides stoves. She's awful strong fer temperance, and she says, 'Why don't the miners shut the dampers on s'loons?' She says it's 'Waste, waste, waste!' Them's her very words. Then I says, 'Mrs. Burt, if you'll go up our way you'll see Thanksgivin' Day means what you never knew before. They celebrates in the s'loons. The men just drinks and fights, fights and drinks all day. You say to thank the Lord, and have friends come home is what the day is fer; but we from the old counthry never knew it that way. The men be idle, but when it's worse than iver fer the women and babies, what's to thank the Lord fer?'"

"An' what fer an answer had she?" asked her mother, looking curiously at the girl's intense eyes and heightened color.

"She just looked like she would cry, and says, 'O Nora, is it so bad?' And then she prayed like, and I heard her speakin' as if 'twas folks that was in a furnace, with nobody to shut the dampers—folks instid of coal, do you mind? I felt that bad I had to say my prayers."

Mrs. McCree shook her head. "Nobody can; an' Mike an' Dennis 'll soon be in," said she.

Nora drew a long breath, and put on her hat. "This never'll do for me. If I don't start I'll have to run the whole way."

Then she stooped to kiss the blue-eyed baby on the floor, drew on her mittens and opened the door. That instant a terrible sound was heard.

"Mother, mother!" she cried. "It's an explosion! They be havin' an accident over to the shaft." And she stood, horror-stricken, pointing toward the west as her mother and the girls rushed out.

A pillar of flames and dust and smoke rose hundreds of feet from the shaft up toward the sky, an awful token of what was happening out of sight. Women and children ran out of the houses on every side, bareheaded, and in some cases, barefooted, and hurried across the snow-covered fields.

"I'm goin', put the shoes on your feet and come, mother," said Nora. But Mrs. McCree could not wait for shoes. Her husband and sons might be dying that moment, and she started as she was, following the girls. The grandmother hobbled as far as the road, wringing her hands and calling on the saints; but, hearing a wail from the forsaken baby, she returned to the house, her poor old body shivering as in an ague.

Meanwhile, scores of people had reached the scene of the disaster. Nora's flying feet had carried her far in advance of her mother, and she pressed her way to the front; looking, calling and inquiring for "Father, Mike and Dennis. What was it, and what's happened down there?" she cried, seizing the arm of a neighbor.

"Gas exploded; the ould chamber was closed up, too. Howiver—"

"McFadden's lamp done it," said another man. "He went in t' ould chamber with 's naked lamp."

"There's summa' near fifty men down there; why doan' you go down?" wailed a woman.

"Don't stop to talk, men, the boss calls for help; who's going down?" called a stranger, hurrying through the crowd.

"It's death to yez all. I'll not let ye go!" shrieked a woman seizing her husband with both hands.

They all knew the danger from the after damp, but that did not deter the brave fellows. A gang of rescuers was quickly organized and descended into the pit of death.

Smoke still filled the air, and the entire scene was simply indescribable. The cries and groans of women who knew their loved ones were below, mingled with the wild prayers of others who knelt in the snow, swaying back and forth as though bereft of their senses. A circle of men had been stationed around the pit to keep the women back; but when the rescuers were drawn up, overcome by the fire damp, some daring ones fought to break through the line, desperate in their desire to know the worst. As soon as possible another party went down, and as the air inside had cleared somewhat, they soon began to send up, three or four at a time, the blackened forms they had found lying at the bottom of the shaft.

THE "MIDDLE CLASS" AND ITS DESTINY.

BY PROF. HENRY A. SCOMP.

Auream quis quis mediocritatem
Diligit, tutus caret obsoleti
Sordibus tecti, caret invidenda Sobrius aula. —Horace.

All praise the golden mean; all hate
The pauper's lot, the pride of state
Contemn; for neither low nor great
Are free from gnawing care.

The Roman bard had lost his patrimony in sunny Calabria; he had followed the fortunes of Brutus, Cassius and the Republicans, until all was lost at Philippi. At last, through Mæcenas, he had been granted a little farm in the Sabine country, which he delighted to cultivate; he could at least live in comparative independence. He would urge Licinius, too, to choose this golden mean; for the tallest pine meets the fiercest storms, the loftiest towers topple with the heaviest crash, and lightnings seek oftenest the highest peaks. The independent mean is better.

Agur, son of Jakeh, prays for neither poverty nor riches, "Lest I be full and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain."

Thus the ideal for mortal life, both in the prophet's vision and in the poet's dream, lay in a simple sufficiency of Nature's gifts, to place one beyond cringing want, and morbid fear of reverses. Towards this pole-star all civilization, all true religion, must tend. The despotism of the few, the debasement of the many, can find no place in a just social system, much less receive countenance from philanthropy and true Christianity.

Are we tending toward this vine-and-fig-tree state? Is our present system bringing nearer this Eden of our dreams? Is the golden mean absorbing the rich from the one side and drawing up the poor into itself from the other? Is the day of redemption drawing nigher, or receding farther? Is the tendency of our industrial system to swell the proportion of happy homes to the ever-increasing roll of families? Is independence in material necessities of life, and, ergo, independence in thought and action, becoming more general, or is it decreasing? If the latter, then a fatal flaw is in our system; the gangrene has already set in, and the end may be almost timed by the dial. Let us see.

The middle class is understood to embrace all those who, while earning a livelihood by their own labor of whatever kind, yet have the control of their own time, the direction of their own labor; who live in their own houses, own the implements of their handicraft or trade, make their own contracts directly with their patrons, or with a general employer for a specified work, or for a given time. This definition does not profess to be perfectly accurate, or at all exhaustive, but only general.

Formerly, throughout our country the trades were carried on under the above conditions for the most part. The workman was directly responsible to his patron, or, at most, only to his temporary employer. His accountability as a laborer went no further. The average village had its hatter, tailor, shoemaker, miller, carpenter, cabinet-maker, wagon-maker, book-binder, fuller, dyer, et alios, carrying on nearly all the essential work of the community. Each of these craftsmen was a freeman, going and coming at his will. The farm was operated by its owner, and the "hired help" never thought of his condition as a permanent one. He, too, expected to advance to ownership ere long. If a tenant now, he would be a freeholder by and by. Personal freedom as to time, kind of work, etc., was his ultimate aim, which he might almost certainly reach if true to his purpose.

Is such the status of the middle class now? Have its members reached the golden mean; or do they look forward, with any reasonable prospect, to reaching this goal of effort, this state of manly independence? Are they really laborers, or simply operatives?

The village tailor is an old man now, for no youth is following in his steps. His occupation is practically gone. An occasional order from some oldtime customer he yet may fill. Perhaps, once a fortnight he may "cut and fit" a coat or a vest, but at other times he sits, like Marius amid the ruins of Carthage, dreaming of that Golden Age of the past to which the brazen has succeeded. The sewing-machine and the half-starved sewing-women of the great metropolis have supplanted him. Would he pursue his calling he must first pursue it to the city where he, too, becomes an "operative," working at regulation prices, with the fixing of which he had nothing to do. "Ready made" clothing in the village store has stranded the village tailor.

As to the hatter, he, to the new generation is only a tradition. Young America never saw him in his shop. The shoe and boot-maker has practically yielded the contest to the city manufactory. He cannot compete in price with the "brought on" article. He must be content to patch and "half-sole." The awl and the last offer no temptations for life support to any more active boys. The local carpenter fares little better. The city planing mills and factories will build a house complete, or furnish each single part thereof, from the most elegant cornice to the plainest cellar door, and the village carpenter may thank his stars for the gracious privilege of setting the building up and of fastening its parts together. His is fast becoming one of the lost arts outside the city limits. Soon he, too, folds his tent and steals away to seek an employer in the city, and add one more atom to the struggling mass of operatives, and be counted by the boasting gazette as another evidence of the city's growth and prosperity. The blacksmith still has the poor boon of tacking to a horse's foot an imported shoe with an imported nail, simply because the horse and the shoe factory cannot be readily brought together. Factory wagons and factory furniture have "done for" the local craftsman. He dies out, or else must seek the city. The local grist-mill cannot compete with the great "roller mills" of the city, and the village miller must take his place with the other Knickerbockers, and smoke and dream of the good old "olden time."

Wool, cotton, flax and hemp in the "raw state" seek the city factory and improved machinery; and the oldtime loom to the young, is an object of curiosity almost as great as an ancient catapult. It may occasionally be seen in city "expositions" alongside of New England mills, to illustrate by contrast our modern progress. Money flows toward the city, and population follows the tide. The farmer even—he of the independent calling—finds that he, too, cannot stem the current setting cityward. His products are losing their preponderance in the markets; the "balance of trade" is against him. Desperately he struggles; inch by inch he is driven backward; he fortifies by mortgages on crops, on stock, on farming implements, on lands, till at last the homestead itself—the pound of flesh nearest the heart—is given up, and he an alien and a tenant upon his former birthright, it may be, still seeks a precarious subsistence.

Is this picture too somber? It is at least so true that its outlines are readily made out; its colors at once recognized. Divested of all that is highly wrought, the plain, simple fact confronts us that the great middle class, the hope and bulwark of every land, under present conditions, is steadily disappearing. We are becoming a nation of employers and employés, a duality of "bosses" and bossed, of owners and owned—yclept tenants, or hired laborers. Here the lines are drawn. Hardly an ell of debatable ground lies between. The great middle class are being aligned, and led, like Peter in his old age, not whither they would, but whither they would not.

"But," we are asked, "isn't the volume of work accomplished under the new system vastly in excess of that under the old?" Most assuredly; and if the maximum of work be the only object and standard of comparison, then the system of to-day is a complete success. But what of the laborers? More skilled in a single line they certainly are; but how about their independence in thought and action, their manhood, patriotism, and power of self-support? The decennial census reflects but little light from these deeper springs of life and of action. Once a parent trunk drawing support directly from the native earth, the laborer has now grown farther and farther away into the infinitesimal twig upon the tiniest branch of the mammoth tree of industry. He has become a specialist. He may be an adept to point a pin which he cannot head, or stamp a die upon a canvas which he cannot weave. He is an expert in his line; but a new invention in mechanism may be made to do his work as well, and with far more rapidity; or a business failure, or an employer's whim, may drop him helpless into the ever-swelling ranks of the unemployed. His enemy's force is measured by horse power; his, only by human power. Soul and mind are excluded; the battle is strong; steam against human strength, machine versus muscle, carbon opposed to cartilage, fibers of iron matched against nerves of flesh—can the issue be doubtful? Manhood melts away into the surging flood, individuality is lost. The human machine drops into place beside the iron and the wooden, and is hardly rated above these by the horse-power gauge. Thinking force and sleight-of-hand run parallel. Life assumes a mere mechanical routine, moving on with the rest of the factory machinery. What will such life develop?

Is there soul uplift in this treadmill of whirr and revolution? Is this the ideal middle class of the philanthropist, the statesman or the patriot? Is it upon arms like these that the country's salvation must depend? Are these the yeomanry to whose stanch hearts the nation's weal is committed?

Over one million of men—most of them having families—are engaged in railroading, nearly all being employés. What a large constituent part of our population is formed by this class alone. All our chief industries are prosecuted upon the same line. With wages barely at a living point, it is impossible for the mass of these operatives to be more than employés, for life. The ranks of the employé class grow more rapidly than the opportunities for employment. That the bulk of property is passing steadily from the many to the few is patent both from observation and statistics. Pitiless steam is ever congregating his slaves more and more from the country into the city, where they must be the creatures of his will. Concentration of industries is always going forward. The golden mean is vanishing; the ideal middle class with its homes, its shops, its mills, and its farms, is yielding to the hireling, the renter, and the tenant. No master is more absolute than Mammon. Will his slaves defend a land no longer theirs? In the Roman empire when land ownership shrank to two per cent of the whole population, Rome fell. In Persia, the percentage was reduced to one, and the kingdom of the Achemenidæ went into dissolution. It matters not that lords may be kind and considerate, the vassalage is felt. The dog of the fable, though pampered, yet always carried on his neck the mark of the collar.

A famous American humorist once declared that while he had heard of many men who had died for their homes, he had never yet known of one who had died for his boarding house. What of our future citizenship, when even now the jury lists in some of our states does not include one-tenth of the voters? Can an independent suffrage really obtain coördinate with dependence for homes and bread? Will not the owner's, or the employer's interest continually control in elections? Of what avail all the laws for "a free ballot and a fair count"? Influences so subtle can be countermanded by no statutes. From such dependence there is only one step to real vassalage—a vassalage beyond the reach of law and only to be overthrown by revolution.

Is it wonderful that labor organizations and alliances of farmers—the most independent and least excitable of all laborers—should be mustering against the treacherous foe? The most hopeful of signs is in the general awakening to a sense of the real danger. When capital, under infamous combinations, can price at will the food to hungry millions, it is surely time for universal apprehension. A remedy may then be found, perhaps not strictly "constitutional," but yet a remedy. People will not quietly starve, even though starvation be "constitutional" and the logical result of laws and of forces now operating. With all industries becoming subservient to monopoly; with avarice and luxury—those twin daughters of the horse-leech—forever crying, "GIVE, GIVE!" how is possible the realization of that golden middle state craved in the prophet's prayer: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me"? Our endeavor should be to check the present dangerous tendency of forces, to insure justice and domestic tranquillity, to bring back peace and the golden mean, and the yet more than golden middle class to man our ship of state and with strong arms and willing hearts bring her to a quiet haven.

THE MOTHER OF THE SALVATION ARMY.

BY LUCY RYDER MEYER.

One of the most remarkable women of our times died a few weeks ago in London. Catherine Booth was not only the power behind the throne, but a sharer of the throne that governed the Salvation Army.

Mrs. Booth was sixty-one years old at the time of her death—still a comparatively young woman. For nearly three years she suffered unspeakably with that fell disease, cancer, and for months before her death seemed to be lying at the very edge of the river. Her influence during these last sad years has been, if possible, greater, by the messages she has sent, the letters she has written, and, above all, by the spectacle of calm and courageous suffering she presented, than during any two years of her exceptionally active life.

It is not generally known that both Mr. and Mrs. Booth were at one time members of the "Methodist New Connection," a branch of the Wesleyan Church which fifty years ago split off from the mother organization. Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, known to all Methodists as the leader of the "Forward Movement" in England Methodism, tells an interesting story about the house where, at a cottage prayer-meeting, General Booth first met the woman who afterwards became his wife. This house is now a successful mission hall of the Wesleyan Church.

After years of regular service Mr. Booth asked his church to appoint him to special evangelistic work. His request was refused, and he promptly severed his connection with his conference and took up, independently, the work which, in later years, developed into the Salvation Army. In all these steps his wife stood by him with an unquestioning devotion and confidence, both in her husband and in his call to a unique service.

Mrs. Booth was an ardent advocate of total abstinence, in a time and country when to be such was an exceedingly advanced matter, even among devoted and aggressive Christians. It was largely through her influence that absolute and unconditional prohibition from all kinds of intoxicating liquors was made one of the conditions of admission into the Army. It is to Mrs. Booth also that the Salvation Army owes its uniform. Her well-known bonnet and coat, with a Bible and a very small bouquet of flowers, were the only ornaments on the plain oak coffin in which this single-hearted woman was carried to her long rest. What a striking object lesson against the luxurious customs which in life-time adorn our poor bodies with the gewgaws of fashion, and in death would load them down with costly and ostentatious display.

The mental struggle which preceded Mrs. Booth's actively engaging in preaching is an instructive bit of personal experience. She was convinced years before she followed out the conviction, that God had called her to preach the gospel. Naturally sensitive and diffident, she felt that she could not do it; and only after a long and serious illness, during which God showed her eternal realities as never before, did she resolve at all hazards to live up to her convictions and duty in this matter. "I told the Lord I would do it or die in the attempt," was her energetic way of stating the case.

Miss Willard once asked Bishop Vincent—then Dr. Vincent—to recommend her as a lecturer. He received the request with some embarrassment, for he of course desired to accommodate his friend, while his well-known belief concerning woman's work made him look upon the platform as an extremely dangerous thing when occupied by the gentler sex. He sailed between Schylla and Charibdis as follows: "If ever a woman ought to lecture, Miss Willard is that woman." So with Mrs. Booth, if ever a woman was called to preach, Mrs. Booth was that woman.

Dr. Clifford, an English divine noted for scholarship, has lately said, in a sermon about Mrs. Booth, that in 1867 he had heard her preach a sermon which, "for clearness of insight, logical conclusion and forcibleness of reasoning remained unmatched."

Many of her sermons and articles have been published in tract form, and widely scattered. The spirit of intense and aggressive Christianity breathes through them all, and whatever views one may hold as to the work of the Salvation Army in special localities, no one can read these productions from Mrs. Booth's pen without being helped to understand what the true spirit of Christianity is, and that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."

It is not often given to man or woman that a concourse of twenty thousand people assembles to do them funeral homage. The crowd that gathered during the last ceremonies over Mrs. Booth's body numbered fully that. The service on this occasion was two hours' long, and consisted largely of singing, alternated with the silent reading of extracts from Mrs. Booth's writings, that were printed on programs held in the hands of everybody. Speaking was impossible, as no voice could be heard throughout the vast throng. The hymns, and the place on the program, were indicated by figures, displayed at intervals from the platform. The singing was led by Army bands. Both the General and Mrs. Booth were strongly opposed to "black mourning," and the only symbol of their deep sympathy displayed in the vast throng, was a white band around the arm with the crimson letter "S" upon it.

This public demonstration was followed, the next day, by the procession to the cemetery where the burial took place. This procession crowded the streets of London, even in the midst of a fog so dense that it was almost impossible to keep the line. Arrived at the open grave, the people joined in singing, "Rock of Ages, cleft for me," and after prayer sang again the chorus often sung by members of the Army in Chicago:

"O the waters of Jordan may roll,
But Jesus will carry me through.
His peace is now filling my soul—
O that it were given to you."

One of the daughters of Mrs. Booth made a short address in a voice trembling with emotion, after which General Booth himself, rose, amid a sympathetic murmur, that seemed to come from the very heart of his people gathered about him.

"My heart is rent with sorrow," said he. "She was my wife for forty years; she was my comrade in the battle, and the strongest when the battle was hottest: and now—she is taken away. To-night she walks the plains, and I—I have been kneeling here and calculating how soon they will lay me beside her, and praying to be made readier to join her in the Eternal City. Death fought with her for two years and more; now she is victor. My wife, my beloved was good, and she was love. She suffered more in her life-time for dumb animals, even, than some doctors of divinity do for their people. And now—without her—I must cheer my poor heart with service for God and the world. God—bless you all."

After the coffin was lowered into the grave, a son of Mr. Booth's led the vast multitude on their knees, as they solemnly pledged themselves:

"Here, by the side of this open grave—and before each other—to be true to our cause—and valiant in Thy service—that we will devote ourselves to the great end of saving souls. That we will be faithful to Thee—faithful to one another—till we meet our beloved mother—in the morning."

DR. KATE BUSHNELL.

A Sketch.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

In 1873 a young woman about eighteen years of age appeared on the scene in the preparatory school of the Northwestern University. She matriculated later on in the University itself and we had many a delightful interview as teacher and pupil. Indeed, I felt that I had no stronger or more chivalric ally than this gifted, individualized, forceful young nature. I have proved the correctness of that supposition on many a field since then, and so has she, whenever I could help her fortunes forward.

Dr. Kate Bushnell is the seventh of nine children, all grown to maturity, of a robust, religious character, and more than ordinary intellect. She was born in Central Illinois. Her father, William F. Bushnell, was a building contractor for the government, and his death in 1889 was the first break in the family circle. The family traces its ancestry to John Rogers, the Smithfield martyr. The American encyclopœdia mentions the two most noted ones, Horace, the Hartford divine, and David, of revolutionary fame. Kate is said to be every inch a Bushnell by those who are acquainted with the family traits, which are, as has already been indicated, quite out of the average line. She was educated in the public schools of Illinois, in the Northwestern University, proceeding in the classical course until the third year. She was a private student, while in Evanston, with Dr. James S. Jewell, the most noted specialist in nervous diseases that the West has produced, and well known in Europe as well as in America as the editor, for years, of the Journal of Nervous Diseases. Dr. Jewell was a prominent figure in the life of Evanston, as he could not fail to be in any community where he took up his abode. To have been his pupil for years was in itself an education far superior to the average college course. Not himself a college man, but one who hewed out success from the most difficult conditions by the reaction of a magnificent intellect, and by an industry tireless as that of Sisyphus, and as productive as that of Hercules, Dr. James S. Jewell is, to my mind, an unexcelled object lesson for aspiring youth that has endowment but no money, no influential friends, and as the world looks upon it, no opportunities whatever. President Garfield said, "If you put Dr. Mark Hopkins on one end of a log and me on the other, you have a university." This was a good illustration of the superiority of men to means, and it accounts for a whole library in the development of Dr. Bushnell's talent, that such an intellectual luminary, joined to a heart so pure and gentle as Dr. Jewell's, came into her girlish life as friend and tutor. She was greatly beloved in his home, where wife and children vied with her preceptor in proving their appreciation of such a medical student as he probably never had elsewhere.

Having compassed two years of her medical education in this way, Dr. Bushnell went to the Chicago Woman's Medical College, and had the rare advantage of studying under that famous specialist, Dr. Wm. H. Byford, the brilliant Dr. Sarah Hackett Stevenson, and others. She was resident physician of the Hospital for Women and Children for a time. Having always felt a call to active Christian work, she offered herself as a medical missionary, and went to China, where she remained two and a half years. The failing health of her friend, Dr. Ella Gilchriest, necessitated her return, and she established herself as a physician in Denver, Col.

In 1885, in common with all thoughtful women who read the newspapers, I was profoundly stirred by the revelations in England, the sequel of which was such legislation for the protection of woman as the world has never known. William T. Stead became, as he must ever continue, a hero in my eyes, and in my annual address in the autumn of that year, in Philadelphia, as President of the National W. C. T. U., I earnestly urged upon the women the necessity of a new departure which should incorporate work for the promotion of social purity as an organic feature in the broad plans of our society. To this they heartily acceded, and as no one was found to undertake the organization of the department, that difficult duty fell on me. Looking about for some one as a lieutenant, and knowing that Dr. Bushnell had been the devoted friend of degraded women in the metropolis of the mountains, I asked her to come with us as evangelist of the department of social purity. This request was complied with on her part with the ardor of a nature that seemed thus to come into its own, and from that day her zeal in this cause has been like a consuming flame. Her medical work and hospital experiences had given her rare preparation for the special field to which she will no doubt devote herself the remainder of her life. There is not a commonwealth at the North which has not felt the influence of Dr. Bushnell's burning words. She seems the embodied Nemesis of the women whose bondage cries to heaven for justice and redress. Coming at once to Chicago, Dr. Bushnell laid the foundation for the Anchorage Mission that has attained such great success, and is now in charge of the Chicago W. C. T. U., with Miss Alice Bond, of Evanston, as its chief dependence, and which gave over five thousand lodgings to women in the last year. But a wider field awaited Dr. Bushnell, and, going out to the country at large, she has been instrumental in organizing the Mission of Hope and Help, in stirring the hearts of the home people to their duty, and influencing legislatures to ameliorate the legal situation of women and girls, adding heavily to the penalties for assault, and raising the age of protection from that of the common law, which is but ten years, to fourteen, sixteen and eighteen, according to the degree of enlightenment and Christian transformation in the heart of the legislator.

The trip made by Dr. Kate Bushnell to the dens of iniquity in Wisconsin, in 1888, was one of the most heroic ever made by any woman, and it was carried out with a fidelity and skill worthy of all praise. Undertaken at the request of officers of the W. C. T. U., who had read the newspaper accounts concerning the slavery of women in that depraved section of the country, and who wished to ascertain the truth, Dr. Bushnell's embassy had the moral and spiritual support of that great society. As was inevitable, she met fierce opposition and cruel injustice, but her faith never faltered, and her steadfast helpfulness to those poor women in the woods is a recital never to be known on earth, but which will gleam resplendent in the records of a better world.

Dr. Bushnell has been a member of the Methodist Church from early childhood, but thinks she was not converted until seventeen years of age. She is now thirty-five years old, and stands at the beginning of a work far greater than any she has ever yet attempted. For she has recently been chosen by the officers of the World's W. C. T. U. to make a trip around the world in the interest of the department to which she is devoted. Her remarkable and growing gifts as a speaker, her equally unique talent with her pen, her insatiable love of learning, which leads her to add constantly to the specific knowledge essential to success in this department, her wise discretion and pronounced Christian character, together with her undaunted courage, have made her the providential choice of those who have the power to send out white-ribboners to foreign lands. Dr. Bushnell goes to Germany in June, remaining there for study for some months, and will then go to England, and, later on, will take her world-wide trip. Notice is given thus early that the good news may have the widest possible expansion, and that thorough preparations may be made at the white-ribbon stations in all civilized lands. I hope this sketch will be carefully preserved and reproduced in the papers of the different countries toward which Dr. Bushnell's steps will tend, and that from the hour of reading what I have so hastily written out of a heart full of hope, prayers may be offered by our host of women for the health, prosperity and success of Dr. Bushnell in the great undertaking to which she has consecrated her heart and hand. I believe that the results of her mission will prove anew the truth of these significant lines we have all of us often repeated:

"He always wins who sides with God,
To him no chance is lost."

World's W. C. T. U.

OUR SECOND ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It seemed that the very elements joined hands in a conspiracy to prevent my departure from China. I waited nearly a month for my steamer, the date of sailing being repeatedly postponed. Finally I left Faviler (in Hong-Kong) in a jenrickshaw, drawn by a Chinaman, followed by a number of coolies carrying my effects. My friends brought up the rear of the procession. Upon reaching the wharf we found that a dispatch had come in that a typhoon was sweeping the China Sea, and that all small boats were ordered to places of safety. The clouds were now black and threatening, the waves high and the wind furious. To return to the city was to wait another month for the next steamer, so I plucked up courage and embarked. The storm was exceedingly severe. I had to stay in my cabin through most of the voyage to Australia, which lasted for thirteen days. Our first stop was at Port Darwin, where I found awaiting me letters from home, and telegrams of welcome from different parts of the colony.

At Cooktown I debarked under most trying and exhausting circumstances, tempestuous weather rendering all ordinary methods of no avail. I was lowered over the side of the steamer in a coal basket into the "lighter," or small transport boat, but as that was unable to reach the wharf, I was transferred into a smaller boat by being thrown bodily by sailors from the larger boat, to be caught by other sailors in the smaller one. For a week I was too ill to be about.

The mission began with a union prayer meeting to ask special blessing upon our work. Sunday afternoon we had a gospel temperance service in Town Hall, and in the evening I was invited to the pulpit of one of the churches. Monday night a public reception was given, when the ministers and representatives of temperance societies welcomed me back to Australia, after which I gave an address on W. C. T. U. organization and its objects. The meetings were very largely attended, with the result of forming a local union with a good membership. As both sides of the streets are lined with saloons and hundreds of sailors come weekly to the place, a great work should be done.

Cooktown is a beautiful and historic spot. Captain Cook having met with some mishap, he beached his ship here for repairs. The citizens have recently reared a beautiful monument upon the spot. The situation is very fine; an excellent harbor and a great port of call for China steamers. I was entertained in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Palmer, grand temperance people, long connected with the Good Templars, and the mainstay of the temperance cause in Cooktown. The house is situated on the side of a sloping hill, overlooking the sea; before us the waters of the bay sparkle in the sunlight, glisten in the moonbeams, and roll mountain high in storms. Just over the bay, some four miles distant, foot-hills rise from the sea, and, still further, a lofty range of mountains tower heavenward. Over this range are seen most glorious sunsets.

Leaving Cooktown we pass out into the open sea. The Great Banier Reef acts as a natural breakwater to the rolling seas of the Pacific, giving a smoothness to the waters between it and the main land. Were it not for this reef the navigation of the coast would be perilous in the extreme. The scenery of the coast is lovely; the hillsides are clothed with palms and tropical vegetation.

Townsville has a most favorable situation at the base of "Castle Rock," that towers far above the city, surrounded by a beautiful bay, with a long stretch of sandy beach. Just now the question of separation is being agitated. The colony is large, distance from place to place very great, and many are of the opinion that the colony should be divided. In case of division Townsville will, without a doubt, become the capital. The people are struggling as one man to this end.

On landing, one of the ministers was waiting for me with his carriage, and I was driven to the home where I was previously entertained. Having sailed from this place to China, I found a very warm welcome awaiting me. It was delightful to see familiar faces; it was almost like coming home.

The city was full of excitement—horse races, minstrels, musical concert. I was quite crowded out, but that did not prevent working with the women. One whole day was spent in visiting influential women to secure their cooperation in the work: women's meetings were held, which resulted in the addition of twenty good members. Three new departments of work were taken up, superintendents appointed, and the union greatly strengthened. The twin vices, drinking and gambling, can be seen on every hand.

The races have interfered very much with the work; every one seems quite given up to horse flesh. On account of the great interest taken in this sport I had to pass several important places, so my next call was at Rockhampton. Fares had been reduced, and the steamer was packed. We were crowded four in each room, regardless of rank or condition.

It was a hard journey. Just before we reached port I dressed and went down into the saloon where I found one of the priests studying for Sunday service on the steamer. In a few moments I heard a gentleman ask him if he "would take a hand at whist?" whereupon the reverend father closed his book and very soon he was as much taken up in cards as he had been in study. Everything of value was handed to the captain for safe keeping; the thieves and gamblers having stolen a quantity of the ship's silver.

Toward evening the tender met the steamer and very soon we were on our way up the river; forty miles of slow travel landed us in Rockhampton in the middle of the night. There stood the faithful president of the union ready to welcome me back. Here I rested on the Sabbath, and early Monday started for Mount Morgan, a gold mine, one of the most famous mines in the world, in fact, it is said to be a mountain of gold. The journey is very trying, although only thirty miles, part by train and part by stage. The road passes through a most uninteresting country. It is midwinter, the trees are stripped of their leaves, the grass is seared and brown, and the air cold, though no approach to our New England winters. A half an hour brings us to the end of the railroad. The stage is an old-time affair; they have just had heavy rains and floods and the roads are rough. Every inch of space is taken, inside and out; away we go, down hills, over ditches, through streams. The country is bleak looking, covered with scrub and gum trees, with here and there a growth of wattle tree. We pass numerous teams drawn by horses and oxen. One had twenty oxen harnessed together by heavy chains, an unusual sight, but the roads are almost impassable. Before we knew it the mount was reached. Several had come out to meet the stage, and one of the ministers invited me to his home.

The welcome meeting was held in the church. Several prominent persons welcomed me as the first woman speaker in the place, after which I gave an address on the W. C. T. U., its aims and objects. Next night the meeting was held in the School of Arts; a splendid attendance. The meetings grew in size and interest till the house was packed the last night. They have a fine military band which gave its services. Of course, it was a great attraction. Several hundred men are at work in the mines. I was greatly impressed with the need of work as I looked into the faces of these young men, and thought of the many temptations that surround them, then remembered they were all some sister's brother and some fond mother's son. I had, when I left home, fifty letters from mothers to their boys on distant shores; some of them had no idea where their boys were, others had not heard from them in two or three years. Many a loving mother gave me a letter saying, "You may hear of him somewhere. Give him this." We held two afternoon and four evening meetings, with the result of large additions to the union. Upon the fifth day I returned to Rockhampton where I held a woman's meeting that was largely attended. A number of ladies gave their names for membership.

At ten o'clock that night I took the steamer. I never experienced greater discomfort. Every place was packed and crowded. The ladies' cabin, intended to accommodate four, was crowded with six women and five children. I had been up since 4:30 in the morning and was completely worn out. I spread my heavy coat on the floor and with my valise for a pillow tried to get a little sleep. One of the women was partly intoxicated. She ordered drinks for all of us; in came a waiter with beer, wine and brandy. At 1:30 next morning we stopped alongside the English steamer where all the women but the drunken one took passage. I was left alone with this woman. I went to her and tried to persuade her to take a little rest and not leave the cabin again, but she went out into the men's cabin where about twenty rough men were trying to make themselves comfortable. She treated them all around twice, and the whole number became very noisy, indulging in rough language and low, coarse jokes. I stood it till about three o'clock in the morning, when I began to feel that out of self-respect I must speak to them, as only a curtain separated my cabin from theirs. I drew aside the curtain and said, "If you have no respect for a drunken woman, in the name of your mothers and sisters have a little for a sober one!" They were silenced at once, and I did not hear a sound till morning. At seven o'clock we reached the southern steamer and were en route for Brisbane.

JESSIE A. ACKERMAN.

Stamthorp, Sept. 1, 1890.

THE W. C. T. U. of Lancaster, Pa., celebrated the anniversary of Crusade day, September 27, by a visit to the county almshouse, which is situated on a beautiful elevation at the eastern end of the city. During the summer this union has made visits and held services of song every few weeks, much to the gratification of the inmates. Upon this occasion a number of gentlemen who are not in any way connected with the union accompanied the ladies and aided in the singing. The meeting was conducted by Mrs. Maria Garber, superintendent of evangelistic work. This lady, one year ago, began a series of weekly cottage prayer-meetings which have been attended with encouraging success. A number of persons have professed conversion as a result of attendance upon these services. This, therefore, was a double anniversary day and fraught with precious memories. The chapel was well filled, the singing spirited, and after prayer, offered by Mrs. Garber, remarks of an interesting character were made by Rev. Mr. Shindle of M. E. church, Mrs. Garber, Mrs. Storm, Mr. Trissler and others. Allusions were made to the impetus given to the work of temperance reform by the Crusade of 1874 and to the far-reaching results as seen in the present organization of women. At the close of the service the inmates expressed their gratitude for the visits and continued interest.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let not any white-ribboner, no matter how poor she may be, feel she has done her duty by the Temple until she has sent for a mite-box and put into it some of her own pennies, and as many of other people's as she can get. Let those whose faith is weak remember what Jane Weeden has accomplished without a cent except what her own hand and brain earn; she has collected almost $2,000 for the Temple. You can secure a mite-box, Temple bulletin and descriptive card, by sending a two-cent stamp to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago.

Miss L. A. Morris, Bushnell, Ill., in sending $5 to the Temple fund writes: "I imagine after the corner-stone is laid there will be a copious and continued shower of fives, tens and larger amounts until the W. C. T. U. gains full possession of the Temple; it has seemed an undertaking too immense to materialize, but as soon as our white-ribboners find that it is an assured success, I think we will put in our very best efforts and make it our own." This is just what we want to see done; now is the crucial time; let every effort be made the coming year to raise as large a sum as possible to pay on the building; don't let any one say, who is able to give, "It will do just as well next year;" it will not, now is the important time. If we could only have the $200,000 all paid in this year, which our W. C. T. U. and Loyal Temperance Legions have pledged, it would be of far more value to us than twice that sum two or three years hence.

The Temple is an assured success; by the first of the new year three stories of the building will be up; the work upon the walls is now going on with much rapidity. There is a great demand for offices in the building; a large number are partially spoken for, on the two lower floors, without counting in Willard Hall; already banks and offices on ten year leases have been let at rentals amounting to $40,000 a year. There are still some offices besides on these two floors not rented. This will give some idea of the value of the property, and the princely revenue which may be expected from it.

Mrs. S. Moulding, of Chicago, writes in warm terms of the plan for each white-ribboner to give $6 towards the building fund; she sends $50 to set the ball rolling, and pay for herself and daughters, Miss Lizzie Moulding and Mrs. W. B. Goodsmith. To carry out the $6 plan will require generous giving from those who have means, because many of our white-ribboners have but little of this world's goods, and are in the condition of the writer of the following letter, Mrs. E. D. Barron, of Medina, Ohio; she sends for a mite-box and says: "I would like to help build the Temple; I cannot do much, for I am very poor, having no income nor allowance, only now and then getting a little work to do, but I will do what I can, for I think it is the grandest scheme ever started." Generous hearts, however, with means are coming forward and giving nobly. Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, Winthrop Center, Maine, sends a check for $100. A friend from Yama, Colorado, who does not wish her name published, sends a check for $100. Mrs. J. C. Martin, of Philadelphia, sends $100. A friend, through Mrs. Carrie B. Reynolds, Griggsville, Ill., sends $50; it is to be credited to the Minnesota W. C. T. U. Mrs. J. R. Dewey, Chicago, Ill., sends $100. Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Butler, Dallas, Oregon, send $25. Mrs. A. C. Blaisdell, Clarksville, Tenn., writes: "Your Temperance Temple column is coming to be one of the most interesting and fascinating of all in THE UNION SIGNAL. We have all been convinced that this Temple has become a necessity; I herewith inclose a check for $12 which I would gladly multiply by three ciphers."

The following communication we are sure will delight the hearts of all friends of the Temple as it has ours. God grant that His spirit may move on the hearts of other rich women of our order, so that they may be constrained to give by the thousand instead of by the hundred to the building fund. The communication is as follows: "Mansfield, Ohio. Please find enclosed New York draft for $101. The $100 credit to Miss Susan M. Sturges. It may be I shall be able to give you $1,000. If so I shall wish this $100 to apply on it. Please credit the $1 to the Mansfield W. C. T. U. We trust November 1 will be bright and fair. Would we all could be there. Truly yours, Susan M. Sturges."

How we would like to have a page instead of a single column at our command to give notes from the scores of letters we receive daily from friends of the Temple. We have had to turn over communications from the Y's to the Oak and Ivy Leaf, and from the Loyal Temperance Legion to The Young Crusader, but we will try and give a little space to the children in this number. Our little friend, Ethel Stout, editor of the Delaware, Ohio, Midget, sends another gift to the Temple of $8, to be credited to the tablet in honor of Mother Stewart. All the children should help little Edith in raising the $100 for Mother Stewart. Just think, ten cents will secure Edith's interesting little paper for a year. Mrs. L. S. Cole, Knob Noster, Mo., sends $11.50 collected November 1, by twelve boys and girls of the Loyal Temperance Legion, on the afternoon of that day by going from house to house with their mite-boxes. She says, "I have never seen our children so enthused over any work before. The idea of their being able to say they put so many bricks in the Temple delights them." Little Lucile Clinton, Polo, Ill., sends $1.50; she earned it by selling flowers. Another little girl, Mabel Roberts, Stockbridge, Mass., sends $4. The dear child evidently denied herself to fill her mite-box. She says, "I have wanted ever so many things, but I saved every penny I had for the Temple. I had some chestnuts which I had picked up, expecting to keep them to eat, but I sold them, as I did not have any other way to get money enough to fill my mite-box."

Our Children.

WHERE DO YOU LIVE?

I knew a man, and his name was Horner,
Who used to live on Grumble Corner;
Grumble Corner in Cross Patch Town,
And he never was seen without a frown.
He grumbled at this; he grumbled at that;
He growled at the dog; he growled at the cat;
He grumbled at morning; he grumbled at night,
And to grumble and growl were his chief delight.

He grumbled so much at his wife that she Began to grumble as well as he;
And all the children wherever they went,
Reflected their parents' discontent.
If the sky was dark and betokened rain,
Then Mr. Horner was sure to complain;
And if there was never a cloud about,
He grumbled because of a threatened drought.

His meals were never to suit his taste;
He grumbled at having to eat in haste;
The bread was poor, or the meat was tough,
Or else he hadn't half enough.
No matter how hard his wife might try
To please her husband, with scornful eye
He'd look around, and then, with a scowl
At something or other begin to growl.

One day, as I loitered along the street,
My old acquaintance I chanced to meet,
Whose face was without the look of care
And the ugly frown that it used to wear.
"I may be mistaken, perhaps," I said,
As, after saluting, I turned my head;
"But it is, and it isn't, the Mr. Horner
Who lived for so long on Grumble Corner!"

I met him next day, and I met him again,
In melting weather, in pouring rain,
When stocks were up and when stocks were down;
But a smile, somehow, had replaced the frown.
It puzzled me much; and so, one day,
I seized his hand in a friendly way,
And said: "Mr. Horner, I'd like to know
What could have happened to change you so?"

He laughed a laugh that was good to hear,
For it told of a conscience calm and clear,
And he said, with none of the old-time drawl:
"Why, I have changed my residence, that is all!"
"Changed your residence?" "Yes," said Horner,
"It wasn't healthy on Grumble Corner,
And so I moved; 'twas a change complete,
And you'll find me now on Thanksgiving Street!"

Now, every day, as I move along
The streets so filled with the busy throng,
I watch each face and can always tell
Where men and women and children dwell;
And many a discontented mourner
Is spending his days on Grumble Corner,
Sour and sad, I long to entreat
To take a house on Thanksgiving Street.

BENNIE'S THANKSGIVING.

BY MINDAH E. M. MERRIFIELD.

Stretched out on the floor in front of the fire was a very small boy, whose clothes were very much too large for fashion and comfort, looking at the dull, half dying embers, while he drew his old coat more closely around him. It wanted only two days till Thanksgiving, and Bennie Gray had walked home with some of the other boys from school, while they had told in joyous tones of the good times coming, of the pies, and puddings, and cakes, to say nothing of the huge turkey and chicken pies. But Bennie had kept silent amid all this, till Ralph Harlow, who was a new arrival in town, turned to him as he cried merrily:

"Your turn now, Bennie, lad, what are you going to have?" unmindful of the big eyes made him by the other boys, for Bennie was a favorite and they would not one of them hurt the little fellow, but the question was out, and Bennie's voice was very low, as he replied slowly, yet with a quiet dignity:

"I don't know, Ralph, just the same as any day; we can't afford to keep Thanksgiving your way, but mamma says she keeps it in her heart, because she has me, and when I am a man mamma and I will keep it your way." And with that he turned and went into the house.

After the door had closed behind him, the boys explained that Stephen Gray was a victim to the wine-cup, and how he had been discharged only a month ago from the great foundry where he had been employed.

"Why, my father owns that," Ralph Harlow exclaimed, but he stopped and the boys went on with their story. "But we never say anything to hurt him, Bennie is such a good little fellow," Harry Brown, who had acted as story-teller, concluded, and then the boys separated on the corner.

Bennie still lay on the floor when his mother came in with her things on and a bundle in her arms.

"Where are you going, mother? Can't I go for you?" Bennie sprang to his feet but she put him gently away.

"No, dear, I must go; I want to get the pay for this, if I can, and then I will get something for our Thanksgiving."

"Never mind, mamma, you have me, you know, and every year will make me older so I can work for you."

She kissed him; and drawing her thin shawl closer together went out, and then Bennie sat down, and picking up Tabby in his arms, smoothed her soft fur, as he talked to her as if she really could understand; and perhaps she did, for she purred softly, and rubbed her face against Bennie's.

"You know, pussy," Bennie said, "I hate awfully to have things go so, but I can't do much. I wish I was big so I could, and then we would have things like other folks. We could now if papa would only be good, as he used to be. I should think he would care for mamma, if he didn't for his little boy, but I tell you, Tabby, if I were a man, I would be ashamed to let my boy see me drink, for fear he would want to, but I shan't. Bah! the nasty stuff; and now day after to-morrow is Thanksgiving, and oh, dear, I do wish we had a turkey," and then the brave little voice ended in childish sobs. Now don't laugh or call my hero a cry-baby, for he was only nine years old, and that was a great mountain of trouble for such a little fellow, but the tears were soon dried, "for mamma will be home soon, and she must not see me cry," said the little major; "but I guess there is one thing we can do, Tab, we can pray for papa," and so the little hands were folded, and the trembling, childish voice began:

"Dear Lord, my teacher says when we want anything we must ask you, and have faith, and you know how hard mamma has to work, and how she has tried to help papa, and he won't be helped; lots of good temperance men have tried to help him; but it don't do a bit of good, and so, dear Lord, won't you try? Take hold of his hand and then he can't fall; lead him, for I don't want to be a drunkard's boy. I would rather come to Heaven, only mamma can't spare me. Please, Lord, help him for Jesus' sake, amen."

The little head sank lower and lower, and the child was fast asleep; then the bedroom door, which had stood ajar, was pushed wide open, and a man stepped softly out and looked at the sleeping child.

"Dear little Bennie, I will try once more, and I pray the Lord to take my hand in His, for he knows I need it."

He opened the door and went out into the street; and shortly after Mrs. Gray returned. There was a sorry look in her eyes when she entered. Bennie was awake and had the light lit and the table set.

"Mr. Sampson was away, dear, so he did not pay me," she said, in answer to his look of inquiry; "but never mind, dear, we will get along."

Then the door opened, and Mr. Gray entered with a few packages which he laid on the table, and then he put his arms around his wife, as he said:

"There is not much, Laura, but next year we will do better, please God. Bennie, lad, you will like this full as well as a turkey," and he laid a temperance pledge card in the boy's hand, signed in bold characters, Stephen Gray; and Bennie gave a scream of delight as he threw himself in his father's arms.

In a handsome parlor sat a grave, stately looking man, reading, and a fine looking boy of about twelve years entered and went quietly to his side, where he stood waiting permission to speak.

"Well, Ralph my son," the gentleman said, as he lay down his paper with a smile.

"Papa, I wanted to ask you if I may use the five dollars you gave me for my new game, in another way."

"Why, Ralph, I thought you would never be happy till that was in your possession. What can have happened? Let us know."

Ralph blushed, as he said in a low voice, "I don't want to tell, papa; it will seem just like showing off. Won't you trust me, and, papa, I want to ask a very great favor."

"Well, let's have it, then. Another five dollars, eh, you big tease?"

"No, papa, indeed, not that. I want you to please take Bennie Gray's father back, and try him once more," and then Ralph told all he knew of Bennie, and his answer sent him away rejoicing. "And you won't ask what I do with my money?" he asked, looking back at the door.

"No, no, my boy; do as you like, and God bless you," Mr. Harlow said huskily.

The next morning a huge basket came to the little home of Bennie Gray, and Bennie was jubilant over the contents, and the following day, as they sat down to a bountiful dinner, a boy handed Mr. Gray a note, saying his old place in the foundry was ready on Monday, and in the evening Mr. Harlow came to call on them, and told Stephen Gray he would help him all he could, and as he listened to the story of Bennie's prayer, the tears were shining in his eyes as he rose to go.

Ralph and Bennie grew to be firm friends, and Bennie told Tabby that night before they went to bed, as he hugged her up in his arms, and hid his face in her soft fur, "Just think, Tabby, we thought of it, all our own-selves, and the Lord did help papa. I knew He would when I asked Him."

OUR BOOK TABLE.

Two weeks ago I told you about The Midget, a little girl's paper, in Ohio. Now I am going to tell you about The Shield, a paper published by the Band of Hope, of Western Avenue Baptist Church, Chicago. It bears at its front a shield with "BAND OF HOPE" across it, and below, the motto, "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up." It comes once a month and is just as full of good things as it can be. The first thing I look at is the column headed OUR BAND, for there is the Roll of Honor, the names of the boys and girls who have attended the meeting of the Band every Sunday morning during the month. I do not know their faces, but I love to look over their names and picture to myself the brave men and women they will make, because they are now being trained in temperance and purity, in punctuality and regular attendance. Here is testimony that this paper is doing good work: "Since I read that short article in The Shield about the danger of cigarette smoking I have been afraid to smoke them," said a young man recently who had smoked ever since he was a boy and never knew how hurtful it was until he read that article in The Shield. If any others wish to read the good things coming in The Shield each month, send a quarter to Henry Howe, 313 S. Western avenue, Chicago.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston, who publish Wide Awake and Pansy, which you like so well, also publish capital books for boys and girls. The one which came to this table only yesterday, is FINDING BLODGETT, and it is so interesting that I read it straight through, and found it one of the best farmer boy stories I ever read. The man who wrote it, George W. Hamilton, knows all about boys and dogs or he never could have "made up" such a boy as Jim and such a dog as Prince. I hope ever so many of you boys will have this book for a Christmas present.

You are all thinking what to do Christmas, perhaps trying to find something good for the "last day" at school. Well, if you wish a Christmas cantata which has plenty of "speaking pieces" as well as songs and no end of pure, genuine fun, send to S. W. Straub & Co., Chicago, for "The Trial of Santa Claus." Just think of the dear old saint being brought before judge and jury! Of course it is stingy old Squire Hardcash that dares do this thing, and his witnesses are Dr. Dryasdust, Professor Statistics who tries to scare us by marshaling up the dolls Saint Nicholas gives away in a year—4,365,841; and the hobby horses—1,297,802—just as though that was not all in his favor; Miss Jerusha Vinegar, sour as her name, Grandmother Grievous and more of that ilk. But the case is tried before Judge Commonsense, and St. Nicholas calls up such witnesses as Dr. Sensible, Parson Greatheart, Mother Comfort and dear Susie Eyesbright, and of course he comes off victorious.

If you wish an exercise for the Sunday-school, Emma Pitt, of 631 North Carey street, Baltimore, will send you a lovely one, "Our Royal Prince," for five cents. It is a service of Scripture and song, telling the sweet old story from the Old Testament in prophecy and the New Testament in fulfilment. The music is very sweet and the words set to it are appropriate to the blessed Christmas time. CAPTAIN MARY.

The Household.

THANKSGIVING DAY.

BY JULIA MILLS DUNN.

Under the shine of the chandelier,
Bathed in the warmth of the glowing grate,
A woman sits in an easy chair,
Like a princess crowned on a throne of state.

Gleam of silver, and scent of rose,
Cushioned couches as soft as down,
Vases filled with chrysanthemums—
Disks of crimson and gold and brown.

Rugs from the Orient, rich with hues
Blent by the cunning of dusky hands,
Silken curtains, that shade the glare
From the sculptured Venus where she stands.

Jewels shine on my lady's hands,
And the rippling sheen of her silken dress
Slips along on the lustrous folds,
As she sobs and moans in her wild distress:

"And this, O God! is Thanksgiving Day!
And away in a village I know well
The church is crowded with worshipers,
I can almost hear the clanging bell.

"The cattle are loose in the stubble field,
In clustered shocks stands the ripened corn,
And I look again from the kitchen door
Of the farm-house old where I was born.

"They are gathered there, I know, to-day,
Loving and kind as they were of old;
Do they think of the outcast, far away—
The one lost sheep from the dear home fold?

"Do they take my name on their sinless lips,
Forgetting my shame as it had not been?
Do they kneel in prayer for the absent one,
Forgetting a moment, my awful sin?

"God help me! I too, have suffered for them;
God help them! they, too, have wept for me—
But the awful gulf that lies between
Can only be bridged in eternity!"

O women! who dwell in your sheltered homes,
Be tender and pitiful, we pray,
Toward the sinful and sorrowing everywhere,
Whose lost lives mock our Thanksgiving Day!

HEPSY'S PROPHECY COMES TRUE.

HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

Well—I—am—beat.

What Hepsy said that time about Jim Price's saloon windin' up its business an' shuttin' up shop has come true. "Needn't tell me there ain't no prophets in this family," Hepsy says, says she, when she come in from down town an' told me about it. "What'd I tell you, Adoniram Peabody?" says she—"what'd I tell you the night Jim Price's girl got the silver medal for speakin'?"

Hepsy looked at me triumphant and I scratched my head tryin' to think up somethin' to say. Hepsy expected me to say somethin'. So I up an' spoke right out an' says I, "If I remember correct, Hepsy, you said somethin' about Jim Price's not ruinin' many more souls with that saloon o' his'n."

"Right!" says Hepsy, jest like a school-ma'am (she did use to teach deestrict school when she was a girl an' hain't forgot some o' the ways o' school-teachin' yet). "Right," says she, "go to the head!" an' then she got up an' laid off her bunnit an' shawl, an' got out her knittin' an' proceeded to tell me all about it. "That girl o' Jim Price's is a girl to be proud of, now I tell you," says she. "Lemme tell you what she done. She's allus ben dretful opposed to her father's bein' in the saloon business, as, o' course, any decent kind o' girl would be. She wouldn't never tend bar for him one minute, an' was too proud to ever go through the bar-room—allus went around to the side door. I've heerd men say as how Maggie Price was too high strung an' stuck up to notice common folks, an' I guess she was—too much so to notice them that hung round Jim's saloon an' went reelin' an' staggerin' home. Maggie'd never 'a' staid to home a day after she was big enough to work out if it hadn't 'a' ben for her mother. She staid to home for her mother's sake an' took in sewin' enough to clothe herself an' her mother too—they was both too honest to wear clothes that ought to 'a' ben on the backs o' drunkard's wives an' children. They wouldn't never use a cent o' whisky money for a thing to wear, an' I honor 'em for it!"

Hepsy laid down her knittin' an' looked at me, emphasizin' her remarks with sundry flourishes o' her knittin'-needle. I sot rockin' in the big chair an' whittlin' away on a stick. (It's convenient to whittle at somethin' when Hepsy gets to talkin' temperance,—it kind o' relieves me o' the necessity o' lookin' at her when I don't want to.)

"It all come o' these medal contests," Hepsy went on. "It seems Jim Price got to thinkin' about that piece Maggie spoke, an' Maggie watched him till she thought the right time had come, an' then she up an' says in that pretty way o' hern, 'Pa, why don't you give up the saloon business? Now pa, do!'"

"Jim says, says he, 'Why Mag, there's money in it! I ain't a-goin' to give up a thousand a year an' run the risk o' not gettin' any work in place of it; I'd be a fool to do it,' says he. Well, Maggie let the matter drop for a spell, an' one day she went to the boss o' the tannery an' says, 'Mr. Rogers, if my father gives up the saloon business, will you give him a job?' Mr. Rogers is in for temp'rance, an' he said right off, that if Jim meant it an' would stick to tannery business, o' course he'd give him a job an' be glad to.' Maggie she thanked him an' then told him of a little plan o' her'n, to turn the saloon into a free readin' room an' library, an' Mr. Rogers was so took with the idee, an' with Maggie's spunk, that he said he'd give the first ten-dollar bill towards it.

"Maggie went home an' told her father about the two dollars a day he could earn in the tannery, an' asked him to give up the saloon at once an' forever,—an' it beats me, but Jim Price done it. He don't deserve no great credit. He owned up he'd got tired o' puttin' old Bill Hicks out when he was drunk, an' standin' costs when any o' his customers got into scrapes, an' worryin' about Chris Foley's havin' to cross the railroad track goin' home from his saloon, an' considerin' the cost o' license an' all, an' 'cause Maggie an' her mother would be so tickled, he thought mebby he wouldn't lose no great sight if he give up whisky sellin' an' went to work.

"After he'd took down his license an' went off to the tannery with his new dinner pail an' the look o' an honest laborin' man, it didn't take Maggie long to make a big change in that saloon. She scrubbed an' rubbed an' cleaned all day, an' at night the place jest shone. The red curtains to the windows was yanked down an' burnt up, an' every trace o' the old business was destroyed. Next day she calcimined the ceiling an' walls herself, an' hung up some pictures she'd had up in her own room, an' the place looks neat an' invitin'." Hepsy stopped an' took up her knittin'-work; I kep' on whittlin'.

All to once I up an' says, "Wa'n't that moral suasion, Hepsy? Wa'n't it moral suasion that made Jim Price give up the saloon business?" says I, triumphant as could be. (I'm a moral suasioner.) Hepsy looks square at me, an' says, "Good land, Adoniram! how everlastin'ly you do harp on that one string! No, 'tw'an't moral suasion that converted Jim Price! Mebby that had somethin' to do with it—I won't deny that it did—but it ain't a clear case o' moral suasion, an' can't be called so. But, jest for the sake o' argument I'll pertend that 'twas (though it wa'n't!).

"But s'posin' it was (an' it ain't), what other man in all these eleven saloons in Puddledock could be worked over like that by moral suasion? Jest think now; there ain't one! It's prohibition them men need—it's the strong arm o' the law. There's some men in this village that ain't got a grain o' decency to appeal to—you've got to scare 'em with the law; that's all they're afraid of!

"I ain't sayin' moral suasion's a useless tool in the temp'rance work; it ain't; it's a good one to use where it can be used. But prohibition's as much better as black is different from white."

After awhile Hepsy wound the clock an' locked the doors, an' we went to bed; but I laid there thinkin' how much I'd better give towards the readin'-room. Well, it w'a'nt a week before that saloon o' Jim Price's was fixed up into as neat an' cosy a readin'-room as I ever see. The people donated books an' papers an' magazines, an' the young folks paid Jim five dollars a month for rent in advance, an' used up the rest o' the medal contest money in buyin' chairs an' tables an' a stove an' lamps.

Hepsy went down one day with her arms full o' things, an' put up some neat white curtains to the windows, an' helped put down the new rag-carpet she give 'em. (Hepsy ain't never a bit backward about givin' or workin'.)

The young folks rented an organ an' gathered up all the singin' books folks would give 'em, an' every Saturday night they have a meetin' free to any one that's a mind to come, but 'specially to young folks. Some o' Jim's old customers come reg'lar (force o' habit, mebby) an' are gettin' sobered down a good deal, Jim himself comes in evenin's an' plays dominoes with the boys (for the young folks believe in havin' games, too) an' reads consid'able. He's lost the hang-dog look he's had ever sence I've knowed him, an' looks like a respectable kind o' man now. He dresses up Sunday an' goes to meetin' along with Maggie an' her mother, too. It's done wonders for Jim anyway.

Well, there ain't no place in Puddledock that's so attractive as the free readin'-room to a good many o' the young men o' the place. O' course the other saloons is doin' a big business yet an' makin' money hand over fist, but there is a change for the better an' no one can't help noticin' it.

Maggie is president o' the young folks' society an' she makes a good one. Every last one of 'em wears a white ribbin like Hepsy's, boys an' all, an' over the door they've got a big sign painted, 'White Ribbon Readin'-Room. Free to all.'

I've got a notion o' droppin' in to look over the daily papers an' I own it's a great improvement over the place Jim used to keep. I ain't so awful afraid Hepsy'll see this piece as I was that one 'bout the convention, 'cause I believe in moral suasion an' she knows it an' she can't deny that moral suasion helped in disposin' o' Jim Price's saloon, an' bringin' the free readin'-room to Puddledock. O' course 'twas Maggie Price too, but moral suasion was the tool she used an' that I'll stick to till the end o' the chapter!

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING NOVEMBER 30, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 24:1-12; Isa. 55-60.)

Sunday, 30; Luke 24:1-12. Verse 24, Women occupy a remarkable position in the Gospel history. Christ was very tender and gracious toward them, and did all He could to throw sunlight and hope into their hard and slavish lives. No woman ever appears against Him, and among them were the most faithful and brave disciples. What our Lord has done to better the lot of women, should lead them all to love Him. Verse 12, The resurrection of Christ transformed the doubting apostles into living witnesses and enthusiastic preachers. They were ready from this time on, to be martyrs for Christ.

Monday, 1; Isa. 55. Verse 1, How glorious is this universal invitation of the Gospel. What satisfaction it brings to every soul. How great is our responsibility to let all know of this salvation. Verse 2, How foolish is the course of the silly, pleasure-seeking world which keeps on spending money and labor for that which satisfieth not. Verse 3, "These blessings are as permanent as they are delightful and satisfying; for God makes with His people an everlasting covenant."

Tuesday, 2; Isa. 56. Verse 1, If we are to be God's favored people we must do His will. The nearer He comes to us in the manifestations of His gracious mercy, the louder is the call to righteousness of life. Verse 2, There is no hope of the religious improvement of a people without the observance of the Sabbath. Piety will disappear in the life of a nation or an individual, where a believing obedience to God is not expressed by honoring this holy day.

Wednesday, 3; Isa. 57. Verse 1, The wicked do not understand how great is the loss to a community by the death of a righteous man. Verse 2, There is no darkness and gloom about the death of a righteous man. He is taken away from trouble and sin, and enters into peace. Verse 12, The wicked go on in their course, always hoping for profit by their bad doings; but at last the reward of their sins shall come upon them, and they shall be given over to hopeless destruction.

Thursday, 4; Isa. 58. Verse 1, The tendency to trust in the outward forms of religion, without seeking a Christlike spirit and life, should be earnestly reproved by all religious teachers. Verse 4, One may be very zealous in the forms and ritual of religion, and self-seeking may be the only aim. Verse 13, The Sabbath is not a holiday, but a holy day.

Friday, 5; Isa. 59. Verse 2, No one is lost because God is not able to save him; but by his own course of iniquity he separates himself from God, and will not seek salvation. Verse 6, Self-deceiving human philosophy and all the other inventions of men, are only like a spider's web, which men weave about themselves; and all will avail nothing as a covering from the consequences of sin.

Saturday 6; Isa. 60. Verse 1, Many of Isaiah's prophecies we know to have been accurately fulfilled; so will this one be, and the glory of the church will surpass anything yet known, and darkness will no more cover the earth. Verse 21, external circumstances will favor the future church, but its splendor shall be a moral and spiritual splendor. Its life shall be drawn from God, as a plant draws its life from the earth.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Reasons for our Confidence in Final Victory. Luke 12:32.)

1. Because the teaching of God's Word points us to victory. The Bible is full of expressions of hope, and prophecies of future triumph for the church, like that of the text. Read Isaiah, chapter 60.

2. Infidelity has made all its arguments; they are worn out; no new one has been invented in the last 100 years. With the progress of time, the truth of the Christian religion becomes more and more evident.

3. Evil is very active, and what is evil is becoming more and more apparent. The lines are everywhere being drawn between what is good and what is bad, and the people are arraying themselves on the one side or the other. When the conflict becomes open between good and evil, the good will win the day.

4. The agencies of good never were so multiplied as now. The means for exposing the wicked and the ways of wickedness, never were so great as now. The spirit of reform is growing. Our Lord and His Gospel are better understood than formerly. Every means, and thev are so many, is now used to spread the light.

We give thanks unto Thee, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come, because Thou hast taken unto Thee thy great power, and hast reigned,—Rev. 11: 17.

O praise the Lord, all ye nations, praise Him, all ye people. For His merciful kindness is great toward us, and the truth of the Lord endureth forever.—Ps. 117.

THANKSGIVING.

The year rounds out to the completion of another circle of ingathering, and what has it brought us to thank God for? We have first to thank Him for Himself, that He is our God, whose love encircles us, whose wisdom guides and whose strength sustains us. We thank Him for all the victories of the year and for all of its defeats; for its crosses as well as for its crowns, because we know He sees a "needs be" for every one. "God takes a thousand times more pains with us than the artist with his picture, by many touches of sorrow, by many colors of circumstances, to bring us into the form which is the highest and noblest in His sight, if only we receive His gifts and myrrh in the right spirit." For this molding of individual character and for a similar work upon us as an organization we thank Him.

For harmony in our ranks such as has not been known before for years, for increased numbers in spite of secession, and for wonderfully increased efficiency in our work, we thank Him; for preserved health and life among our leaders, yea, for the heavenly coronation of some who having faithfully labored, "now rest from their labors and their works do follow them," while their crown of rejoicing sparkles with the jewels given those who lead many to righteousness, we offer a tribute of praise. This has been a year of overturnings; we are still amid the debris of shattered political forces and things seem chaotic, yet even out of this chaos may come causes for thanksgiving. Men are being set free from party domination and learning the necessity of thinking for themselves in politics as well as in business; they are learning that professional politicians are most unsafe leaders; that principles are very practical things, not easily crushed, though every day defeated. If men have not learned that sacrificing principle to expediency does not pay, they must be slow learners. The list lengthens of states where prohibition was submitted to the vote of the people by the dominant party, then defeated at the polls by the same party for the sake of expediency. New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Nebraska, Oregon,—and in every one that party is defeated. And this gives me more hope of the Republican Party than I have had for years; it is being chastened that it may repent. Texas and other Democratic states did exactly the same thing, but defeat did not follow. Why?

The Original Package decision with its complicated resultants may yield cause for thanksgiving, bitter as some of its fruits have been. It has brought the nation face to face with the question, "Have states any rights which the Federal Government is bound to respect?" for if prohibitory laws can be set aside by National enactments, any laws can be.

It and the decisions against the constitutionality of the Wilson Law have caused many long steps forward in the direction of National Prohibition. If the United States government can override prohibitory state constitutions and laws for the purpose of forcing liquor upon protesting peoples, it surely has the power to prohibit it within state limits.

A cause for thanksgiving is found in the fact that the secular press is giving more attention than ever before to questions involving moral issues: the temperance question, Sabbath observance, the Bible in schools, the responsibility of voters; these and other like topics are freely discussed, pro and con. This is a hopeful sign, for it lets in the light and stimulates thought.

What is true of the press is true of the pulpit; these themes are being discussed as never before, thus focusing the Christian conscience upon them.

A decision of great importance has just been made by the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case appealed from San Francisco. The police commissioners of that city had refused to renew the license of a saloon-keeper, Christensen, on the ground of the bad repute of his place; he went on with his business without a license, and was arrested therefor; he sued out a writ of habeas corpus, and the United States Circuit Court ordered his discharge, on the ground that the ordinance under which he was arrested made his business to depend upon the arbitrary will of others, thus denying him the equal protection of the law. The case was taken to the Supreme Court, which reversed the decision of the circuit court. Justice Fields, who delivered the opinion, says:

"It is undoubtedly true that it is the right of every citizen to pursue any lawful business, subject only to such restrictions as are imposed upon all persons of the same age, sex or condition. But the possession and enjoyment of this right, and, indeed, of all rights, are subject to such restrictions as may be deemed by the governing authority of the country essential to the safety, health, peace and good order and good morals of the community. Even liberty itself is not unrestricted license to act according to one's own will. It is the only freedom from restraint under conditions essential to the equal enjoyment of the same right by others. It is their liberty regulated by law. Regulations governing the various pursuits of life are almost infinite, varying with the nature of business; some regulations being designed to lessen noise, others to protect health, others to remove odors, etc. It would hardly be necessary to mention this, were it not for the position often taken and vehemently pressed, that there is something wrong in the principle and objectionable in similar restrictions, when applied to the business of selling, by retail, intoxicating liquors. It is urged that as liquors are used as a beverage, and the injury following them if taken in excess is voluntarily inflicted and is confined to the party offending, then the sale should be without restrictions, contention being that what man shall drink, equally with what he shall eat, is not properly a matter for legislation.

"There is in this position an assumption of fact which does not exist, that when liquors are taken in excess injuries are confined to the party offending. The injury, it is true, first falls upon him in his health, which this habit undermines; in his morals, which it weakens; and in self-abasement, which it creates. But as it leads to neglect of business and waste of property and general demoralization, it affects those who are immediately connected with and dependent upon him. By general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community, there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dram shop, where intoxicating liquors in small quantities to be drank at any time are sold indiscriminately to all parties applying. Statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime attributable to this than any other source. The sale of such liquors in this way has, therefore, been at all times considered a proper subject of legislative regulation. For that matter, their sale by the glass may be absolutely prohibited. It is a question of public expediency and public morality, and not of federal laws.

"There is no inherent right of the citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail; it is not a privilege of a citizen of the state, or of a citizen of the United States. In prohibition or regulation of traffic, discretion may be vested in officers to decide to whom to refuse liquor licenses."

A decision involving principles so broad, and bringing out such a statement of them from such an authoritative source, is certainly something to be thankful for.

CONVENTION HINTS.

As we are fast growing into a nation of convention-goers, especially the feminine part of the nation, it is well to make a business of finding out how to get and give the most good at conventions. Here are some suggestions jotted down while sitting in various assemblies:

If you are a delegate, be on time and stay till the work of the convention closes. Your constituency send you there to represent them and secure the most good possible to bring back. It is not honest to spend part of convention time sight-seeing. You are there for business; attend to it.

Do not whisper; use your pencil and tablet instead of your tongue when communication is necessary; but think twice before you decide it is necessary; half the time you will find, by stopping to think, that what you wished to say is not as important as you imagined it to be. If you receive a note or have other scraps of paper to dispose of, don't, I beg of you, for the honor of W. C. T. U. housekeeping, don't throw them on the floor. I have heard of conventions which were more provocative of "swear words" by the good janitor than a means of grace to him, because of the herculean task imposed upon him by the innumerable bits of paper strewing the church carpet. Just remember how hard you have to work sometimes to sweep up a few such off your sitting-room carpet, and calculate from that what it must be to have a whole church floor thus strewn, while hundreds of pews stand in the way of a good fair sweep of the broom. Mother Thompson has made a unique scrap bag for Ohio's convention; it hangs on a chair back in plain sight, on the platform, and tidy Mrs. Monroe reminds her women to roll up every scrap of paper tight, and during intermissions, deposit it in said receptacle. Miss Willard proposed having that scrap bag come to the National as an ensample of the thing that ought to be in all conventions.

Plan to save time by studying how to use it to best advantage. If you have a motion to make, do not pop up and make it without carefully considering what it is you wish to move. As sure as you do this, somebody will have to move to amend, and then time is wasted in putting two or three motions where one ought to have covered the ground. For example: your president has just delivered her address containing, as all good addresses of the kind do, suggestions of work; you jump up and say, "I move that this address be accepted." Some one seconds it, but before the words are well out of her mouth some other one moves to amend, by adding the words "with thanks;" and at once you think: "Of course I meant that, why didn't I say it?" Now, a clear-headed sister, who always knows where things belong, moves to further amend by adding, "and its suggestions be referred to the Plan of Work Committee." Then you feel more like a goose than before, and each one of all these busy women loses five minutes, having three votes taken instead of one. For, of course, the thing you would have said, had you stopped to think before you spoke, was, "Madam President, I move that the president's address be accepted with thanks, and its suggestions be referred to the Committee on Plan of Work."

Often time is lost through an opposite failing, motions are not made promptly enough. Avoid both these rocks of offense; for you, as for Phœbus' chariot, "in the middle path is safety." Do not waste time by debating undebatable questions; that you may be sure never to do this, learn, by heart, the list of such questions given on Mrs. Benjamin's card, and when one of them is announced, show your knowledge by keeping still. Another thing; remember that even if the question is debatable, no one has a right to speak on it more than once, so long as there is any one in the convention who has not spoken on it and wishes to do so.

Acquaint yourselves thoroughly with the duties of committees, for the main work of most deliberative assemblies is performed in committees; if they do their work wisely, there is little left for the convention to do but to ratify their action. The appointment of committees is therefore a very important thing. Put your best women upon them, and discriminate as to which committee most needs the peculiar talent of each woman. A lady who would do admirably on one committee might prove a failure on another.

If the committee is to carry out some line of action already agreed upon, it should be small and composed of those favorable to that action; if it is for deliberation, it should be large and represent different localities and different opinions. This is the reason that plan of work and resolution committees are usually formed by having each delegation in the convention elect a member. In such a committee a clear-headed chairman well versed in parliamentary practice, is a vital necessity. Every committee—unless in forming it a chairman is definitely specified—has the right to elect its own presiding officer; in important committees this is best accomplished by balloting. She is held responsible for the final shape in which the report is made to the convention, and should, therefore, have a good command of language as well as a thorough understanding of the matter in hand. She should also possess a good, clear voice, capable of making itself heard to the furthest corner of the room in which she is to report, and sufficient command of herself not to lose her head if sharply questioned or criticised.

How shall the committee report? Much confusion on this subject exists, at least in the use of terms, if not in the ideas they convey. "Receive," "accept" and "adopt" are great stumbling-blocks in many conventions. I wish for the sake of clearness there were only two words instead of three, used in this connection, as in common usage "accept" and "adopt" are interchangeable and in ordinary societies, "adopt" would cover the ground, without the ambiguity which in many minds attaches to the word "accept." Strictly speaking we "accept" a report which contains merely a statement of opinions or facts; we "adopt" it if it contains orders or resolutions which must be carried into effect.

To "receive" a report is simply to allow the committee to bring it before the convention. When the report is short or contains but one specification, it is not necessary to take a formal vote on receiving it; it can be read without such motion and a motion to adopt made immediately. When the report consists of several specifications, like that of Plan of Work Committee, the motion to receive should be duly made and carried. Then the chairman reads the report entire, making explanations if deemed necessary, though the more thoroughly the committee has done its work the less need there is of explanation; it should be in language so clear cut that there is no danger of mistaking its meaning. It is now in order to move to adopt it seriatim; this is always better than to adopt it as a whole. The president now calls for the reading of the first resolution, and when it is read asks: "Is there any amendment to be offered to this?" She pauses a moment, and if there is no response, asks the chairman to read the next, which is treated in the same way, till all are read, when the motion is put to vote on adopting the report as a whole. Never adopt each resolution separately and then adopt the report as a whole, for you are doing the work twice.

It is seldom that an entire set of resolutions will be adopted with such unanimity. The greater part of them will probably "pass muster" in this way, while a few will give rise to sharp discussion. When such an one is reached and the president puts the usual question, the thing to do is not to begin discussing the matter (for the only motion to which you can talk, as it is the only motion before the house, is the one to adopt the report seriatim) but to move to amend the resolution in such way as you desire. This brings the matter before the house for discussion, and such action as it sees fit to take. At the close of the series, when each specification has not been adopted separately, although some of them may have been, the report should be adopted as a whole. When the resolutions are all adopted separately, the preamble is the last thing acted upon. If the resolutions are defeated, of course the preamble goes down with them.

Frequently a minority report is made, though Cushing considers it not strictly parliamentary. It is received, however, by courtesy, and respectfully considered, for guarding the rights of the minority is the imperative duty of every convention, but no action can be taken on its acceptance as a minority report; the thing to do is to move that it be substituted for the report, or that the report be amended by its being added to it. The report of the committee is that made by the majority, and it should be always thus designated, never be spoken of as the "majority report."

In electing officers, conventions often get into a tangle, not because of sharp differences of opinion, but because the presiding officer does not know exactly how to proceed. The first thing to do is to ascertain how many in the house are entitled to vote. The number is usually ascertained by the chairman of enrollment committee calling roll of delegates. These should be seated compactly, each in her own delegation, as no one has a right to vote when out of her seat. A prayer for God's guidance in this important business is now in order. Tellers are then appointed, enough to distribute and collect ballots promptly. The ballots should be prepared beforehand by the secretary. A good way is to have those for all the officers to be elected, printed on one slip, with perforations between, so that the one for president, for secretary, and so on can be torn off readily. This saves time in distributing.

Our usual custom is to nominate by informal ballot; its advantage is that every delegate can then express her own choice uninfluenced by, and unknown to others. Before this informal ballot, it is well to have several names proposed in open convention; this acts to prevent scattering. The presiding officer now announces the office to be filled and asks each delegate to write her choice on the ballot; these are collected by the tellers who then stand in front of the desk facing the convention, while the president asks any one entitled to vote who has not done so, to rise. If any lady rises, a teller is sent to take her ballot; when all are in, the president announces "The polls are closed." Two tellers then come to the desk in sight of the whole convention and canvass the whole vote, one reading the name on the ballot and the other "keeping tally," that is counting, "One, two, three, four, tally," with each count making a straight mark opposite the name called, and at tally, crossing them diagonally for five. This makes adding easy. The ballot should be straightened out by other tellers and placed right side up in the hands of the one calling them off. When all are counted, the president asks the tellers if they are ready to report, and they report the number of votes cast for each candidate.

Usually the W. C. T. U. are such an harmonious set that one candidate receives nearly all the votes; when this is the case, she can be elected by voting to make the informal ballot the formal ballot. Be sure you move to do this instead of moving to make the vote unanimous. The difference is that by making the informal ballot the formal one, each candidate goes on record with the exact number of votes she actually receives; if the "vote is made unanimous" all votes are given to one, and those who cast their vote for the defeated candidate are defrauded of their proper representation. When the motion to make the informal vote the formal one carries, the president announces: "Mrs. A has received —— votes, Mrs. B —— votes, Mrs. C —— votes. The whole number of votes cast is ——, number necessary for a choice ——. As Mrs. A has received more than the requisite number, she is duly elected your president for the ensuing year."

Often it occurs that only one name is proposed for an office; in such a case it is not necessary for the convention to ballot, they can instruct the secretary to cast the vote of the convention, which, of course, is a unanimous vote; hence this method must not be employed when there is any opposition. When so instructed, the secretary writes the name of the candidate upon the appropriate ballot, drops it into the box of the teller and announces the fact that she has done so, whereupon the president declares the election. Do not elect your officers twice. I have actually heard a motion made, put and carried, "that we make the informal ballot the formal one, and instruct our secretary to cast the ballot of this convention for Mrs. A."

Do these instructions seem too elementary to put into an editorial? Nothing that hinders our highest efficiency is beneath our notice, and I have seen even a National Convention thrown into inextricable confusion and hours of valuable time wasted, because some of its members did not understand and practice some of the simple directions here given. If you take kindly to this chapter, some day I may give you a second along the same line.

Special Difficulties.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

QUERY.—A gentleman from Volga, Iowa, writes: "We find an article in THE UNION SIGNAL on the tariff which has caused considerable comment here. Please give us, for the sake of fairness and the reputation of THE SIGNAL, the correct figures of the old and new tariff laws of the items mentioned in said article."

ANS.—These items are woolen goods, tin-ware, hardware, lamp chimneys, dishes and "other necessities of life." "Woolen goods" are so varied that the list giving the old rates and the new occupy a closely printed column in the daily papers, so that we cannot give them here; we give a sample referring our friend to the published list for more particulars. "Women's and children's dress goods valued at not exceeding fifteen cents per square yard, seven cents per square yard, and in addition thereto forty per cent ad valorem." The old rates were "valued at not exceeding twenty cents per square yard, five cents per square yard, and in addition thereto thirty-five per cent ad valorem." That is, a higher rate of duty is put upon a lower grade of goods by the new tariff. The tariff on tin plate does not go into operation until next July; the new rate is "one and two-tenths cents a pound on manufactures of which tin is a part, fifty-five per cent." The old rate was one cent. "Hardware," the next item, is also a long schedule; take table knives as a fair sample, the old duty was thirty per cent, the new one is thirty-five per cent. The rates on lamp chimneys were given in the previous article; spectacles and eyeglasses were taxed forty-five per cent; the new rate is sixty per cent. Sugar of milk, mentioned as an ingredient of babies' foods not manufactured in this country, under the old tariff was free, and is now eight cents. We have not room for further quotations from the tariff schedule, but think these are sufficient for "fairness and the reputation of THE UNION SIGNAL."

Here is a query which we leave some one wiser than us to answer:

Why is there not a greater effort made through the National W. C. T. U. to secure a uniform pledge? In looking over all state minutes it would be amusing if it were not such a serious matter, to read the many different pledges given. The National pledge should be our model, should it not? and all unions urged to attain that ideal. It seems to me agitation, discussion and education of this neglected matter would not only bring us into harmony with the National, but result in larger gifts for the Temperance Hospital, as soon as unions see that it banishes alcohol from medicine, and they believe in that after reaching a point where they can intelligently and understandingly sign a pledge which excludes the use of it in every thing, not only as a beverage, but at communion table, in sickness, etc. It seems to me we need more foundation work and the top stone of Prohibition will surely follow.

Yours for the cause,

LAURA E. HOWEY.

QUERY.—Can a person, without violating his pledge, [having signed the one you publish under the heading Special Difficulties] go to a communion table and partake where fermented wine is used?

ANS.—I think he can not.

The Illinois Woman's Press Association held its November meeting on the 13th inst., at the Palmer House, Chicago. In the absence of the president, Miss West, vice-president Alice B. Stockham took the chair. A valuable and exhaustive paper on the history of "Charity Organization," was read by Miss Eliza W. Bowman. This was followed by a free discussion.

The pupils and admirers of Mrs. Emma Willard, the pioneer in higher education for women, propose to preserve her memory and that of her pupils through a literary memorial and reunion at the Columbian Exposition. Several hundred very enthusiastic letters favoring the plan have been received. Now the committee wish to secure the addresses of all her pupils; if these are sent to Florence Montgomery Taylor, 5111 Hibbard Ave., Hyde Park, Illinois, it will greatly expedite the work. Mrs. Willard was the only woman honored by having her bust or portrait placed in the government exhibit at the Centennial, and it is very fitting that at this Exposition she shall be remembered in a way to keep in memory her services to the cause of education.

Great Britain is moving in the way of industrial training for girls. A school has just been opened at Ben Rhydding to prepare girls to earn a living in departments of work not yet overcrowded, such as keeping accounts, designing, piano tuning, and cooking. The course includes intellectual, physical and industrial education, so that the girls who take it may graduate from it not only able to earn a livelihood, but educated women as well. A medical school for women has been opened in connection with Queen Margaret College, Glasgow, Scotland, and a new hospital for women in connection with the London School of Medicine for Women

A poem so striking and beautiful that the Convention UNION SIGNAL claims a large part of it, is, "The White Star," by Rev. Dwight Williams, of Cazenovia, New York; it comes to the Watch-tower in the form of a dainty booklet, in pale blue covers tied with white ribbon. It pictures the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as the Queen Esther of the New Time. Its power and sweetness are wonderful. Here is one of its beautiful similes:

"It was a child's hand touched the wire
That burst old Hell-gate with its fire;
The white-starred hands are on the key
That hides God's thunderbolts, and He Can use a woman's hand as well
To rock the sturdy citadel
That mocks her sweetest fancies,
And spoils her life's romances
With wounds no heart can tell."

Mrs. Marietta S. Case, of Highland Park, Connecticut, is fast winning her way to the position of poet laureate of the W. C. T. U. Several poems written by her, published first in THE UNION SIGNAL, and later preserved in more imperishable book form, have won popularity. The latest to be thus presented to the public is, "The White Water Lily," emblem of the World's W. C. T. U. It is prettily gotten up, with emblematic embossed cover, designed especially for it, and makes a delightful souvenir or holiday gift book. So dainty and suggestive is it, that it seemed a fitting thing to put it into the Temple corner-stone that future generations might know how much of beauty and of pathos the W. C. T. U. represented.

ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

EXPLANATORY.

The department of News from the Field is one which has grown with the growth of the W. C. T. U. It was introduced in the first issue of THE SIGNAL, January, 1880, and retained when THE SIGNAL grew into THE UNION SIGNAL, in January, 1883.

It began with one page, in coarse, leaded type, soon increased to two pages, then to three, and in March, 1883, the material had become so abundant that a smaller, solid type was employed, giving space for at least a third more matter.

It being necessary to confine this department to three pages, and the number of reports being in excess of the space, it was determined, about two years ago, to inaugurate a new feature—reports from states by some one appointed for that special work. Another imperative reason for the change was to secure more condensed and attractive reports, and provide for a more equable representation of the states. Accordingly this plan was presented to the National Executive in 1888, and unanimously indorsed by the state presidents, a majority of whom succeeded in securing the appointment of a UNION SIGNAL Reporter. It was hoped that ere this all the News from the Field matter might be arranged in state reports, thus giving the paper much more of a National character, and facilitating the work of the editor of this department. There are still eighteen states that, according to our latest information, have not selected state reporters; all such are most earnestly invited to do so, and in order that there may be no mistake, we publish below a list of those states having no regular reporter, also those having reporters. If there is an error in the list, it will be most cheerfully corrected.

Every local, county and district union in the states which have regularly appointed reporters is requested to make a note of the name and address of the reporter, and send to her instead of to THE UNION SIGNAL, brief, fresh reports of meetings, workers, and items of temperance interest in its immediate locality. The state reporter will prepare a general report each month, or as often as she may have material sufficient, and send promptly for publication. A united effort in this direction all along the line cannot but result in added force and usefulness to this department of THE UNION SIGNAL.

DELAWARE.

ELEVENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Our eleventh annual convention, held in the M. E. Church of Dover, Oct. 15 to 17, was in striking contrast (as to numbers) to the memorable one of 1882 (composed of "over forty delegates)", the hospitable people of the lovely little capital having this time entertained one hundred and forty-nine delegates, besides a number of visitors. In opening the convention, our president, Miss Margaret S. Hillis, warmly welcomed the new members in our midst, and made tender reference to the memory of Mrs. Annie H. Martindale and others of our number who have passed on to the other side; reading also a letter from the Rev. Mr. Martindale calling our cause a "sacrament," and bidding us fight on.

The devotional service of this first session was conducted by Mrs. Julia E. Tomlinson, upon whom now devolves the entire responsibility of the department of social purity, Mrs. Frances Mather, who so faithfully labored with her, having, on account of weak health, declined a reappointment. The presence of Mrs. White, the Wilmington police matron, with the reading of her report, emphasized the fact that her work is an important step toward the "Open Door" for girls, earnestly commended by Mrs. Mather, and impressed us with its helpfulness to those whose unfortunate lives have known so little of real motherliness. A box of flowers, the gift of the No. 1, Middletown Loyal Legion, added their beauty to the blooming plants kindly loaned by I. N. Mills, superintendent of the P. W. & B. R. R., our returned Paris exposition flag, and state temperance banners (one made in 1847), completed the effective chancel decoration. Mrs. M. M. Walcott, who, as she said, "took advantage of the situation,"—the welcoming of the convention, to read a bright paper upon the dangers to which boys are exposed from the tobacco habit. The response to the welcome, so cordially given by Mrs. Walcott at the close of her paper, consisted of a beautiful appeal for love and unity from the pen of Mrs. Professor Chester, of Delaware College, read by Mrs. Mary B Donnell, of Newark. The Rev. Mr. Terry, pastor of the church in which the convention was held, evinced his brotherliness, not only in an address of welcome, but by his presence and willingness to lend hand and voice to our work throughout the sessions. We had with us Thursday morning another strong advocate of our principles, the Rev. Alfred Smith, of Middletown, whom we will remember by the prophecy that the ultimatum of our hopes, "the absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic" will be reached by the year 1900.

The reports of superintendents read during the business meetings manifested much interest in the work of their respective departments. Notably encouraging as to work accomplished, was the report of our young woman's department, read by Miss Elizabeth Thomas, department secretary, the superintendent, Miss Mary Mather, of national fame, being to our great regret, absent. The report of juvenile work gave thirty-eight juvenile societies, five more than the unions of the state, with a membership of 1,856, which is five hundred and thirty-nine more than the membership of our W's and Y's. With these figures, who can estimate the power of the "little child" for winsome leadership in the temperance reform?

Speaking of membership, the Crusade upon Miss Willard's birthday gained ninety-three active and thirty-eight honorary members. To Sussex county belongs the honor of the largest increase of members during the year. Among the interesting reports from local unions, given by our accurate corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary L. Cox, was an account of a pretty boat launch, under the auspices of the Milton union, in which flowers and the white ribbon upon which the monogram, W. C. T. U., was handsomely painted, took the place of the usual bottle.

Two of our unions during the year anticipated Miss Willard's advice, by the erection of drinking fountains; the Newark W. C. T. U. having purchased a handsome fountain and placed it upon the plaza in front of the college, and the ladies of the Smyrna W. C. T. U. having secured one for their town.

At one of our sessions Mrs. George Capelle, of Wilmington, for years our efficient recording secretary, told us very pleasantly of her experience as a white ribbon woman abroad, stating that she did not once find it necessary to violate her total abstinence pledge in those wine drinking countries. With other business the financial condition of the temperance hotel at Hockessin was mentioned, Mrs. V. L. Culbertson, president of New Castle county, with the consent of her delegates, making a donation to it, which was followed by a contribution from the state union.

This year we were much gratified by the presence of two of our National workers, Miss Elizabeth Ward Greenwood, whom few of us had heard, and Mrs. J. T. Ellis, well known throughout the state. In speaking of Miss Greenwood's Bible reading, a bright little woman from my home union said: "That one talk was worth coming to hear;" the opinion being doubtless shared by all who heard Miss Greenwood. Mrs. Ellis also did us good service by practical suggestions upon department work.

By-laws were for the first time adopted by the convention, as was also the emblem for the state W. C. T. U., the magnolia, with the motto contained in Ephesians 6: 18. Important among the resolutions adopted were the following:

Resolved, That we declare our continued allegiance to the National W. C. T. U., and hereby express our loyalty and love for our National president, Miss Frances E. Willard, and reaffirm our support of that political organization, whose principle is the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and pledge ourselves to pray and work for its success, and that we thankfully acknowledge the fearless and uncompromising attitude of honorable men, who have openly advocated prohibition.

Resolved, That believing the safety and happiness of our homes and country depend on the proper observance of the Lord's Day, we plead for an awakened conscience in regard to it, and denounce everything that menaces its sanctity.

Resolved, That realizing the corrupting influence of the vice of tobacco upon the youth of our country, and especially of our own state, Delaware, it is our purpose to work in the direction of influencing the legislature toward prohibiting the sale, gift or use of tobacco in any form to minors.

Resolved, That the successful training of the children "in the way they should go," is one of the means which will bring victory to our cause in the near future; and that we will exert ourselves to greater diligence in the carrying on of the work of the Loyal Temperance Legion.

Resolved, Believing the evangelistic work to be the corner-stone of all our efforts, we heartily recommend all local unions to appoint superintendents and enter into work along this line.

Resolved, That as there exist in our midst certain prisons or jails for the incarceration of criminals and offenders of the law, and that they are improper, both in construction and management, inasmuch asprisoners of both sexes are allowed to associate, and that instead of being places of punishment for evil doers, they are mere asylums for the profligate and worthless, that some action be taken in the direction of influencing the legislature toward the reformation of this evil.

Resolved, That we heartily approve the adopting of the department of non-alcoholics in medicine, and that we desire and urge a liberal circulation of the literature of the National Temperance Hospital (such as Hospital Quarterly and other documents) believing such to practically demonstrate that alcohol is not a curative or a preventive agent for disease,

The election of officers the closing session resulted as follows: President, Miss Margaret S. Hillis; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary L. Cox; recording secretary, Mrs. Jennie C. S. Price; treasurer, Mrs. H. M. Phelps. Miss Hillis, after her election, was conducted to the chair by Mrs. Hitch, the oldest member of the convention and a young lady of the Dover Y, and in her own sweet, simple way, for the fourth time, accepted the duties of the office; kneeling, as she said, to "ask God's blessing, thus lifting up her 'eyes to the hills from whence cometh our help.'" Both our corresponding secretary and treasurer had proven their efficiency by years of faithful service; and Mrs. Price convinced us at the beginning of the convention that we were very fortunate a year ago in our choice of recording secretary. As a state we feel glad of the representation which we will this time have at the National,—our president, recording secretary, Mrs. M. M. Walcott, delegate-at-large; Mrs. Annie Maloney from New Castle county, and Mrs. Martha Miltbank from Sussex county.

The three public meetings of the convention were very successful in interest, large attendance and good music by the Band of Hope, Dover Glee Club, Mrs. M. M. Walcott, whom we hope will sing at Atlanta, Mrs. George Todd, Miss Bessie Paris, and Mr. W. T. Smithers.

Wednesday evening the president of Kent county, Mrs. Kate E. Smithers, presided, reading the thirty-second chapter of Isaiah for the Scriptural lesson, the choice of which was decided by this little incident: Going into the parsonage for a Bible of large type, she found the precious book open on the pastor's table, and at the first glance saw the chapter which had been in her thought for the evening lesson; Miss Hillis's fine address and the cordial greetings of the ministers of the town were interesting features of this meeting.

Thursday evening Father Quigley of the Roman Catholic Church, made us a little temperance speech, and Miss Greenwood gave her eloquent address, upon "The duty of the church to the temperance reform."

The meeting Friday evening was in charge of the Y's, Miss Maggie Terry, presiding, Miss Elizabeth Thomas, reading the lesson, Miss Annie Cannon gracefully welcoming the convention, and Miss Josie Fogg responding for the delegates. The presentation of bouquets and Mrs. J. T. Ellis's enthusiastic address completed the sparkling program of the evening.

As fragrant as the perfume of our beautiful magnolia is the memory of these pleasant days, and we trust that true to our motto as a state organization, we enter upon another year, in the spirit of prayer, watchfulness and perseverance.

FIRST DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The annual convention of the first district W. C. T. U. met at Evansville, October 28–30, 1890, Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, president, in the chair. The opening consecration meeting was led by Mrs. Emma M. Jordan, district evangelist.

After the reading of the minutes and appointment of committees, the convention listened to an excellent and inspiring address by Miss Margaret Gay, state superintendent of the Y. W. C. T. U. This was followed by the annual address of Mrs. Campbell, district president, which was full of practical suggestions. In closing, she presented the convention with a gavel made by a little girl in the slöyd school in Milwaukee.

There were twenty officers and delegates present, and many visitors from the contiguous third district. The first district has thirty-eight unions, with a membership of over seven hundred. It has five counties, three of which are organized, and have held conventions during the year. Five new unions have been organized during the year.

The election of officers resulted in the following women being chosen: Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, president; Mrs. K. V. Stevens, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Carrie M. Dresser, recording secretary, and Mrs. Eva Kinney Griffith, treasurer.

Superintendents were chosen for the following departments: Evangelistic, Mrs. Emma M. Jordan; Social Purity, Mrs. Eva Kinney Griffith; Flower Mission, Mrs. Alvira Soper; Lumbermen, Mrs. H. R. Osborn; Narcotics, Mrs. S. C. Kinney; Railway employés, Mrs. Miltmore; Juvenile work, Miss Mary R. Smith; Franchise, Mrs. Vie H. Campbell. Many excellent papers were read during the convention, and the spirit of prayer was not wanting.

Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, of Chicago, lectured before the convention for two evenings to appreciative audiences, and her help in the convention was timely and practical.

The children of the Loyal Temperance Legion marched in at four p. m., Wednesday afternoon, and sang a welcome song to the W. C. T. U. The sight of their bright faces and sweet voices was helpful and inspiring.

The Baptist Church in which the convention held its meetings was tastefully decorated with flowers and mottoes, and a bountiful lunch was served at noon each day.

The convention closed at noon on Thursday, Oct. 30, having had a profitable session.

EVA KINNEY GRIFFITH.

STRAY BITS FROM NEBRASKA.

According to promise made last summer, I returned to Nebraska to give a few more days of work.

The Knox county convention, held at Niobrara, was a complete success. Along with reports of superintendents, words were dropped that awakened thoughts that will continue to live as long as eternity. One business man remarked that the "chaste, earnest words of Mrs. Komanski on social purity, would go with him as long as he lived."

The appeal of Mrs. Huestin for juvenile work will not soon be forgotten. Mrs. Hinman set them to investigating the scientific temperance instruction law of Nebraska, followed by Nellie Himes, who showed the necessity of mothers understanding what kind of food makes the best blood, brain and nerves.

Earnestness and interest reached the climax when the committee on election work reported a plan of work, urging the women to make a house-to-house canvass, enlisting the women for work at the polls, with tickets in their hands, planning for children's parades, mottoes and banners, lunches, etc. The report was adopted with enthusiasm, and I imagine his Satanic majesty, the liquor element, will trail his colors in the dust in Knox county.

At the request of the young women of Niobrara I organized a Y with thirteen as sweet roses as ever blossomed in the "Queen's Garden." They immediately set about making plans for election day.

My host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, of Niobrara, and the ex-county superintendent, Claire, all three martyrs to the cause for years, accompanied me over the reservation to the Santee Agency, where I had the pleasure of taking tea with Mrs. Steers, who has spent seventeen years teaching the Indians at the mission school, and whose husband, one of nature's noblemen, has charge of the iron shops of the mission, teaching the native boys to mould and fashion everything in that line.

I spoke in the Government school-building to a large audience of natives, and teachers, and employés. The young lady who presided at the organ with grace and dignity, and led the large audience in gospel hymns, was one who had grown from a child of the forest to a noble Christian womanhood, under the careful training of the Riggs mission school. I never had a more attentive audience than among those dusky faces upturned to me for an hour and a half. When I asked a vote on organization, many hands went up, and I organized, as far as I know, the first W. C. T. U. among American Indians. I am confident that with such leaders as those young women who have come from their eastern homes as missionaries, giving their youth, talent and sweet womanly influence, supported by the matronly wisdom of Mrs. Steers and others, this union will make a good record.

I shall never forget my feelings as I laid my head on the downy pillow in a nicely furnished, airy room in the Mission Normal Training School, and tried to adjust my bewildered thoughts that would tangle up my flight from Minnesota in 1862, during the massacre of my friends by the fathers of these same students, and the quiet, polite demeanor of these dusky children of the Tepee, as they quickly and cheerfully obeyed the instructions of the Christian teachers. During that flight nothing in this world could tempt me to stop short of Illinois; to-night I rest in their own beautiful building, the same roof sheltering us in peace and security, and as I mused on the wonderful change, a thank-offering went up to our Father for the humanizing influence of Christianity. As I took the place assigned me in the large dining hall, commanding a view of the tables surrounded by nearly two hundred native students of all ages and both sexes, and bowed my head to lead in prayer, all that feeling of horror that has haunted me from the days of the massacre left me, and the song of "Peace on earth, good will to men," dropped like a benediction upon my heart. After the bountiful, wholesome breakfast, as they marched out at the tap of the bell, some of those cute little boys and girls looked back with roguish smiles and loving glances, and I was sorely tempted to give them a warm "hug."

I wish I could tell you all the wonders of that school founded by that brave missionary, Mr. Riggs, who began with a little wooden house which has grown into a number of large buildings with shops representing all the trades, even to a well equipped printing office, where I saw Indian boys at all kinds of work pertaining to such an office. One memento I carried away with me was the constitution of the United States printed in the language of the Dakotahs. The calisthenic drill by students, from the little "tots" up to young men and women, where they exercise great precision, some of the exercises being quite complicated, and into which they all entered with a vim and zeal keeping accurate time with the piano, was a decided improvement on the "war dance." My surprise and astonishment almost overcame my politeness as I gazed at the young women who were taken from the wigwams in childhood and now moving about, educated, refined, dignified women, helpers in elevating their own race.

Mrs. Steers, with her ponies, visits the homes of the Indians on the Reservation at stated times, taking in a certain number of them each day, teaching the women to cook and sew as white women, and is acknowledged as giving the most practical training of all. She is loved by them as a mother.

I visited the government schools and buildings, and must acknowledge this the real solution to the Indian problem; but the Mission School lifts them into a higher realm, giving a polishing touch, and never before did I see so strikingly the contrast between Christianity and civilization. Too much credit cannot be given that grand man, Mr. Riggs, whose son, equally as well loved, superintends the work in his father's absence.

Yours for the brotherhood of humanity,

NETTIE C. HALL.

TENNESSEE.

NINTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The ninth annual convention of this state W. C. T. U. convened at McMinnville, on October 29th. This is a beautiful little city up in the highlands near the foot of Ben Lomond mountain, and a kinder or more hospitable people it would be hard to find than its citizens. It is the county seat of Warren county, a great apple producing region, celebrated for the extensive manufacture of apple brandy.

On the evening of the 28, a general mass-meeting was held in the Southern Methodist Church, which had been generously tendered for the use of the convention. All honor to the pastor, Mr. Currey, who in the face of recent events (notably among which is the suspension from the ministry of Dr. D. C. Kelley, the Prohibition candidate for Governor, by Bishop Hargrove, at the annual conference just closed), had the courage to tender the use of his church to an assembly of women, unconditionally devoted to the principles of which Dr Kelley is the able exponent.

On entering the church we found it beautifully decorated with a profusion of chrysanthemums, gorgeous boughs of autumn leaves and handsome potted plants, while on an easel on the pulpit platform was a likeness of Miss Willard. Back of the pulpit on the wall was a photograph of the Temperance Temple, while in numerous and conspicuous places, knots of unmistakable orange were mingled with the white ribbon. At first we could scarcely believe that this was intentional, but soon found that the local union of this place, though few in number, and working under great difficulties, were fully abreast of the foremost of our state on every question of moment. Miss Prince, of Illinois, who has recently taken charge, as lady principal, of Cumberland Female College, at this place, addressed the meeting, her subject being, "The Home against the Saloon." Of this address the local paper in speaking of it says, "It was eloquent, logical, forcible. The speaker was frequently applauded, and had her address been delivered by a man with a strong voice, to the same audience, it would have been cheered to the echo."

Wednesday morning at 9:30 o'clock, the convention was formally opened by Mrs. Lide Meriwether, our honored state president. She has been quite an invalid the past year, so much so, in fact, that serious fears were entertained as to whether she would be able to attend the convention. As she read the 23d Psalm, all hearts were touched, and we thanked God for His loving care of our noble leader, and prayed earnestly for its continuance. After devotional exercises, the usual committees were formed, and reports of the several state superintendents were read. After the reading of report on prison work, Dr. Rachel Gowling, superintendent, by Mrs. Reynolds, a special vote of thanks was tendered the superintendent, for efficient work. After the report on work among colored people was read, in which Mrs. Early, of Nashville, was highly commended for her untiring efforts in behalf of her race, a motion carried to admit colored delegates to the state convention until such time as they could organize a state union of their own. At the close of report on juvenile work, a motion prevailed to extend an invitation to the Loyal Temperance Legions of the state to become auxiliaries to the state union by the payment of ten cents annual dues per capita. In view of the fact that comparatively a small portion of the state is organized for the work, an organizer's fund was pledged by the delegates present. The amount pledged was $290.

The address of welcome, by Miss Susie Hoyt, McMinnville, was appropriate and beautiful, and evinced a thorough appreciation of the most advanced thought on all questions pertaining to the work of the W. C. T. U. The response was given in an able address by Mrs. Roach, of McKenzie. Then followed an address from our president, "Stepping Stones," which won the closest attention and commendation from all who heard.

On Thursday the election of officers took place, resulting in the reëlection of all save the corresponding secretary, who resigned several months ago on account of ill health. A rising vote of thanks was tendered this estimable lady, Mrs. Nat. Baxter, Sr., of Nashville, for her past services. Mrs. East, of Nashville, was elected to this office. Mrs. French, of Knoxville, made a most interesting talk on woman's work in her city. She is president of the Woman's Industrial Union at this place, and has accomplished much in the way of reform. Through her efforts the office of police matron has been established in that city. At noon the convention adjourned to visit the grave of Mrs. L. Virginia French, the much lamented and highly gifted sister of Mrs. Meriwether. Two most excellent papers by Mrs. Holman, of Fayetteville, were read before the convention, one on "Narcotics," and the other on wines, entitled "The Lord's Supper."

On Thursday evening Mrs. Meriwether addressed the workingmen of McMinnville on "The Saloon and the Workingman." This address was a masterly effort, was listened to with profoundest attention and made an abiding impression on all who heard it. Altogether we spent a pleasant and I trust a profitable time at the convention, and departed to our homes encouraged to do more and better work than ever before. May the blessing of God our Father rest upon our efforts.

PENNSYLVANIA.

FIRST GRAND GOLD MEDAL CONTEST.

This was held at the state W. C. T. U. convention in Scranton, October 17, 1890. The Academy of Music was crowded, and an attentive audience listened to prohibition truths, expressed by ten contestants from ten counties. The selections were well chosen and admirably delivered. The judges (Prof. G. Phillips, city school superintendent, and his assistants) awarded the grand gold medal to Margaret Fitz-Gibbon Badger, a loyal little worker from Philadelphia, aged twelve years. Her recitation, "The Saloon Ever a Political Factor," was written by John B. Finch. Honorable mention was made of Master Willie Morris from Luzerne county, he being only one point behind.

All the class came from their respective counties with noble aspirations to win many to the right, and gain the medal. All helped the cause by their efforts, and although only one received the medal, each was the recipient of a handsome book entitled "Crown Jewels," from the state president, Mrs. M. H. Jones.

During the past year 359 silver and twenty-one gold medals have been distributed. This means at least 3,800 recitations on the subject of temperance, by our young people. We extract from The People: "There is no department of the W. C. T. U. work of more importance than these contests. Hundreds of public meetings are held, and thousands of temperance and prohibition speeches made to large audiences. The state contest for the grand gold medal was the finest temperance meeting ever held here. The academy was crowded from pit to dome, and for nearly two hours the contestants held the audience. Miss H. Frances Jones may justly feel proud of the contest arranged by her." All information concerning these contests will be gladly given by

H. FRANCES JONES,

EAST WASHINGTON.

ASOTIN COUNTY CONVENTION.

The earnestness and enthusiasm which prevail in our county can no longer be withheld. Up to this date no report of our W. C. T. U. county conventions has ever greeted the public through the medium of the press, hence a brief report concerning the rise and growth of temperance in Asotin county cannot be amiss.

On October 1, 1883, Mrs. Norman Buck, then of Lewiston, Idaho, traveled twenty miles and reached Asotin prairies to be present at temperance meetings which were appointed previously. She is a gifted speaker and having been working for years in the temperance cause, she kindly gave a short lecture. The writer of this had the pleasure of presiding at this meeting and circulating the pledge. On the next day, after delivering another address, Mrs. Buck organized the first W. C. T. U. in Asotin county.

Just before these meetings a saloon was started in our neighborhood. Soon afterwards it disappeared as suddenly and mysteriously as it came, to the great joy of all. But our joy was short-lived, for no sooner was this evil stopped than our attention was turned in another direction. At the extreme eastern end of the county the little town of Asotin had sprung up and its growth has been rapid. At present two saloons, whose influence is felt all over the county, stand in its midst, and any candid observer cannot but know that they tend to anything but prosperity.

Since the time of organizing a W. C. T. U. the membership has slowly but surely increased, until now the hearts of fifty noble women in the three local unions beat as one. We have two Loyal Temperance Legions, numbering sixty members. Womanhood has been translated from the passive to the active voice for temperance. We know that this cause is God's cause, and this is at once its safeguard and glory. The following are our county officers: Mrs. A. E. Welton, president; Mrs. S. Waldrip, vice-president; Mrs. Etta O'Keefe, recording secretary; Miss Cora Meader, corresponding secretary; Miss Hallie Baggan, treasurer. The organization of the county took place July 31, so that this was our first convention.

After hearing the reports of committees and those of superintendents of departments, which were very encouraging, it was unanimously carried that the city council and board of commissioners be petitioned to grant no more licenses in our county. We know that stimulants are sold under legal guarantee, which makes the city council partners in the traffic, by accepting part of the profits as revenue, and we know with shame they are forced by political party, upon a population either ignorant or unwilling. A very able paper was read by Mrs. E. Rogers setting forth the fallacy of the moral suasion argument. We adjourned to meet April 14, 1891, when we hope to chronicle some important results.

MRS. GEO. M. SMALL, Press Supt.

SIXTEENTH DISTRICT WORK.

The W. C. T. U. of Lawrenceville engaged the services of Mrs. H. J. Musselman, district superintendent of evangelistic work, for a twelve days' gospel meeting, beginning September 11. The meetings were well attended, and we believe much and lasting good was accomplished. Our union, which was well-nigh dead, was reorganized, re-officered, and many new members pledged, a Loyal Temperance Legion started, and superintendents appointed for mothers' meetings and gospel work, all of which are doing good and effective work. The night meetings were largely attended by a usually non-churchgoing people, many of whom became deeply interested for their soul's salvation; there were a number of conversions and reclamations, and the Christian people were greatly strengthened and revived. On the evening before the meeting closed, fifteen rose to ask the prayers of the Christian people. Could the meetings have continued, doubtless scores would have been saved. Mrs. Musselman is a forcible speaker and a successful revivalist; long will our people cherish her in memory.

BETHESDA DAY NURSERY.

I hardly need to say that this home for little children is supported by the Central W. C. T. U. of Chicago, and is for the benefit of the poor working people who leave their little ones to be cared for during the day, taking them home for the night. The children are not only comfortably and cleanly dressed and bountifully fed, but are given that other essential of true growth—the loving warmth of a real home. Our babies have none of the repressed, scared look of charity children, but are light-hearted and active and natural. One of the moral influences of our nursery is the bath tub (which I think ought to be spelled with a capital B) and several times lately it has happened that after little Najit or Lena or Bridget had been scrubbed, the same little soiled garments he or she had been wearing have had to be put back on the little clean bodies because there were none to replace them—a matter which has caused trouble of spirit to our neat matron and our faithful nurse. I wish I had the eloquence of a Miss Willard or a Mrs. Rounds to induce the women of the W. C. T. U. to rush to their store-rooms and garrets, examine the contents of trunks and bags for shirts, petticoats, or stockings to keep these raw fall winds from finding their way to tender baby skin. Size or shape matter little, for we have infants in long clothes, toddlers just beginning to talk, tiny men and women of the kindergarten age, and from that up to ten years old. In fact, there is hardly a garment imaginable which will not be gratefully received and put into immediate use, as we are in daily contact with some of the most destitute people to be found in this great city. Do not be deterred from sending because the donation is a small one; one little warm hood may keep some little pair of ears from aching all winter, and the flannel shirt some one may think hardly worth the trouble of sending may put an end to the sorrows of a colicky baby. All donations will be acknowledged directly by mail. Send packages to Mrs. Buckbee, Bethesda Day Nursery, 406 South Clark street, Chicago, Ill.

Chairman of Bethesda Nursery.

NORTH CAROLINA.

GENERAL STATE ITEMS.

During the month of October, our state evangelist, Mrs. P. J. Ector, "held forth the word of life" in sister towns in a very pleasant two weeks' tour, meeting with the hearty welcome and kindly sympathy which her chosen work so well deserves.

Two of our four state organizers have been at work this month. Mrs. Winston has organized a union in Henderson, a small town near Raleigh. Much interest in our cause is awakened there, and we have every reason to expect a faithful union. Mrs. Tomlinson has visited Hickory and Marion this week, but we have not yet had time to learn the results of her work.

Our superintendent of scientific temperance instruction has sent her petitions all over the state, asking the people to sign the request for compulsory scientific temperance instruction in our graded schools. Calls have also been sent to all our counties urging the necessity of county organization.

The young women of our state are growing stronger each day in the Master's service. To us, the elder daughters in this beloved cause, it is especially pleasant and cheering to note the earnestness and consecration of our younger sisters, the Y's of North Carolina. The Guilford College Y's just now particularly deserve our admiration. Their Y (the oldest in the state) is divided into different tens, each band of ten taking some special line of work. They have the "Flower Mission Ten" who raise their own flowers in the college campus, and there is no sick bed in all that neighborhood which is not brightened by their blossoms, and the gospel message they carry from "the Book of Books." There is a "Home Mission Ten," whose members meet regularly on Saturdays to sew for the poor; there is a "Devotional Ten," "A Pledge and Membership Ten," besides others quite as important and helpful. On each Sabbath afternoon all these bands meet together, making the entire Y, and engage in Bible study, using as a text-book Mr. McConaughy's little manual, "Leaves from a Worker's Note Book." Because they give equal time to conscientious study of the Word and the work, these girls are an untold power in church work and at revival seasons. And why should not our young women be, above all else, soul-winners for Jesus? This Y is the exact counterpart of the Y. M. C. A. among the young men. Boys and girls alike "studying to shew themselves approved unto God; workmen who need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Would not some other Y like a similar work?

B. D. CALDWELL, Cor. Sec.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE financial returns of the recent trip made by Miss Willard and Miss Gordon in ten towns in Nebraska were $541.78, of which they left in the local and state treasuries all but their traveling expenses.

THE Chester county, Pa., W. C. T. U., from which a portion of the membership seceded about two years ago to join the so-called non-partisans, has received from the state convention, lately held at Scranton, the prize banner for the largest increase of members during th year just closed.

THE following pathetic little postal card has been received at headquarters: "Please pardon this intrusion. The white-ribboners are falling on every side. Would it not be well to have flags, similar to those used on Decoration Day, with the addition of the cross, and our motto, 'For God and Home and Native Land,' to put upon our graves, when each shall be decorated as our other soldiers' graves are decorated each year? It would be more endearing, if not more enduring than marble. From your fellow-soldier, though a private, on the verge of three score years and ten."

MRS. R. A. EMMONS, the capable secretary of the W. C. T. U. Lecture Bureau, is the proud possessor of a handsome bicycle, presented to her by a few grateful friends on the Bureau,—lecturers who appreciate the prompt and satisfactory business methods of which Mrs. Emmons is master. Mrs. Emmons' health is already greatly improved by the exhilarating exercise which her wheel affords, and this good news will be welcomed by all who know her worth.

DR. NETTIE C. HALL prepared the following thought-provoking mottoes for banners to be used by superintendents of election work, and put up at polling precincts in the Dakota campaign:

The ballot is the citizen's right—women are citizens.
In 36 states the married mother is not the legal owner of her child.
Only the Insane, Idiots, Traitors, Paupers, Criminals and women are denied the ballot.
Taxation without representation is tyranny.
God said, "Let THEM have dominion."
"Under God the people rule."—Women ARE people.
Down with an aristocracy of sex.
Not one woman in ten is in the criminal dockets.
The mothers of the Nation must be protected.
The daughters of South Dakota plead for justice.
Our birthright claim we now.
Equal rights and protection forever.
Give woman a fair swing at life as well as on the scaffold.
Woman is the only reserve power left to the Nation.
G. A. R.—"Break the shackles of 70,000 white women."

THE union of Morrice, Mich., deeply deplores the loss of Mrs. Jennie Colby, who was for a long time its wise and efficient president. She was called away from earth October 8. The members of the union accompanied the funeral procession to the church, and sat in a body, wearing appropriate badges.

THE address of Mrs. H. A. Terwilligar, superintendent of the social purity department for Minnesota, is changed from Tracy to Fulda, Minn.

W. C. T. U. WOMEN visiting Chicago will be glad to lunch at the W. C. T. U. Restaurant at 67 E. Washington street. It is one of the successful and well-established restaurants of the city. It occupies two stories, and has a pleasant "ladies' room" on the second floor.

THE Central W. C. T. U. of San Francisco, Cal., Mrs. L. M. Carver, president, is printing monthly leaflets pertaining to local temperance matters and other work. They issued 36,000 pages in August and September. The California W. C. T. U. used them at the state fair at Sacramento, and they had a ready sale both in the city and out. Cold, hard, local facts are what tell. This union first suggested a bulletin board, giving a daily record of "drink's doings," which they hope yet to carry out. But for the present the leaflets will take its place.

THE State Reformatory for Boys was secured to Texas through the efforts of Mrs. Wm. H. Hamman, state superintendent of juvenile department, who was nobly seconded in this work by her husband, then a member of the state legislature. The W. C. T. U. of Texas feels that in the death of Gen. Hamman it has lost one of its truest, noblest and bravest defenders and helpers, and that he was, indeed, a martyr to the work of social purity. With his clear mind, broad vision and manly courage, he was ever ready to step to the front along all lines of moral advancement.

THE union and people of Miltonvale, Kan., were highly entertained and strengthened by a lecture from the W. C. T. U. state evangelist, Mrs. Emma Smith, on the evening of October 29. May the time soon come when the much-abused and long-suffering people of Kansas will be rewarded by seeing the saloon again driven from the state.

TRUMBULL COUNTY, O., held its sixteenth annual convention October 29 and 30. Five general officers, eight superintendents of departments, and thirty-four delegates were present, representing seventeen unions (an increase of five) and 130 members. Fifty-seven Demorest contests have been held during the year. The greatest harmony prevails throughout the county, and the unions are fast taking up department work. Six of the nine county papers give a column to be edited by the W. C. T. U.

THE third annual meeting of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Rensselaer county, N. Y., was held in the M. E. Church at Valley Falls, September 18, 1890, the president, Mrs. O. J. Squires, in the chair. Delegates were present to the number of thirty-six. Reports from unions showed progress in all departments of work. Reports of superintendents of departments showed much hard work done in distribution of literature, jail work, Sunday-school work and Loyal Temperance Legion work. The following county officers were elected: President, Mrs. Rev. O. J. Squires, of Lansingburgh; vice-president, Mrs. Sarah A. Kenney, Troy; corresponding secretary, Miss Hattie Robinson, North Nassau; recording secretary, Mrs. Seymour C. Hull, Hoosick Falls; treasurer, Mrs. L. Hoag, Troy. At the evening session Rev. H. O. Hiscox, of Troy, delivered a very able address.

THE annual convention of the Tioga county, New York, W. C. T. U., was held at Newark Valley, September 26. Very encouraging reports were given. Several clergymen were present, and responded, after being introduced. Mrs. Lowman's paper upon "Heredity" was excellent, as was Mrs. Weeks' upon juvenile work. The state corresponding secretary, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, greatly added to the interest of the convention by her hour's talk upon methods of work, and her wonderful evening address upon "Woman's Mission." The departments of work taken up are prison and jail, narcotics, social purity, fair work, evangelistic, Sunday-school work and unfermented wine, literature, franchise, soldiers and sailors, juvenile and parliamentary usage.

AFTER a heated debate, wine was banished from the menu of the banquet to be given December 13, at the Palmer House, Chicago, by the Northwestern Traveling Men's Association.

GALETON, Pa., union, organized October 20, under the direction of Mrs. Helen Bullock, of Elmira, with forty-seven members, has five departments of work already adopted. This is a little town of about 700 inhabitants.

THE Hoffman, St. Louis, Loyal Temperance Legion celebrated Miss Willard's birthday, September 29. They sang the battle song of Nebraska, had readings and recitations and two short addresses by eminent temperance men; took up a collection for the Nebraska fund, and closed by singing the temperance doxology. A sociable on Thursday evening was well attended.

MRS. F. M. SWIFT, of Yankton, S. D., is presenting to each of the primary schools in her city, a neatly framed copy of the picture of "The Mill and the Still." With the presentation she makes a personal request to each teacher that she will explain the picture to the children. Two other copies of this picture for the fronts of wall pockets for literature are to be placed in the railroad stations.

THE Somerset county union, of New Jersey, had a beautiful banner, painted in oil, presented at their annual convention, by Mrs. Tunis, the county president. A light-house on a rocky height throws its beams across the breakers, upon a vessel struggling in the distance, while a rescuing party are striking out vigorously to the relief of those in peril. Means for procuring this banner were obtained through the sales of the photograph of the "great-grandma," of the union, the oldest member, aged 101 years.

The result is an admirably condensed volume of recipes for every day, arranged for practical use.

None of the recipes include liquors, such as wines, brandies, etc., among the ingredients, and it is recommended as a

TEMPERANCE COOK BOOK.

Among its Points of Excellence are the Following Topics:

Practical Suggestions to Young Housekeepers, Necessary Kitchen Utensils, Suggestions and Recipes for Soups, Fish, Poultry, Game, Meats, Salads, Sauces, Catsups and Relishes, Breakfast and Tea Dishes, Vegetables, Bread, Biscuit, Pies, Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Desserts, Cookies, Fritters, etc. Also for Preserves, Beverages and Candies; Cookery for the Sick, Bills of Fare for Family Dinners, Holiday Dinners, Parties, Picnics, Teas, Luncheons, etc. A Table of Weights and Measures; chapters on Various Departments of Household Management and Work.

Liberties of our Daughters.

"There is no one thing more delicate to decide upon than that of the correspondence of a young girl. Certainly, the letters of a school girl should, in sheer justice to her, be subject to examination and revision. What can be more painful in after life to a sensitive woman, when the morning roseate tints of illusions have vanished, than the record preserved by some ill-natured person of her indiscreet letters, which, after all, were but the outcropping of meaningless exuberance, yet, alas! liable to grave misconstruction."

So writes Mrs. Admiral Dahlgren in an article under the above caption, in the November

Ladies' Home Journal

Sound sensible advice for both Mothers and Daughters is always to be found in the columns of this leading Journal for Ladies and the family.

Handsomely printed and daintily illustrated, it has won its way into nearly Half a Million of our best families.

For $1.00 We will mail the Journal from now to January 1, 1892—that is, the balance of this year FREE, and a FULL YEAR from January 1st, 1891, to January 1st, 1892. What is She Thinking of?

Why this look of contemplation? Evidently she is thinking thus: "Really, what a remarkable offer that is I saw in THE UNION SIGNAL to-day! How can it be done?—THE UNION SIGNAL a year, The Ladies' Home Companion a year and a large cook book, all for only $1.10? I certainly shall accept that offer and now—let—me—see. There's Mrs. Younghusband, she sorely needs a cook book if she wants to retain the true happiness of married life, for will not sour, sodden bread make sour lives? And there's Mrs. Highflyer—she ought to have a cook book that does away with all brandies and wines in sauces—they spoiled for me an otherwise perfect dinner at her house the other day—and she with three boys, too! And there's Mrs. Nonnie, all off by herself, like—all these need the visits of THE UNION SIGNAL and I can show them fashions—a new cook book to start them. Yes, yes, that is what I'll do—go right this moment and see them."

She Does!

She Wins!

and we get three new subscribers and one renewal. Mrs. Nonnie chirks up. Mrs. Highflyer finds two or three sauces that are "just lovely," and Mrs. Younghusband delights her worse half's heart (?) with flaky bread and digestible pie crust, and THE UNION SIGNAL is planted in three new homes. Worth trying? Well, well, well! Oh, if only 5,000 of our readers would resolve to find these three folks—add their own name and send us the needed $4.40! What would happen? That 100.000 mark would happen—that's what! We have made the figures as small as possible, you observe? They are getting sort o' worn! No need of it, however. More than ten times five thousand good and true women will read these words. If a tenth of them respond to this way of putting a gentle request you will hear further from us!

If

you remember the Atlanta convention,

If

you have a desire to know about it,

If

you send twenty cents for the same,

Then

you will get the report.

Then

you will greatly enjoy it.

Then

you will be informed and

If

the newspapers send out another flood of what-do-you-call-ems,

Then

you will be able to set wrong right.

"F——, N. J.

"DEAR FRIENDS:—I want to tell you a little incident; about two weeks ago I came to this place to learn dressmaking. There are five young men boarding here; all of them are strictly temperate except one; he is a fine young man, too. About a year ago he came from his farmer home to learn a trade, and began to drink beer; he is more fond of it than is for his good; he doesn't get real intoxicated, but gets stupid like. I had with me a temperance manual on 'The influence of cider and beer on the human system.' I mailed it to him; after two or three days he said to one of the young men: 'Some one sent me a book on beer; I hadn't any idea it affected one so, and if such is the case, I don't want anything more to do with it, and what is more, I will not touch it again,' and so far he has kept it. Please pray for him that he may not only keep the pledge but that he also may be brought into the fold of Christ at this time. Truly yours, H. J. M."

Do you see? "Instant in season and out of season!" Do great results seem very far off? Unattainable? Think over that letter and see if the work nearest by has not sometimes been neglected in the attempt to accomplish the great work afar off. Do you know the manual referred to on Beer? It is Vol. II., No. 3, and it cost five cents to make that convert! The people die through ignorance. There's nothing the working people are so sure of as that beer is a friend; that it brings relief for tired bodies, and by benumbing causes forgetfulness. Look at the tremendous buildings put up by all breweries as verification of this statement. One five cents for a manual vs. five cents for a glass of beer! This is the issue. Do you want to join the fray? Each bullet costs as much as a whole glass of beer!

SCOTT'S EMULSION

Of Pure Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites Of Lime and Soda.

There are emulsions and emulsions, and there is still much skimmed milk which masquerades as cream. Try as they will many manufacturers cannot so disguise their cod liver oil as to make it palatable to sensitive stomachs. Scott's Emulsion of PURE NORWEGIAN COD LIVER OIL, combined with Hypophosphites is almost as palatable as milk. For this reason as well as for the fact of the stimulating qualities of the Hypophosphites, Physicians frequently prescribe it in cases of

Why is it that the

can and does pay its losses promptly and in full, and furnish insurance at less than one-half the cost of a similar policy in an Old Line Company?

1. Because the Old Line Companies charge a great deal more for insurance than is necessary, as proven by their own experience.

2. Because the members of the Total Abstinence Life Association of America are persons of correct habits and clean lives, and therefore much better risks than the average.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

Signal Notes.

GEORGE EHRET, the celebrated brewer of New York City, is the owner of chattel mortgages on over 200 beer saloons, valued at $242,000.

"They say," said a reclaimed drinker, "we make teetotalism our religion; but we don't. I mix them together and they agree very well. I know if I lose my grace I shall take to drinking, and if I take to drinking I shall lose my grace, so I keep them together."

THE following are among the resolutions on temperance, passed at the late session of the Minnesota conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church:

We re-affirm and if possible would emphasize all former utterances of this conference upon the evils of intemperance as a habit, and upon the saloon as an institution. Our attitude toward both is distinctly and aggressively hostile. We will unceasingly labor for the reformation of the one and the abolition of the other. We will not temporize, and we dare not compromise in this conflict, and will fight this enemy. The ultimate and speedy overthrow of the liquor traffic must be the aim of every movement, social, political, or religious, if it would commend itself to our attention, or successfully invite our co-operation; therefore,

Resolved, That we will not cast our votes nor exert our influence for any party that by any form of license plans for the continuance, rather than the destruction, of this traffic.

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and bid them Godspeed in the various departments of work in which they are engaged.

Resolved, That we earnestly petition the managers of the World's Exposition to be held in Chicago to exclude from the grounds under their control the sale of all intoxicating beverages.

MR. WILLIAM CLARKE, of London, in a letter published recently in the New York Commercial Advertiser, gives the following graphic portraiture of Cardinal Manning, who he says has to-day a larger influence over the working classes of Great Britain than any other man in England: "I think him in many respects the most important personality, the most impressive and powerful, I ever met. His presence is striking. His tall, attenuated form, telling of midnight vigils, of severe thought, of complete self-control, of the victory of mind over the flesh, impresses men strongly. Great numbers of sensual men have a vast respect for a sincere ascetic such as Manning is. Tales, somewhat exaggerated, of his spare diet are told on all hands; and people gaze with some wonder on a man who, at splendid public banquets or at noblemen's tables, contents himself with a biscuit and water. The Cardinal's voice is weak and thin, but singularly clear, so that the largest audiences can usually hear every word he says. Every one listens eagerly for every syllable, and every syllable tells. No lawyer at the courts of justice is more severely argumentative; yet the argument is couched in such very lucid language that even the most ignorant can scarcely fail to comprehend. Many of his platform speeches have been made at great temperance meetings. He is a strong advocate of prohibitory legislation."

THE annual conference of the United Brethren in session at Des Moines, Ia., recently passed the following resolutions on suffrage and temperance:

WHEREAS, We believe that the best interests of our country would be enhanced by the enfranchisement of women, in that they are more capable of exercising the prerogative than many men who have the privilege of suffrage.

WHEREAS, Knowing that the people of Iowa have been fully satisfied by recent experience with the original package system, that the return of the saloon to Iowa would bring sorrow and ruin to many homes and endanger the future of our young men, therefore be it Resolved, 1st. That we, as ministers of the United Brethren church, will continue to do all in our power to help enforce our prohibitory law.

2d. That we extend to our national legislators, and especially to our Iowa representative, Hon. James F. Wilson, who is father of the bill, thanks for their wise legislation in abolishing the original package house from our state. And, further, be it resolved that we lend to our sister states our sympathy, aid and influence in their efforts to bring about constitutional prohibition. That we give to our sisters of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in both state and nation our hearty coöperation in their work against the rum traffic.

To the Readers of THE UNION SIGNAL:

In August, Mr. William Weilbrenner, of Mt. Vernon, Indiana, purchased a lot at Harvey for $400. Mr. Weilbrenner will not sell that lot today for $1,000, his price is $1,500. Those who buy at present prices will realize next spring what it means to own property near the great city of Chicago, as gigantic enterprises are on foot, involving millions of dollars. RESIDENCE LOTS AT HARVEY, ILLS.

THE NEW MANUFACTURING AND TEMPERANCE TOWN.

A GOOD INVESTMENT, LESS THAN 2 MILES SOUTH OF CHICAGO.

Its Origin. Some nine months ago the daily papers told of the purchase of a large tract of land two miles south of Chicago and eighteen miles south of the city hall. The land was described as lying at the junction of the Grand Trunk, Illinois Central and Big Four Railroads. It was then announced that Mr. T. W. Harvey, a gentleman well known in Chicago for his wealth and philanthropy in connection with Mr. Moody's Bible Institute and Evangelization Society, had made plans to build here a city which should be both a successful manufacturing place and a strictly temperance town. Every deed says if the purchaser puts up a building that shall be used for a saloon or immoral purpose, or permits any intoxicating drinks to be manufactured, sold, or given away on the premises, or permits any gambling house, or house of prostitution, the property is to revert to original owners, as fully and completely as if the deed had never been made, and this without any compensation or forfeiture to the offending purchaser of the lot. This agreement is made a part of each deed and must be signed by both parties.

The Plans. It was considered that the temperance people of the land would be glad to invest in an enterprise that promises so well as this one does. You may have the utmost confidence in the enterprise, in the men who are behind it, and in the opportunity that is now given you to double your money!

First, last, and always, this is to be a strictly temperance town; every deed says so, insists on it, and already a number of applications for manufacturing sites have been refused by the Land Company, because they felt that it would be difficult to maintain their high temperance ideas and admit the firms that applied.

Second. It is to be a manufacturing city. It is true that the World's Fair is coming to Chicago, and that this property lies within fifteen or twenty minutes' ride of its location, and that the Fair will undoubtedly bring thousands to Chicago who will contentedly settle down and live in this great City of Cities, the marvel of the 19th Century, and that all this will conspire to increase greatly the value of real estate in Harvey; but even without the boom that the great Exposition will bring, Harvey is

BOUND TO BE AN ASSURED SUCCESS AS A MANUFACTURING SUBURB:

Because of its unrivalled location. Because of the millions already invested.
Because of the manufactories already there. Because of many more that are coming.

There is no doubt whatever that Harvey will soon be a rival of its successful neighbor, Pullman, and the most conservative estimate is a Population of Ten Thousand in One Year, Instead of Three Years as We First Thought.

Do you want one or more lots? Make your home in Harvey if you want steady work. Invest in a lot if you want to make money.

What About the Manufactories? Harvey is already a busy place. Long train loads of brick, stone, lumber, etc., are unloaded; hundreds of men are busy on new buildings. The facilities for shipping are unexcelled. The rates of freight are guaranteed to manufacturers to be the same as at Chicago. Three roads nowthere, two more being built. The manufactories already there are the Automatic Mower and Mfg. Co., employing about 125 men, the Grinnell Wagon Works, from Grinnell, Iowa, manufacturers of steel headers, steel hay rakes, buggies, carriages, etc., with capacity for 500 men. Their buildings are of the following dimensions: One of 160x200 feet; one 200x240 feet, and one 82x200 feet. The Harvey Steel Car Company, formed under the patents of Mr. George L. Harvey, to manufacture steel passenger and sleeping coaches and freight cars. The buildings when completed will be as follows: One 80x200 feet, and two each 100x300 feet. Five tons of sheet steel will be used daily at the least by this immense company, which will probably employ a thousand men to begin with. The Car Company has a capital of $1,000,000 fully subscribed.

The Buda Mfg. Co. are about to move their plant to Harvey from Buda, Ill. They will employ at least 300 men. The Connor Core Drill Company are under contract to put up a factory. An extensive Windmill Company will also locate there. Two companies Employing 600 Women and Children are ready to come as soon as they are sure of finding that many employees to put at work. A grain elevator is already built. What else?

A BANK, CHURCH, PUBLIC SCHOOL, NUMEROUS STORES, Grocery, Hardware, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc. By referring to the reduced plat you will see that all the manufactories are to be one side of the railroads, and all the residences on the other.

Chicago has over 1,200,000 population now, and Chauncey M. Depew says it will double its population in the next two years. Chicago is the greatest railroad center in the world. Greatest lumber market in the world. Greatest grain market in the world. Chicago estimated real estate transfers for 1890, $460,000,000.

The Chicago Evening Journal, of Nov. 15, in speaking of the possible building of a railroad between Chicago and Labrador, thereby making Chicago over two days closer to London than New York is at present, says Mr. Balch, a capitalist from London, and who is engineering the American end of the corporation which has been capitalized for $20,000,000, will be in the city early next week to see to the Chicago end of the project. Very few, even of the solid men of this city, recognize the future in store for Chicago. The building of the above road will make it by two and a half days nearer to London than is New York. The vast importance of this is illimitable. It would bring to Chicago inside of a quarter of a century a population equal to that of London.

What Does it Mean to You? Here is a temperance town for temperance people; a place where Sunday will be kept and not made hideous by beer worshippers; a place owned and controlled by a company of Christian men; with numerous manufactories on the ground and more coming; with all the advantages of the big city right at hand—thirty-eight trains daily; soon will be more—and with none of its disadvantages; with pure water; pure air, and steady work for the steady home-maker; with the certainty of rapid increase of value for all who purchase now. The management want people to buy who will come and go to work in the manufactories. Does that mean anything to you? They want temperance people. They want Bankers, Merchants and skilled labor of all kinds—carpenters, machinists, foremen, and artisans. Does this mean anything to you?

Prices. The lots range in price from $245 to $575 each.
TERMS. One-fourth down; Balance in six, twelve and eighteen months. Warranty deed and abstract furnished on making first payment.

Send for Plats at Once. The Company prefers that only actual settlers should be the purchasers of lots, and if desired they will advance money for home building, but if you wish to buy on account of the profitable investment it cannot be denied you. There is good reason to believe that you can

DOUBLE YOUR MONEY IN A YEAR!

We refer by permission to Mrs. T. B. Carse, President W. T. P. A.; Miss Mary Allen West, Editor of THE UNION SIGNAL; and to Mr. Geo. C. Hall, Publisher of THE UNION SIGNAL. A warranty deed will be issued each purchaser after the first payment is made. Untold millions of money are pressing toward Chicago for investment, and it is scarcely to be wondered at when property sells as did two pieces on State Street recently for $10,000 and $11,000 per front foot respectively. Chicago is the Future Great City, and with all the advantages we have named, you cannot make a mistake if you invest your money here in real estate at a trifle over $7 a front foot. It is a place where the world must learn that

TEMPERANCE PAYS, BUT SALOONS ARE A CURSE.

We have procured situations for every one who has applied for work and has said they would buy a lot in Harvey. Come to Chicago and look the ground over; this is no wildcat speculation. We have never failed to make sales to parties who have carefully investigated the statements above made. Come to our office and we will see that you have every facility to do this. The World's Fair location is definitely settled now, and cannot help but add value to this property. Address,

THE PALESTINE MUSEUM CABINET

DIRECT FROM THE CHRIST-LAND.

Not everybody is fortunate enough to enjoy the privilege of visiting the Holy Land, particularly at Christmas time, when everything in Palestine looks pretty much as it did when the Saviour was born.

Dr. Talmage made his ever memorable tour under just such favorable circumstances, and the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD accompanied him there. It was a very instructive trip, and much light was thrown on many things frequently mentioned in the Bible, but theretofore not thoroughly understood. One of the truths most forcibly impressed on the writer's mind was that one can generally learn more by a single glance at the thing itself than by hours of patient study. The PALESTINE MUSEUM CABINET in a large measure accomplishes for you what a trip to Palestine would. It brings right home to you, to your hands and your eyes, many articles of peculiar interest.

You will be more pleased with the PALESTINE MUSEUM CABINET than with almost any other gift. As for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it is only necessary to say that Dr. Talmage is its editor to make you feel quite certain that its weekly visit will delight you.

These articles, a list of which follows below, are very compactly placed in a cabinet, each one by itself in a neat mica-covered transparent box, all properly labeled and accompanied by an illustrated pamphlet which gives the fullest information in alphabetical arrangement.

Anise.
An herb bearing small aromatic seeds, used in medicine and cookery. The tithe of this herb was scrupulously paid by the Pharisees. The Master referred to this in Matthew, 23; 23.

Boxtree or Boxwood.
Much prized by engravers. In Isaiah. 60; 13, it occurs as follows: "The glory of Lebanon shall come to thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the BOX, to beautify the place of my sanctuary."

Camphire.
Eastern women are fond of decorating themselves with the flowers of this plant. They take them in their hands and perfume their bodies with them. It is remarkable that camphire is still found only in En-gedi, as mentioned in Song of Solomon, 1; 14.

Cassia.
Of which David speaks in Psalms, 45; 8: "All thy garments smell of myrrh, aloes and CASSIA."

Cummin.
Found in Syria. In Isaiah, 28; 25, reference is made to the manner of sowing and threshing it.

Eye Powder.
Used by Oriental women to paint the eyelids, thus making the eyes look large and lustrous. Jezebel, in 2 Kings, 9; 30, is said to have prepared for meeting Jehu by painting her face, or, as it reads in the margin, "Put her eyes in paint."

Fitches.
A pungent seed sprinkled by the Syrians over their flat cakes before they bake them and mentioned in Isaiah, 28; 27.

Ground Corn.
Not like the corn of this country, but wheat boiled, dried in the open air and then crushed. In 2 Samuel, 17; 19. we find a woman making effectual use of it when hiding Zadok's sons in a well from their pursuers.

Husks.
The fruit of the Carab tree, used for the fattening of swine. Our Saviour mentions it in the parable of the Prodigal Son, Luke, 15; 16: "And he would fain have filled his belly with the HUSKS that the swine did eat."

Hyssop.
Associated with our Saviour's last hours. John, 19; 29: "And they filled a sponge with vinegar and put it upon HYSSOP, and put it to His mouth."

Incense.
Ordered to be burned in the Temple.—Exodus, 30; 7. It was at the right side of the Altar of INCENSE, where Zacharias, according to Luke, 1; 11, heard a wonderful answer to prayer.

Lentiles.
Sold even unto the present day in the markets of Palestine. They make an excellent savory pottage, just the thing to tempt a weary and hungry hunter. Genesis, 25; 34, tells us that "for bread and a pottage of LENTILES did Esau sell his birthright."

Manna.
Miraculously supplied to the children of Israel in the Wilderness. "The Ark of the Covenant contained a golden pot of MANNA." Hebrews, 9; 4.

Mustard Seed.
Largely raised on the banks of the Sea of Galilee, the ground of which is frequently gilded over with its yellow flowers. References to it by the Saviour may be found in Matthew, 13; 31, 17; 20, etc.

Myrrh.
One of the ingredients of the Oil of Holy Ointment. It was among the gifts brought to our dear Saviour by the wise men at His birth, and it was mixed with the wine that was offered, but refused by Him on the cross.

Olive Wood.
Grown everywhere in Palestine. Dear Mount Olivet, so often trod by the sacred feet of our blessed Master, supplies much of it to the small factories at Jerusalem where it is made into keepsakes for tourists and others.

Oriental Nuts.
Grown in Syria. Among the presents old Israel sent by his sons to Joseph on their second journey to Egypt were balm and honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds. Genesis 43; 11.

Pulse.
A sort of parched peas, and a favorite food in the East. 2 Samuel, 17; 28, mentions parched PULSE as among the food prepared by the people for David and his men when in pursuit of Absalom.

Reed Pen.
Still used by Turks, Persians, Arabs and other Orientals. These pens are generally carried by the scribes in a solid brass case worn in a belt around the waist.

Sackcloth.
A coarse fabric made of goat's hair and used as cloth. Ahab wore it as a mark of contrition after his interview with Elijah. The king of Israel, during the famine in Samaria, wore it next to his skin. SACKCLOTH and ashes are Scriptural emblems of mourning.

Saffron.
Mentioned in Songs of Solomon, 4; 14, is a perfume abounding in Palestine.

Tares.
A weed, so similar in appearance to wheat, that in certain stages of its growth the closest scrutiny fails to discover the difference; hence no attempt is made to weed the fields lest while men pluck up the TARES they also root up the wheat with them.

THE PALESTINE MUSEUM CABINET is a marvellously liberal premium for ONE NEW YEARLY SUBSCRIPTION TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at $1.50, with 25 cents additional for packing and postage.

THE UNION SIGNAL

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE WORLD'S AND NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

"THOU HAST GIVEN A BANNER TO THEM THAT FEAR THEE; THAT IT MAY BE DISPLAYED BECAUSE OF THE TRUTH."

Vol. XVI.—No. 48.] CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, November 27, 1890. [Price $1.50 per Year.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

August Belmont, the New York banker, died suddenly, Monday.

Henry Martyn Dexter, editor of The Congregationalist, Boston, is dead.

Frances Hodgson Burnett's son, Little Lord Fauntleroy, is dying in Paris.

The financial situation all over the country is very unsettled and stringent.

John Walrous Beckwith, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Georgia, died Sunday.

Reports of big failures in every line of trade come from various parts of the country.

D. L. Moody is holding a ten days' mission in Chicago, in connection with his Bible Institute.

Premier Griffith, of Queensland, has declared in favor of an independent government for Australia.

The Non-partisan National Convention met in Pittsburg last week and reëlected all of its old officers.

Stanley has placed at the disposal of the London Times all documents and journals relating to the Barttelot matter.

Mrs. Hoffman and Mrs. Lathrap spoke by invitation in the House of Representatives, Atlanta, Wednesday evening.

King William III, of Holland, is dead, and Queen Emma has taken the oath as Regent during the minority of her little daughter.

The financial pressure has been so stringent in London, that the Baring Brothers averted disaster only by aid of the Rothschilds.

An interesting conference is in session in this city between Jews and Christians, on the past, present and future of Israel.

The Lady Managers have indorsed Miss Sara T. Hallowell as Director of the Art Department of the Columbian Exposition.

Judge Killam, of Manitoba, has made a decision that Catholics have no right to claim a division of the school fund for the maintenance of their parochial schools.

Kittle Halvorsen, the Prohibition candidate for Congress from the fifth Minnesota District, is elected, the first straight out party Prohibitionist to receive that honor.

The Earl of Derby subscribes £1,000 for General Booth's plan for the regeneration of London slums. The Duke of Fife subscribes £500, and other donations are rapidly coming in.

The Board of Lady Managers of the Columbian Exposition elected Mrs. Potter Palmer, president, and Miss Phoebe Couzens, secretary. About one-quarter of the board are white-ribboners.

Twenty-four indictments for manslaughter have been returned against the two leading officers of the Genesee Oil Company for causing the Tioga disaster by shipping naphtha under the pretense that it was oil.

General Booth's "In Darkest England," is substantiated by terrible facts, among them that England has 750,000 homeless people; 10,000 of them in London, and that over 1,250,000 heads of families are out of employment.

General Gordon was elected Senator by the Georgia Legislature, and the jollification over this event prevented the proposed hearing of Mrs. Hunt by that body; she addressed the committee on "Education" with good effect.

The Balloon Cable Road company, to provide rapid transit between the two sites of the Columbian Exposition by means of balloons, has been chartered in Illinois. The system is the invention of Philip Horvath, a Frenchman.

The vote on the admission of women to the Methodist General Conference has been in the affirmative in the churches of Chicago; in the Evanston church, to which Miss Willard belongs, the vote stood one hundred and twenty for, to ninety-four against.

The question of jurisdiction between the Board of Directors and the Commissioners of the Columbian Exposition has been settled by appointing a Governing Board, consisting of fifteen Chiefs of Bureaus and the Director General; there is also a Board of Reference, composed of eight members from each of the two bodies, to whom all disputed points are to be referred.

WE call especial attention to the announcement of Mr. Schumacher's generous gift for the National W. C. T. U. Training School, made on page 11, and to the fact that applications for membership must be made immediately, if the plan is carried out this winter.

ON the platform of the National Convention is a pictured woman's face, sweet and strong, yet one none of us recognized. In response to eager questioning, we were told, "That is Lady Henry Somerset, president of the British Women's Temperance Association." Looking at it, we do not wonder at the enthusiasm she has aroused.

NEXT week's issue will have something of the character of an "overflow" number, as many good things concerning the convention crowded out of this will be given in it; among them is the address of Mother Wallace at the Opera House, which aroused so much enthusiasm, and Miss Guernsey's account of the excursion to Indian Spring.

FOR three years Mr. T. E. Bowman has generously given two or three hundred dollars a year to the state department of scientific temperance instruction in the W. C. T. U. of Kansas. This year the sum was used in preparing a little manual to aid the teaching of temperance in public schools. The book is admirably adapted to this purpose, and the money used in publishing it will bear a rich harvest.

MUCH thought and experimenting went into the decision of what form our Stenographic Report should take. It culminated in the adoption of the form of THE UNION SIGNAL; the main reason for this decision being the desire expressed by many to have this Report ready for binding with the regular issue of this paper. It is now in press and in connection with this convention number, which will be sent out with each copy of the Report, will, we feel sure, give the best idea of the convention and what occurred there, that has ever been given for any of our annual gatherings. Orders are coming in rapidly.

No National Convention has ever been treated with the courtesy extended to the last one by the press. The Constitution, and The Journal, of Atlanta, as well as the Southern Star, gave full reports of its proceedings each day, besides devoting much space to the organization and its leaders before the opening of the convention. Other papers all over the country have given it much more space than is usually accorded to such gatherings; this is notably the case with the Inter Ocean, for which Dr. Cushman reported. It gave from a column to a column and a half daily to her reports, often in the best location. All of which shows that "Nothing succeeds like success."

CLOSELY following the strain of his hard canvass in Tennessee, Dr. Kelley was called to bear the irreparable loss of his devoted wife; the hearts of all white-ribboners go out to him in deepest sympathy. Mrs. Mary O. Kelley was in every sense worthy to be the wife of a moral hero like her husband. She was the daughter of Governor William Campbell, a woman of rare character and culture, a most devoted wife and mother, and earnest, devout Christian. Her death was sudden, and who can know that when the books are opened her name will not be found upon the roll of martyrs? The sharp arrows hurled by hate against her husband could not pass her by unscathed.

MRS. MARY A. LIVERMORE brightened our office with her presence a few moments Monday. As usual she is full of business, full of enthusiasm and full of hope. She lectured in Englewood that night, one of six engagements she has in Chicago and its suburbs during the winter. Our readers will be glad to know that we have engaged her to give a series of chapters from her life history, for THE UNION SIGNAL. We feel most happy to have secured these articles, both because of their intrinsic value, and because her giving them to THE UNION SIGNAL, when many other journals begged for them in vain, is a renewed expression of her loyalty to woman and to the W. C. T. U., whose official organ this paper is proud to be AMONG the lady reporters who faithfully wrote up the convention was Mrs. King, mother of Mrs. Grady. She reported for the Constitution, on whose editorial staff she holds an honored position. She is a very able as well as a very affable lady, and it is pleasant to think of her as connected with the paper with which her noble son-in-law's name is indissolubly associated. Among other lady reporters were Eva C. Griffith, reporting for The Voice; Dr. Cushman, for the Inter Ocean; Clara Stephens, Mrs. Virginia D. Young, representing the Allendale Enterprise; Miss Alice Briggs of the W. C. T. U. Press Bulletin; Mrs. Helen H. Forest, of Philadelphia, who most admirably discharged the duties of superintendent of convention press reporters, as she does those of business manager of The Pennsylvania Bulletin; Mrs. Crane, superintendent of press work in New Jersey, and many others.

WE take pleasure in according more than our usual words of thanks to Mr. Geo. B. Bower, our official stenographer, for the admirable and painstaking manner in which he has reflected back to our thousands of readers the actual words of the Atlanta Convention. Mr. Bower has a school for teaching short-hand in the Globe building, Minneapolis, Minn., where he has more than one hundred pupils, but is, however, able to satisfactorily teach short-hand by mail and give a thorough course in six months' time. We advise any of our readers who have a desire to know the mysteries of the curious looking lines, loops and dots to write Mr. Bower at the above given address. The fact that we have had his services for five successive conventions should be ample warranty as to his ability not only to do, but to teach others how to do stenographic work.

ONE of our ladies writes: "As the Boston excursion, called White Ribbon Special, neared Washington, the ladies were forming into little parties preparatory to sight-seeing; imagine our surprise when we stepped from the train and several of Washington's W. C. T. U. sisters took us, like loving sisters, to see all the best things in that beautiful city—White House (including, especially, Mrs. Hayes' picture), Corcoran Art Gallery, and many other places. President and Mrs. Harrison gave us a reception. After lunch Arlington was visited, our national cemetery, and our hearts stood still when we thought what all those graves meant to the mothers of this country. Mrs. La Fetra entertained us and won all our hearts. In the evening the Wimodaghsis gave a reception to the delegation. A delightful program had been prepared, and we went from the dear sisters reluctantly, for they seemed a part of us, but when we found the grand leader was to accompany us, we came on our way feeling 'twas an occasion never to be forgotten."

A PATHETIC craze has seized the Indians of our Northwest—that their Messiah was to appear to restore their heritage, and that they must prepare for his coming by the ghost dance. Accordingly they gathered in appointed places, and kept up the weird dances till often strong men dropped down dead. Such gatherings of Indians naturally alarmed the settlers, troops were called out and for days the whole country was aroused. Those to whom an Indian outbreak and the presence of troops means money from increased trade have done all possible to magnify the danger, and designing Indians have worked the craze among their people for their own advantage. Now the wiser ones are beginning to see that they are being made dupes of, and the excitement is subsiding. A similar craze seized the South American Indians several years ago, and William Helper, the author, came near being a victim to it. He was traveling through that region, on horseback, unattended: his appearance tallied with the Indians' tradition of the Messiah, "a white man of another nation than the Spaniards, with snowy, long, flowing hair and beard." They flocked round him and "would take him by force and make him king." He was obliged to put himself under the protection of the Governor. The pseudo-Messiah among our Indians is a different sort of a man, an impostor by intention. Is it not a sad thought that through all this "century of dishonor," in which the Indians have been the wards of this Christian nation, we have not so made them to know the true Messiah that the false would have had no power over them?

So vexed! So ruffled! for they say—
"They" that's Society's sharp clatter—
The strife—the battle of a day,
What does it matter?

Delighted! Nay, elated! proud!
For honeyed tongues are soft to flatter,
And one sweet speech may sway a crowd,
What does it matter?

Cut, wounded, stung—ay, to the quick.
By what?—Mere idle, venomed chatter,
Green envy's darts—that fall so thick,
What does it matter?

Fast pelt the critic's hailstone words
Until weak skulls they bruise and batter,
For men's opinions rush in herds,
What does it matter?

Go straight and fear not! Choose your path;
On beaten tracks let soft steps patter;
And if you rouse the wise world's wrath,
It cannot matter!

For, when—Life's teacup turmoil o'er
Grim Death's rough kicks our mud pies shatter,
Once safe—upon the golden floor,
What else will matter?

"NAKED LAMPS."

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

II.

Every time the "cage" appeared, it was greeted with heart-rending cries. Nora had grown faint and hidden her face at first, but as she saw her mother crouched beside her, and the girls hastening away with hands clasped tightly over their ears, she realized that she must watch alone for her father and the boys.

At that moment she remembered what Mrs. Burt had told her about the Pilgrim Fathers, how in times of sorrow and distress they had been brave, and calm, and still. The idea had lodged in the girl's awakening mind, and now became an inspiration. "I'll be brave and still," she murmured, and then she prayed that the loved ones might be delivered, that she might have a Thanksgiving. She pressed nearer the guards, so quietly as to be unnoticed among the crowd of frantic women, and forced herself to look at the poor sufferers as they were taken from the "cage" and carried into the engine house, but every face was blackened beyond recognition. One half-crazed woman, weak from recent illness, fainted near by; a gentleman in the crowd motioned to Nora.

"You're the only one I can see that has any sense left," said he. "Take hold now, and bring this woman to, and get her to a house if you can. If they'd only stop their noise, and go home to get beds ready for some of these poor chaps, 'twould be a mercy."

"What do you do for them in the engine house?" asked Nora, turning to raise the helpless woman.

"Roll them in blankets dipped in oil," replied the gentleman as he turned away.

"Please, sir, if you find Mike and Dennis McCree with their father, will you let 'em be sent home? Not to the 'ospital," pleaded Nora.

"Yes, if it's best," he replied hurrying away.

Nora recognized in the woman she supported the wife of a Welshman who often preached in a little meeting-house on the hill. After sprinkling her face with the fast melting snow until consciousness returned, she pleaded with her to go home and get ready to care for her husband. But she only wailed:

"I'm sure he's dead, and he was so good. I'll never see him again."

"Mrs. Williams, I'm sure he's not dead at all; but what'll he do if you don't keep up to take care of him? Mother's here with her bare feet, and you two shall go home together."

Mrs. Williams caught a ray of hope from Nora's words, and rose with a determined look on her pale face.

"If he's alive I'll save him—I'll save him yet."

After exacting a promise from Nora to watch and have him sent home, she went away with Mrs. McCree, who was nearly helpless with grief and terror, and whose feet were almost frozen.

Nora's heart was ready to break, but she had found her mission; and with an energy born of necessity, she went from one group of women to another, reasoning and pleading with them until some were persuaded to go home, and others grew calmer as she said over and over:

"Hush a minute! They'd never groan like that if they was dead. Now, then, try to get ready to take care of them."

It was well that none of the praying, wailing, frenzied women could reach the engine house, or their petitions for life might have turned to equally earnest prayers for death, as the only relief for the indescribable suffering seen there.

When the "cage" came up for the last time, Nora saw her father step off with the aid of a fellow miner. She knew him in spite of blackened face and torn garments, and by great effort got within speaking distance before he was hidden from her.

"Father, find Mike and Dennis and have 'em brought home," she cried. "Don't let 'em go to the 'ospital!"

"Dinnis!" he forgot his own bruises and burns, as he checked the men at his side. "The b'y was first up. 'Take 'im up,' I says, 'an' I'll stay to th' last.' Conner, where's Dinnis, the poor b'y I sint up airly?"

"He could walk, maybe he went home," suggested one of the men.

"I'll find him, never you fret," said Nora, bravely. "Get Mike and Williams, I promised his wife"—but excited women thrust her aside, and between her and her father an ambulance slowly made its way.

Pausing here and there to soothe and encourage hearts weaker than her own, Nora gradually left the colliery and started toward home, hoping to find Dennis there. Avoiding the people still rushing toward the scene of disaster, she took a path that led past a rocky ravine, where was a spring of water. A woman paused in front of her and looked that way.

"What is't, yonder?" she asked, shielding her tear-swollen eyes, and pointing toward the spring.

Nora saw at once that some one had fallen there, and ran quickly to the place. It was Dennis. Trembling with fear she knelt and raised him, talking tenderly.

"Poor boy! was it too much for ye? Wake up, now, Nora'll help you on."

Dennis soon opened his eyes, looking at her wonderingly.

"What be I here fer? Oh!" with a shudder, "I heard such a noise, an' it made me dizzy, like. Did feyther an' Mike get up in time? Did the mine take fire? What makes my legs trimble so?"

"Don't try to walk alone, Dennis," said Nora, putting her arm around him; "lean hard now, and you'll soon be in granny's bed."

This bed, with its bit of carpet in front and its generally tidy appearance, was apt to become family property when accident or sickness invaded the family. Granny herself was none too pleasant on such occasions, yielding her rights reluctantly; but to-day in the midst of her prayers and groans she had dressed the bed anew, and prepared it for, she knew not whom, the living or the dead.

It was a great relief then to see Dennis, shaken and bruised, to be sure, but able to walk with Nora's help, coming to claim that sunny corner. Hardly was he between the sheets before poor Mike, rolled in an oil soaked blanket and groaning with pain, was brought in and laid beside him under the pictures of the Virgin Mary and thorn-crowned Christ. The old woman, with touch as tender as that of any high-born dame, hovered over them, praying and weeping softly. Mr. McCree, himself suffering, but unselfish, was obliged to take the lounge, hastily prepared by Nora; and his wife, who had been swaying back and forth before the fire with her apron over her head, aroused herself and sat down beside him.

"It's a sad marnin' fer ye, Thomas," said she, sobbing afresh. "An' it's little worruk ye'll be doin' the long, could winter."

"But, mother," exclaimed Nora, "don't you feel glad they're alive? Just alive! I said if only father and Mike and Dennis came out of the shaft with the hearts beatin' inside of 'em, I'd have a real Thanksgivin'."

Her father groaned. "Do yez forget who's lyin' dead the day? Yer Uncle Mike, fer one, an' Corny Ferris fer anither, an' the inside boss, an' Williams, the mon that preached, an' the two brothers that sung in the church; more 'an a dozen men, by me sowl! an' not a praste at all! There's twinty more that wishes they was dead an' free from their tormints. Wad yez have a merry-makin'?"

"No, no, father," cried poor Nora, losing her self-control at last. "I was but thinkin' of our own selves. I'll see it every night; I'll see the awful sights, an' I'll hear the groanin' and the prayin'; I'll never, never, never get it out of my head."

"Lord bless ye! cry away, thin, Nora; yer eyes was too dry intirely over t' the shaft," said her father.

"I'll tell Mrs. Burt to come an' hear poor Mike a-groanin', and then she may go where they wishes the men would groan, but they can't, an' she'll see we pays the big price fer coal. An' there's no dampers at all to shut," sobbed Nora, lifting her hands with pathetic earnestness. "There's no dampers to shut."

"'Twas McFadden's lamp, I tell yez," interrupted her father, hoarsely. "The ould worked-out chamber was full o' gas, an' he knows it, an' in he goes with 's naked lamp. He's dead himsel' fer 's careless doin's. A mon's got to have 's head on in th' mines, an' dampers doan do no good if ye doan use 'em. The b'ys was talkin' the mornin' about sthrikes, like they're havin' down yander; an' I says: 'Have naught to do with't; sthrikes is wors'n fire damp in th' mines.' An' McFadden, says he: 'Doan ye listen to 'im; he'll niver stan' fer 's rights;' an' next minit comes scorchin' blaze, an' we's all blowed hither an' yon."

"Feyther," said Mike, brokenly, "McFadden wasn't himsel' this mornin'. When he gets in a s'loon he niver knows when to come out, an' he was in Carrigan's all day yesterday. Corney Ferris tried to keep 'im back, but the stuff was in 's head an' he cared for naught."

"There! there!" and Nora stood still in the floor with wide-open, startled eyes; "that's just what she said. She told me the trouble was in the s'loons. That's what she meant by the furnace. And it's so! 'Twas the naked lamp, sure, but what made McFadden a fool to carry it in the ould chamber, father? 'Twas the drink in his head. Oh, I never knew it that way before! And there's Uncle Mike, and Corney Ferris, and all the rest, dead! and men in the 'ospital and in the houses, ready to die fer their pain, and all fer McFadden's spree."

"Nora, girl, doan look that way! Ye make me could inside," said her mother.

Mr. McCree's face was working convulsively, showing that he understood the full meaning of Nora's words.

"Lord!" he groaned, "there's gas an' gunpowder under ground, an' there's worse things t' explode top o' the ground; an' if a mon wears a naked lamp in 's hat right in 'mongst 'em, what's a mon t' expect? It'll burn the life out of 'im, sure."

"But, father, the comp'ny tries to keep the mine safe, and McFadden was told, and the men tried to hold him back. But these other places, father. Does any body try to shut the s'loons where the men make fools of their selves? Why don't the comp'ny see to them? Why don't the president, or some o' the big men, when they gives a holiday, think about the miners? If they'd shut the s'loons, then there'd be somethin' to make Thanksgivin' out of. Why don't they, father?"

"Be makin' less noise, Nora. Mike's settlin' down like, granny says, an' it's either worse or better he's gettin'," said Maggie.

And Nora went to the window and looked out, silently, over the bleak fields. The girl was just beginning to think for herself, and it is no wonder that her face grew pathetic in its questioning, as she caught her first glimpse of the problem which is deeper and darker than the mines themselves.

Nora's "Why?" is not answered. It has only joined itself with millions of other eager, impatient cries which ascend day after day, night after night, not lost, not unheeded, only making more sure and overwhelming the answer which God is preparing.

SCIENCE AND HUMAN LIFE.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

It was a choleric old gentleman on an elevated train, who first read to himself and then shouted for the benefit of the passengers at large his opinion of an article headed as above.

"Science!" he roared, and a timid little woman near him screamed slightly and then turned a lively red. "Science! We never heard fol-de-rol like that when I was a boy, and the world got along very well without it. Folks would live longer if they minded their own business and let science alone. That's my opinion."

The old gentleman disappeared again behind his paper, strange rumblings at intervals indicating that he was not in full harmony with other views discovered there. Nobody answered, but everybody smiled, which perhaps answered as well. But certain thoughts came to one of his hearers, and here they are.

One must be middle-aged to consider this subject with a real unction; the daughters of the mothers who come under that head, take things for granted. As yet they have no background and therefore no standard of comparison, and they settle the question as to whether we live longer by a run over some vital statistics, or it may be, an appeal to the family physician as to what he thinks about it. But we, who are a quarter of a century in advance of them on the happy way leading into all wonderful, unexplored spaces, turn for a moment to our youth and remember. Let us see what was the general aspect of affairs in that day of our youth.

First, then, every well-regulated family had one, and it might be, more than one, invalid. It was regarded as hardly reputable to be out of bed after sixty years of age, and a truly sensitive woman who wished to live up to the largest expectation of what she owed the community, has even taken to it at fifty. The severest cases were the pride of the village. Other invalids listened anxiously to the record of symptoms, the number of bottles of medicine consumed, and any little details calculated to inspire emulation in themselves. The family counted the pill-boxes, and checked off the bottles of bitters and lotions and mixtures, with the same pride that filled the breast of Mr. Poyser, like Sam Weller, "swellin' wisibly" as he announced in the parish that no man had had a bigger apothecary's bill than he.

These were the invalids who nurtured patience in long-suffering daughters and meek husbands; who ate of the choicest the house afforded, and demanded a care as disproportionate to their need as was the selfishness that blighted all about them. But there was another order, also; the overworked drudges, farmers' wives most often, who fell on the highway with no ounce of force for further struggle, and as paralytics or given over to the train of evils summed up under the head of "bed-ridden," dragged out such years as remained, waiting with patience for release, and sparing those who cared for them any added burden of murmurings and complainings.

Add to this another class, the invalids by right; those whom accident or inheritance had fated to fill this role, and we have the story of most of the houses on the long street of many a New England town or village. Often from darkened room and shut-in life came a radiance that made itself felt in always widening circles. Often such rooms were sanctuaries, and the whole village mourned when the patient life went out. But nobody asked: "Is all this necessary? Why is this woman or this man prisoner here? Who hath sinned, this man or his fathers?"

There was reason. Nobody knew enough to ask. For the most part life was a monotonous routine of inevitable work, in itself always an open door to many a physical ill. So long as the great Colonial chimneys existed, ventilation was certain, and fresh air undid many effects of dietary and other transgressions. But when the stove came in, and the careful housekeeper sealed up every window and door, and breathed over and over through the winter months, not only this devitalized product, but added to it the noxiousness of mouldy vegetables and the general contribution of miasma and fever sent out by the cellar banked up in November and packed with the winter's supplies, each barrel and bin a little germ factory on its own account, why should we wonder that consumption was in every house, and invalidism the necessity sooner or later? The miracle is always, that the entire village did not go to bed permanently.

Looking at it in the light of all that modern discovery has brought about, we know what count to bring against the generation that is responsible for much of the weakness and ill-health that has been said to be characteristic of American women. There was a time when such charge had truth in it, and wherever ignorance or indifference still rule, it remains true. But in every school, in every family where the mother has used the opportunities open now to all and comprehensible to the simplest intellect, of teaching the laws of life, our eyes can see the result growing before them. Ventilation, drainage, sunshine, location, are studied as never before. Food has taken its rightful place as the first factor in building up sound bodies. Sleeping arrangements have all altered, the feather bed has gone into the limbo it deserved in the beginning. The cultivation of fruits, the enlargement of the dietary at every point, bathing, gymnastics, a hundred helps where once were chiefly hindrances, this is the work of modern science, and the common-sense that is its first-born child.

Wherever knowledge has been brought to bear, wherever cleanliness and decently ordered homes are made compulsory, for even the poorest, added length of life is the immediate result. If we return to the conditions of the past; if unheeded evils allow the birth and growth of the tenement house system, our epidemic follows, and we have learned that we owe to our own folly the condition once pronounced a judgment of the Almighty. We know at last that the "dispensations of Providence" of this order have been arranged for by our own act, and that simple obedience to natural law ends much of the tragedy of human existence.

As to the phase involved in preserving what one may perhaps count useless lives, the crippled and incurable from hopeless disease, I shall say but little. That they also exist needlessly, and that when pauperism, drunkenness and crime are dealt with scientifically, there will be less of this form of life to protect and aid, is as certain as that we are responsible for much of it to-day. But as a whole, years are bringing better and better methods, and one result is plain. In cities, where in spite of popular opinion, the average of life lengthens yearly, there are few old people to be seen. There are white heads, it is true, but they are a mere accident, and their owners walk erect, and look out on life with bright, cheery eyes. If one may read in them tokens of deeper experience, of knowledge of human pain and struggle, and sometimes the wistfulness that comes from such outlook, that is the only token of age. Science has taught the necessities involved in the physical side of life. Life has taught what healing and quickening power lies in work for self as well as others, and has brought so many alleviations of pain and the lessening strength of years, that growing old, if conditions are in faintest degree favorable, may be a process no more to be dreaded than the passage from one's teens into the twenties.

There comes to my mind one woman, long a leader in many movements for women, and now at eighty-seven, suffering from incurable disease which has already necessitated two or three operations.

"If I had known at forty what I know now at eighty, I needn't have had it," is her sole comment, and in the intervals she pursues her indomitable way.

Old age must come, but never need it, save when accident has destroyed possibilities, come as enemy or destroyer of force. At eighty-four Bryant ran up and down stairs like a boy. And I have previously referred to the old lady of eighty-two who headed the class of 1890 at Chautauqua. The passage must be made at last, but it need be simply the dropping of the ripe fruit. Age may be extended indefinitely, and science is working busily at many a problem, and offers us to-day the formula by the observing of which a painless, busy, happy old age may be the portion of all, always taking for granted that the foundations for such life have been well laid, though one need not even to have begun in youth.

Doctors and wise men will tell the detail; what manuals we should study, what methods follow. It is all quite possible for every one, and once learned one has only to go on and on, till at last, silently, peacefully, what we call natural force is transmuted into the spiritual, and the casket that held the jewel transfers its uses to the elements, to reappear in other, and it may be, more enduring forms. That is the end of one phase, and a woman who came to old age and lived each year larger and fuller life, wrote long ago for all uncertain souls, words that are ours no less than hers:

"Life! we have been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time,
Say not good-night—but in some brighter clime
Bid me good-morning."

IX.—ARABIA.

The ancients had a proverb to the effect that "Milk is the wine of youth, and wine the milk of old age." That absurd adage has been made the test of numerous dissertations in defense of the Old World drink habits. "America," said those apologists, "is a young country, offering its inhabitants sufficient excitement in the form of adventures in the struggle with the perils of the wilderness, and of manifold inducements to activity and enterprise. The older civilized nations, on the other hand, need an artificial stimulus to prevent the stagnation of their vital spirits."

Such sophists ought to visit Arabia, the ancient home of total abstinence. The Mohammedans date the triumph of their religion from the year 622, though the complete conversion of the Arabian peninsula was not accomplished before the end of the seventh century. But under the Califate of Omar, prohibition of intoxicating beverages was enforced throughout the Moslem dominions, and since that time the followers of Islam, with the rarest exceptions, have remained total abstainers in all continents and all climes. It would be a mistake to suppose that the Mohammedan Scriptures interdict wine alone and permit other noxious stimulants. Wine-drinking, indeed, had become a synonym of the poison-habit, but the precepts of the Koran are comprehensive enough to answer all the practical purposes of temperance: "Avoid Drunkenness;" "Renounce the Vice of Intoxication." The Wahabites, or Mohammedan protestants, as they have been called, on account of their reform doctrines, make, indeed, the Koran their warrant for prohibiting coffee and tobacco, as well as wine and brandy, and the opium excesses of the modern Turks have never been sanctioned by the strict expounders of their faith. In that part of Araby known as Arabia Felix (the hill country in the south of the peninsula) grapes flourish in hundreds of gardens, but the crop is gathered exclusively for the sake of the raisins, and the natives actually dispense with all fluid stimulants except coffee; yet the effects of that abstemiousness can by no means be traced in their lack of mental energy. "What struck me most in the character of the nation," says the traveler, Burkhardt, who visited every part of the peninsula, "is the dignified bearing of their poor and the vivacity (lebhaftigkeit) of their old men. Patriarchs of sixty or seventy years will enter with unaffected pleasure into the spirit of the liveliest conversation; will bandy repartees with a precocious youngster, or shake with laughter at the recital of a practical joke. So universal is that disposition among the graybeards both of the well-to-do classes and of the poorest, that I cannot help thinking the lack of mental buoyance among the aged persons of our own nation must be due to some cause besides the depressing influence of long-continued drudgery."

Can there be much doubt that that "other cause" is the lethargizing after-effect of habitual intoxication? Wine and brandy stimulate or rather irritate, but eventually blunt the mental energies, and the Arabs escape that cause of vital exhaustion in spite of their torrid climate, and in spite of their rather far-going habit of early marriage. In the nomad camps of Yemen, boys of twelve years are frequently married to girls of ten, and young fellows of twenty may thus be burdened with all the cares of responsibility for the support of a numerous family, for polygamy, too, is practiced now and then. War, fearful droughts and famine add their share to the sorrows of existence, but temperance-steeled health bears up against all that, and an Arab sheik of eighty years is, to all purposes, younger than a French marquis of fifty. Wrestling-matches and horse-races are amusements shared by all the adult males of an Arab tribe, with the exception of cripples, sickness being so rare that it is almost limited to indigestions contracted by the eating of unwholesome substances in time of famine. On the flight before a pursuing enemy the Arabs of the desert brave with impunity almost incredible fatigues, thinking nothing of bestriding a trotting dromedary for twenty consecutive hours, or of traveling for days in the teeth of a blinding sandstorm.

Nor does poverty daunt the spirit of that plucky race. "The natives of Araby have no proletariate," says Baron von Wrede; "no lower classes in our mob-and-rabble sense of the word. The poorest tiller of the soil maintains his dignity as a man, declines to cringe before superior wealth or power, and never loses sight of the rules of decorum in the presence of a guest. The wealthy sheiks of Hadramant, with all their overbearing treatment of menial foreigners, at once drop their hectoring manner on approaching a fellow-countryman. They know that a negro will put up with kicks for the sake of bread, and a Frankish peddler with taunts for the sake of profit; but they also know that the self-respect of an Arab is poverty-proof."

In the pursuit of science Arabia has remained behind the countries of the civilized North, but in a land of deserts the development of educational institutions is hardly a fair test of mental energy. Science, like art, is more or less a product of leisure which again presupposes a surplus of wealth. In their prosperous colonies, in Syria, Northern Hindostan and Egypt, the Arabs cultivated science with a zeal not surpassed by any nation of classic antiquity, or by the Greeks alone, and during the long night of the Middle Ages the Arab portion of Spain was an intellectual Goshen, strangely contrasting with the barbarism and the gross ignorance of the surrounding countries. During the long period from the end of the eighth to the middle of the thirteenth century, when every sovereign of Christian Spain was at daggers drawn with his Moorish neighbors, the fame of the Moslem high-schools frequently induced Christian noblemen to send their sons to Cordova and Toledo, and history records the name of more than one North Spanish monarch who obtained a safe conduct for his own person or a near relative in order to consult a Moorish physician of international fame. If it were not for the culture of Arab Spain, one might, indeed, often be tempted to doubt the progress of mankind during the thousand years' interval from the downfall of Rome to the discovery of America, but even the chronicles of hostile historians make it probable that the kingdom of the Cordova Califs was in several essential respects a more civilized country than the empire of the Roman Cæsars. Industry and agriculture flourished in the valley of the Guadalquivir as they never flourished anywhere in Italy or Greece; medicine, astronomy, geography and mathematics reached a summit then attained for the first time in the history of science, and the culture of the magnificent Moorish cities was not defiled by orgies of vice and intemperance. Their kingdom perished, but they can boast that under their rule the Spanish peninsula enjoyed a degree of prosperity not equalled before or after; and the same claim might be justly advanced by the Arabian colonists of large portions of Eastern Africa and Central Asia. Eight hundred years ago a Chinese emperor imported an army of Arab auxiliaries who, in compensation for their services, were permitted to colonize the Province of Yunan, and that colony, in the extreme west of the Chinese empire, has ever since remained exempt to a remarkable degree from the famines, insurrections and other calamities of its eastern neighbors. Islamized Turkestan is an oasis in the midst of dreary deserts, and in all the vast dominions of the Czar the finest specimens of physical manhood are found in the Mohammedan settlements of the upper Caucasus.

THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION OF 1890.

ATLANTA, GA., NOVEMBER 14–18.

Sixty years ago an old log house marked the site of Atlanta. Years rolled on, bringing the Georgia railway, which stuck its stake where the Union depot now stands, and named the place Terminus. Later it bore the name of Marthasville, in honor of Governor Lumpkin's daughter. In 1847 it was christened Atlanta, and has now won for itself the cognomen, "Gate City of the South." It is a little east of an air-line from New Orleans to New York, and exactly on one from Richmond to New Orleans, two hundred and seventy miles from the Atlantic, two hundred and sixty from the Gulf ports, and three hundred and forty from the Mississippi.

It is beautiful for situation, and the road leading to it from the North runs through some of the grandest scenery on this side the continent. The route culminates in grandeur as well as in altitude in the approach to Chattanooga. There the road climbs the Cumberland mountains, with a grade of one hundred and twenty-five feet to the mile, till near the crest, which it pierces with a tunnel half a mile long, then descends the other side by an incline almost as steep as the ascent, till it again reaches the bed of the Tennessee river. This beautiful stream kept us company for hours, its banks brilliant with autumn foliage, showing gorgeously against the deeper-hued mountain sides.

Atlanta sits on the dividing ridge between the Atlantic ocean and the Gulf of Mexico, 1,050 feet above the level of the sea, its drainage being through tributaries of the Ocmulgee and Chattahoochee rivers.

The church in which the convention was held is one of the largest in Atlanta, seating (including platform and gallery) twelve hundred. It has an unusual number of rooms which were utilized by the committees; we have seldom been so well provided for in that line. The platform built around the pulpit was also very commodious. Elegant decorations of the palmetto, cut flowers, blossoming plants and heaped-up fruits adorned the platform without obstructing it, making a beautiful setting for the grand faces seen there. Here and there on the platform and pendent from the walls were the banners which have come to be a part of every convention.

Promptly at nine o'clock Miss Willard called the convention to order, and "Rock of Ages" was sung. Mrs. Monroe, president of the Crusade state, Ohio, and Miss Willard, led the convention in a responsive reading of the Crusade Psalm, the 146th. Mother Wallace followed in a fervent prayer.

Mother Stewart appeared on the platform, and Miss Willard said, "I hoped she would speak, but she says her voice is too full of tears. Mother Stewart was the first Crusader ever seen in Atlanta, and remembers being here when we had no white-ribboners here—or anywhere. She sees this great convention and her heart is touched. 'What hath God wrought?' Let us sing the doxology." This was done.

Roll-call was the next thing in order. The roll of state presidents was called in Mrs. Woodbridge's clear voice, and as "Iowa, Mrs. M. H. Dunham," was called, and this quiet, dignified lady responded without being challenged, a sigh of relief escaped from many breasts, for all knew that it meant peace. The result of this roll-call showed the presence of the presidents of thirty-nine states and two territories—the largest representation on record.

Appointments of committees on finance, publications, business, courtesies and credentials followed.

Mrs. Woodbridge read the reports of the various meetings of the Executive and the Plan of Work committees, and meetings of the general officers. These were accepted.

Just now came one of those bright breaks that distinguish W. C. T. U. meetings from all others.

Miss Willard held up a great bag, bigger than herself, saying that it was a grab bag, not of the naughty kind which sometimes appear at church fairs, but a bag into which all scraps of paper shall be tightly "grabbed" and thrust. The idea was suggested by seeing one at the Ohio convention made by dear Mother Thompson. "We wish to leave this beautiful church in as good order as we find it, thus impressing Atlanta with a belief in our good housekeeping. Please appoint the youngest member in each delegation to gather up all the scraps which accumulate from the wagging pencils—and let the pencils, not the tongues, wag—and deposit them here." This bag was brought by Mrs. Alice Peters, of Columbus, Ohio, to whom a vote of thanks was tendered.

Mrs. Elizabeth Comstock, the Quaker philanthropist, who has visited more prisons than any other person alive, was descried in the audience and called to the platform by the President. "How Firm a Foundation," was sung to the old Southern air we first learned at the Louisville convention, and sung in the depths of the Mammoth Cave. When the verse, "E'en down to old age," was reached, a movement of Miss Willard's hand stilled the audience as she said: "In my own home we often sing this at family worship for my mother; let us sing it now in the same spirit for the sake of the good gray heads here—Mother Stewart and Elizabeth Comstock." Tears stood in Miss Willard's eyes, and were mirrored in those of hundreds of the audience, and deepened the feeling with which the stanza was sung.

Rested by this episode the audience was in excellent spirit to listen to the magnificent paper of Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, the National corresponding secretary. She styled it, "A Review of the Year's Work," and explained that as the state presidents have Monday evening to give their reports, and the superintendents have space on the program for theirs, she would not "trench on their preserves," but would give points of a more general nature. The reading was again and again and again interrupted by cheers; when she announced that "the increase of membership during the year, according to the treasurer's report, is 1,625, and as 7,261 members in Iowa and Pennsylvania have seceded, we have had that loss to make up; this makes the total gain 8,886," the enthusiasm was irrepressible, and was only stilled by singing the doxology. Before Mrs. Buell could proceed two gentlemen stepped to Miss Willard's side, and were announced as a committee from the Georgia Legislature, Hon. Simeon Maxwell, chairman of the committee on temperance, and Hon. R. H. Jackson, chairman of the committee on education. They handed Miss Willard the following communication:

Resolved, That the use of this hall (Legislative Hall—House of Representatives) be tendered Mrs. Mary H. Hunt for the delivery of an address to the General Assembly of Georgia, on the subject of temperance teaching, on any night or at noon of any day.

Resolved, That the Hon. Simeon Maxwell, chairman of the committee on temperance, and the Hon. R. H. Jackson, chairman of the committee on education, be charged with the duty of informing Mrs. Hunt, and of ascertaining the time.

The invitation was accepted with thanks and Tuesday evening was appointed as the time for this meeting.

Mrs. Buell was now permitted to finish her paper.

SUMMARY OF MRS. BUELL'S PAPER.

During the year our President has attended seven state conventions, and that of the Maritime Provinces of Canada, spoken before the National Teachers' Association in Minneapolis, worked at the Asheville School of Methods, and given two weeks' work to the Nebraska campaign and as many more to Iowa.

Miss Pugh has had charge of the School of Methods at Lake Bluff, and assisted in similar work at Mountain Lake Park, Maryland, and Lakeside, Ohio. Mrs. Woodbridge, recording secretary, has been on the wing during the year, except when laid aside by sickness. Mrs. Stevens, of Maine, her assistant, while serving her state as president, also served it under appointment of the Governor, at the last national gathering of the Society of Associated Charities. Mrs. Buell, herself, besides her office duties, has taken charge of two Schools of Methods, assisted at a ten day W. C. T. U. camp-meeting at Valley Forge, and at other places, and attended three state conventions. Our national speakers have been busy, East and West, North and South, scarcely a state not visited by one or more of them. The same is true of National organizers. Special mention was made of Miss Henrietta Moore, who for over a year and a half trod her weary way through the territories to the Pacific coast, never complaining, but ever longing for the mother at home, anxiously waiting for the return of her daughter.

A review of the past decade shows that during these years seventeen campaigns for state constitutional prohibition have claimed the thought of the W. C. T. U., and although defeated and counted out so many times, we have just as much courage to undertake the eighteenth.

Our union has taken active part in the campaign of South Dakota for woman's ballot, which, although unsuccessful, polled the largest vote for suffrage on record.

Ten years ago, at our Boston convention, twenty-three states and territories and the District of Columbia were represented; to-day, forty-four states, two territories and the District of Columbia. During the decade, Maine trebled her membership, Vermont doubled hers, Connecticut, Ohio, Minnesota and District of Columbia quadrupled theirs; Michigan, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey multiplied theirs by six, New Hampshire by seven, Indiana by nine, New York by eleven, Maryland and Nebraska by twelve, Florida by eighteen, Virginia by twenty, Wisconsin by nineteen, Arkansas by twenty-five, Missouri by forty-seven and Pennsylvania by fifty. The money received as dues in 1890 is sixteen times as great as that received in 1880. This measures the extent by which the "W. C. T. U. has been killed by its political action" and the secession of malcontents. Since 1880 the official organ of the union has grown from an eight page monthly, OUR UNION, with a circulation of 5,000, into a sixteen page weekly, THE UNION SIGNAL, with a subscription list of 80,000, the largest list of any religious or philanthropic paper except the Sunday-School Times. The children have been provided with a paper of their own, The Young Crusader, and the young women with the Oak and Ivy Leaf.

Since 1880, Mary Clement Leavitt has belted the world with the white ribbon, leaving a W. C. T. U. in every land on which she has set her foot, and Miss Jessie Ackerman is following in her footsteps. As a resultant, the World's W. C. T. U. has been organized, of which Miss Willard is now president.

Since 1880 six states have, by a majority vote of their people, signified their desire to place prohibition in their respective constitutions; it stands there in two to-day, in one it was lost by a technicality; in another it was re-submitted by trickery, and lost by the same means; in two others it was counted out by politicians.

Since 1880 the Federal Supreme Court has settled for all time the right of a state to prohibit the liquor traffic; it has also given us the original package decision, not so directly in the interest of the temperance reform, but one of those events which often is more potent than argument. Since 1880 a large number of states have given the school ballot to woman. Kansas has given her the municipal ballot, and Wyoming has come into the Union with a constitution assuring the political equality of the sexes. Mrs. Buell paid touching tribute to the martyrs who have baptized our cause with their blood during the decade; to Clinton B. Fisk and to John B. Finch, promoted from the ranks militant on earth to the ranks triumphant in heaven.

Mrs. Chapin announced a communication from Governor and Mrs. Northen to the effect that they desired to tender a reception to the Convention at the Executive Mansion at any time most convenient to us. The invitation was accepted with thanks and referred to the Executive Committee to fix the time.

The next in order was the treasurer's report, by Miss Esther Pugh, showing that during the year there has been received as dues $14,495.50, every dollar of this sum representing ten Christian Temperance women, as our dues to the National are ten cents per member; donations for Nebraska, $724.31; other donations, $5,460.37. The total expenditures for the year foot up $26,007.39.

Miss Pugh, after reading treasurer's report, said:

"Our corresponding secretary has indulged in a little retrospect. This is the thirteenth year of service with me, and I suppose it is the unlucky year. Thirteen years ago I was told by the then President of this union, that the National treasurer had broken down in health, and that I had been selected for the place. The treasury was bare and in debt. I was appalled. She said, 'We are going to pray the Lord for $1,000'—that was as far as her faith extended—and from all sources that year we had a little over $1,000. This was in 1878. Our receipts now from all sources foot up to over $40,000. A. E. Bartlett, of Connecticut, gave us a $5,000 gift. It came to us almost as a bequest, as before our letter of thanks reached him his ears were past hearing and his eyes past reading."

Mrs. Burt, of New York, asked which state paid the most money for dues.

Miss Pugh responded: "New York will not have a hard time to find that out. New York has paid $2,100, Pennsylvania, $1,700, Illinois, $1,467. New York is first."

Miss Willard, with great feeling, said, "And Pennsylvania next. You had better know what that means, our being able to say, 'and Pennsylvania next.'" Our thoughts went back over the two or three years' strife there, ending in the secession of some local and county unions, and we all thanked God that in spite of the machinations of politicians and false friends, the National W. C. T. U. is able to say, "And Pennsylvania next."

A large number of introductions, including many of the city clergy, followed.

The time had now arrived for the Bible reading by Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, National Superintendent of Evangelistic work. Her topic was, "Christ as a Servant," as set forth in the gospel of Mark. No more helpful Bible reading has ever been given before the National—not even Hannah Whitall Smith's "Wings."

When the benediction closed this opening meeting of the session of 1890, all felt that we had never witnessed a more auspicious beginning. The especial feature of the afternoon session was Miss Willard's annual address.

MISS WILLARD'S ADDRESS.

Our space permits only a synopsis; further extracts will be given in the Stenographic Report.

Beloved Friends and Comrades:

We are assembled here in Georgia, the Empire state of this great Southland, by reason of an invitation sent to us at Chicago from General John B. Gordon, its gallant Governor, from its legislature, and the mayor of its renowned "Gate City." This was indeed high honor and significant courtesy. It meant that the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is for "Native Land," not for a section, and is guided by the Southern Cross as well as the North star.

Grateful for the good-will that called us, we have come to the smiling land of Oglethorpe, who preceded by a prayer-meeting the founding of Savannah; to the land blessed generations ago by John Wesley's and George Whitfield's ministry, the land of Alexander H. Stephens, of whom his colored attendants said, "Mas'r Alick's kinder to dogs than most folks is to men;" the land of Ben Hill, the peerless orator, and of Joseph E. Brown, the trusted statesman. We have come to the Georgia of Judge Longstreet's famous "Scenes," of "Uncle Remus" and "Bill Arp," of "Old Si" and Richard Malcolm Johnson; the Georgia of that Southern "Brother Jonathan," Rev. Sam Jones, the greatest humorist among them; the land of those famous champions of our cause, Senator Colquit, Dr. Felton and Walter B. Hill; of those noble sons of the church, Drs. Hawthorne and Lee, and Bishops Pierce and Haygood; the land in whose bright firmament burn those stars of the first magnitude, Paul Hayne and Sidney Lanier, poets beloved, and Henry W. Grady, Georgia's favorite and lamented son.

But "King Alcohol is enthroned in the realm of King Cotton," to quote the words of that scholarly Georgian, Professor Scomp, and Atlanta's proud neck has once more come under the yoke lifted for a brief space five years ago. Nevertheless, Georgia has the signal honor of having been the first American colony with a prohibitory law. "In 1733," says Prof. Scomp's book, "the whole colony, not then two years old, was put under prohibition of rum and distilled liquors—a law which remained in force nine years, antedating that of Maine by more than a century. Georgia was the first Southern state to start a temperance newspaper in 1834, and in 1839, Josiah Flournoy, a pious farmer of Putnam county, canvassed the state with heroic perseverance, securing names to a petition to the legislature for the abolition of the sale of spirituous liquors, or the closing of bar-rooms.

All ages have witnessed to some degree the chivalry of man, but this age is giving us a new development—the chivalry of woman. For the magnificent material civilization of force has a worm in the bud. It is not more certain that jungles are dangerous because of lions, and rocky valleys because of snakes, than that cities have their wild beasts and stealthy serpents. Man has killed off the roaring beasts and creeping things that hiss and spit out venom, because he has a strong arm and stout heart. St. George slew the dragon and rescued the beautiful maid, but women saints are stout of heart against the serpent of the still—against the wild beast of impurity and the stealthy tiger of the gambling den. Women wield the sword of the spirit with untrembling hands, and their chivalry toward man shall yet clear the jungles of civilization from the trio of scourges that lie in wait to devour him body and soul.

The watchword of those who believe in prohibition by woman's ballot is, "two votes for the home where it now has but one." We can in no other way so re-inforce the Nation's conscience or purify the polluted blood of the body politic. Hands that have just put down the whisky bottle, or shuffled the greasy pack of cards in some saloon, are putting ballots in the box that are like the match to a powder mine. God grant that soon those other hands may be released that have been busy with home's most sacred ministries; that have sheltered helpless infancy; cooled the fevered brow of anxious manhood, and been clasped in prayer, while women's voices have cried out, "How long, O God, how long!"

EVANGELISTIC DEPARTMENT.

A gentleman driving along the country road overtook a stranger and invited him to ride. Said the gentleman to himself, "I wonder what this man is thinking about, and what subject he will introduce. Surely it will be one of three—the weather, the crops, or the coming election." But no, his mind was on a greater theme, and his first words after the usual salutations were those so seldom heard, so worthy to be often uttered, "How is salvation down in your country?"

In the interview that Dr. Talmage had with Mr. Gladstone in London, recently, the great statesman said:

"Talk about questions of the day; there is but one question, and that is the gospel. It can and will correct everything needing correction. All men at the head of great movements are Christian men. During the many years I was in the Cabinet, I was brought into contact with sixty master minds, and all but five of them were Christians. My only hope for the world is in bringing the human mind into contact with divine revelation."

These are golden words, the choicest religious utterance of 1890, for they come from the greatest nation's greatest man and are the sum of what eighty wonderful years have taught him. So often have they recurred to me with hope and inspiration that I put them here for their heavenly helpfulness. "No atheist's gibe falls from the lips of nature, but the whole universe is a set of pictured and lettered blocks, by which we babies learn at last to spell out 'God is Love.'" Faith is God's dynamite. "I believe more than I know," is its formula. "The steps of faith fall on the seeming void and find the rock beneath" Faith sent Stanley to the tropics and Schwatka to the pole; Edison to his laboratory and Grady to the forum; without faith it is impossible to please the God of Science, of Investigation, of Reform—for all these are but profile views of the God whom Deborah worshipped and Mary gave to the world in incarnation, even of Him who said, "Before Abraham was I am!"

The ever feminine draweth on in church no less than state. Miss Greenwood, our superintendent of evangelistic work, reports 701 names and addresses of women ministers and evangelists. The Congregational Church lately voted to ordain a woman, Miss Juanita Breckenridge, who had been permitted to graduate from one of its own theological seminaries. The vote, on admitting her to ordination, stood thirty-three in favor to fifteen against.

Women are freely permitted the hardest tasks. Competition does not crowd them out there! Bishop Thoburn, of India, says that in ten years there will be more missionaries from their ranks than from the ranks of men, and he says, too, they are equal to all emergencies, even to those of leadership. Bishop Taylor, of Africa, says that his hardest stations are manned by women, and in the very hardest of all a Canadian woman, saintly and true, works all alone among the natives, and is almost worshipped by them.

Thirteen years ago a general missionary conference for China was held in one of the chief cities. This year it assembled in Canton for the second time, with about five hundred delegates of all denominations. When it met before, a woman-missionary was called upon to bring her methods of work before the conference, whereupon the presiding officer left the chair, while several members hastened from the church in tears, and still others protested in holy horror, "It is unscriptural for a woman to participate in such a meeting." But this year, one of the first things done was to make all the ladies who had come (including missionaries' wives) "voting members of the conference with all the privileges of the floor."

Besides all this, a resolution was adopted, by an overwhelming majority, to set apart an evening for a speech by Miss Jessie Ackerman, of California, "the representative of the National W. C. T. U., who is working in China on behalf of a society that is the greatest moral force outside the church."

Surrounded by pagan hordes, these Christians stand together, and men perceive the need of woman's utmost aid. Hedged in by hordes of skeptics and saloon defenders, the Christians of America have well-nigh attained a similar clearness of vision. May the M. E. General Conference, North and South, profit by the Chinese example.

SOCIAL PURITY.

Only about seventy women in every thousand enter upon the holy vocation of motherhood. In thirty-six states the married mother is not the legal owner of her child. In several states it can be willed away from her by the father before it ever sees the light of day.

Bishop Thoburn, in a recent address on India, said: "When you want to raise a building you put screws and levers under its lowest parts. When you lift the lowest brick you lift every brick above it." A better figure cannot be found by which to impress the importance of work for the home makers, since "the chief corner-stone of the state is the hearthstone." The supreme object of the W. C. T. U. is to elevate the home and protect its members, one and all—the stronger from legalized temptation, the gentler from oppression.

I suggest a pledge that the boys and girls "will not do, say or listen to any thing they could not tell to mamma." One of our women writes: "This promise has been a wall of defense to my children all through their school-life, and the habit of confidence thus formed is not easily broken." I believe we can place this pledge in the hands of primary teachers to excellent advantage. The White Cross and White Shield pledges are now well known among us, and are kept in stock at Headquarters with all the leaflets necessary to a full understanding of the work, and suggestions for mothers who would gladly talk with their children about personal purity, but hesitate for lack of language.

One of the best methods of protecting our children in public schools from evil habits is to induce the wives or mothers of the men who form the board of education, or the women who may be on such boards in commonwealths of great liberality of sentiment, to use such an influence as shall result in a course of lectures from clergymen and physicians (who would undoubtedly give their work gratuitously) once a month, in the interest of boys from ten years old and upwards. These lectures would of course be extempore and in simple language, accompanied perhaps by literature of the best class. This method seems to us altogether practicable and reputable, and we earnestly desire that good women should note the suggestion and do all in their power to carry out its provisions.

OUR LOCAL WORKERS.

I cannot too often or too earnestly appeal to women working in over-crowded groups to branch out into the W. C. T. U., thereby helping to open new lines of beneficent activity, and to leave a standing place in old guilds for the less adventurous an capable. Our riches consist in women, not bank deposits. Each new worker we estimate at from ten to twenty-five thousand dollars, actual money value!

From the first, these soldiers of the rank and file have been our truest heroines. On the prairies of Nebraska and among the hills of New England they are everywhere the same—patient, invincible and uncomplaining. Their faces are a type distinctly marked; their lips still smile even when the eyes are full of tears. They are like that old soldier of Waterloo who had charge of a gun on an important height. Some one asked him what he could see while the battle went on. "See! nothing but dust," he answered. "What did you do?" "Do! I stood by my gun."

The pathos of these women, working so hard, but held back from the authoritative expression of opinion; so eager to help, but weaponless; praying for the protection of the homes for which they have given "the last full measure of devotion," yet powerless to work out their salvation, is something that can but give to any who perceive the situation, "thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears." Yet in the churches good men, who pray for everything besides, forget to pray for temperance, and kindly, home-like husbands and fathers smile at "the enthusiasm of the women," and freely own that they dare not vote for prohibition lest it harm their trade or hinder their ambitions.

The presidents of our local unions are fairly typified by one whom I met upon the prairies recently. In introducing me to an audience, she said:

"Some declare that the W. C. T. U. is not doing much in this headquarters of beer, but I would remind them that no fort is thought to have surrendered so long as its colors are flying, and ours were never brighter. Don't stand off and criticise, but come and help us."

Anxious parents and forsaken wives are learning to appreciate the help of the W. C. T. U. in caring for their wayward, absent ones, and the saying of a woman thus consoled becomes of wider significance every year: "The W. C. T. U. gives to each boy a score of mothers." May this faith deepen the motherliness of all our hearts.

After Miss Willard's address came the reports of the superintendent of young women's work, Mrs. Barnes of New York; of Loyal Temperance Legion work, Mrs. Helen G. Rice; work among foreigners, Mrs. S. F. Grubb, Kansas. Before the reports Mrs. Franc Finch was introduced, bringing the fraternal greetings of the Good Templars, and an invitation to send fraternal delegates to their meeting in Edinburg, Scotland, next summer. Mrs. Woodbridge and Mother Stewart were elected said delegates. A deputation of the National Grange, consisting of Mrs. M. S. Roan, Mrs. Himbrough, of Georgia, Mr. S. H. Ellis, of Ohio, brought cordial fraternal greetings to the National W. C. T. U. Their message was gladly received, and Mrs. Snead Cairnes, of Missouri, was appointed to carry our greeting to the Grange, now in session in this city.

Mrs. Frances J. Barnes said for the Y work:

We have a larger loyal paid-up membership than ever before, most notably in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Vermont. I want also to say, this last year we have gained more young men as honorary members than ever before—last year we had 6,000 and this year 8,000. Our young women are gaining an experience in financial matters that the mothers didn't have. The young women have raised for all purposes $34,899.

The state W. C. T. U. of Pennsylvania, receiving from its membership of young women about $1,000, has voted to give to the department $600 for the promotion of that work, and you all see how it tells in the results.

Ohio has also provided ways and means for the state superintendents to meet the young women. It is well known in days that are past when there was no superintendent in the state and the reports came back to us, "there are a few young women working with the unions." Now the amount expended has brought into the state treasury two or three times the amount ever expended in that direction. The returns to the National treasury are increased in equal proportions, also more subscriptions have been taken for THE UNION SIGNAL. This year the evangelical work, the juvenile work, the flower missions and press work have been carried on more successfully than ever.

The Young Woman's Conferences in Ohio not only increased the membership of young women, but caused a larger delegation to attend the state convention than ever before. The result is greater loyalty to the state union.

The statistics give the figures, as Miss Willard says, and figures are what we can rely upon. Virginia has also taken a start this year and one of the bright unions in a college in Norfolk has three singular committees. One is a committee on home-made candy; one of the young ladies says that no young woman in that college dares buy candy outside, and all the proceeds are given towards state work for young women. They say, also, they will buy spools of thread for five cents and make lace for twenty-five cents, and the proceeds go toward a library. They have, also, a darning committee. Some of the girls do not like darning stockings, for some reason or other, while the others do, and these latter darn the stockings for the other girls and the money received goes into the state fund. The young woman at the head of the state Y's of Vermont lives on a farm and does all the house work. They have six cows and she makes all the butter, does all her own dress-making and yet finds time to bring about the result she does there in that state.

Connecticut's Holiday House we must not pass over—the state superintendent—when she found she couldn't get another housekeeper, went herself and was the housekeeper in that Holiday Home. It made the young woman feel that to be a good housekeeper was certainly an honor. I can't, in this brief moment, state the new things that have come up. New Jersey reports that at the next social meeting of a certain union in New Jersey this is to be the subject of the debate: "Resolved, That the young women in the W. C. T. U. are in their proper sphere."

Mrs. S. F. Grubb reported on foreign work: A strange fact confronts us to-day in our governmental offices; it is that they are largely ordered and controlled by a class alien in birth, education—many of them foreign in speech also. The population of all our Northern cities is over fifty per cent foreigners, and children of the first generation. In elections the cities control the states, and the states decide the nation's fate. These people, utterly ignorant of the principles of our government, are, from inheritance and training, opposed to the best interests of our society. A fact concomitant with this is that the saloon is the most potent force in American politics, draws its strength and power largely from this class of people. They have absorbed the whole training and education of emigrants from the time of their arrival until they become citizens, and taught them all they know of American politics. In the very course of human nature the foreigner becomes the friend and ally of the saloon. A thought full of suggestion comes to us that if we were as zealous and as energetic, this great body of people on an average of a half million in a year, could be gained for God and humanity instead of for evil and corruption. This is the work of the foreign department of the W. C. T. U. To accomplish it we must take them before they set foot on our soil. While yet they traverse the highway towards our lands, meet them at the ports of entry, follow them persistently all the way along, give them kindly and graciously the education and training in relation to good citizenship and good morals, and impress upon them the stubborn fact that this should be God's country in its citizenship as well as in its churches.

In the matter of education children should be thoroughly well grounded in that speech in which our laws are written and our institutions framed. The future citizens of the republic should be taught the underlying principles of our government in our own language; but the schools are not the only places of education. The state owes a duty to its citizenship to see that they have the opportunity and means thoroughly to understand the duties and obligations of the citizen before that privilege is conferred. A very large number of the people coming here can do this only by having these things given to them in the language in which they are familiar. They cannot comprehend such matters in a strange tongue. We would have these presented to them in their own speech, so as to impress them thoroughly with their importance. It can be done. Either our immigration laws must be greatly restricted or our foreigners better fitted for citizenship if our country is to be saved.

The objective points of work during the last year were, 1st. The petition sent in to Congress to prevent liquors being sold at the landing place, Castle Garden, or the barge. This was presented in both Houses of Congress, and was successful, an order to that effect being given by the government in response to petitions.

2d was the Nebraska can paign, in which an immense amount of literature was distributed. We do not believe it was lost, but feel that it will yet bear fruit. The campaign for woman's suffrage in South Dakota was also vigorously pushed among foreign-speaking people by means of tracts and leaflets.

The work projected for the coming year is to memorialize Congress to prevent the ballot being given to foreigners before they are naturalized, as is done in sixteen states; and to begin the work of evangelization on the high seas. Nearly two million of pages in ten different languages have been distributed since last January.

Mrs. Helen G. Rice, superintendent of juvenile work, next reported: Every state and territory has been heard from. Nearly every one reports forward steps. Forty new companies of the Loyal Temperance Legion have been formed in Pennsylvania, one hundred and four in New York, sixty in Illinois. The western states and territories deserve great credit for grand advances in spite of obstacles. Among the hindrances she mentions lack of financial support, indifference, lack of consecrated leaders. The states of Massachusetts and Illinois have given the best financial support to this department. New York has the largest number of graduates on the diploma plan, seventeen; Wisconsin and other states have taken up the plan with excellent effect. County conventions of Loyal Temperance Legions have been very helpful. Indiana leads in having Loyal Temperance Legions incorporated, also in erecting a Willard fountain as a memorial to our President's birthday. This state utilized Miss Willard's birthday this year, September 28, in raising money for the Nebraska campaign, $90 being raised on that day by the children for the amendment fund.

So far as now reported there are 3,892 companies of Loyal Temperance Legions now organized, with an enrollment of 240,000 children pledged against liquor, profanity and tobacco. Doubtless there are many more organized in temperance bands under other names, or not reporting. Mrs. Rice has worked in Maine, Massachusetts, Virginia, Indiana, and Illinois in the interest of her department, and did two good weeks' work at the Lake Bluff School of Methods.

Miss Anna Gordon, her associate, has worked in six states, and in each of the Maritime provinces there, often addressing audiences of one thousand or fifteen hundred children. Mrs. Blair, of Nebraska, National chalk talker, has had so much work to do in the amendment campaign that she has not traveled as extensively out of her state as usual, but has furnished many sets of drawings for use by other workers.

Mrs. Lovell, of Pennsylvania, who has charge of Bands of Mercy, reports good work accomplished along her distinctive line—training children to be merciful. She acknowledges the receipt of many copies of that wonderful book, "Black Beauty," to be distributed among the bands.

Mrs. Rice made grateful mention of the services of Miss Alice M. Guernsey and the W. T. P. A. in preparing and publishing helpful literature for her department, especially the Loyal Temperance Legion Responsive Readings, Crusade Leaflets, and Advanced Lessons for the Loyal Temperance Legion.

A number of notices were given and the afternoon meeting adjourned.

EVENING MEETING.

The first feature of the evening was the march of the children, marshaled by Anna Gordon. For a week she has been drilling two hundred children of Atlanta, and to-night she must have felt repaid for it. They marched in headed by two dear girls in white, one of them the daughter of Editor Hemphill, of the Constitution, bearing the Temple banner. They filed upon the stage, filling it full with such a nosegay as shamed the beautiful flowers with which the stage was adorned. As soon as the children were in place they sang Miss Lathbury's hymn:

"Who are these, a singing band
Marching through the listening land?
In the tender dew of youth,
In their armor, white as truth,
In the name of Him who calls them
In the morning."

It never sounded so sweetly as when sung thus by these sweet young voices. Next they sang Miss Willard's "Saloons must Go:"

"List to the tread of many feet,
From home and playground, farm and street;
They talk like tongues, their words we know;
Saloons, saloons, saloons must go!"

With each verse the enthusiasm rose higher, shown by cheers and waving handkerchiefs. Then these children sang Mrs. Henry's "Rise, Temple, Rise," with rhythmic movement of swaying arms and with uplifted eyes:

"Upward through the sunny air
Rise, Temple, rise!
Brick and stone and timber fair,
Rise, Temple, rise!

Chorus—

"Rise, Temple, rise, Temple!
Rise, rise, rise!
Rise, Temple, rise, Temple!

* * * * *

We never saw a more beautiful and impressive sight than was that church when those children turned to march down the aisle. The house was packed, floor and galleries. The vast audience rose, and waving handkerchiefs and "God bless you's," rising spontaneously from many hearts, followed them as they passed out of the church. As they passed off the stage, a dear little tot turned, and running up the stage, gave a beautiful boquet to Mrs. Carse. Miss Willard then led Mrs. Carse forward and introduced her to the audience.

Scores of people were standing inside the church and outside the steps, sidewalks and street were packed. An overflow meeting in the basement was therefore improvised. Mrs. Benjamin, of Michigan, presiding. Dr. Anna Shaw, Mother Wallace, George Woodford and others speaking.

The meeting upstairs was opened by prayer, led by Rev. Sherrill, pastor of the Congregational Church. Then came the addresses of welcome—a score of them almost—yet wonderful in many respects. We never anywhere heard from any state official such an address as that of Governor Northen. If he is a sample of the kind of governors farmers elect, we wish they had the chance to elect all the governors in the land.

Ten addresses of welcome and responses, good as they are, cannot be compressed into the compass of our paper. Only a few of them are given here; for the rest we refer you to the Stenographic Report.

ADDRESS OF REV. DR. HEIDT ON BEHALF OF THE ATLANTA W. C. T. U.

Madam President and Ladies of the W. C. T. U. met in National Convention:—

In the name of 150 women constituting the local unions of this city, and in their behalf, I greet you. With united voices they say to you, dear sisters, we welcome you here. The precincts of our home, and the charmed circles of our domestic worship have thrown wide their doors, and bid you enter in and be at home.

I represent a body of women noble and true, who have stood the brunt of criticism and have not been discouraged, who have looked in the face of seeming failure and have not known its presence, who have stood in the might and majesty of their own holy cause and have gone forth to battle and to conquer. They are rebels; not rebels against the best government the world ever saw, but rebels against the curse and tyranny of the licensed liquor traffic. They are in the union, for they are bound together by that silken cord which unites the women of the world in one grand movement to save our homes, and give blessings and peace to future generations. They are protectionists, but they lay no heavy taxes upon necessaries; they stand for the protection of the fireside, of their sons and their daughters. They are free-traders, for they want clothing to be placed at cheap rates upon the backs of the ragged, and all needed articles to be supplied to poverty-stricken homes. They go forth with a sword, but it is not the sword that drenches itself in the blood of brothers, but rather the sword of the spirit which is the word of God, and the banner that they hold high is not the banner that is tattered and torn by the bullet and the shell of the field of carnage, but the pure white banner that waves aloft beneath God's blue sky and will, we verily believe, lead them on to final triumph.

The trustees and officers of this church give you welcome. Here our sons and our daughters have been born unto God; here have the vows of eternal fealty to God been made; here have we gathered about the sacramental bread and remembered the death and passion of Him whose cause we plead and for whose honor we toil. Is not such a place a fitting place for you, dear sisters? Are you not seeking to establish peace and good-will among men? Are not your banners inscribed with personal purity and is not the Sermon on the Mount the creed under which you toil? Fitting place to receive you. Your songs are holy, your words are devout, your hopes are toward the coming Christ. Be welcome in these pews. You are on the winning side. Old Athenasius used to say, "Athenasius and God are in the majority," and so it seems to me that these hundreds and thousands of consecrated women may claim God to be with them and in the majority against any foe which may be sent against them. Yes, the saloons must go. They are going.

A lovely procession crowded this aisle to-night. What heart was unmoved as infant voices spoke? A greater procession yet is to form. It will be the grand moving columns coming up from this mighty conquest, when there shall not be a saloon left in the land. Little children will head the procession, maidens and boys will follow hard behind, then matrons and mothers, and the grand refrain of that long song shall be, "The saloons have gone." Later in the ages a trumpet shall sound and there shall come a mightier psalm and a sweeter reign, for Jesus shall reign "where'er the sun doth his successive journeys run." God grant we may soon see the happy day.

MISS WILLARD—We will now be welcomed by the state's new governor, William J. Northen.

ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR NORTHEN.

Madam President:

As the executive officer of this state, I welcome to Georgia the Christian women of America. I never stood in so remarkable a presence as this. From Nevada, from Vermont, from Kansas, from California, from South Carolina, from Alabama, from Missouri, from New York and Pennsylvania, to Georgia have come Christian mothers to counsel, and pray, and work for the uplifting of society, for the security of the church and the safety of the home. What a wonderful, and lovely, and beautiful gathering of influences; tender and soft as the love of Christ, and yet strong as the power of God; quiet as the mysterious operations of nature that build mighty forests, and yet loud enough to be heard in heaven, where the angels rejoice over one sinner that comes to God. In the name of Georgia mothers, who lean upon the manhood of their sons, full of hope for the possibilities of their future, I welcome you. In the name of those fathers, broken-hearted, who say, "Oh, Absalom, my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee, Absalom, my son;" in the name of the little children, joy forsaken, destitute, hungry, ragged and forgotten, I welcome you. Strange influences these, blessed and pure. I welcome you, my friends, because of yourselves—for all that is lovely, all that is beautiful, all that is sweet and all that is Christlike. I welcome you because of your purposes. Why, I never heard of women banded together for bad purposes. I welcome you because of your purposes, lifting up humanity, elevating society, making pure and better the world. I welcome you because of your earnestness.

Your President asked you, "What is the greatest thing that has come to your mind this year?" I will tell you what I thought. A few days ago I was traveling with a friend of mine. He said, "What do you think is the greatest element in Christian life and Christian character?" "Well," said I, "you have asked me a great question. Will you please tell me first what you think is?" He said, "I think humility." "Oh, well, no," said I, "humility is Christlike, but humility is negative." "Well, then," said he, "forbearance." "No," said I, "Christ taught patience under afflictions, but still that itself is to some extent negative." "Well, what is your opinion?" he asked. I said, "Love for humanity; not living for yourselves, not cultivating those graces that are simply the sacrifice of yourself, but going down into the dirt, into suffering and sorrow and laying your hand upon your fellow and saying, 'My brother, have hope in Christ.' Going down into the dark alleys and up into the loft and laying the hand of sympathy upon the brow of one who suffers, and saying, 'Sister, I love you. God is your friend,' Hunting up humanity, living for God, home and humanity."

A friend told me this incident. He said there came out of a car a strong, stalwart man, bearing in his arms a little child. Its little feet were deformed. The father and mother followed behind the strong man. They had sold a part of their farm in order that that little child's feet might be made strong. They had given a large part of their income that their little one might have feet. Said he, "I thought as I looked sometimes into the faces of people about us, why is it that people do not give more that their children may have brains, that their intellects may be cultivated," and then I thought, why don't people give more by sacrifice, by prayer, by effort and by money that people may have heart, that in them may be raised up living monuments in society, honorable to themselves, to their homes, to their country and to their God. When this shall be done through the wonderful God-blessed influences of your organization, then we will gather in all the people to home, to humanity and to God.

Miss Willard—It occurred to me that it is a very fine thing to be governor of Georgia, but so much finer thing to have a brotherly and a fatherly heart. I think that is just the sort of man the farmers are going to elect from this out.

The welcomes of Mrs. Sibley, for Georgia, and of Mrs. Chapin for the rest of the South, contained so many fine points and capital hits, they delighted the audience continually. The responses of Mrs. Buell, for New England, Mrs. Lathrap, for the North, and Miss Kinnear, for the Northwest, were good as they could be after ten o'clock at night, to an audience which knew that the last car started out at 10 : 30.

Sandwiched in between the addresses was a spicy collection speech by Dr. Anna Shaw. The collectors said it was altogether too spicy and entertaining to suit their purpose, for people were so interested they could not see the baskets.

SATURDAY MORNING.

The convention opened at 9 o'clock, with a half-hour devotional meeting, conducted, as all these meetings of the convention are, by Miss Greenwood, superintendent of evangelistic work. Hon. Neal Dow, who was to have given an address this morning, was detained by sickness, to the great regret of all. His daughter, Cornelia, was in attendance and presented her father's regrets.

The reports of superintendents were resumed, Mrs. Mary H. Hunt giving the report for the scientific temperance instruction department as follows:

Ten years ago the department of scientific temperance instruction in the public schools was created, a department that seeks to teach children in the public schools the reasons for total abstinence as written in blood, brain, nerve and tissue. At the close of this decade of work, I have been asked to present a history of the origin of the department and of the work done. I can only give you the briefest kind of a glimpse. In 1873, Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson reported to the world his finding that alcohol was a poison. Running through those years to 1878 that topic absorbed my attention as a novel would. In 1879 your National President was my visitor. I told her of the great concern in my soul about this thing. She said, "Come to Indianapolis to the W. C. T. U. convention." I went there. A committee was appointed and I was made its chairman. This department was created in 1880.

The first two years the chief work was to present the topic to the people through the local unions. In 1882, trembling at my own temerity, backed by the noblest constituency the world ever produced, I pleaded before the legislature of Vermont for the passage of the first education law, a law requiring teaching physiology, with special reference to effects of alcoholics and hygiene. Michigan and New Hampshire followed the same year. The legislature of New York, in 1877, enacted such a law, and the next year nine states, including the great state of Pennsylvania, and the smaller, though perhaps as influential state of Massachusetts enacted similar laws. Then we went to the Congress of the United States. The bill passed the Senate unanimously, and there were only eight votes against it in the House.

We had no books of the kind desired. There rushed into market a great flood of books not containing the teaching desired. Then followed the four years' book war. A great petition, signed by distinguished men and women, was sent to publishers, asking them to bring their books up to this high standard of total abstinence, and the publishers surrendered on condition that I would revise those books. Last year I reported to you we had four separate series well graded, in which the nature of alcohol, hygiene, food, including physical culture in all its departments, were incorporated.

When a man like Dr. Martin, a professor of biology in Johns Hopkins University, puts his name on the title-page of his book, revised to these standards, we can bow very respectfully to our opponents and ask them to read a little further. We have passed the time when we can be successfully attacked on the ground of failure of scientific accuracy. This year the work of legislation has been going steadily on. The map displayed here shows only ten states left with no form of temperance education. Before we leave Georgia we are going to take that black cap off this state. You see the states are black that have no law. They are Texas, Mississippi, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Kentucky and Tennessee. Virginia has just taken the step that enabled me to rip off the black on the state before the map was hung.

After having breasted that four years' book war, we grew courageous and have prepared a circular, showing just what was the matter with the different books published, so any local superintendent can take that circular, fit herself to tell her story about the different books, and go then before the school board. (Remainder in Stenographic Report.)

TEMPERANCE TEACHING IN SUNDAY-SCHOOLS—MISS LUCIA E. F. KIMBALL.

The most notable event of the year's work in this department was the presentation of a petition to the International Sunday-school Convention asking that the temperance lesson might be placed on some other than review Sunday. Concerning the result of this effort Miss Willard wrote:

"What was asked in the memorials and by Miss Kimball and myself was four specific temperance lessons yearly on some other than review Sunday. This was granted:

"First. Two specific temperance lessons in 1892, and two optional temperance lessons in the same year, none of the four being placed on review Sunday. It was stated to be the opinion of the Lesson Committee and of the Executive Committee, ratified by the convention, that a similar arrangement would in all probability be practicable for the lessons in the years that follow 1892.

"Second. There was no dissent from the opinion that the temperance lessons should not come on review Sunday. This, in itself, is a great gain.

"Third. It was urged that temperance be taught in every lesson, so far as practicable.

"Fourth. It was especially urged upon Sunday-school editors and publishers that the temperance lesson should be as carefully elaborated as any other lesson furnished."

Now, I do not know how this may look to temperance people in general, but to me this action, unanimously gained (for it was finally made unanimous) is a long stride ahead, for which I feel sincerely thankful, though I most earnestly desired the four Sundays set apart. But I believe we should make the most of the gain that has come to us, looking forward to the years of instruction that are provided for under this plan, and with the utmost goodwill and faith toward our Sunday-school comrades coöperate with them to bring about the best results possible in the Sunday-schools of the Nation for total abstinence in the individual and personal alliance with the temperance movement of our time.

Here is the summary of the year's accomplishment along the regular lines of department work:

Two hundred and twenty thousand pledged scholars reported; 200.000 pages of temperance literature sent out by the National superintendent; 50,000 by the National secretary; 826,229 reported as used in the states, 1,076,299 in all. Some say, "A great quantity, no definite figures." The one million reported probably stands for many more. Nine thousand and fifty-seven temperance Sundays—gain 3,658; 2,870 gain of books in Sunday-school libraries.

Mrs. Emma A. Wheeler, of Michigan, reported on kindergarten work, showing that eighteen states and territories have taken up this work in greater or less degree. She thinks it impracticable for local W. C. T. U.'s, except in large cities, to establish kindergartens, but earnestly advocates work for their incorporation into the public school system.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

After prayer by Dean Wright and reading of the minutes, the report of the World's W. C. T. U. was given by its American secretary, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, of Ohio. She sketched the history of this organization from its beginning, and strenuously urged the circulation of the petition to the governments of the world for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, opium and tobacco. The work, as shown in this world-wide survey, is simply marvelous and emphasizes the motto hanging over her head as she spoke, "What hath God wrought?" The entire paper will appear in the Stenographic Report.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, our round-the-world missionary, who has been out on her heroic mission for seven long years, sent her annual report, from which we make the following extracts:

In Edinburg I received a warm welcome. Many people were from home on account of the season, yet opportunities were found for eight meetings. Two of these were at the Carrubers Close Mission. The commodious building, in the very heart of the worst part of the city, was built through the exertions of Mr. Moody, who himself raised the money for it. Meetings are held every night, under the leadership of Mr. Barclay, ably assisted by his wife. Hundreds connected with this mission, who had been drunkards, thieves and prostitutes, are leading reputable lives, and rejoicing in the Saviour. Intoxicating wine has been banished from their communion table, a painful experience having led them to take this step. On one occasion fourteen were received into the church and partook of their first communion. All had been addicted to drink, but had become abstainers. In consequence of the alcohol in the communion wine eleven out of the fourteen were drunk before night. Another most interesting occasion was at a Sunday morning breakfast for the poor. Hundreds were present, men and women in one room, and children in another, and certainly they had a most substantial meal once a week, bread, meat and coffee. After the feeding there is a gospel service.

The most notable occasion was at "Free Assembly Hall" on Sunday night, and perhaps the most useful, the meeting with the local B. W. T. A.

At Glasgow there were six meetings, of which one was for ladies, and three in mission halls or mission churches.

Mrs. Leavitt's African work shows much to interest all who care for either missions or temperance. We can only give sketches here and there:

I landed at Duke Town, Old Calabar, for the day. A woman's meeting was to take place in the afternoon. Mrs. Beedie and Miss Edgerly were very glad to give the meeting to me, and the result was a W. C. T. U., with these ladies to fill the offices as they might arrange among themselves. I landed at Free Town, Sierra Leone, February 24, and was received by Mr. and Mrs. West, who had come from their station, about seventy miles inland, to take me back with them.

During Friday, Saturday and Sunday, eight meetings were held, all by interpretation, and a W. C. T. U. was formed, Mrs. Bickersteth, of Sierra Leone, president; Mrs. Clark, of America, secretary.

We next went up the bay and the Bompeh river to Rotufunk, the principal station of this mission. During the next two days we had six meetings, one for young men at which a White Cross society was determined upon. A W. C. T. U. was formed, with American missionaries as officers. Miss Groenendyke was chosen president; Mrs. West, vice president; Miss Williams, secretary, and Mrs. Sage, treasurer. An excellent spirit prevailed at both of these places. The people were interested and serious, many besides Christians coming in.

On May 25, a Sierra Leone trader (that is, a native of Free Town, not belonging to the Bompeh tribe), a member of Miss Williams' Sunday-school class, through her influence, emptied his entire stock of rum into the Bompeh. He then went to his "factory" (place where he bought) to empty out the supply there, but the Lord dealt kindly with him. The supply ordered had not been shipped, and he countermanded the order. Since that time he has been converted, and will join the church as soon as he gets rid of the tobacco trade, which he is trying to do. He is an honorary member of the W. C. T. U.

A "protracted meeting" was held very soon after my visit, and there was a great turning from idols to God, and an ingathering to the church. All the large devil houses in the town and surrounding district were destroyed. I believe the number of idol-worshipers here could be counted on one hand. We destroyed a great amount of "medicine" (charms), grugrees and sabbies, and their power is completely broken, though we see one now and then.

A chief, whose evil face, big, bloated, red-eyed, I remember well, after a terrible conflict, in which he seemed actually torn of evil spirits, was converted. In relating the story this man said, "The devil and I had lived peaceably together all these years. This is the first quarrel we have ever had." In making confession of his sins, he owned to having offered up five living human sacrifices, to having stolen fowls and the wives of four other men.

The good work spread to the town of Bompeh, through Mrs. Thompson, daughter of Bishop Crowther, and sole missionary in Bompeh. The chief of Bompeh, really king of the region, has been converted. A great change has been effected in the town. Mrs. Thompson has also formed a W. C. T. U., "of eleven members who have determined to drive drink from the town—their labor certainly is rewarded, and their prayer heard.' Among results here is mentioned the conversion of the sacrificial priest, others pouring out rum, and one man giving up the position of manager of a factory because he had to sell rum and tobacco. Verily there are white traders and clerks, members of Christian churches in England and America, who might sit at the feet of these newly-converted negroes to learn their duty.

From Africa I returned to Europe, landing at Lisbon, Spain. At San Sebastian two meetings were held in the Mission Chapel of the American Board. I spoke five times in Lyons, France, the next point, but did not find encouragement enough to form a union.

The press department was reported by Miss Alice Briggs, who has been its superintendent since Miss Mary Henry gave up the work to take an editorial position on the Chautauquan. The report showed that an immense amount of temperance has found its way into secular and religious newspapers through this department. Its work has been especially successful through the Newspaper Unions, which, as we know, send out the "patent insides" to country newspapers. There are seventeen such unions in the country, of these twelve use matter prepared by this department. One of these unions puts into one hundred and fifty papers weekly from one to ten columns of temperance matter supplied by this department; another inserts four articles each week in one hundred and fifty papers.

Between this report and the next one were many pleasant introductions. Mrs. James Hicks Stapler, the daughter of the last hereditary chief of the Cherokee Indians, was born near Atlanta, and with her parents went to the Indian Territory at the great Cherokee exodus in 1838. She has not visited her native state from that time till now. She comes back as president of the W. C. T. U. of Indian Territory. She spoke briefly and pathetically, referring to her childhood days here, to the Indian spring, of which she had drank when a child, and on whose waters her mother, in her girlhood. paddled the light canoe. Mrs. Stapler is a cultivated, refined lady. Mother Wallace was much stirred during Mrs. Stapler's address, and at its close came forward saying, "Fifty years ago I saw Mrs. Stapler, though until now I did not know it was the same person. It was on board a steamboat; her father was taking her to New Jersey to school, a bright, pleasant girl of twelve or fourteen. I was attracted by her, and on my expressing surprise to find she was an Indian, she said: 'Oh, the white people think of Indians as having rings in our noses and bells on our toes; but give us a chance and time will show that the Indian is capable of as high civilization as the whites.' After fifty years she stands here as the best exemplification of her own prophecy."

Mrs. McLendon, chairman of the reception committee here, who had done so much for our comfort, Miss Missouri Stokes, Mrs. Witter, president of the Old Atlanta Union, Professor Scomp, who paid a beautiful tribute to the grand women of the Atlanta unions, were introduced. Mrs. Donaldson, of Ontario, received most hearty welcome as she brought the greetings of our sisters across the Canadian border—one with us in work and aim.

Mrs. Carse now reported the Temperance Temple, giving the same facts lately given in our Temple number.

Mrs. Anna Snead Cairnes reported the department of relation of temperance and labor, and Mrs. E. B. Ingalls that of narcotics, giving very valuable papers, which will be found in the Stenographic Report.

Then followed touching memorial services conducted by the President: Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas, of England, First President World's W. C. T. U.; Mrs. Georgia Hulse McLeod, of Maryland, Southern Associate Press Department; Miss Julia Thomas, of New York, Lecturer of Health Department; Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, of New York; Mr. John Grubb Richardson, of Ireland; Mr. Lucian Adams Hagans, Illinois, were all tenderly remembered.

Adjourned by prayer.

SATURDAY EVENING.

The famous W. C. T. U. gavel was in use at an Executive Committee meeting on Y evening, but daughter-wit came promptly to the rescue, and a brush-broom tied, of course, with the white ribbon, and wielded by Mrs. Barnes, National superintendent of young woman's work, "called to order." Mrs. Barnes introduced Miss Ida Clothier, National Y organizer, as the presiding officer of the evening.

After the opening song, "We are Daughters of a King," the Scripture lesson was read by Miss Edna Hale, and prayer offered by Mrs. Norinne Law, of Michigan.

"The Battle Song of the Y's," in solo and chorus, and a recitation from bright little Louise Broadax, of Ohio, were followed by "Our daughters must help make America free," the solo being charmingly rendered by Miss Heidt.

The report of the fraternal delegates to the convention of the British W. T. A. was given by Mrs. Barnes. Well-nigh "killed by kindness," Mrs. Barnes and Miss Ames left our shores to receive most loving welcome from white-ribboners over the seas. English convention plans were found to be like our own and yet unlike; like in purpose, but unlike in methods. Impressive, indeed, was the scene when Lady Henry Somerset assumed the position of president of the British W. T. A., left vacant by the death of the lamented Margaret Bright Lucas.

Among the many public invitations, time and strength permitted the acceptance of but three—the great demonstration against the Compensation Bill, a Garden Party and a Y and Press Conference in London. Aside from these, luncheons and quiet home chats in the homes of many of England's nobility, who are truly royal because "Daughters of the King," made the days beautiful and fleet.

The exquisite word-touches, the tone and look of the speaker, utterly fail of reproduction by the reporter's pen. Mrs. Barnes' entire address will appear in the Stenographic Report.

The Y banner for largest increase of membership was won by Pennsylvania and presented by Miss Fessenden, of Massachusetts, who said:

"Massachusetts is proud to hold this banner just for a few minutes; what would it be to have it for a whole year." Miss Jessica Morgan, of Ohio, passed it on, saying: "It goes just over the line—it's next to having it ourselves." It was received by Mrs. W. L. Rhodes, superintendent of Y work in Pennsylvania, with brief thanks and earnest appeal to the young women of the audience to "come with us."

Miss Willard then read a letter from Marion Harland, relative to the neglected condition of the grave of Mary Washington. The dilapidated tomb and five acres of ground are now in the possession of the Mary Washington Monument Association. It was strongly urged that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union contribute to the fund for erecting a monument over the grave of George Washington's mother. Miss Willard asked that all the Marys present give a quarter of a dollar toward the fund, heading the fund herself for her mother and sisters—"Three Marys."

SABBATH SERVICES.

Sunday was a notable day for Atlanta, on account of the number of pulpits filled by women. The regular Sunday services of the W. C. T. U. were held in Trinity Church, Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, president of Illinois, delivering the annual sermon, or gospel talk, as she prefers to call it, at 3 o'clock. At the same hour, in the basement, the children's meeting was held, in charge of Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Massachusetts; also in another room of this many-roomed church, a young ladies' meeting was held, presided over by Mrs. Barnes. About sixty ladies spoke in the various churches, missions and Sabbath-schools, and all services were well attended. It was remarked by many old residents that never had so many Atlanta people attended church on one day.

TRINITY CHURCH.

Services presided over by Mrs. Fessenden, and opened with singing, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," followed by Scripture reading by Mrs. Hathaway, of Illinois, from I Corinthians, first chapter, beginning at the eighteenth verse.

Prayer by Mrs. Rastall, Kansas.

Singing, "Come, Thou Fount of every blessing."

Mrs. Rounds, who, by appointment, was to preach the annual sermon, on being presented to the congregation, said that, although she was not a minister, never had hands laid upon her head nor given holy orders, still she came with the old, old story.

The text was taken from the first chapter of the second epistle of Peter, the fifth, sixth and seventh verses: "And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity."

The stenographer who has reported each annual sermon for five years, declares that this is the strongest one delivered in that time before the National. It is given in full in the Stenographic Report.

OPERA HOUSE—MASS-MEETING.

Although little notice had been given of this meeting, because Miss Willard did not wish it to interfere with the annual sermon being delivered by Mrs. Rounds at the same hour, the Opera House was packed, floor, galleries, boxes and stage. Mrs. Sibley, president of Georgia, presided.

The exercises opened with, "How firm a Foundation," sung in the old Southern tune by the whole audience, led by the clear, true voice of Anna Gordon. Jennie Smith read the first Psalm and Mrs. Sophia Grubb led in prayer, remembering especially the young men who made up so large a part of the audience.

Another hymn, then Miss Willard was introduced and spoke on her favorite theme, "A White Life for Two." Grand and beautiful as were her words—and they were never more so—it was even more beautiful and grand to look into those hundreds of eager faces, full of curiosity—kindly or critical—at first, soon warming into deepest interest as she proceeded.

She glided easily into some of the lessons of the convention, showing that if the women of this age have less of the clinging they have more of courage; less of the doll and more of the duchess; less of the syren and more of the sisterly.

"Do not make the mistake that the W. C. T. U. is devoted to the 'Woman question;' it is the great human question that concerns us," she said.

"Nearer, My God, to Thee" was sung. after which Mrs. Ellis, of New Jersey, "made a few remarks" that crystallized into a perfect gem of a speech.

Mrs. Burt, of New York, asked for the collection, and received a generous response.

While the collection was being taken, Mrs. Sibley made some very happy remarks, keeping the audience in good nature.

Then came our Deborah, Mrs. Governor Wallace, "the mother of Ben Hur." Our memory stretches back to war times, with its enthusiastic meetings, and all through the years since, it has been our privilege to look into the faces of great assemblies when swayed by intense feeling, yet never, anywhere, have we ever seen an audience so wondrously moved as was that one by Mrs. Wallace's address, and it was not an audience easily roused. In the boxes and the parquet was cool, cultured cynicism, and all gradation from that up to the rabble in the "peanut gallery;" yet all were equally moved. Rough men sat with elbows on their knees, chins in their hands, eagerly listening with eyes and mouth as well as ears, sometimes interjecting. "That's so," "She knows," etc. The cynicism faded out of cultured faces, and conviction took its place; every good point—and they were many—was greeted with cheers, and when she closed, there was such a storm of applause, such waving of handkerchiefs as is seldom seen, and the applause "would not down." Never did prima donna receive a more enthusiastic encore; an encore it was, and nothing would silence it but to have her step to the front again. This she did, and said, "I am too old to be flattered by this applause. If in your legislature you will give to woman just a little bit of suffrage—say school suffrage—I shall know how much value to place on your cheers. But I should like to know how many of you believe the doctrine I have just preached. Those of you who do, rise." Nearly the whole house rose, and from floor to highest gallery, waving handkerchiefs made it a billowy sea of white. Scarcely was the doxology sung, when men rushed to the platform to shake her hand and declare their conversion to woman suffrage. So great was the throng surrounding her that she seemed in danger of being crushed, when her kind host, Mr. Chamberlain, rescued her and took her to the carriage. In the evening she spoke to another large audience in the Christian Church, when as much interest, if not as much enthusiasm was evoked. Mrs. Wallace's address will be found in next week's UNION SIGNAL.

SUNDAY EVENING—MEETING IN TRINITY CHURCH.

The Sabbath services in Trinity Church closed with a gospel temperance meeting, presided over by Miss Helen L. Hood, of Illinois. Miss Henrietta G. Moore, of Ohio, read the Scripture and led in prayer. The first address was by Mrs. J. T. Ellis, of New Jersey, who made such a decided impression in the Opera House meeting in the afternoon.

After singing, "Rescue the Perishing," Miss Hood introduced Col. George Woodford, of Illinois. His address was clear and convincing in argument and touching in its pathos. We can give only a few of its good points:

This temperance question has now narrowed down to just the difference between abstinence and indulgence. All half-way measures have proved futile; as Tom Marshall said of the old movement which had not total abstinence for its basis, "It died of intemperance, with a bottle of champagne in one hand and a pledge in the other."

One grand thing we have accomplished: we have found out what to do by finding out what not to do. Nothing is failure which makes way for broader, better methods. It takes a great deal of grace for a man to forgive a woman for knowing more than he does; most of us are short of this kind of grace. But as I have sat here during these days, I have felt, who shall solve this temperance question if not these conservative women? The best in this world, the best in all worlds, can be had without sin. Protective law as well as protective love is needed.

The law of total abstinence a man can enforce upon himself. This was the text for earnest appeals for men to sign the pledge, which was presented and signed by many.

Meeting closed with the benediction.

MONDAY MORNING.

Many Northern women wilted under the unaccustomed heat of Atlanta, Sunday; among others, Miss Willard, who for the first time in seventeen years did not feel strong enough, in body, to attend a session of the National convention. Mrs. Buell therefore called the convention to order.

Opening prayer by Mrs. Hitchcock, of Nebraska. Mrs. Buell called upon the secretary to read the by-laws providing for a presiding officer in case of sickness or death of the president. Mrs. Woodbridge read it, showing that in such a case the general officers should preside in order. This devolves the duty of presiding upon Mrs. Buell, as Miss Willard was not well enough to preside this morning. She announced that owing to a mistake in the program, which brings the election of officers Tuesday morning, we are obliged to make a change in order to comply with the constitution and have the election this morning. By vote, election was made the special order of business at 10:30 a. m., and the report of the superintendents was resumed. The first was the SCHOOL OF METHODS.

This department is the Normal school of the W. C. T. U., its object being to train teachers in methods of the W. C. T. U. work. It is only four years old, but has already attained goodly proportions. The superintendent, Mary Allen West, reported that during the year there had been held twenty-six state Schools of Methods, or in connection with Chautauquas; 165 county or inter-county schools, with an aggregate attendance of over fifteen thousand. These schools have been generally conducted by presidents of states or National superintendents, with National and state superintendents as teachers in their especial departments. These schools occupy from one or two days, for the county schools, to two weeks in the Chautauquas. The number of departments discussed of course varies with the length of session; the combined curriculum of these schools sweeps the whole circle of the W. C. T. U. work. Most interest had been aroused in evangelistic, juvenile, Sunday-school, educational and foreign work, and parliamentary usage. This last department is in special charge of Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, associate superintendent, who has done grand work, particularly in a series of parliamentary institutes.

Mr. Ferdinand Schumacher, of Akron, Ohio, having offered $500 to the National and as much more as the organization will cover, for the purpose of establishing a W. C. T. U. Training School, the offer was gratefully accepted by the Executive Committee and a committee appointed to prepare plans for commencing the work. This committee reported in favor of holding an experimental session of six weeks' duration next winter, provided twenty suitable women shall report themselves to the superintendent before December 10 as ready to take the course. The school shall be in Chicago in charge of the superintendent. Its object shall be to give systematic training in W. C. T. U. departmental work. The theory will be taught from departmental manuals and other helps provided; the practice, by field work and observation of methods adopted by various organizations in the city. Bible study and how to use the Bible in our work will hold a prominent place in the school's curriculum.

The instruction shall be under the supervision of the National Superintendent of School of Methods, who will call in the service of such experts in different departments as she can secure. Her services shall be rendered gratuitously, but she shall be provided with a clerk.

Concerning the class of pupils desired, they should be earnest, Christian women, not less than twenty-five years old, well educated, possessed of grace, grit and gumption in abundance, willing to spend and be spent in the Master's service, and able to adapt themselves to the varying conditions of the work and workers. They must prove themselves servants of the Lord by being "gentle, apt to teach;" they will be expected to continue in active W. C. T. U. work at least one year after leaving the Training School. Report accepted.

Dr. Thomas, President Stone, of the Woman's Medical College, Dr. Hawthorne and Baby Forbes were introduced, the baby being made an honorary member. A letter was read from Henry H. Faxon, of Quincy, Mass., accompanied by a check for one hundred dollars.

Mrs. Elizabeth Comstock, the philanthropist, and her daughter, were introduced and made honorary members of the convention.

Miss Greenwood now reported the evangelistic work. She dwelt earnestly upon her ideals for her department:

1st. That every local union hold weekly a devotional meeting separate from the business meeting.

2d. That each local union have, during the year, a week at least of Bible expositions, to stimulate the workers and reach the uninterested.

3d. That in the National, state and county conventions, the hour from 11 a. m. to 12 m. be devoted to a Bible exposition for the spiritual uplifting of the workers, that we may inspire the community with the truth that we have not departed from the gospel lines of work.

4th. That a half hour of each morning be given to a season of communion with God and Bible reading. Let every white-ribboner keep this trysting time with our Father, that thus our strength may be renewed.

The hour for the election of officers having arrived, Miss Mollie Hay, of Indiana, Mrs. Mount, of Alabama. Mrs. Rhoades, of Pennsylvania, and Miss Griffin, of Tennessee, were appointed as the first set of tellers who distributed the blank ballots. Mrs. Downs, of New Jersey, offered prayer for Divine guidance in voting and for the speedy recovery of our President.

The report of the committee on credentials was given, showing the number entitled to vote, four hundred and six. The informal ballot for President was now taken, and by vote it was ordered that the tellers retire and count the ballots.

A second set of tellers was appointed, Miss Cornelia Dow, Mrs. C. G. Davis, Mrs. Blair, of Nebraska, and Mrs. Rice, of Massachusetts. While the ballots were being counted, Mrs. Nichols, of Indiana, in the absence of Mrs. Cairnes, reported the visit of our delegates to the National Grange, now in session in this city. They were received with the greatest form and courtesy, and a response to their address made by a prominent officer. At the suggestion of Mrs. Nichols the Grange decided to have its own exhibit at the Columbian Fair; to protest against the sale of intoxicating liquor on the grounds or any gambling devices; also to have plenty of good drinking water on the grounds.

The report of the tellers showed that all the general officers are elected by practically unanimous vote. Mrs. Mayer voiced the noon devotions in an uplifting prayer, and the meeting adjourned.

MONDAY AFTERNOON.

The meeting was called to order by Mrs. Buell, followed by singing, "Come, Thou Fount of every blessing," and prayer led by Mrs. Baldwin, Maryland.

The minutes were read and adopted.

Mrs. Gauze, chairman of the committee on Sabbath services, now reported, showing that most of the churches had been open to the delegates. In conclusion she said:

This morning most glorious reports, both from the ministers and the churches and also from the speakers, were received, and our hearts are filled with gratitude unspeakable. In the language of our Crusade psalm, "Praise ye the Lord."

Report adopted.

Mrs. Meriwether said: "You all know that our prohibition candidate in Tennessee has been suspended as a minister for six months, because he chose to stand as a candidate. His wife has just died, and I move a telegram of condolence be sent to Rev. Dr. Kelly."

So ordered.

Dean Wright here reported on Bible study as follows:

I esteem this a privilege and an honor. Particularly, I wished to call attention to the quality of the work which is being done by the pupils under my care, the representatives of the W. C. T. U. I want that fact to be emphasized, not alone in your thought, but in every statement you make in regard to it. The women who apply for instruction in your courses of study are all very busy. I haven't received any inquiries from women who didn't have enough already to do. These women are accomplishing great things in consideration of what they are already undertaking to do. They do a great deal better than the ministers whom I have had the honor of instructing during the last nine years. The ministers won't mind, and so when they come to recite, they cannot. That is why they do not do well. The women mind their instruction, and so when they take the sealed envelopes which contain the questions to be answered, they have learned their lesson. The courses of study which you have provided are: First, the evangelistic course. That includes the English Bible, New Testament Greek, the elementary principles, English grammar, English rhetoric, and last evangelistic methodology. We have not done much in the line of instruction in this section yet, but during the present year we shall pay particular attention to that. It includes, first, how to lead souls to Jesus, how to lead a prayer meeting, not a female prayer meeting, how to deal with inquirers. That is what we mean by evangelistic methodology, the methods of evangelism. I do not know how much time it will take each day, perhaps an hour. Try and see. I have recommended the English course of Bible study. It consists simply of the English Bible—you need no text-books. This course of instruction includes simply six lessons in the Bible for each four years. And what does this course of study intend to do? First, to show you how to prove to yourself that your faith in the Bible rests on the truth. We are not teaching you how to interpret the Bible.

Report of Mrs. Bateham, of Ohio, superintendent of Sabbath Observance, came next, from which we give a few points. As the people must be educated largely by literature, thirty leaflets on different phases of the Sabbath question have been issued by the department. The first week of April is observed by this department as a week of prayer for the better observance of the Sabbath, and all Christians are heartily invited to join in its meetings.

Mrs. Nichols, superintendent of state and county fairs, both in the National and in the World's Union, in which capacity she superintended these unions' exhibits at the Paris Exposition, now made her report. It gave many facts of great interest which we have before given in this paper.

Before giving report, Mrs. Nichols offered a resolution of thanks to Miss Pearce, of London, England, for faithful care of the exhibits of the National W. C. T. U. at the Paris Exposition, which was carried.

She then briefly alluded to the work of the exhibit of the World's W. C. T. U. at the Exposition there, that of the National W. C. T. U., the work done in the National Fair Department, plans for future work of the department, and for an exhibit at the World's Fair at Chicago.

Mrs. Barney was not present, but her report was read by Mrs. Martin, of Rhode Island. It is given in full in the Stenographic Report.

FLOWER MISSION WORK

originated in England by Mary Stanley, sister of Dean Stanley and companion of Florence Nightingale, at the Crimea, has had a wonderful development in connection with the W. C. T. U. The superintendent of this department is Jennie Casseday, of Louisville, who for over twenty years has been confined to her sick-room, and yet exerts a most potent influence all over the country. She plans the work, selects texts of Scripture, which are printed on cards tied with white ribbon to bouquets of flowers, bringing "something white, something bright and something sweet" into thousands of sick rooms and prison cells. By this mission the poor, the sick and the prisoner have the gospel preached unto them. She who is the inspiration, the center and mainspring of this work, can never look upon it; she can never meet with us in convention. The report of her work is given as well as words can give it—work accomplished through devoted state and local superintendents, read by her secretary, Miss Ferguson. This is its summary:

Text cards sold and donated by the National superintendent for the work, 77,764; bouquets distributed, 95,279; literature, temperance and religious (pages), 266,544; tracts, English, German and Italian, 2,905; Easter and Christmas cards and letter, 1,612; religious poems, 784; Bibles and Testaments, 453; leaflets, 10,225; sick or poor families visited and helped, 6,666; baskets clothing, 621; boxes fruit, 297; baskets food, 112; meals furnished, 339; glasses jelly, 102; flowers, crates, June 9, 567; flowers, baskets, 87; signatures to the pledge, 1,683; services held, 724; conversions, 148; churches decorated on Memorial days, 84; number of Flower Missions reported, 217; amount expended by local workers, $973.42.

At the conclusion of these reports the convention adjourned to accept the invitation of Governor and Mrs. Northen to a reception at the Executive Mansion, to be followed by one at the Y. M. C. A. rooms.

Lights shone from every tower and turret of the Executive Mansion last night, welcoming us to the broad halls, where Governor Northen, with his wife and daughter, waited to receive their guests. Mrs. Northen's grace appeared in her dress as well as in her sweet face, crowned with smoothly brushed hair. She wore a simple gray cloth dress, so her guests, many of them in traveling costume, felt quite at ease. A beautiful souvenir card, bearing the autographs of Governor and Mrs. Northen and tied with a white ribbon, was given each guest.

Atlanta is justly proud of its Y. M. C. A., which dwells in its own habitation at the corner of Pryor and Wheat Streets. The building is of brick with brownstone facade, is five stories high, and has about forty rooms. The cost was $100,000. The Woman's Auxiliary contributed $10,000 toward the building, and $4,000 in the furnishings, which are very beautiful. The parlors were decorated with garlands of ivy and chrysanthemums, the state flower. This association boasts the finest gymnasium in the South. Best of all, it rejoices in having "put one hundred young men into the churches this year," as the General Secretary says with tender pride. The work of the Y. M. C. A. is less reformatory than that of the W. C. T. U., but it is preventive, and might it not be said, an ounce of preventive is worth a pound of reform? Its welcome to the W. C. T. U. in this reception was cordial and beautiful.

MONDAY EVENING'S MEETING.

This was an unique meeting, nothing like it ever having been enjoyed before at the National. Heretofore the state presidents have had no official recognition on the program of the National. This year Monday evening was devoted to the state presidents, each being allowed two minutes to tell all she knew. All who knew these women looked forward to this as the great feature of the convention. To make it more enjoyable some of the best singers of Atlanta sang for us. The exercises opened with a song by the Orpheus Club composed of sixteen young gentlemen, giving first, "Throw out the Life Boat," and responding to the encore with "Jesus is Tenderly Calling Me Home."

The first state on the list is Alabama; her president not being present she was represented by Mrs. Cochrane. She said·

Madam President and Ladies:—

When you have heard the report of our state organizer, Miss Frances E. Griffin, all that could be said of state work is embodied in it. She has indomitable will and strength of purpose, love inexpressible for her native state, ability beyond the usual standard of her sex, and what she has accomplished is all that could be done, yet it is painfully evident that our state is not equal in this work to many others. Our flag is thrown to the breeze and we will wave it until we accomplish the end that our beloved Sister Lathrap so ably presented to us in her address last night.

Our fiscal year closes in April; hence our treasurer's report to this convention is incomplete.

Our superintendent of scientific temperance instruction is up to the proper standard in her department, and her scientific, scholarly husband, Dr. Peter Bryce, is a helpful medium that tends to success.

I cannot say too much for Miss Julia Tutwiler's faithful, efficient work among criminals. This department, under her superintendence, is entirely satisfactory. She has been justly recognized by press and pulpit as one of the most philanthropic enthusiasts in the line of prison reform that has appeared in this country. Cultured to a degree of perfection, tender in her nature, she is all we could desire in the department.

We have a few ministers who extend a helping hand, and although we are numerically weak in state, counties and towns, the few heroic ones feel the force of responsibility, and will return home with renewed zeal and inspiration gathered from the able women of this great convention.

Mrs. L. C. Hughes, the president of Arizona:

Madam President, Ladies and Friends:—

I am glad to be with you and proud to be one of you. In Arizona we have a population of 60,000 whites and about 40,000 Indians. As with all western countries, the rum element is the controlling power, and until quite recently it has flaunted its power with audacity, and hurled defiance at every attempt to crush out this evil. But the prayers of our Christian women for the last few years have worked a marvelous change. The seed sown and prayers offered have permeated every settlement, yes, in the valleys, the mining camps, and in the mountains public sentiment and opinion is growing against this evil, and ere long this will be crystallized into positive action, and then comes the victory. My friends, I am here to-night to ask your aid. We have a governor for the first time in the history of Arizona, who is in full accord with us, and we hope to have temperance legislation this coming winter.

Mrs. L. M. Chace, the president of Arkansas, in her soft Quaker gray, now told us of the original "Arkansas Traveler."

I suppose that all of our friends here have heard of the Arkansas Traveler? He has been known for a long time, and when the temperance work commenced in 1879, he commenced to travel for the W. C. T. U. There was but one county in the state then that did not have open saloons. To-day there are forty-four counties that haven't a licensed saloon! And this is the result of the W. C. T. U. We have used our influence with our Legislature with regard to having scientific laws on temperance, but the Arkansas legislators thought they were wiser than the legislators of the United States, and the rest of the states, and they haven't given it to us yet. We have also used our influence in favor of protecting our girls, but we haven't secured their protection. The temperance sentiment throughout the state is largely increased, though, and we are thankful to say that while we have not advanced in numbers as a union, yet we feel the uplifting of our state has been largely blessed.

Mr. Cole, of Atlanta, an unusually fine baritone, sung a song. "He and She," most delightfully.

Mrs. Emily P. Stevens spoke for California in the absence of the president:

Madam President and Friends:—

I come from the far-off land of California, but I believe that we have the most wide-awake, aggressive, earnest W. C. T. U. to be found in the United States. And we are loyal to our beloved President and the National, notwithstanding the Republican Party says we are not. We have no Sunday law in our state, but we have a mammoth petition for it before our Legislature this year. Also a petition for franchise, because we, the women, and the Chinamen, are the only people in California that cannot vote. We are terribly in earnest, dear friends. We mean to annihilate the saloons. In the city of San Francisco we have 4,000 saloons and 10,000 boy-drunkards. But we are all alive and in earnest, and, with God's help, will see the liquor traffic buried so deep it never will have a resurrection.

Mrs. N. P. J. Button was introduced as the president for (Southern) California:

We come to the National Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with loyal greetings from the fairest part of the Pacific's golden state, California; the beautiful southland of California, where trees are ever green and flowers are ever blooming; where there is more climate and better climate to the square foot than can be found elsewhere on God's green earth. This I say after having seen fair Atlanta, the Gate City of Georgia. Our eastern friends and its admirers call it the second Garden of Eden. But then, as in the first garden, Madam President, the trail of the serpent is seen! High license, or temperance as taught by the dominant political parties of the land!

How long! O Lord, how long? We have traveled many long, weary days to reach this Mecca of our organizations, and I feel honored by being permitted to make a two-minute speech before this august body, not expecting to add anything of interest, but hoping to be so enthused with zeal and earnestness for future work that we may count the toil, weariness and expense of our long journey as naught!

I am glad to say to you, Madam President, that the principles of the W. C. T. U. are steadily gaining in our loved land. Never can it be otherwise, when the Republican nominee for the highest office in the state, publicly announces that he has never given a nickel, or said one word favoring prohibition. I hope Georgia's fair women and brave men will thank God and the Farmers' Alliance for a temperance Governor, and pray that there may be enough of that kind for all the sisterhood of states in the near future.

Mrs. Mary C. Woody spoke for North Carolina:

I am glad that Carolina is spelled with a C and not with a W. I say that "in warning of" what is to follow. But what can a state president say about the work in two minutes? They are not noted for being brief. North Carolina, a state reaching from the mountains to the sea, which, if it were swung upon a pivot at its longest corner, would sweep through Georgia down through Florida, up to the Ohio river—(two minutes!!) with a thousand distilleries—what can we say in two minutes? North Carolina is a conservative state; but when we march up against conservatism, it doesn't follow we have walked up against a stone wall. It will yield; it is pliable. I would far rather come in contact with conservatism than skepticism, which has nothing to rest upon. Conservatism furnishes a good foundation, and it is beginning to look with favor upon the W. C. T. U., and we are old enough now there to be respected.

Mrs. M. J. O'Connell spoke a word for North Carolina W. C. T. U. No. 2:

It is with no small degree of pleasure and gratitude to God that I am permitted to appear before you to speak of the work of Union No. 2 of North Carolina. Our state union was organized July 15, 1890. I am glad to be able to tell you that there are some earnest Christian negro women in North Carolina, whose hearts are in every movement of the W. C. T. U. We have come to join our hearts and our prayers with yours, and to join hands with you, never to let go till we shall have encircled the world for Christ and against the great king alcohol.

Mrs. A. A. W. Cadwallader, of Florida:

Madam President and Friends:—

I am not going to say anything about the climate of Florida as compared with Southern California, but just ask you to look at Florida's president and at Southern California's. (Florida's president weighed 200 pounds, while the other was tall and slender.) [Great laughter].

If I am not mistaken Florida is the baby of this National body. Arizona and we may be twins, but I know we are less than seven years old, with an influence in our state that any state in the Union might well envy, although we live largely in the winter. But we live so fast and grandly that in less than seven years there isn't a press in our state that ever says a word adversely about our work, whether we go to the polls or where. They commend our work. The Florida Times-Union, of Jacksonville, the leading paper—well, if I wasn't in Atlanta where the Journal keeps a lion and the Constitution an elephant, I would say the leading paper of the South, but as it is, I will say of Jacksonville, helps us very much.

Miss Willard came down and looked after our christening; there were so many children in the South that she appointed a nurse to look after us, dear Sister Chapin. And she did her work so well that in six years we had cut our eye-teeth, had the whooping cough and the measles, and the National sent her out to establish more children just like us.

Miss Heidt here favored the audience with a solo, "Show me Thy ways, Oh, Lord," the singing of which delighted and charmed all who heard it. The young lady is the happy possessor of a particularly pleasing voice, and her singing showed how wonderfully such a gift can be cultivated.

Mrs. Eva Higgins, president of Colorado:

Madam President:—

Colorado comes with a slight increase of sheaves this year. Like every other state our locality has obstacles to overcome, exorbitant railroad rates, broad plains and high mountains. It was a wonderful coming down for us to come to Georgia, but we are glad we are here and only take back sweet memories of the Southland.

We have a Mexican population in the Southern part of the State—so large that they can elect their own candidate to represent them. That candidate is often an uneducated and uncultured Mexican. Even they are sometimes a credit to the white men we send there. As our people are becoming more settled our cause is being rooted and the principles of prohibition are growing. We nearly quadrupled our Prohibition vote this year. The W. C. T. U. of Colorado is no farce, but an important factor in the Christianizing and civilizing of that part of the country. We have there men and women with principles as fixed and character as strong as the mighty snow-capped mountains that surround our homes. Our one state institution, the Cottage Home, where we care for, protect and save the innocent unfortunate, is well supported. I learned to-day that we are the banner state for the increase of Loyal Legions this year. Yea, the tramp of little feet is being heard through the length and breadth of our state. It means pure lives and thoughts.

Mrs. Forbes, of Connecticut, was introduced:

On the map there is a little corner up in the northeast part of the nation called New England, and I think all the rest of the nation delights to make us very small, for whenever they want to tell about the size of Texas or Ohio, they say five or six times as large as New England. And Connecticut is only a little corner of New England. Though Connecticut is rather diminutive in size, I am glad she is, for two minutes would not do otherwise to tell her progress. I really pity the presidents of these great domains. Though diminutive she is rather proud, because she can boast of such men as Lyman Beecher and Horace Bushnell; and such women as Harriet Beecher Stowe and Mrs. Buell. Dear friends, though the politics of our state is a little bit doubtful, the W. C. T. U. is not the least bit so. It is very positive, though perhaps not very aggressive. We know just where we stand and that is worth a great deal in these days, you know. We have our little state organ, The White Ribbon Banner, not a year old yet. We have a law prohibiting the sale or gift of tobacco to boys under sixteen years of age, and then we have the very meanest, most insignificant text-books on scientific temperance in the nation, prepared simply to kill the law in our state. We are going on our way grandly, however, in spite of all this.

A duet, "Samantha Allen's Advice," a very amusing prohibition object lesson, was sung by Professor O'Dell, of Nebraska, and Mrs. Nichols, of Minnesota.

Mrs. H. M. Barker, introduced for South Dakota:

I am so glad, my friends, to give you an exhaustive history of the work of the W. C. T. U. of South Dakota in two minutes, and I am very glad to be here. Our friends felt rather badly to have us leave the balmy climate of South Dakota, and come down here and risk the cyclones of the South, and I have written back for their comfort that we have not seen a cyclone since we came here. The last five years in South Dakota have been campaign years. They submitted prohibition and we carried it, and it went into the constitution. We sent the constitution down to Washington, and asked that we be admitted, and Mrs. Hoffman's senator from Missouri objected to our admission; then South Dakota sent a message to Congress, and we said—refined and cultured as we are—"Pull down your Vest." Then the omnibus bill said, if we would submit the question of prohibition again we might be admitted with prohibition in it, if the people would so vote. We carried that with a majority of 8,000, and then this last year we have been in another campaign, and we tried to put equal suffrage in the constitution, and chivalric as your men are down here we have got men up there, because all our best men, and men with smart wives, voted for equal suffrage. But we have all the foreigners up there, Scandinavians and Germans, and others that can't read the English language, and they were permitted to say, "Dem vimmen shan't vote." So we lost this.

One of those foreigners got off at a station the other day, and they had been having a small-pox scare, and one man ran up and said: "Say, have you been vaccinated?" "Yes, I was vaccinated six months ago, and I have voted ever since." He didn't know the difference between naturalization and vaccination. We are going to continue this fight until woman occupies the place God meant she should occupy as a helpmate to man, not only in the church and in the home, but in society and in the government.

Miss Margaret R. Hillis, president of Delaware, was called upon:

Little Delaware makes boast neither of her size nor age. She is not yet entered into her teens, but she is one of the little strands in this great W. C. T. U. Among the things we have been able to accomplish is that of following Mrs. Hunt's suggestion and securing the enactment of a scientific instruction law. Also to have a law passed providing for the better protection of our women and girls. We have secured the appointment of a police matron, and even though so small as to be lost in one of your counties in the larger states, we do boast that in Wilmington the first school for girls was founded in this country. In the fifteen hundred membership we have yet to hear the first whisper of discontent or disloyalty to the National W. C. T. U. What rejoices us most is the fact that we have an army of children nearly fifteen hundred strong, marching along right bravely, with their banners and singing,

"Saloons, saloons, saloons must go."

District of Columbia was heard from through Mrs. S. D. LaFetra, president, as follows:

Dear Friends—I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak to you this two minutes of the work at the nation's capital, your city as well as mine. We have a thoroughly organized W. C. T. U. down there. We have twelve W's and ten Y's with a membership of 625. Our Executive Board is composed of forty earnest, consecrated women from the very heart of the prayer-meetings of eight different denominations. We are holding aloft our banner. Our city is composed of government officials and employés almost entirely, and political complications come in and often affect our work. But our brave workers never hesitate to wear the white ribbon. We are not afraid to be called Prohibitionists. We have lost two only by secession during the past year, but, dear friends, our ranks have been filled by others, and our membership has increased the last year twenty-five per cent. Another feature of our work is that among the colored people; we have several earnest, active auxiliaries among the colored people, and the colored sisters come into our executive board on an equal footing with ourselves, and this has been very educational and helpful to them. We have also many Loyal Temperance Legions aggregating many thousand children. At our last annual meeting I was authorized to invite the W. C. T. U. to meet at Washington next year and to bring to you this cordial invitation from those at home. There should also be a meeting of our organization while Congress is in session. To this end we have planned a meeting to be held the 11th of February, to continue four days. We hope you will bear in mind the meeting. We do hope many members of the Executive Board will be present.

TUESDAY MORNING.

Mrs. Buell presiding, as Miss Willard was in Executive Committee meeting. Opening prayer by Mrs. L. B. Tyng, of Illinois.

Mrs. Ada M. Bittenbender, of Nebraska, W. C. T. U. attorney at Washington, reported for her department, that of legislation and petition, whose work it is to secure state and national temperance legislation. She showed much good work done in states, and several important forward steps in temperance legislation taken by Congress.

Mrs. S. B. Wilkins, Illinois, now gave a very interesting report of the National Temperance Hospital at Chicago. Scientific evidence had fully demonstrated the principle which the hospital advocates, that alcohol is not essential either as medicine or food.

This principle is fast gaining recognition in professional circles. Said a prominent physician to us lately, "You women would be astonished to know how many physicians are discarding the use of alcohol."

What is now needed is such a demonstration of this principle that all physicians shall accept and practice it. Such a demonstration has been going on in the London Temperance Hospital for fifteen years, and the same work is being done in this country by our hospital, and it is imperatively needed in America.

The past year has been the best in the five years life of this institution. Last spring it was thoroughly reorganized, its board of directors enlarged, an association back of them organized; staff of ten physicians, including both schools and both sexes secured, all devoted to the principle for which we contend. The Clara Barton Training School for nurses is doing admirable work. A hundred patients have been treated in the hospital since last April, they are from ten states and are of twelve nationalities, so that it is already a cosmopolitan institution. Its financial condition is better than ever before; the debt with which the year opened has been cleared off, and that with almost no appeal to outsiders. But this institution needs and deserves aid from all temperance people, as it is strengthening the very foundation of temperance. Every state should endow a bed in the hospital, $350 a year; secure members to the association; send patients to it; pray for it. At the conclusion of this report Mrs. J. B. Hobbs offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, The National Temperance Hospital, located in Chicago, has been established on a solid foundation, and has been successfully operated during the past year; and

WHEREAS, This hospital is being conducted and managed by a board of W. C. T. U. women; and

WHEREAS, It has an excellent medical staff in full sympathy with the principles of the W. C. T. U.; and

WHEREAS, It is daily demonstrated that disease can be successfully treated without the use of alcoholics; and

WHEREAS, We believe that non-alcoholic medication is a principle that must be established before total abstinence can be maintained. Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National W. C. T. U. in convention assembled, do most heartily indorse this noble effort to demonstrate this principle, and that we will officially and individually do what we can to promote its further success."

A telegram was read from Dr. C. G. Davis, chief of its staff of physicians, saying: "Every bed filled; we must have a new hospital."

Mrs. Buell, in the absence of Mrs. R. A. Emmons, reported for the Woman's Lecture Bureau:

This is the only Lecture Bureau controlled entirely by women, and while it is called a "Woman's Bureau" it has upon its list of speakers both sexes. It includes not only those whose work bears upon the temperance reform, but aims to supply Sunday-school, Chautauqua Assemblies, Summer Camps, G. A. R. Posts, and all who desire to arrange for literary, musical and other entertainments. All our money should not be put into leaflets or all into speakers; neither should supplant the other, but both be used. "Every politician knows the power of personal appeal. The 'campaign document' never crowds out the campaign speaker."

We are in direct communication with five thousand or more local unions, and these are constantly making a request for speakers. By making these engagements from our own Headquarters, from whence radiate lines of communication and convenience to the local unions, that are strung like pearls along all the lines of railway from the center to the circumference of the Nation, we are in a position to afford facilities that cannot, for many years at least, be supplied by any other organization. We not only have the demand but we can create it; we not only have the supply but we can increase it. It has only been run systematically for two years, the first year receipts were $610.04, the second year a little over one thousand dollars was its income. It is now practically self-supporting, and its reputation well established.

Reports of National organizers were now in order, and given by Miss Frances E. Griffin, Alabama; Miss Henrietta Moore, Ohio; Mrs. M. L. Wells, Tennessee; Mrs. L. H. Washington, New York; Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, Massachusetts, and Mrs. Mary Read Goodale, Louisiana. They will be found in the Stenographic Report.

In the midst of the reports a flutter of white handkerchiefs in the audience announced to those who could not see her the coming of Miss Willard on to the stage from the rear. For the first time in seventeen years she had been prevented by sickness from a day's meeting of the National Convention.

Mrs. Dunham, of Iowa, chairman of the committee appointed to announce to Miss Willard her election, now presented her to the convention, saying:

The greatest honor—the greatest pleasure of my whole life, has been conferred upon me to-day. I cannot express the love and esteem we all feel for our President, but I do have the pleasure of presenting to you our beloved leader, who has consented to walk before us in the days to come.

MISS WILLARD—Somehow you look more beautiful to me since I have been away. You look like a bigger convention. I said to Anna yesterday, it is rather lonesome to be shut up here with the women's tongues going like a buzzing top, their minds working like a righteous fermentation, and their hearts beating for the nation; and this morning, when I had a little day or night dream, I don't know which, with the birds twittering outside in your golden weather, about five o'clock, I saw a beautiful city, with such wonderful banners floating from the towers and turrets, and all these banners white, and on one it said, "Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crime and the cities of violence." And on another banner it said, "The Lord shall turn the way of the wicked upside down." And on another it said that "Our daughters may be like corner-stones polished after the similitude of a palace." And on another it said, "The little feet are coming, the children are afield. Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up." And over the great arch of the city were the words, "For God and Home and Native Land." And a great procession was going in, and women with their blessed faces and their great hearts were holding me up on either side, and as we entered they whispered in their motherly voices, "We have made you our chief," and then I fell down upon my face in that beautiful city of refuge, the home city of the Republic, and heard a voice above saying, "Lo, I am with you always." And I then and there pledged soul and body and spirit that I will be true to the National W. C. T. U.; that I will speak those words and do those deeds that seem to me to be the best, no matter what it may bring on me of condemnation or cross-currents, but that for those things that you love, and because you and I pray together and trust each other more and more, it shall be true that you shall see my heart. So help us God; we stand for the blessed white ribbon with its purity, and the W. C. T. U. with its gospel for a purified home, a protected childhood and a redeemed nation. I would like Mary T. Lathrap, the first woman who ever spoke to me about being a leader in the National, who, when back in 1874, turned to me as I came a school-teacher into the convention, and in her off-hand way said, "Frances, we are going to make you Cor. Sec. (corresponding secretary), and I said, I am not wise enough, and she insisted; and so I always look upon her as my sponsor and stand-by, I would like her blessing on me in this house of feebleness, and yet of joy, and on us all.

Mrs. Lathrap complied with this request in a prayer that voiced the deepest feeling of all hearts. The hour for devotional exercises having arrived, Miss Greenwood gave a beautiful Bible reading.

Miss Willard now introduced Colonel Pringle, the hero of temperance legislation in Georgia, in whose legislature he had stood for years, the stalwart advocate for no-license, temperance teaching in the public schools, and all other forms of good legislation. In response he said:

Madam President: I just wished to return my thanks to the honored President, and to each member of this great convention, for the kindness they have extended to me. I take it more in honor of the Georgia Temperance Association, that I happen to be President of, than I do as a personal honor to myself. And in the name of the Georgia Temperance Association, I extend to this convention a most cordial greeting. In the name of every temperance association of this state, we extend a most cordial greeting.

On motion the thanks of the convention are extended to the proprietors of the Southern Star for their general distribution of papers, two thousand copies having been distributed gratuitously among the audience.

Rev. Dr. Thirkell, the president of Gammon Theological Seminary, was introduced. He said:

Allow me thirty seconds to say that the first address I ever had the privilege of delivering was under the auspices of the Woman's Crusade in my native Ohio town. I always felt I got a good start then. I have been for the last seven years at the head of an institution for the training of colored ministers. I want you to feel that we are your allies in this work. In our late temperance campaign in Atlanta, when every other precinct and district in the city went for liquor, the South Bend district, in which our institutions are located, alone went for prohibition.

On motion, the thanks of the convention were extended to Brother Barker, of the Southern Star, for the delightful excursion to Indian Spring tendered to the convention.

Just as adjournment was moved, a letter from Lady Henry Somerset, President of the British Women's Temperance Association, was received by Miss Willard, and the audience gladly waited to hear it read.

LETTER.

EASTNOR CASTLE, Oct. 29, 1890.

DEAR SISTER:—I have it much at heart to send you a few words of greeting, as you assemble for your annual National conference this year. I would that I could have been present to tell you and the dear white-ribboners how the thought of their loyal devotion to our cause, the untiring efforts they make to advance the good time when we shall trample the greatest foe to the well-being of humanity under foot, inspire us over here with fresh courage and new hope.

The enthusiasm kindled by your grand leadership and your heroic effort is felt throughout the whole world. In England the battle is raging most fiercely, and our hearts are sometimes faint when we see the overwhelming forces against us; it revives our spirit to feel the clasp of our sisters' hands and hear their voices cheering us onward, for even the ocean waves cannot separate the touch of souls united by the bonds of loving service in a common cause. I much regret that I have been unable this year to go to America. I quite hope, however, God willing, to be present at your National conference next year, and to have the joy of greeting you personally.

It has been a great happiness this summer to welcome some of your sweetest women whom we have learned to love. The visit of Mrs. Frances Barnes and Miss Julia Ames has been productive of much good in our midst, and we have cause to thank God for their visit.

I rejoice this year has brought you some signal victories and above all, I thank God that public opinion in your country is far in advance of ours. That is our hardest battle. We cannot hope for legislation until public sentiment has been brought to the high level that will demand it, but we know our cause is God's cause and He will give the victory. He always wins who sides with God, and the very men and women who turn from us to-day as fanatics shall be among those who rise up and call us blessed.

May the light of God's countenance illumine your conference. May His wisdom guide you in the future as in the past, and may you be sustained by the strength of the everlasting arms, is the constant prayer of your loving sister in the cause of God and Home and Humanity.

ISABEL SOMERSET.

Adjourned with the benediction.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

Opening prayer by Mrs. Bailey, of Maine.

Mrs. Oberhaltzer, of Pennsylvania, gave a very interesting paper on "School Savings Banks," which will appear in the Stenographic Report.

Mrs. Sarah A. McClees' reports for department of soldiers and sailors followed; when the department for social purity, Miss Willard, superintendent, was called, Miss Gordon announced that it was in print and would be distributed in the audience, as well as appear in the minutes, but would not be read. Mrs. Bailey reported for department of peace and arbitration; Mrs. Fessenden for franchise, and Mrs. Helen L. Bullock as National Organizer. For all these papers we refer you to the Stenographic Report.

The rest of the afternoon was occupied by the report of the committee on resolutions, Miss Helen L. Hood, of Illinois, chairman, and the passage of special resolutions offered from the floor. The resolutions were passed with great unanimity and no protests were offered.

RESOLUTIONS.

We, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in convention assembled, return thanks to Almighty God for the many blessings granted us during the past year. We note for consideration the addition of many new organizations, the wonderful increase in membership, and the opening up of many new opportunities for the introduction of our work. In all this we recognize the hand of our Father in the fulfillment of the promise that those who are faithful shall reap the reward.

1. While discountenancing all union of Church and state, we do affirm our belief that God in Christ is the King of Nations, and as such should be acknowledged in our government, and His Word made the basis of our laws.

2. We believe that under God the prosperity and effectiveness of our union is largely due to the systematic work done in our forty departments, included under the general head of Organization—Preventive, Educational, Social, Evangelistic and Legal.

3. We recognize the fact that the foundation of all our work lies in the acceptance and practice of the gospel of Christ, and believe that even greater effort should be made the coming year in all evangelistic lines.

4. Recognizing the grand possibilities under the temperance education laws of the country, in their bearing upon the ultimate settlement of the liquor problem, as well as the security extended to rising generations through intelligence;

Resolved, That we will make the enforcement of these laws a leading line of work during the coming year.

5. Resolved, That we deplore the ever-increasing desecration of the Sabbath, for it will inevitably bring ruin upon our country; that we feel we are responsible for this evil until we have done everything in our power to correct it; that we pledge our organization to use all its influence to maintain our God-ordained Sabbath.

6. Resolved, That we rejoice greatly in the gain which has come to us in the line of Sunday-school Temperance Lessons as the result of the memorial effort of the past year, and that we will strive most earnestly to improve the larger opportunity afforded us for thorough temperance education along the line of Bible truth beginning in 1892.

7. As the W. C. T. U. recognizes in the Kindergarten a potent factor in our work:

Resolved, That in every state and territory where kindergarten is not a part of the public school system, we recommend petitioning the several Legislatures to enact a law requiring kindergarten teaching in the primary school.

8. Recognizing with gratitude the growth of W. C. T. U. work among young women, which has materially increased the membership of the organization, and added to the state and National treasuries, and appreciating the fact that upon the multiplication of these means must depend the future prosperity of our work:

Resolved, That we urge upon states special attention to this particular line of organization.

9. Resolved, That the disfranchisement of twelve millions of people who are citizens is contrary to the fundamental principle of our government and out of harmony with the idea of Christian co-operation for the highest good of humanity; that we have now in Wyoming an example of a genuine republic, and that we will hail with delight the time when the entire nation shall carry out in practice what it promises in theory by conferring upon women all their rights as citizens under the jurisdiction of this government.

10. WHEREAS, Good morals are the foundation of good education, society and government, and

WHEREAS, The Bible, the only true basis of good morals, is being excluded from our public schools; therefore,

Resolved, That each state W. C. T. U. present the subject of ethical culture before all Normal Institutes and Educational Conventions, to the end that moral training based upon the Bible may be an emphasized and prominent feature in the public school system of our country.

11. Resolved, That we favor the enactments of state laws requiring physical culture and industrial training to become a part of public school education.

12. Resolved, (a) That we give more effort to the work of the World's W. C. T. U. As we look back over the last decade and see what God hath wrought for us as individual women, through our relation to this cause, let us direct our faith, strengthened by exercise, our mental and physical powers, increased by use, into this broader field of labor for humanity, taking, each one of us, more directly to heart the command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," believing in the fulfillment of the promise, "Greater things than these shall ye do."

(b) That we respectfully request Congress to prohibit the exportation of all alcoholic liquors to all uncivilized, and therefore unprotected peoples.

(c) That we personally sign, and use our influence to gain signatures to the great petition to the Czar asking for more humane treatment of the political exiles of Siberia.

13. Realizing our inability, under the existing system of managing the criminal classes among women, to do effective and permanent reformatory work for that class.

Resolved, That we urge upon our state unions the pressing need of reformatories for women; also that we urge upon our unions everywhere the need of police matrons; also, that in all institutions where women are incarcerated, we use every effort in our power to secure the appointment of women to the charge of such institutions.

14. We reiterate that we believe it vital to the temperance reform that the principle of Prohibition be recognized as the dominant issue in American politics, and that party power must stand back of this principle in it application through law. We again send the assurance of our good word, good will and prayers to those voters who, in the fear of God and love of humanity, cast their ballots in town, state and nation for prohibition measures and prohibition men.

15. Recognizing the power of the press as one of the potent factors of education in the Nation; be it

Resolved, That while thanking those papers that do hold to a high standard, we utter our protest against press records of the details of crime; its admission of impure matter in the form of medical and personal advertisements and of sensational stories calculated to mislead the minds and destroy the morals of our children, and through them the home.

16. Resolved, That as a National organization, through our several state unions, we memorialize the Commissioners of the Columbian Exposition to prohibit the sale of intoxicants within its limits; also that we petition them not to open the Exposition on Sunday.

17. Since the saloon system militates equally against the interests of both capital and labor, we recommend to these classes a close and careful study of statistics, showing the immense drain caused by intemperance upon the resources of both the capitalist and laborer.

18. Believing that education is most efficient in removing political evils, we therefore reaffirm our former declarations in favor of government aid for public schools, and urge the fifty-second Congress to enact a law to that end.

19. Resolved, That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States of America to prohibit the sale of all alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and the territories, also to prohibit the importation, exportation, and transportation of such liquors, and to propose an amendment to the Federal constitution to forever outlaw the liquor traffic in this country.

20. Resolved, That we rejoice in the efforts being made by the Anti-Lottery League of Louisiana to prevent this infamous corporation from obtaining a renewal of their charter, and that we appreciate the stand taken by the noble men of North Dakota last winter in their remarkable contest on this question in not allowing their fair young state to be ruined by becoming the legalized home of such a moral leper. We entirely disapprove of all games of chance in church and state, and all methods in business life that tend to foster the spirit of gambling. We also commend the action of government in refusing the transportation of lottery tickets through the mails.

Mrs. Lathrap, of Michigan, offered the following:

Resolved, That the National W. C. T. U. has never planned nor purposed organizing a new church, nor has our President ever advised us to undertake any such work of supererogation.

Mrs. Benjamin, of Michigan, moved:

Inasmuch as our Annual Report can be procured each year for the small sum of fifteen cents, and in it is included all department reports, thus enabling the members to read them at their leisure and refer to them at pleasure, therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that for the future the time of the annual meeting be given largely to discussions of general interest, both to the members and the public, thereby bringing more fully before them our methods and aims with such a consensus, or diversity of opinion as is nowhere else obtainable.

Mrs. N. H. Knox, of New Hampshire, moved a vote of thanks to Senator Blair for his heroic championship of prohibition, woman's enfranchisement and his educational bill; all of which were carried.

Mrs. Woodward, of Nebraska, moved a most hearty and comprehensive expression of thanks to Atlanta for her delightful hospitality, which was carried by a rising vote.

Miss West, as superintendent of W. C. T. U. Training School, moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Ferdinand Schumacher, for his donation of $500 to start that institution.

Mrs. Hughes, of Arizona, presented a strong protest against the sale of liquors by governmental officials in army posts and soldiers' homes.

Mrs. Ingals, of Missouri, moved to petition Congress to enact a law prohibiting the manufacture of cigarettes.

Adjourned with the benediction.

THE CLOSING SESSION.

Tuesday evening was devoted to the report of the Plan of Work Committee, through Miss Lucia E. F. Kimball, and the speeches with which the banners were presented to the state having made the greatest per cent of gain in membership. For these we refer you to the Stenographic Report.

Wisconsin won the National banner for the greatest per cent of gain in the whole Union, also that for the greatest per cent of gain in the Western states; Colorado those for the greatest per cent of gain in membership in her section and for greatest increase of enrollment in the Loyal Temperance Legions, having nearly trebled the number during the year. The beautiful Young Crusader banner was won by Michigan, that state showing the largest increase in subscriptions to The Young Crusader; Maine won the banner for New England; New York that for the Middle States; Florida that for the Southland; and the District of Columbia that for the District and the territories. As Indian Territory came within four-tenths of one per cent of the District's markings, Mrs. LaFetra gracefully passed the banner over to Mrs. Stapler because, as she said, she realized how much harder the work in Indian Territory was. These banners are presented by Miss Willard, to be given each year into the custody of the state, in the various sections of the country, which shows the greatest per cent of increase in membership for that year. Miss Willard suggested that each state, on receiving it, mark on the back, the date and place of the convention at which it is received.

Miss Henrietta Moore, of Ohio, presented the following memorial to Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas:

During the year there has been lost to our organization, to every land and every people, Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas, of London, first president of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and afterward president of the British Women's Association. She was born for her work, a woman "nobly planned." Ancestry had given to her brain and strength of character. Society had cultured refinement and delicacy, and made the gentle woman. The sorrows of humankind had awakened tender sympathies, and the Christ had beautified and sanctified the whole woman with divine purpose and the spirit of sacrifice. Therefore

Resolved, That in this annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the United States, we express our gratitude to Him who remembereth all our wants and giveth to the world such saviors, and that we here pause in thought of her earth-life and earth-work and in the desire that they have an eternal lingering in the world through the enlarged sweetness and holiness and usefulness they gave to our lives.

Adopted by a rising vote and a copy ordered sent to the relatives of Mrs. Lucas and to the British Woman's Temperance Journal.

Miss Willard announced that "we have here present one hundred white ribbon women, good and true, who have come many of them long distances, to attend this convention; they have had no part nor voice in these proceedings; but now, that our business is over, I wish we might show our appreciation of them by making them members of this convention." This was done unanimously. Another hundred visitors, ladies and gentlemen, swelled the number of strangers drawn to Atlanta by the convention to over six hundred.

After a few reports and introductions, and a most hearty vote of thanks to Mrs. Buell, for the admirable way in which she had presided during Miss Willard's absence, came the closing exercises, tender, helpful words from our President, singing with hands clasped, "Blest be the tie that binds," and repeating with bowed heads the form of benediction adopted for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee and give thee peace." Thus ended the largest, most harmonious National convention the W. C. T. U. has ever known.

Publisher's Notes.

Why Your Paper is Late.

THE UNION SIGNAL of this week has taxed our resources to their utmost. The edition — 210,000 — 24 pages—will take eight presses, day and night, for a week, and the delay now caused will also make the issue of December 4th late. Kindly be as patient as you can; that new perfecting press will be running, we hope, in January, and then we can increase pages and editions without these vexatious and costly delays.

The Temple! The Temple!

Its walls are slowly but steadily going up; the steel girders and supports are being placed in position; an army of workmen hurry here and there to carry out the thought of the master architect.

Back of his plans were the thoughts of the originator of it all, Mrs. T. B. Carse, so you see how thought can be represented in stone and steel? With this idea in mind, we have had made a beautiful lithographic view of the Temple in its own colors, and on the same page is also given an excellent portrait of Mrs. Carse. We offer this picture in two ways. First

For Ten Cent (five week) Subscriptions

We will send a picture free to any one who sends us a club of 5 ten cent subscriptions (with 50 cents) sent in at one time.

For Twenty-five Cent (3 mos.) Subscriptions

We will send the picture free for 2 such names with 50 cents.

We will also send the picture to any one who sends us 10 cents and promises to use their best endeavor to get us the trial subscriptions. The ten cents can be deducted from the first fifty cents sent in. If any one of your friends want the picture, it will be sent for an additional 15 cents. That is, a five weeks' (10 cent) subscriber would pay you 25 cents to get the picture included, or 40 cents if a three months' (25 cent) subscriber.

Lastly

We will give 5 of the elegant framed aquarelle-tint pictures of Miss Willard to the five who send us in the largest number of trial subscriptions, under the above offers, before January 1, 1891. In the contest each 25 cent subscriber to count the same as two and a half 10 cent subscriptions. You will be delighted with the picture. Don't be too late in getting to work.

The Human Body.

"I have to acknowledge," said an ancient philosopher, "how well this body of mine has served my purpose." There are, alas! too many of us who are not in a mood to make a similar acknowledgment. But perhaps the body can be put in order, the machinery repaired, and the acknowledgments will follow.

Christmas Goods.

Don't pass those two pages by. The cards, leaflets, booklets and books there advertised are worth your careful attention for a number of reasons. Here are some of them: Everything described is very low in price. Nothing trashy or sensational is there. Sunday-school teachers will find it a treasure house for rewards and gifts to their pupils. Parents can find good and true books for their children. Children can find valuable gifts for their friends and parents. So don't pass the two pages by. Another thing. Don't wait till December 22 to send in your orders!

Making Money Anywhere.

Having read Mr. Morehead's experience plating with gold, silver and nickel, I sent for a plater, and have more work than I can do. It is surprising the spoons, casters and jewelry that people want plated. The first week I cleared $37.10, and in three weeks $119.85, and my wife has made about as I have. By addressing W. H. Griffith & Co., Zanesville, Ohio, you can get circulars. A Plater only costs $5. You can learn to use it in an hour, can plate large or small articles, and can make money anywhere.

"IGNORANCE of the law excuses no man," and ignorance is no excuse for a dirty house or greasy kitchen. Better clean them in the old way than not at all; but the modern and sensible way is to use SAPOLIO on paint, on floors, on windows, on pots and pans, and even on statuary. To be ignorant of the uses of SAPOLIO is to be behind the age.

HARVEY.

A PLACE of the GREATEST ACTIVITY

The only thing lacking is houses in which to shelter people, and those I am building at the rate of fifteen per month, and other parties are building three times as many more, and yet the supply is nothing like equal to the demand; we need boarding-house keepers and parties to build and rent houses.

The three hundred lots in my addition are rapidly selling at the low prices put upon them, and the business lots in this addition afford the greatest opportunities for investment, as the great demand has not yet started there.

I will let a contract to 100 different men to build a house this winter, and apply his labor in payments of a lot, with a cash payment on the lot of $25, and I will furnish all material; I will sell a house and lot on same terms, with a cash payment of $300.

To Investors: Twenty per cent on your money. To persons not desirous of coming to Harvey I will sell one of 20 houses just completed in Block 93 for $1,200, and accept $500 cash and $75 quarterly. These houses are well and substantially built, being sheeted and papered all over outside, with hard wood kitchen floor, and with sink and water supply in the kitchen, pipes being connected with the water main in the street.

The house is 20x30, four rooms, pantry and vestibule on first floor, with an 8-feet ceiling upstairs, and all rented for $12.50 per month.

The investment figures this way:

Cost of house and lot	$1.200	Yearly rental	$150
Cash payment	.500	Yearly interest on amount due	49
Amount still due, 7 per cent	.700	Amount of yearly rental clear	101

This pays more than 20 per cent clear on the $500 invested, to say nothing of the advance in real estate, which will no doubt double in 18 months.

I will agree to collect the rent and take charge of the property exactly the same as if I owned it, free of charge, and apply the rentals in cancellation of the amount due, or on the quarterly payment. Do you know where you can get larger returns on your money? These houses would bring a higher rental in view of the great demand, but my policy has been to be satisfied with what the houses are worth, and not impose upon people simply because it is possible to do so. Write for a photograph of the house, and all information. Now is the time to buy lots, as the Spring-time will witness, no doubt, an advance of one-half in prices. I sell now simply that I may be able to buy more acres to subdivide in the Spring.

The shops and factories are getting about ready to begin work, and any day long train loads of machinery and material may be seen on the tracks there, and the whole town has an appearance of the greatest industry and enterprise.

The temperance clause in each deed, as given by the Harvey Company and myself, has had the effect of keeping out all undesiraole people, and the community is a collection of persons such as seldom come together for temperance and good citizenship.

Remember that Harvey is not simply a booming town, that depends on nothing but excitement to keep it up, but that it has the resources within itself to make it a permanent and established city, and that the factories and business capital is already established there, and he who buys now cannot fail to realize great advances.

Write for plat and price-list and all information.

SOME LAST WORDS

Don't put off ordering till the last minute; better have these handsome Christmas goods hid away for a few weeks in advance than run the risk of not getting any on time.

Don't fail to write your name and address with distinctness, also to make your orders clear.

Don't forget that we can furnish you the best of Bibles (Oxford and Teacher's Editions) or any other books you may want.

Address,

Woman's Temperance Pub. Ass'n.,
161 La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.

Publisher's Dep't.

We have a number of things to say. We talk right along week after week to you, and you who are familiar with this part of the paper may be counted on as a good friend, but this talk is not meant for you alone, but for

You and Your Neighbor!

You read THE UNION SIGNAL—your neighbor does not. You think the paper has a power for good—your neighbor, not knowing anything thereof, thinks nothing. Here is the problem: How shall your neighbor be transformed into a friend of the paper? Shall it be done by your putting your hand into your own pocket and paying for a subscription which shall be sent to your neighbor all unbeknown to him wherefor it comes? Nay, nay. That would beget suspicion on his part at once, then a dislike to the paper, finally an order to the postmaster to "stop putting that UNION SIGNAL in my box; there'll be a bill along shortly, and I won't pay for the paper."

Glum-um-um! And so you lose your neighbor for THE UNION SIGNAL! Now see,

One, Two, Three.

Try another way! Gently hold out some sugar—in speech, manner and bait; why not? That wins.

For instance, tell

Your Neighbor, First.

That he or she—(why, Oh why! can we not have an impersonal pronoun? if you only knew how much it is needed!)—that "thon," we'll say, is as nice a person as the truth will permit you to say; that being so nice you wanted to interest "thon" in a plan for '91 which will bring joy to the household, peace to the home, hygiene to the kitchen, information to the various "thons." Having aroused a mild or eager curiosity—make it the latter if possible—pull out a copy of THE UNION SIGNAL. Now shall we tell you what to say for it? We have "bin a-sayin'" it for five years past, and you know the paper. To one, urge the excellent household and children's department; to another, the world-wide correspondence and what it is; to another, the thoughtful, up-to-the-times editorials, showing how national questions look from woman's standpoint, etc., etc. Don't overload the hook, carefully selected bait and not too much of it, you know. But if you are not heard all through, and have interjections of "too many papers now," etc., go right on and show to

Your Neighbor, Second,

THE LADIES' HOME COMPANION; it is a large and popular 16-page journal, published twice a month, and gives information about those things which ladies particularly wish to know, and is mostly written by ladies. Original or selected stories by eminent authors are found in each issue. A special feature is the variety of departments, each of which is conducted by a special editor. It gives the latest fashions, arranged for practical use; timely hints to housekeepers; cheering and helpful talks with mothers; valuable information for lovers of flowers; a pretty and pleasant page for pretty and pleasant children. All handsomely illustrated. It is not an ultra-fashion paper, but a journal for the home circle, full of common-sense ideas and suggestions for home happiness and comfort.

Now your neighbor gets more interested, wants to know price of the two papers; but even if the neighbor is obdurate don't mention that price, but say to that you are authorized to actually offer the two papers and a splendid new temperance cook book for only $1.10; then your neighbor will open his or her eyes in astonishment. If you can, by all means have a copy of "The Cook Book" to show. A sample will be sent for twenty-five cents, which can be deducted from the first order sent in under this neighbor offer. If you don't have a copy of the book by all means know well some of the following facts about the HOUSEKEEPER'S COOK BOOK, and here they are:

The cook book has over 300 pages, and several hundred illustrations. At a great expense the publishers of this book procured a vast number of recipes from practical housewives living in every part of the United States, and out of 20,000 recipes the best were selected by competent ladies, and over 300,000 copies of this cook book were sold. The edition for 1891 has been greatly improved by adding the newest, best and most practical recipes of progressive cooking schools. Several hundred illustrations have also been added, at great expense, making it the most complete and best illustrated cook book ever published. The result is an admirably condensed volume of recipes for every day, arranged for practical use. None of the recipes include liquors, such as wines, brandies, etc., among the ingredients, and it is recommended as a temperance cook book. Among its points of excellence are the following topics: Practical suggestions to young housekeepers, necessary kitchen utensils, suggestions and recipes for soups, fish, poultry, game, meats, salads, sauces, catsups and relishes, breakfast and tea dishes, vegetables, bread, biscuit, pies, puddings, cakes, custards, desserts, cookies, fritters, etc. Also for preserves, beverages and candies; cookery for the sick, bills of fare for family dinners, holiday dinners, parties, picnics, teas, luncheons, etc. A table of weights and measures; chapters on various departments of household management and work. It is the latest, best and most practical cook book published, more nearly meeting the wants of American homes than any other, and would be cheap at $1.00.

Now, in starting this campaign among the neighbors, don't forget that you are to keep the price for all three sections of sugar away from your neighbor until the very last. But the pivotal point, after all, is to get your consent to do this neighborly work, and will we have to plead with you? and beg you? The offer closes January 1. Don't send any orders to Philadelphia or Springfield; send all to us; samples of THE UNION SIGNAL or samples of The Ladies' Home Companion or the Cook Book can be ordered, indeed, must be ordered if this offer is to get the attention it deserves.

Publisher's Notes.

Money-Making Entertainments.

The list is worth your attention, as it comprises all sorts and kinds, and if your union seeks to occasionally make some money by amusing the people you will find here ample material. In many instances the entertainment will result in not only making the coffers heavier but in silencing the scoffers! Why? Because the planning has been not only to amuse but also to arouse thought while being amused, and a new idea that comes to you on the wings of a hearty laugh has a good-natured way of settling down quite at home in its new quarters. Here is the list:

INTERSTATE MILKMAID'S CONVENTION.

Price 5 cents. By Laura J. Rittenhouse. An amusing and witty "take off" on a woman's convention. The amount of learning (?) displayed on the cow business is funny.

Prohibition Program. Price 10 cents. By Anna A. Gordon. Song recitations and exercises of the brightest and best kind. High license is fired at in a way that tells. A dialogue by Mr. E. J. Wheeler on "Sense vs. License," is full of vigor, fun and education!

Platform Voices. Price 25 cents; compiled by Miss Julia Ames, editor UNION SIGNAL. This is a collection of unusually good temperance poems and recitations. Great care has been taken in the selections, and we cordially recommend this book to all who need "something in the line of recitations" and don't know exactly what. This book fills the vacuum completely.

Crusader Programs. Price 25 cts. A book of 188 pages, full of the best of Sunday-school and general temperance exercises, largely from the Sunday-school Young Crusader, given in its columns from time to time. All are good; none need costumes or any such outside helps. An admirable book in every way. Twenty-four numbers or exercises in all are given.

HINTS FOR Y. W. S. T. U. ENTERTAINMENTS.

Price 10 cents. Explaining the mysteries of Oriental Tiffin, Kaffee Klatsch, Mother Goose, etc. Candy recipes are added to sweeten things generally.

YE HATCHET PARTIE.

Price 15 cents. By Miss Mary H. Mather, superintendent department of entertainments National W. C. T. U. The most successful shekel winner we have ever printed for young ladies' use. Other good entertainments are also given, "Mistress Mary and Her Flower Garden," "Silhouette Social," etc.

LADIES' BELT NO. 4—BACK VIEW.

THE OWEN ELECTRIC BELT AND APPLIANCES

For Ladies and Gentlemen.

A LIFE SAVED AND YOUTH RENEWED.

BANNER, ILL., Oct. 30, 1890.

DR. A. OWEN—Dear Sir:

It is with pleasure that I add my testimonial to your list. I have had liver complaint 27 years. I went to a physician 50 miles away. He said that I had liver complaint and could not cure me. Ever since then I have been doctoring, and I did not expect to live from one week to another. I heard of the Owen Electric Belt, and talked of getting one for a year before I got mine. Some people laughed, and told me it was a swindle; said it wouldn't cure me if a good physician couldn't. I AM THANKFUL TO SAY THAT IT HAS CURED ME, and I would not take a hundred dollars for my belt and do without it. You that are suffering, do not let any one persuade you that the belt won't help you. I intend to keep mine as long as I live. I met one of my old neighbors, and she said that I looked younger than I did fifteen years ago. I told her it was all due to my Owen Electric Belt. Yours respectfully,

MRS. D. FIDLER.

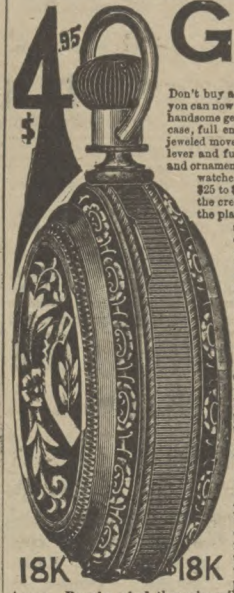
$4.95 GOLD PLATED.



Don't buy a common looking silver watch when you can now obtain for the small sum of $4.95 a handsome genuine 18 karat gold plated hunting case, full engraved watch with a first-class full jeweled movement, a perfect timekeeper, genuine lever and full plate handsomely damaskeened and ornamented, fully equal in appearance to the watches regularly sold by jewelers at from $25 to $35. In carrying this watch you have the credit of carrying a solid gold watch, as the plating process is got down so fine nowadays that it is almost impossible to detect the difference. The engraving on the case is just the same as on the high priced watches, and is in the very loveliest and latest patterns. Some will doubt our ability to be able to supply such a watch at this price, and to convince you that we mean just what we say we make the following most extraordinary offer for the next 30 days.

READ!

Cut this out and send it with your order, and we will promptly ship the watch to you by express C. O. D. with instructions to the express agent to allow you to examine it at the express office. If on examination you are convinced that it is a bargain, pay the agent $4.95 and the express charges, and it is yours, otherwise you pay nothing and it will be returned at our expense. We could not afford to make such an offer as this, unless we were confident that the watch will not only please you, but be a surprise to you. Bear in mind this price will be for 30 days only. ECONOMY IS WEALTH.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE IS ECONOMY OF MONEY, ECONOMY OF HAPPINESS,

ECONOMY OF HEALTH,
ECONOMY OF BRAINS, ECONOMY OF MORALS,
ECONOMY OF LIFE.

But if the total abstainer insures his life in a company or association where he contributes to pay losses on tipplers, he ceases to be economical.

FACTS PROVE IT.

The books of the Association during the last fiscal year show that

THE TOTAL ABSTINENCE

Life Association of America

has saved to each member on the average on death losses over the normal rate of insurance companies

Seven dollars and one-half per thousand.

During the same time the Association conducted its business at an expense which, compared with the sworn statements of the regular companies, averaged a saving of Seven dollars per thousand.

These two items yield a total average saving to each member of Fourteen and one-half dollars per thousand.

No honest claims have ever been settled by this Association except in full——— for their face. A certificate is as good as a bank draft. The actual total cost is not one-half ordinary life rates in old line companies. The saving at 5% compound interest for the average lifetime of our members (30 years) amounts to over

One thousand dollars per thousand.

This is more than the proceeds of an endowment policy. Can you forego to reap the reward in cheap life insurance, of your clean life and good habits?

PRACTICE ECONOMY.

You cannot afford to do otherwise. A consistent total abstainer will be quick to see the advantage of this. The experience of a prominent English company confirms our own. The death rate on total abstainers averaged 28% LOWER THAN THE REST.

This was in a carefully selected membership, a l of whom had passed a strict examination.

HOW TO BE ECONOMICAL.

To all who cut out the coupon below and mail it to us before Jan. 1st, 1891, we will give special terms which will save them the greater part of the initial cost of membership. Fill in your name, address and date of birth, and an explanatory statement of cost at your age will be mailed you. If it does not then seem to insure elsewhere, go no farther.

Coupon No. 1.

DEAR SIR—Please send me descriptive statement on a Thousand Dollar Certificate at my age. I was born on the day of , 18
This is in no sense an application.
Very respectfully,
Residence,
P. O. Address,

Publisher's Dep't.

A Personal Word.

Many of our readers will remember an item on the first page of THE UNION SIGNAL of November 13, in which it was stated that I had tendered my resignation as business manager of the W. T. P. A., but had withdrawn the same and had accepted a proposition to stay for three years. It becomes a difficult task to now say that I have felt compelled to again decline the position, and that, at Atlanta, I told the stockholders of the W. T. P. A. who were present at the convention that I cannot, under any circumstances, serve them longer than January 1. This was brought about largely by the statements to me from unquestionable authority that there is more or less dissatisfaction and that many of the workers thought there ought to be a change. I make this personal explanation at no little cost to myself but prefer to do so here rather than put the matter on the editors or the board of directors. Something had to be said and with this statement the matter will be dropped. Due notice will be given of the election of my successor.

I will only add a word of sincere thanks to the many friends who have been friends indeed, in responding to my frequent calls upon their time and services, and have shown their friendship not only in that way, but by the many "kind words that never die." I will leave one part of the work with the utmost regret. You who read, know well how I have planned, schemed and besought in the interests of that 100,000 mark—sometimes to your weariness, doubtless, and perhaps it is as well to have a new manager, for I never would have "let up" till the mark was reached. I have not done, and planned these many ways as a matter of personal ambition, but because I felt that THE UNION SIGNAL could be made the greatest possible lever for home interests, and if now those who read would say, "I'll show my friendship for the plan, and get at least one new subscriber to THE UNION SIGNAL," the work would be done, and I would give up the helm of my department, on January 1st, with a heart full of gladness for the added power and efficiency of THE UNION SIGNAL, which I honestly esteem to be one of the best papers in the world,—the most influential in building homes where peace, purity and charity shall reign. Am I asking too much? If not, will you not read the article on another page, and send your response before January 1st? I have so long used these columns in a personal, chatty way of writing, as though I was really talking to friends, please let me now say I wish I could shake hands with every one of you, and thank you more adequately than is here possible, for your loyal devotion to THE UNION SIGNAL, and your coöperation in plans of mine for its advancement.

Geo C Hall.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

It would require nearly $40,000 in government bonds to produce this income. WALTER THOMAS MILLS & CO.,

A year ago La Grippe laid heavy hands on one of Boston's most prominent merchants. His physician advised a warmer climate. He determined to try FLORIDA. Before going he happened to say to a friend that he wouldn't give two cents an acre for all the land in Florida. Recently he said to the writer: "The moment I struck the Orange Belt I was charmed with everything about me. I immediately looked around for a Southern winter home. I bought a developed Orange Grove of nearly a hundred acres. In the spring we discovered that the long drouth was likely to ruin our Orange crop for 1890-'91. I at once made a contract with Mr. A. G. Kingsbury, Hydraulic Engineer of De Land, for an Irrigating Plant. It is the most satisfactory piece of work I have ever had done for me, and will save our crop, otherwise we should not have had a single Orange."

One branch of the Kingsbury Manufacturing Company is the installation of the KINGSBURY HIGH-PRESSURE SYSTEM of IRRIGATION, the only successful method, and the demand for this class of work exceeds our capacity tenfold. We have therefore built, and are equipping, large new Machine shops on our beautiful property at De Land, and have an authorized working capital of $150,000, on which we are able to earn very large dividends. A limited number of shares of the stock will be disposed of until December 20th, at par $10 per share, after which date it will be advanced to $12 or more. A MAMMOTH CHRISTMAS BOX

Our object in getting up this Great Bargain Box is to introduce to the American people our "Sweet Home" Family Soap and fine toilet Articles. They are the purest, best and most satisfactory whether made in this country or England, every one who uses them once becomes a permanent customer. We propose a new departure in the soap-trade and will sell direct from our factory to the consumer, spending the money usually allowed for expenses of traveling men, wholesale and retail dealers' profits, in handsome and valuable presents to those who order at once.

Our goods are made for the select family trade and will not be sold to dealers; and to induce people to give them a trial, we accompany each case with all of the useful and valuable presents named. Larkin's Great Bargain Box contains the greatest lot of Presents ever seen for the money.

We do not ask you to remit in advance nor run any risks, nor take any chances. We merely ask permission to ship to you a box of these goods, and if after 30 days' trial you are fully convinced that the soap is all we claim, and the extras all we advertise, you can then pay the bill. But if you are not satisfied in every way, no charge will be made for what you have used. How can we do more?

TO GET THE BOX,

Simply write your name and address on a postal-card and mail to us, and we will ship you the goods on 30 days' trial, and you are under no obligations to keep the box if it does not in every way meet your expectation. We know the great value of our articles, and are willing to put them to the severest kind of a test, hence will send the box on 30 days' trial, and if not satisfactory will remove it.

A Special Offer to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL:

Some people prefer to send cash with order. We do not ask it, but if readers of this paper remit in advance we will place in the box, in addition to all the other extras, a valuable present for the lady of the house. Something that is near and dear to the heart of every woman, and that she will be proud of for years to come.

Where boxes are paid for in advance, we ship same day order is received. All other orders are filled in their regular turn.

Persons remitting in advance can have their money refunded without argument or comment if the box does not prove all they expected. Price of box complete, $6.00.

The above offer only holds good until Jan. 1st. Send in Your Orders AT ONCE.

Publisher's Dep't.

Subscription Book Dep't.

Editorial notice has been given that we are about to open a department bearing the above given title. We more and more find there are those who are willing to lend their energies in selling our publications, and as we grow in power we will aim to carefully develop this line of our work. Just now we can offer agents exclusive territory on a number of publications. First among them we would name Miss Mary Allen West's book,

"Childhood—Its Care and Culture."

This is truly a remarkable book. Into it has gone the best thought and ripest experience of a life that has been full of usefulness and golden rule service. Recently a pamphlet came from Pennsylvania giving the report of Clearfield county unions, and in it the report on mothers' work has these words:

"I would recommend a course of reading in the mothers' meetings. And let me mention "The Girls of To-day" as one, another, "Childhood, its Care and Culture," by Mary Allen West. If I were the mother of one young child, or a dozen, I would have the latter if I had to subsist on bread and milk, or water until I had the required sum to purchase it. By all means possess this book, and do not put it on the top shelf in the library, but where you can reach it in odd minutes."

If you wish to leave behind you an influence for real home and character building, you cannot do better than to act as our agent for "Childhood, its Care and Culture." Write for terms and territory, enclosing $1 for full morocco prospectus and instructions.

The Picture of Miss Willard is also offered you as a first class publication with which to earn money. The outfit, which consists of a sample picture, heavy tube, piece of the frame, and full instructions will be sent for 75 cents. Name the territory that you want—and not any more than you feel sure of being able to canvass with thoroughness. It don't pay to skim over territory. There is no reason why the book above named and the picture cannot both be sold at the same time. Address all letters pertaining to agency to Subscription Book Department, W. T. P. A. Make orders and drafts payable to the Association.

A Cute Letter

and with a good "idee" involved; read it and see:

"Mr. Geo. C. Hall, Dear Friend:—Can you—but first let me explain. I am generalissimo of a working girls' club, having evening classes. One class now forming wishes to study reading, spelling and geography. Of course they cannot afford to spend much for books, so I try with a very small stone, despite the shape of my collar bone, to kill as many birds as possible. The W. T. P. A. and The Union Signal, are also ever in my mind's eyes. So can you change (in our case) your last offer of "The Union Signal and one of Drummond's books for $1," to The Union Signal and an (up to date) Intermediate geography for $1? My plan is to use The Union Signal for a reader and speller (trusting thereby to introduce 'idees') and get the geography 'thrown in.' Now don't smile so they'll hear you to Madison street and say: 'Just like a woman.' 'Trying to make one dress meet all the requirements; short for street wear, long for house wear; cool for hot days, hot for cool days; handsome as silk and cheap as calico, etc.' It's second nature, we've done it all our lives and you'll have to wait till the next generation for that sweet reasonableness that doesn't try to decorate barren walls with a carpet-whipper tied with a bit of ribbon. Please answer at once and greatly oblige,

"Yours for equality before the law, constitutional prohibition, abolition of capital punishment, restriction of gum-chewers, colonization of tobacco users, and the perpetuity and prosperity of the W. T. P. A. A. C. W."

New York, 10, 28, 1890.

To the Publisher of the W. T. P. A.:—

I have recently been attending the large state conventions of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, at all of which one evening was given to the young women, and at all of which the music was a prominent and delightful feature. It is needless to add that the songs were from the Y. W. C. T. U. song book. The choruses and solos being new to many in the audience, and well rendered, were heartily applauded.

Yours for the sale of the song book,

Frances J. Barnes.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Congress met Monday and received the President's message.

Americans in Paris and in Berlin celebrated Thanksgiving appropriately.

Gladstone and Morley have both answered Parnell's manifesto, denying many of its statements.

Chairman Dickie proposes a series of state Prohibition conferences during January and February.

F. S. McCabe, D. D., a Presbyterian divine, is a member of the police commission in Topeka, Kan.

The Emperor of Germany has bestowed upon Dr. Koch the grand cross of the Order of the Red Eagle.

A Chicago syndicate proposes to establish a steamship line between Galveston and South American ports.

The Pasteur Institute of New York will establish a Koch Institute annex to treat consumptive patients.

O'Brien, Dillon, and the four other Irish members of Parliament were heartily welcomed to Chicago Saturday.

Miss Jennie Smith held very successful meetings at Atlanta, Ga., Birmingham, Ala, and Somerset, Ky., after the convention.

In his Thanksgiving sermon Dr. Barrows declared that Chicago is ruled by demagogues and demijohns, and his hearers agreed with him.

The vote for president of the "Non-partisan W. C. T. U." may be considered representative of the society's strength; it numbered forty-eight.

General Bidwell, of California, received about 12,000 votes as Prohibition candidate for Governor, a large increase over any prohibition vote ever before polled in that state.

The American, Bostor., Lowell, and the New England Express companies have issued orders to their employés not to receive liquor billed to the prohibition city of Lowell.

The American Sabbath Union proposes making its anniversary meeting December 8 and 9 a national rally for the Rest day. The meeting will be held in the First Baptist Church, Philadelphia; all friends of the American Sabbath are urged to attend.

WE ask all our readers to note particularly the offer made in the Publisher's Department, whereby our subscribers can secure THE UNION SIGNAL and the Ladies' Home Companion one year for $1.10, with a cook book thrown in. This only holds till January 1, so you have no time to lose.

THE photographs taken by Miss Guernsey at the Convention excursion to Indian Springs will be for sale at twenty-five cents each. The proceeds will form the nucleus of the Loyal Temperance Legion World's Fair Fund. If the weather will permit printing, they will be ready in time for a list of the same to be given in our next issue.

Now that all complications concerning the site and jurisdiction are satisfactorily arranged, plans are being pushed to make the Columbian Exposition a great success. Among others suggested is a plan for rapid transit from one building to another by means of a moving platform; its proposed capacity is to transport 40,000 people each day.

THE Southern Inter-States Immigration Bureau, Austin, Tex., is doing a good work in organizing every portion of the South for the purpose of bringing the best grade of new citizens and capital into that section of our country. A convention is to be held at Montgomery, Ala., December 17, to which delegates are called from all over the South.

WASHINGTON has been all astir with the visit of the Brazilian Squadron. A formal reception of its officers occurred at the White House, Friday. It was the most "brilliant event of the season." Admiral da Silveisa presented President Harrison with a letter expressing Brazil's appreciation of this country's early recognition of the Republic of Brazil, and a medal commemorating this event.

THE first regular meeting of the Woman's National Council, of which Miss Willard is president, will be held at Albaugh's Opera House, Washington, D. C., February 22 to 24, inclusive. Mary T. Lathrap was chosen to represent the W. C. T. U. on its Executive Committee, and will speak in its behalf. It will represent the leading National societies of women in this country. Its meetings are held triennially.

THE following telegram was sent to the "Non-partisan" Convention by the National W. C. T. U. On the plea that it was not officially addressed, the "Non-partisan" Convention refused to take any notice of it: "Mrs. E. J. Phinney:—Believing that it is legally and morally wrong for any other society to take the name of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union with the prefix 'non-partisan' we ask you as Christians to discontinue the use of this name. On behalf of the National W. C. T. U. Frances E. Willard, president; Mary A. Woodbridge, secretary."

THE corrected count of the returns for Nebraska, as compiled by the Secretary of State, gives the vote for the prohibitory amendment, 82,292; against, 111,728; for license, 75,462; against, 91,084. George H. Gibson, who so valiantly held the Leader in Omaha, till after election, now takes editorial charge of the New Republic, of Lincoln, with C. E. Bently, as associate. Not a shade of discouragement shows among the Nebraska leaders; they have entered upon the new campaign with all the energy and enthusiasm that distinguished the old, and are bound to win, no matter how long it takes.

MR. H. C. BITTENBENDER writes that the Prohibitionists of Nebraska will contest the fight "For God and Home and Native Land," and the redemption of the state from Rosewater, Rum and Roggen rule. The Independents have served papers for contest of state officers and the hearing commences to-day. Whatever may be the outcome of this contest, it will do good by letting in the light upon the scandalous methods used by the Rosewater ring to defeat prohibition. Had such atrocities been committed in any Southern city the whole country would have rung with denunciation, but being in Omaha, and in the interest of rumocracy, the Associated Press and the organs of both parties pass them over almost in silence.

IS THERE any W. T. P. A. stock for sale? is a frequently recurring question. Yes, there is, and we shall be very glad to sell you what you wish, provided you do not wish more than $6,000 worth apiece. The shares are twenty-five dollars each, and not one has ever been sold below par. We believe it a good investment, and prove our faith by our works, by putting all our spare change into it; have purchased three shares this week, and hope to purchase more before this issue is exhausted, for probably no more will be issued. All who wish to purchase will do well to apply at once. We should like to sell $10,000 worth this month to have the money ready to pay for our new perfecting press, which is approaching completion. Address the secretary, Mary Allen West, at this office.

LUCY STONE enumerates among the especial causes suffragists have for thanksgiving, these facts: The House Judiciary Committee has for the first time reported in favor of the sixteenth amendment; the admission of Wyoming; the expression of the vast audience in the Atlanta Opera House when Mother Wallace spoke in favor of woman suffrage; the pledge that women shall be admitted to the medical school of Johns Hopkins University: the Kentucky Constitutional Convention favors better laws for women; South Dakota has heard the gospel of equal rights throughout all her borders; the whole Methodist Church has become a school for the discussion of woman's rights, and a great body of women in New York have entered earnestly into the movement for better municipal government.

A PROMINENT minister, in his Thanksgiving address, gave as one cause for thanksgiving, increased sensibility in public conscience, as shown by the English Liberals withdrawing from the support of Parnell because of his complication with the O'Shea divorce suit. In these proceedings Parnell was the co-respondent; no defense was offered, which amounts to a confession of guilt. Parnell, the leader, has the world's confidence as sagacious, far-seeing, courageous; Parnell, the man, stands convicted of impurity. The moral sentiment of Christendom must sustain Gladstone in his decision that the desecrator of a home is not the one to lead the Home Rule party. The action of the Irish envoys at Chicago last week, to whom the decision seems to have been left, shows that his own party feels that Parnell must resign the leadership.

THE committee appointed by the National Convention, Mrs. L. C. Hughes, of Arizona, chairman, called upon President Harrison and the Secretary of War last week, to urge them to issue an order forbidding the sale of beer and wines at military garrisons. They said that the government was not only licensing and encouraging beer and wine drinking, but was even compelling commissioned officers of the army to be "overseers of military saloons called canteens, and thus giving a semblance of respectability to beer drinking." They stated that under the government canteen system the consumption of beer had more than doubled, and declared that the military garrisons in the West were rapidly drifting into agencies for breweries, and the soldiers were acquiring intemperate habits which unfitted them for either military or civil pursuits. What the result will be remains to be seen.

LETTERS were received by the Convention from many distinguished men and women, among them Rev. Phillips Brookes, Bishop Vincent, Bishop William Taylor, Bishop and Mrs. Warren, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Miss Grace H. Dodge, Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. John B. Gough, Sir Wilfred Lawson, England; George Blaiklock, England; Mrs. Letitia Youmans, Mother Thompson, Professor Ely, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Marion Harland, the Woman's Band of Missions, Boston, (Congregational), Woman's Baptist Foreign Missionary Society of the West, United Society of Christian Endeavor, Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, and National Division of Sons of Temperance. Marietta Holley writes: "I cannot be with you in person, but my heart journeys Southward and is with you all, noble workers, for the best good of the world. God is with you. He will keep you and nothing shall harm you, and the victory is not long delayed."

THE Conference lately held in this city on "The Past, Present, and Future of Israel" developed great interest. Jews and Christians participated in it, not for the purpose of converting either to the other's faith, but that each might understand the other better, and both learn points of agreement. Mr. William E. Blackstone presided; Dr. Goodwin, of the First Congregational Church; Ex-Rabbi Felsenthal, who has resided here over a quarter of a century; Rabbi Hirsch, of Sinai Congregation, and Dr. J. H. Barrows, were the prominent speakers. Dr. Goodwin gave a valuable historic paper on "The Attitude of Christian Nations toward the Jews," showing that it had been anything but Christlike; Rabbi Felsenthal followed with an answer to the question, "Why do Israelites not Accept Jesus as their Messiah?" Rabbi Hirsch defined the position of the three classes of Jews to-day, the orthodox, the conservative, and the reformed Jews, and Dr. Barrows spoke eloquently on "Israel as an Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion." The meetings of the Conference were very fully attended by both Jews and Christians; the spirit pervading them was excellent, and the result must be better fellowship among those who worship the same Father.

"WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE CAN BE DONE."

BY FRED WOOSTER OWEN.

They said, in Rome, when the Christians prayed,
  Down in the Catacombs, dark and drear,
Or with life the price of the true faith paid,
  "Who would the tale of these zealots hear?"

Yet the Christian sings his swelling hymns,
  And the cross of Christ triumphant stands
Where the lions tore the convert's limbs,
  On the wide arena's cruel sands.

They said, in Holland, when Alva smote
  The babe at the breast, and the white breast, too,
"We have these 'beggars' hard by the throat,
  Perish the whole rebellious crew!"

Yet Holland sent to this favored land,
  In the little "Mayflower's" cabin small,
Men of a purpose, stern and grand,
  Germ of the noblest folk of all.

They said, in the days of old John Brown,
  "We breed our blacks for our private gain.
Ye liberty-prating rabble, down!
  Or we rend the land and the flag in twain."

Yet Abraham Lincoln forward came,
  And a million muskets gleamed at his back;
Brown lives in song, and a nation's shame
  Is washed in blood from the nation's track.

They say in this, our fateful hour,
  Two parties vast, that are stained with sin,
"The nation must lose its manhood's flower,
  That we, on election day, may win."

Yet God is a God of changeless might,
  And changeless love; in the days ahead,
Let us rally around our roses white,
  And trust Him to smite this giant dead.

MRS. MYRTLE'S PARLOR-MEETING, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY MRS. E. J. ARCHIBALD.

"Dear me," sighed little Mrs. Myrtle, as she settled herself cozily in her snug rocking-chair before the fire, "how I wish we had one here!"

"Had what?" inquired her husband from behind his newspaper. "Are you alluding to a lady-help, or a patent family washing machine?"

"Don't talk rubbish, John," answered his wife, "when you know just as well as I do that I mean a W. C. T. U., here, right here in Ayleborough, where it is so sorely needed!"

"Why, what has been stirring up your temperance temper, little woman? It is a good long while since I have heard the sound of those exceedingly cabalistic letters. Thought you were cooling off a little on your white-ribbon views."

"I'm afraid it has seemed like it," sighed his wife. "You see where there are no meetings to attend, and no chance of help from other white-ribboners, one's enthusiasm does grow a little cold, though," she added with indignation, "I think mine has been at white heat after what I have seen to-day."

"What dreadful doing have you witnessed which has so specially excited your ire?"

"Why, you know, John, how everybody here has wine on their tables, and it is always offered when you pay afternoon calls. Mrs. Traill always has sherry and port on her sideboard on her reception day; of course she is supposed to give only five o'clock tea, but she says the men won't come unless they have something a little stronger, and, John, I believe that there is spirits on hand, too, if they want it!"

"Well, my dear?"

"Well! I don't call it well, and I don't think you would, either, if you had seen her absolutely coaxing that young Dallas, her nephew, to 'help himself; he would find what he wanted on the sideboard.' He flushed up at first, and said he would like tea, but afterwards he said he would just take a glass of sherry instead."

"Well, my dear, young fellows are apt to prefer good sherry to weak tea, and a glass of wine isn't going to hurt any one!"

"John! you know perfectly well that with Gerald's family history fresh in your mind, you don't really think that at all! Why, you cannot have forgotten how his grandfather ruined himself, in fact, killed himself with drinking, and his father, a man who, I suppose, was more highly respected in this community than any one else, until just lately, is fast going the same way."

"What! Judge Dallas a drunkard?"

"Yes, John, it is too true; and it is just killing his poor wife. If you could have seen the imploring look she gave her sister-in-law to-day, when she offered Gerald the wine! And yet, I don't suppose that with all this dearly-bought experience she realizes the necessity of putting away the temptation entirely from her household. I dare say she uses it in cooking, and most likely keeps it in the house for sickness. Oh," cried little Mrs. Myrtle, despairingly, "what could I do to convince these dear women how wrong they are about all this? Why! I couldn't talk temperance to them, they would only stare at me and think I was a crank! They simply won't understand. Why! when I first came here to live I got perfectly tired telling people what my white ribbon meant."

"I thought perhaps you had got tired of the idea yourself," remarked her husband, quietly, "as I see you have quite given up wearing it."

Mrs. Myrtle reddened a little. "You are wrong, John," she said, "although I must say it does look so; but I will put on a fresh piece to-morrow, and after this I will always wear it."

"Will you sport it at your teas and afternoon calls, dear?" asked Mr. Myrtle.

"Certainly I will; and—Oh, John! don't you suppose that would be the very thing?—if I only could manage it," she murmured under her breath.

"What brilliant idea has struck you now?" inquired her husband, as he folded up his newspaper.

"Why, to get Mrs. Traill to let me have a parlor meeting in her house. You know she has just the rooms for it, they will hold so many people."

"I thought you represented Mrs. Traill as being quite impervious to temperance arguments, and deaf to all good moral impulses, a blind guide, perverting youthful nephews, and—"

"John! you are too bad," cried his wife; "Mrs. Traill is just a dear, good little woman, only she has never been brought face to face with her responsibilities about these things. She was brought up in a home where wines and liquors were always used quite as a matter of course, and very fortunately for her, her own immediate friends did not (apparently) suffer any ill effects from the use of them. To be sure they have their family gout, but they are rather proud of that; it is aristocratic, you know, to have a family gout, and there is a consumptive tendency, also; both of her brothers died young. But I am sure that if she saw things in the right light, she would give up the use of wine altogether, and I am sorry that I have never had the courage to tell her so, as I should have done. But my mind is made up now on that point, and on the parlor meeting project, too, if only I could see my way clear!"

"That being the state of affairs, dear, I think we had better sleep on it; perhaps to-morrow morning will bring you more light on this knotty problem."

Mrs. Myrtle always said afterward that at least once in her life she was quite thankful to Jane, the nurse, for her forgetfulness. For Baby Myrtle's nightly allowance of "Mellin's Food" was not forthcoming when that young gentleman awoke, between two and three o'clock, loudly clamoring; and it took up so much time to appease his hunger and to still his outcries, that his mother got thoroughly waked up, and as she sat rocking him gently before the nursery fire, her thoughts reached out into the coming years, when the little golden head, pillowed so tenderly on her breast, should be crowned with the glory of manhood. How would it be with her boy then? Would he—could it ever be—that he should grow up to be her grief and shame instead of her pride? and she thought with a pang of sympathy of a young man of her acquaintance, handsome, rich, cultured, "the only son of his mother, and she a widow." Crossing the room she looked across the street to a house opposite where a dim light burned in a chamber window. She was watching for him even now, that poor, widowed mother. Ah! what an aching, desolate heart was hers! For the hours rolled slowly by and he came not; that son who should have been her stay, where was he? Drinking the night away in some low haunt of sin, with gamblers and felons for his boon companions. Or worse yet, the prey of her "whose ways take hold on death." . . . . Mrs. Myrtle's eyes filled with tears; kissing her babe tenderly she laid him softly in his cozy crib, and then sinking on her knees beside him, she poured out her heart to her Heavenly Father in prayer. She prayed for her boy, for her neighbor's boy and for herself, that she might be given grace and strength to be a true and faithful witness for her Master among those who, in calling Him Lord, Lord, had yet forgotten His injunction about causing His little ones, His weak ones, to offend. Hitherto she had felt strong in her own knowledge of what was right; secure in her own principles, and careless of those of others; now, as the spirit of grace revealed to her her past, she saw that she had been faithless to her trust. Seeking then, low at the foot of the cross, that mercy and forgiveness never denied to the suppliant in Jesus' name, she rose refreshed and strengthened from her solemn communion with her God, resolved to delay no longer, but to carry into the homes of her friends, in His name, the message of the W. C. T. U., and to win them, if possible, to work for God and Home and Humanity.

Later that same day, Mrs. Myrtle tied her bonnet-strings to the music of Frances Willard's words, who, when asked who might organize a W. C. T. U. answered, "Any God-fearing white-ribboned woman with the grace of God in her heart."

She found her friend, Mrs. Traill, at home, and plunged at once with a sort of desperate courage into the subject so dear to her. Would Mrs. Traill lend her drawing-rooms for a meeting? Why, what sort of a meeting? When? and who was going to conduct it?

"A temperance meeting! and you to address it? Why my dear Mrs. Myrtle! how funny! Do excuse me, but isn't this something new?"

"No, dear friend," said Mrs. Myrtle, "this is not new, though I feel very guilty in not telling you so before. If you will invite your friends, and allow me to invite some of mine, I just want to have a little talk with you about some things which concern us women very nearly, and to lay before you a plan whereby we may work together against what we all know to be evil, and may be very helpful to those who sorely need our help. Will you do this?"

"Certainly, I will," said Mrs. Traill, and added warmly, "I do think you are just as sweet and brave as you can be! Tell me just what you want done in this matter, and I will help you."

"Well, then, I think at this first meeting, I should like only women, and it had better be in the afternoon. You can make it a five o'clock tea if you like—only remember! no wine!—and I do wish we could have some music!"

"I am sure Carrie Mathew would sing for you if you would care to have her."

"The very thing," exclaimed Mrs. Myrtle, "and I have a song I would so much like her to sing."

"Give it to me, then, and I will see that she sings it," said Mrs. Traill.

"Would you mind," said Mrs. Myrtle, hesitating a little, "if I asked old Miss Stedham to open the meeting with prayer?"

"As you please," returned Mrs. Traill somewhat coldly. "I don't know the woman, but if she is a friend of yours, of course you are at liberty to invite her. But I thought this was to be a temperance affair, not a prayer-meeting. I give you fair warning that I don't know anything about prayer-meetings; never was at one in my life!"

Mrs. Myrtle's eyes glistened. "Never mind," she said, "let me have my own way this time, and then, if you don't like it, you need never speak to me again! Perhaps—I don't know—perhaps you will cut my acquaintance when you have heard what I've got to say!"

"You absurd little woman!" said her friend, "who in their senses could quarrel with you. Have a conventicle right here and now, if you like, only don't expect me to conduct it, that is all!"

DR. JOSEPH T. DURYEA, OF OMAHA, AND PROHIBITION.

BY HON. NEAL DOW.

In the semi-weekly Tribune of New York, 18th inst., is a letter from Dr. Duryea, with the following displayed head-lines:

"PROHIBITION IN THE WEST.

"AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM DR. DURYEA SHOWING ITS FAILURE IN NEBRASKA AND IOWA."

This letter would be of no importance and would not require a reply to its statements, but for the fact that the name of its author is more than respectable among those of mere theologians, and the indorsement of the letter by the Tribune may lead a great many people to accept it as a fair and honest statement of facts in relation to the matter of which it treats. Among the influences surrounding its author this may be mentioned: that his residence is in a city in which vice and corruption more abound than in any other in the country. That is its reputation. Grog-shops are there established by law, and houses of prostitution are protected by the city authorities, yielding a fixed and steady revenue to the public treasury. The Doctor has lived there long enough to become acclimated, so to speak, and to regard saloons and brothels as necessary evils, if evils at all. The whole drift of the Doctor's letter is to narcotize the public conscience as to the liquor traffic, and to lead public opinion to regard it rather as a good thing than an evil. From the first word to the last word of the Doctor's letter, there is no expression of interest in the temperance cause, nor of sympathy with the movement for the suppression of the saloons which inflict upon the people more misery than comes from all other sources of evil combined.

There is no prohibition in Nebraska, as the Tribune suggests, and it never has been there. The grog-shops pay an annual fee of $1,000. It is high license; the first state to adopt that policy, so much praised and so warmly advocated and defended by the Tribune. The Doctor's letter—if honest and true—would show that the defeat of the prohibitory constitutional amendment in Nebraska was the result of the cool and deliberate opinion of the people—after a careful survey of the ground, that upon the whole, grog-shops regulated by law "are the best . . under present conditions." He would like to have "a depot (of liquors) in every dist for their sale for legitimate uses," among which wo be as a drink by those who can "enjoy the good gift f God without abusing them."

The Doctor says not a word of the violence and outrage at the polls in Omaha, and generally throughout the state, on the voting day, when temperance men were driven away from the ballot boxes and prevented from voting; not a word of the fact that immense sums of money were spent by the Liquor Leagues throughout the state in buying up newspapers to print and circulate falsehoods in their interest; in corrupting voters and subsidizing "impecunious parsons;" not a word of the fact that the entire machinery of the Democratic and Republican parties was devoted to the defeat of prohibition; not a word of the fact that immense quantities of temperance literature was suppressed at the Omaha post-office. But in his view the defeat of prohibition was the result of the cool, wise conclusion of the people that upon the whole, prohibition would not be a public good compared with licensed grog-shops.

I call particular attention to the Doctor's statements as to the working of prohibition in Iowa. He lays special stress upon this, suggesting that the failure of that policy there had much to do with the defeat of the constitutional amendment in Nebraska. Every word of the Doctor's statements upon this point shows what the influences are by which he is surrounded, and discloses the fact that his sympathies are entirely with the side opposed to prohibition and in favor of licensed saloons. He gives his readers and the Tribune to understand that in Iowa prohibition is a failure. His reasons for this are from the familiar talk of the grog-shops, while he ignores entirely the great amount of testimony upon that point contributed by a great many officials of Iowa of every rank in the public service, including judges of the courts and the governor of the state.

I do not suggest that the Doctor suppresses the testimony of those men; he probably knows nothing of it, his associations and sympathies being clearly and strongly on the other side. Great pains were taken by the friends of temperance to scatter far and wide over the country the most abundant and conclusive proofs of the great success of prohibition in Iowa, and a special effort was made to leave no part of Nebraska without the most reliable testimonies upon this important matter. Iowa is near neighbor to Omaha, where the Doctor lives, and it is not possible that he should be ignorant of the abundant and overwhelming proofs of the success of prohibition in that state, if he had the smallest interest in the agitation now going on in all the English-speaking world for the deliverance of nations and peoples from the misery, wretchedness and ruin, the degradation and brutalization coming from the liquor traffic. How can we wonder at the moral condition of Omaha when we see the highest ecclesiastical influences there on the side of the grog-shops—the overflowing fountains of all possible sin, shame, crime and degradation?

In February of this year was printed at "Des Moines, By Authority of Law," the message of Governor Larrabee to the Legislature of Iowa, in which he shows that prohibition there has been a great benefit to the state and an unspeakable blessing to the people. It is hardly possible that this testimony could have escaped the notice of Dr. Duryea, if he had any interest whatever in the temperance question.

There has never been in the world's history, a controversy in which the right and the wrong, the good and the bad, the Lord's interests and the devil's interests were more clearly and sharply defined and involved on one side and the other in violent antagonism to each other, than in this contest between the people and the liquor traffic. The most formidable obstacle in the way of a speedy and final settlement of this controversy on the Lord's side, is the attitude towards it of the church as a whole, and the antagonism or indifference of a great many clergymen, who, if they were true men, would occupy no position of unfriendliness to the right in this warfare, nor one so equivocal as to justify the demand of them, "Which side are you on?" In a great audience in a church three years ago, I heard this question in a loud voice from the floor, interjected into a clergyman's speech on temperance, greatly to his discomfiture. I think it an appropriate thing to do, to ask Dr. Duryea: "Which side are you on?"

BIRTHDAYS.

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON.

Much as we may value the holidays and holydays, it is the birthday of each one of us that has the deepest and most personal individual significance. The Christmas time, with all its beautiful and lovely associations; the Thanksgiving day, with its re-binding of family ties; Fourth of July, Washington's birthday, and the other national days—these belong to all. These are not our days any more than they are everybody's days, and still they make special and blessed halting-places in the year, and around them cluster our best aspirations and noblest thoughts, and we could ill afford to spare them from our lives. But the birthday is peculiarly our own. And if we should commemorate the birthday of Christ, the nation's birthday, or the birthday of any grand institution, how much more should we treat as of solemn personal significance the day that marks the beginning of our life, and the number of years that for us have already passed! The birthday is more than holiday; it should be above all others the holy day. In childhood, kind hands fill the day with the brightness of special indulgence. We have our little birthday party; we have our cake, with its few, small glistening candles; we have the years told off in kisses on cheek and brow and lips; we have to undergo the frolicsome whippings from older brothers and sisters; we have something by which it is made a merry day; something to make us feel that father and mother, and grandfather and grandmother at least, are glad that we, with all our little ways, good and bad, came to dwell in this world, and to dwell in this home instead of another. Somebody is glad we are here; somebody is glad we are born; somebody is happier because of our restless little lives. Many and many a child has come to its first consciousness of the possibility of its being a blessing to other people through the loving words said to it on its birthday. When it is all over, there is left a half-eaten cake in the closet, at which we may nibble at will, a new story book to be read in the window-seat while the light grows dim, and some kind voice warns us that we are burning the brightness out of our eyes.

But it is not on these childish birthdays that we wish to dwell; it is further on, when the duties, and the studies and the preparations for the life coming so swiftly upon us, seem to demand that out of every hour we shall gather the greatest good that it can be made to yield. It is at that period when we know that we have all the time there is, and yet we do not have time enough, that the birthday begins to mark the too rapidly fleeting years and to take on a solemn significance to the soul.

How many of you are just there, my young friends, on what is called the threshold of life, and yet finding the time so closely occupied that it seems to you you can take nothing more to think of or to do. How many of you are already learning that, in order to have the hours take care of themselves, you must take care of the minutes? How many, I wonder, have passed over the point where you looked forward to the older years and wished they would hasten their coming? We can all remember a time when we were very little girls, when the one eager longing of our hearts was to be bigger, and when we could not wait patiently to grow. We can all remember the time when our frocks coming only to the tops of our boots, yet covered hearts that throbbed longingly for a dress with a train. We can all remember when our hair was braided in stiff little tails, tipped off with a knot of bright ribbon and drawn back from our faces, as if only so could sleepy eyes be kept from closing over our books; and we know that even then our little hearts were longing for grown-up coiffures of puffs and frizzles and curls.

Alas! we come soon enough to the time when the longing is backward and not forward, when the delights of life seem to be behind. A year or two out of school, a few years in so-called society, an early marriage, a strange home, ceaseless care and responsibility in the place of tender indulgence and assiduous ministry to our fancies and needs and desires. Ah! these are the things that take the holiday element out of life and make the birthdays seem more and more like one of the good days. This being true, let us keep the holiday element that sets apart this day as long as we can, both for a joy to ourselves and to others. Especially if there are little children about us let us "make much" of the birthday. The German custom of celebrating everybody's fête day, from that of the dear, old white-haired grandmother down to the year-old baby, is one that we would do well to imitate. For every other member of the family to make the one whose festival it is, feel that the loveliest thing that ever happened was his own coming into the home; this is a joy in the strength of which even a child may go many days Much more common than we suppose is the fear and the dread, even on the part of young people, that one's life is not dear or necessary to the home or to the world. It is not old people alone who feel that they are useless and have no particular place in the hearts of those about them. To put more consciousness of love into any life is one of the sweetest things to do, and a thing that might be done all the year round, but that surely ought to be done at least one day in the year. So, whatever other day is sad, try to make the birthday a festive occasion to every child in the house, and because of its festive and special character it will be all the easier to impress upon the mind the responsibility of future years.

To those of us who are older the sense of the irrevocable past, the impossibility of gathering again what is lost; the fact that opportunities never exactly repeat themselves, is sure to come to us on the birthday. For us it should be a day of finding out just where on life's road we stand, just what are our exact relations to our families and our homes and to the people among whom our influence ought to be most favorably felt. This day should not be one of simply making good resolutions, as so many of us are apt to do in January only to break them before the first month is gone, but it should really be the time, as Whittier puts it, when one says,

"Stand still, my soul, in the silent dark,
I would question thee,
Alone in the shadow drear and stark
With God and me;
Say, soul, what is thy errand here?"

Whether the solemn question come in youth or later years, no better re-adjustment can be made of our duties. No better resolution formed, no better life can be lived than the one which tries to act from day to day as if no other birthday were to come, and as if this year were to be our last.

We should fill our lives with the sweetest things,
If we had but a day,
We should drink alone at the purest springs,
In our upward way;
We should love with a life-time's love in an hour,
If the hours were few,—
We should sleep, not for dreams, but for fresher power,
To be and to do.
We should be from our clamorous selves set free,
To work or to pray.
And to be what our Father would have us be,
If we had but a day.

WHAT THE "ORIGINAL PACKAGE" DECISION DID NOT DECIDE.

BY JUDGE DAVID M'CULLOCH.

III.

From the foregoing observations it will be perceived that, by reason of this "Original Package" decision, the country is liable to be thrown into a state of uncertainty in all its interstate commercial transactions. It affects as well the wholesale merchant, the manufacturer and the dealer in live stock as the rectifier or the brewer. If the latter may take the products of his plant into another state and there expose them for sale, without regard to the police regulations of such state, there would seem to be no good reason why the former may not. If such be the law, then the foreigner or the resident of another state enjoys privileges in the markets of the several states which are denied to their own citizens.

The principle involved in the case is strikingly like that which agitated the minds of the people of this country some years ago. It was then contended that whatsoever the Constitution of the United States recognized as property was entitled to the protection of the Federal Government in every part of the union, and inasmuch as that document recognized the right of one man to own another, that right must be protected wherever the National flag floated. It was the assertion of this right that resulted in the enactment of the "Fugitive Slave Law," the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and the promulgation of the "Dred Scott" decision. If the result of this decision shall be to cause us again to dig about the foundations of our government, to discover on what our freedom rests, it may lead to consequences no less momentous than did those involved in the Dred Scott decision.

If the other states may force upon the prohibition states a traffic deleterious to their well-being, and obnoxious to their tastes and habits of life, until they can have protection therefrom at the hands of the National Congress, they will be very apt to inquire somewhat closely into the reasons for such a construction of the constitution.

The case under consideration determines that the power to regulate commerce between the states rests exclusively in Congress, and that while Congress remains silent, the states have no power to legislate upon that subject. The question, therefore, naturally suggests itself (there being no statutory law in existence applicable to the subject), "By what laws are the courts to be governed in determining the rights of parties?" In the absence of statute law, there would seem to be no other guide than that known and recognized by all commercial nations as the "Lex Mercatoriæ," or the law of commercial usage. To this fountain of justice the courts must necessarily go, until Congress shall have prescribed something different.

But what is the nature of those laws which Congress has the power to enact? It seems to be conceded on all hands that the purpose had in view in conferring upon Congress jurisdiction over this class of rights was to impart uniformity to commercial law throughout the Union. The inhibition resting upon the states to pass any law in restraint of free commerce, or to regulate the same, comes from the constitution and not from the will of Congress. It is somewhat difficult, therefore, to see how, by removing a supposed restriction, Congress could authorize any one state, while all the others remained silent, to pass any valid law, touching the commercial relations of that state with all the others. Notwithstanding the intimation thrown out by the court, that it is within the power of Congress to afford a remedy to the prohibitory states, yet the nature of that remedy is not revealed. It would seem as if that sovereignty with which the exclusive jurisdiction rests, should furnish all needed legislation, fortified with penalties sufficient to accomplish the purposes in view.

All that precedes this was written before the passage of the Wilson Bill through Congress. From the time of the rendition of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Original Package Case until the passage of that bill, the prohibitory states were literally overrun with venders of intoxicating drinks, selling in what they were pleased to call original packages. Upon the passage of the Wilson Bill many of them quit the business. But enough were found to stand out against it, to verify our prediction that the traffic would resist at every point. A new line of decisions is now beginning to pour in upon us, under which the traffic is again reviving. So far as observed they do not come squarely up to the point of deciding that the powers of the states are not enlarged by the Act of Congress, but slide off on a side issue. It is now held that inasmuch as the statutes of Kansas and Iowa were void when passed, they require reënactment before they can have any force. Other courts, we understand, have held that, although pronounced void until Congress should have removed the inhibition, as soon as the necessary permission was given by Congress, the state statutes already enacted immediately became of force.

The most recent report is that one of the Federal Courts in the state of Iowa has rendered a decision sustaining the Wilson bill, as a valid permit to the state of Iowa to enact the prohibitory law, and that no reënactment is necessary. No full text of any of these decisions has yet come to hand, but inasmuch as they were not rendered by courts of last resort, they cannot be of much consequence outside of the particular locality where rendered. It is not unlikely, however, that out of some one of them may grow another test case for the Supreme Court, as full of defects as that one already decided.

We shall probably never reach a satisfactory solution of this vexed question until the Supreme Court shall have had a case before it, in which the whole subject in all its length and breadth shall have been fully discussed and investigated. We shall then probably find out what the framers of the constitution meant by the power to regulate commerce among the states, and to what extent, if any, it was intended to limit the powers of the states. We may also find out something we do not now know of that function of government called the police power.

If in that investigation it should be discovered that the powers of government, both state and national, over the commercial affairs of the country are much more extensive than we have heretofore thought; that the police power of the state is sufficient for the suppression of all sorts of monopolies, corners and trusts in the common necessaries of life, as well as to the prohibition of the traffic in everything deleterious to the morals, the health or the general well-being of the people, a great advance will have been made in the solution of many other vexed questions which the greed of gain has forced upon us.

THE INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ORDER LEAGUE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The recent meeting of this organization at Pittsburgh, Pa., was the ninth since the formation of the National League, and the second since its enlargement to include the Provinces of Canada, as well as the states of the American Union. Space forbids my giving the proceedings in order and detail, but their relation to the sacred cause in which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is engaged is so important that the most noteworthy events of the meeting must have place and comment.

There were seven sessions during the two days assigned for the convention, commencing with a meeting of the Executive Committee at 9:30 on Thursday morning, November 20, and ending with a general public meeting in the old City Hall, on Friday evening following. The headquarters were at the Seventh Avenue Hotel, and the business meetings were held in the chapel of the Y. M. C. A.

Among the leaders at the convention were noted President Bonney, Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Prof. John M. Langston, of Virginia; Major E. L. Bond, of Montreal; F. S. Spence, of Toronto, secretary of the Dominion Alliance; Col. L. Edwin Dudley, secretary of the International League, also of the Massachusetts League; Hon. Arthur M. Burton, President of the Philadelphia Law and Order Society; Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, of the Sabbath Union; Hon. Felix R. Brunot, Rev. Dr. David McAllister and Capt. A. Wishart, of Pittsburgh; Rev. Dr. Cushing, of Wheeling, and Rev. Dr. Stevens, editor of the Christian Advocate.

The work of the convention consisted of reports of the progress of the Law and Order movement in the United States and in Canada, a comparison of methods and results, for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the organization, and presentations to the general public showing the importance of enforcing the laws and maintaining their supremacy. The greatest practical successes have been achieved in Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Toronto and Montreal. The secretary reported that there are about one thousand local Law and Order Leagues, and that the movement is everywhere attracting more and more attention, and making gratifying progress. The only lack was of means to prosecute the work, print and circulate documents, hold meetings, and effect organizations as the public needs require. The report made by Mr. Spence, in his address on the condition of law and order and temperance in the Dominion of Canada, was remarkable for its lucidity and comprehensiveness, and the importance of the facts it presented. Dr. Hale said it was worth a journey from Boston to Pittsburgh to hear. It is understood that this address will be printed for distribution.

The meeting on Thursday evening was at a public dinner given by the Pittsburgh League to the International body at the Seventh Avenue Hotel. This banquet was a decided success, and the speeches were of a high order. There was an address of welcome by Maj. W. B. Negley, president of the Pittsburgh League, with responses for the Dominion of Canada by Major Bond, and for the United States by President Bonney, followed with admirable speeches by Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Mr. Burton, Colonel Dudley, Professor Langston and Mr. Horace Geizer. Many brilliant and eloquent sayings were uttered, including some very bright things about reciprocity in morals, intelligence, virtue and progress; and some very caustic and heartily applauded condemnations of corrupt politics which would ignore the decalogue and the Golden Rule, as the foundations of civil and religious liberty. The music, given by a glee club, was unusually fine. "God Save the Queen" was sung after Major Bond's response, and "America," after that made by President Bonney.

During the sessions formal messages of greeting were received from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Western Pennsylvania Sabbath Association, and other organizations, to which appropriate replies were returned. The Pittsburgh press gave extended accounts of the proceedings, with favorable comments upon the nature of the Law and Order movement, and the work and character of its leaders.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year;

President, Hon. Charles Carroll Bonney, Chicago; vice-presidents, Hon. G. W. Ross, Canada; S. S. Kimball, Maine; Governor Goodell, New Hampshire; Major W. B. Negley, Hon. Daniel Agnew and Hon. A. M. Burton, Pennsylvania; the Rev. Washington Gladden, D. D., Ohio; Hon. B. M. Cutcheon and Jerome B. Cobb, Michigan; I. P. Ramsey, Illinois; J. C. Schafer and Hon. Lew Wallace, Indiana; J. B. Olin, Wisconsin; the Right Rev. John Ireland, D. D., Minnesota; Hon. L. S. Coffin and Hon. C. C. Nourse, Iowa; T. H. Leavitt, Nebraska; John Mulvane, Kansas; Hon. A. H. Colquit, Georgia; J. B. Dougall, Montreal, Canada; J. M. Wallace, Colorado; Hon. G. C. Moody, South Dakota; Rufus S. Frost and Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D. D., Massachusetts.

General Secretary, Col. L. Edwin Dudley, Boston, Mass.; Honorary Secretary, Wilbur F. Crafts, D. D., Boston, Mass.; Treasurer, Maj. E. L. Bond, Montreal, Canada.

Executive Committee: the president, secretary-treasurer and C. W. Wyman, Vermont; the Rev. Howard Crosby, D. D., and the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D. D., New York; B. B. Johnson, Massachusetts; Robert C. Ogden and A. Leggate, Pennsylvania; Walter T. Mills and John R. Walsh, Illinois; John Davis, M. D., Ohio; Gen. A. B. Nettleton, Minnesota; John J. Maclaren, Q. C. Canada; J. B. Richardson, New Jersey.

The proceedings culminated in the public meeting of Friday evening, which was well attended. The audience was cultured and sympathetic, and the addresses were warmly applauded. Dr. Hale spoke with great earnestness and power of the sovereignty of the people, and their right to demand and require their servants, the public officers, to enforce the laws, and protect the interests entrusted to their charge. Prof. Langston made a very eloquent appeal for universal obedience of the constitutions and the laws, and closed with an impassioned prophecy of "the good time coming," when equal rights shall everywhere prevail. Col. Dudley gave a graphic portrayal of the triumphs of Law and Order in the state of Massachusetts, with allusions to his part in the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic, years ago, in the same hall where he was then speaking. The annual address by President Bonney, on "The Executive Power and the Enforcement of the Laws," was a magnificent effort. I have room for the closing paragraphs only:

"The commanding need of our time is for executive officers who understand and will exercise the executive power. The laws do, indeed, need improvement, and judicial proceedings, reform, but not as urgently as existing laws need better enforcement. In his most exalted character of dignity and power, the supreme executive is called the CHIEF MAGISTRATE. In that character he organizes the administration of his department of the government, under appropriate orders, rules and regulations, and carries into effect with promptitude and efficiency, that great body of the laws which do not require any judicial interpretation or decision, but only executive direction and application. THIS IS GOVERNMENT. The legislative department acts by statute; the judicial by judgment, and the executive by proclamation and order, and each in its province is supreme. The first enacts, the second expounds, the third executes, and the result of that triple supremacy is not chaos, but harmony and power. If the existing laws were now only sufficiently enforced, most of the evils against which new legislation is demanded, would largely disappear.

"The mighty hand of executive power was created to protect and defend the people and their institutions against the assaults of foes within, as well as against the attacks of enemies without. Let it no longer neglect its duty. On the same table where waits the pen of the Chief Magistrate, rests also the sword of the Commander-in-Chief. If evil doers heed not the executive order and proclamation, the Constitution intends that they shall feel the sharper argument of arms. The Constitution knows nothing of crime and disorder, defiant and unsubdued. It places at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief all the civil and military forces of the government, and requires him to execute the laws, and maintain peace. There are no conditions; there is no alternative. THE LAWS MUST BE OBEYED.

"The mode in which the laws shall be enforced is not prescribed. That is wisely left to the good judgment and discretion of the executive, and may vary according to the exigencies of the particular occasion. The constitution grants power, and demands a result; and he who cannot give the result has no real right to hold the power. Executive office is no place for timidity and indecision. Alike in monarchy and in republic, but more especially in the latter, the safety and peace of the people depend on the integrity, the wisdom, the strength and the activity of the executive power. In the suppression of riot and disorder, and the prevention of crime, it may be necessary to destroy property, and even to take human life; and the people have made their chief magistrate the judge of that necessity, and have given him authority to execute the laws, "peaceably if he can, forcibly if he must." It is a serious thing to destroy property; it is a dreadful thing to take human life; and the just executive will make the utmost effort, by warning, appeal, and command, to secure the supremacy of the laws without injury to either; but if riot and crime will not heed his warning, appeal and command, he must meet the emergency according to his oath of office, and those who willfully resist the law must fall.

"To take care that the laws be faithfully executed, is diligently to observe and inquire whether they are obeyed; and in case any violation of law appears or is discovered, to admonish the offenders to cease their disobedience; and if the offense be serious, to cause the arrest and detention of the law-breakers for punishment in due course of law; and if in other cases the preliminary warning is not promptly followed by compliance, to apply, without needless delay, such force as may be necessary to secure obedience of the laws, and in case the wrong committed can be undone, to compel its prompt undoing, and if a repetition of the offense be attempted or threatened, to interpose the necessary means of prevention. To preserve the peace, to maintain order, to protect the people—these are the purposes for which the laws should be faithfully executed.

"It is an impressive truth that just in proportion as the executive authority is alert, active and determined, will its moral power be found adequate, without a resort to physical force. There will be little resistance to law, when it is known that the law is equally able and ready to protect the faithful, and to punish the refractory.

"The principle of executive authority is essentially the same in family, school and state. Insubordination is fatal to peace, to prosperity, to happiness.

"The claim that because a considerable number of persons in a particular locality are opposed to a particular law, it can not, or should not be enforced, is too imbecile for serious discussion. If the laws are defective, amend them; if oppressive, repeal them; but while they stand, enforce them. Only this, is rational government.

"It is, therefore, a high and imperative duty to exalt the regal principle of human government in the affections of the people; to lead them to revere and study its majestic nature and lofty duties; and to encourage them to support with all their power those executive officers upon whose courage and fidelity they must ever depend for protection and defense. However perfect may be the laws, and the judicial decisions that expound them, the people cannot enjoy the blessings of a reign of law and order, without a faithful and efficient exercise of THE EXECUTIVE POWER.

"The American Republic is not the absence of government. It aims to be the very perfection of government. In the name and by the authority of THE PEOPLE, it exercises sovereignty, enacts and enforces law, maintains its independence among the nations of the earth; makes war and establishes peace. Thus august, supreme and irresistible is the regal principle in free government, and upon its vigor, activity and wisdom, depends the actual enjoyment of the rights and liberties of the people."

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

HAPPY HUNTING GROUNDS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—"Every lady keep her hand on her pocketbook! Three pickpockets arrested; two loose in the crowd!" was the word passed through the throng that surged upon the platform of the East Tennessee depot the morning after the close of the convention. We remembered that in previous years at conventions held in northern cities we had suffered much from liars, but this was our first experience with thieves, and we questioned among ourselves which was worse, to lose our good name or the "trash" in our pockets. It seems the marauders had entered the empty cars, and crouching between and under the seats had escaped the observation of the train men in the yard. Evidently their plan was to rise up in the crush of passengers coming on board, mingle with them, take their money and get off before the train left. But they had not reckoned the quick perceptions of women trained to see and act; and when one felt her pocket-book going she seized the thief and gave the alarm. Instantly the culprit was surrounded by "sisters," and held until an officer arrived. He proved to be the leader of a gang from Brooklyn, N. Y., who had been "working" at the races in Bainbridge. This little rencounter at the start was like a slice of lemon or a dash of cayenne on a cup of breakfast tea; it gave the excursion just the needed flavor of romance. The cars—nine in number—were packed, jammed, sardined. The old iron horse tugged on the up grades, but no one was cross. The little women who could sit three in a seat declared it was jolly, and the big women who got on after the seats were all taken, were too good-natured to complain of standing.

Now the reader may wish to know whither we journeyed. By grace of the East Tennessee road and Mr. C.

A. Barker, of The Southern Star, a free excursion was given the delegates and visitors of the National Convention. Its objective point was Indian Springs, located on the old hunting grounds of the Cherokee Indians, about fifty miles from Atlanta. These springs are possessed of remarkable medicinal qualities, according to the inhabitants of that region. It is said to be impossible to drink their waters, and at the same time drink any form of alcoholic beverages. We did not hear of this peculiar property being tested the day we were there. The fact of there being no intoxicants sold in the county doubtless increases the difficulty in drinking both at the same time. The spring flowing from a small orifice in the rock above, has made for itself a basin in the rock below holding scarcely a quart until it overflows through a circular opening about the size of a silver dollar. It is said to yield a gallon a minute. The water is very clear and deliciously flavored with just a suspicion of sulphur. Given such water, mountain air and scenery, pine trees and a prohibition county, what could be added to make the site more perfect for an inebriate asylum? The land upon which the spring is located, and adjacent to it, is reserved by the state, but has been leased on long term by an enterprising syndicate, who are building a fine hotel to be completed and opened next May. It is hoped and expected that the state will here erect an inebriate asylum to come ultimately under the care of the National W. C. T. U.

It is historic ground. Here the Cherokee nation was gathered before starting on the long journey westward. Eight hundred of the older ones died on the way—died of broken heart. Empire is a juggernaut, crushing the weak under its wheels of progress. Only the kingdom of Christ waits on the movements of the lame, the halt, the slow.

The water upon which "our Jane Stapler's" mother used to float her canoe now turns a wheel, and the mill forms a picturesque feature of the scenery. Over the hills back of the springs stands the old stone fort, which has been converted into a peaceful dwelling occupied by Colonel Collier. A delightful lunch was served there to all who called, as over a hundred ladies did. Mrs. Collier is dainty and rosy in her seventy-fifth year, and not behind in the repartee and small talk of the drawing room, as she proved by her ready answers. As I took her hand I said: "I love every old lady for my dear mother's sake." Quickly she replied: "And I love every one who loves old ladies." There we met Miss Varner, charming for her frankness. When addressed by one of the ladies as "Mrs." she hastened to correct the error, saying: "I'm no 'Mrs.'; I'm an old maid. No other woman has my husband, for no man ever asked me to marry him." We knew that was fiction; such sparkling women do not live long "unasked."

A canopied rostrum had been erected on the hillside above the springs, and, as good speakers were on the program, there were doubtless good speeches, but we who had been spoken to for five days, hied us away to the old mill race, there to get the sermon of the stones and babbling brook.

Butts county proved that day that the half has never been told of Southern hospitality. Every one, black or white, who had a conveyance, must have been in service to carry us from the station at Flovilla, the two miles through cotton fields and pine woods to the springs. Jackson, the county seat six miles away, closed the public schools, and came down to swell the welcome, and the children marched and sang. Our nearest of kin, the Good Templars, were out in force and fine regalia to meet us when we stepped from the train.

The great event, however, was the barbecue, of which we had read but never expected to see or taste. Tables were built in the form of a hollow square in the light shade of the pines, and these were loaded with all good things in pastry, but the heart of the feast was in the center, where the barbecue pit had been smoking all night. Beef and pig and lamb, chicken and turkey—the firstlings of the flock—were cast into those fiery trenches for us, strangers within their gates, who aforetime had been enemies. Who shall say this whole burnt-offering was not a peace-offering, most generous and hearty? Remember how largely it was the offering of Southern women's hands to Northern women, and then remember the old war proverb: "The women on both sides are the bitterest." Now that the women have made their peace, let politicians fold away the ruddy vesture, and concede that "the war is over."

I must not omit the cotton picking, which was a pleasure all by itself. The train stopped against a snowy field, and immediately it swarmed with a vandal host. The mistress of the cabin appeared on the porch with a brood of small ones in her wake. She stood speechless as if paralyzed, arms akimbo, face aghast. The gentlemen in the party returned to the train by way of her cabin, and the expression of her countenance changed. The fluffy, snowy balls, with their rich brown calyxes, served as button-hole favors and hand bouquets, and are now treasured in hundreds of homes as souvenirs of a careless, happy day, "the loikes o' which," W. C. T. U. women have all too few.

RAMABAI'S SCHOOL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is reported in a letter to the Sacramento, Cal., Record-Union, written by a lady who visited the Shâradâ Sadan during "her trip around the world," which visit was made, we are informed, last November or December, that there was but one child-widow in the school and that she was six years of age. Allow me to say that there never has been a child-widow of that age in the institution. Any one who knows anything of Hindu customs and their tender treatment of little children, especially among the higher castes, would know the practical impossibility of our obtaining a little widow so young. They would not send the child away from their protection. War or famine might possibly strand such a little widow upon our shores, but with the composite family system prevalent among the higher castes, even orphanage could hardly do it.

The truth is that twenty-five widows have been admitted into the school (and at the time of the visit by the correspondent of the Record-Union, there must have been ten or twelve) since it opened, with one widow, March 11, 1889. It was prophesied that no widows would enter Ramabai's institution, and that, if they did, caste prejudices and religious hatred would cause their removal from the instruction of a Christian teacher. This has happened in a few cases. Two of the girls who were admitted, died; they were in bad health when they entered. Besides the widows there are at present about fifteen non-widows in the Shâradâ Sadan, whose expenses are paid by their parents or friends.

I have before me a tabulated record of the Shâradâ Sadan up to September 20, 1890. It reports seventeen widow-pupils, all but four of whom are Brahmins; the four belonging to the Vaisya or third high-caste. Of these young women, one became a widow at the age of five or six, another at seven, a third at eight years of age. Eight lost their husbands before the age of ten, and four between the ages of ten and thirteen. The youngest widow to be admitted was twelve years old, her husband having died some six months previous. The first widow was twenty-one or twenty-two years of age when she became a member of the school, having lost her husband when very young.

The majority of these young women know little more than the Marathi alphabet or primer when they come into the Sadan, though a few have advanced through two or three of the government standards of study which correspond to our public school grades. They are earnest, devoted students, eager to make up for lost opportunities, and eager also to go forth, at some time not far distant, to help other women as Ramabai is helping them. Their gratitude to the American people, who have opened these opportunities to them, is unbounded, and if nothing else were gained by this institution and the support given to it by Americans, there would be ample compensation in the interest aroused in our country among intelligent Hindus who learn of it as an American work.

Two of the young widows successfully completed three "Government standards" of study during the first year; others did nearly, if not quite, as well. Besides their regular studies the pupils of the Shâradâ Sadan are taught sewing and embroidery, and each girl is required to do from one to two hours' work every day about the house.

The future prospects are good; teachers are in demand, especially kindergartners. Abundant opportunities are also open for them to make nursing a profession, and there is great need of woman physicians. To reach the women of this land is one of the greatest humane works of the age, as any report of Zenana mission work will testify.

We are about to remove the institution to Poona where it was the original intention to establish it. Greatly to our regret and Ramabai's disappointment the opposition was so great on her return from America, that she decided to try Bombay. That opposition is now overcome. The reasons for the change are many. First. Poona is a much cheaper place in which to live. Second. Property can be purchased at prices from one-third to one-half as much as we would pay in Bombay, and Ramabai is anxious for an established home and school. Third. The climate is both cooler and healthier, the city being much higher and on the edge of the great plateau, known as the Deccan. Fourth. It is a Brahmin center, there being 40,000 Brahmins here, while it is said there are only 10,000 in Bombay. Fifth. It is an educational center, with hundreds of young men, all of whom are husbands and fathers, coming from different parts of the Deccan, who are beginning to be interested in female education. Sixth. It is the summer capital of the Bombay Presidency, and the resort of any number of Maharajah princes and potentates, who have the means and the power to help on reform. Seventh. Our support must come largely from Deccanese towns, and with all their prejudices and objections, the people greatly prefer Poona to Bombay, because there is scarcely a family of any position in the Deccan which has not friends in Poona to whom they can intrust the care of their widows in this new and untried experiment of school life. Our friends here congratulate us on the change.

It has also been reported that $80,000 were raised in America for the support of this work, of which some $50,000 were raised on the Pacific coast alone. That is a great mistake. Exclusive of "circle" pledges, about $18,000 were raised for general and building funds inclusive, of which less than $5,000 came from the Pacific coast.

No nobler work has been attempted. It is as far-reaching and beneficent as the sunlight. A similar institution for widows is being established near Calcutta, bearing the same name, in the Bengali language, of Shâradâ Sadan, or Home of Learning. The widows have been and are a despised class, though in this Bombay Presidency, at least, there is a growing feeling of sympathy for them. With the present system of early marriages little can be done toward educating girls previous to a marriage which must be consummated before the age of twelve. There are difficulties in the way of doing much for young wives, who are given into the care of mothers-in-law, as soon as possible, for housewifery, and for those religious duties which shall secure longevity to the husband and propitiate the gods in favor of male offspring. As the girl grows older, her household duties are usually many, and there is little chance for mental improvement. There is great hope in the widows, to whom re-marriage is absolutely forbidden by orthodox customs. There is a "Re-marriage Society," however, and in twenty years sixty or seventy widows have been married under its auspices. But it means a social death, and few, either men or women, are brave enough to submit to all that it may entail. A man may be married many times, but a woman is considered as forever wedded to her dead husband, whose face she may not remember to have seen.

With many thanks for the interest always shown in our work by THE UNION SIGNAL and its supporters, I am

Very truly yours, SARAH D. HAMLIN

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Any friends of the Temple who cannot afford to give a large sum to the building fund, can send a two-cent stamp to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, for a mite-box, in which to collect their own and their friends' pennies; with the mite-box will be sent a bulletin and descriptive card.

Optimism may be carried to such length that it becomes dangerous, but surely it is never as pernicious in its effect as pessimism, which undermines faith in everything. No matter how promising a project may be, the pessimist sees breakers ahead in the smoothest waters, and he whispers his fears to others in such a way that they think there must be danger, although they do not understand just how.

The latest whispering by this class in regard to our National building, is that it is to be called "The Temple" instead of "The Woman's Temple" as it was at one time talked about having it named. For good and sufficient reasons I decided with others that "The Temple" was by far the best name for our building. In the first place, it is necessary to have a short name for the great business blocks of Chicago. "The Temple" is brevity itself, and bears with it a world of meaning. It is to be the Temple of the twentieth century. There are masonic temples and all sorts of temples, but this unique building—like the beautiful one of old at Jerusalem—is to be "The Temple" of temples. These two words cut in the granite over the grand entrance will be supplemented by the addition in the glass transparency over the door with the following inscription: "The National Building of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union." The corner-stone will also bear the monogram of the W. C. T. U., date of organization and National motto, "For God and Home and Native Land," with date of erection. Surely this is sufficient to indicate that the entire building belongs to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union without having over its entrance, "The Woman's Temple," which anyone after a moment's thought can see would indicate to a stranger that the entire building was set apart for woman's work alone. Just as a building having over its entrance "The Men's Temple," would indicate that women were debarred from a place within its walls. The facts in the case are that probably one floor will fill the demand for all offices required for women including W. C. T. U. Headquarters. The rest will be used for banks and offices for large business firms. Under the circumstances is it not wiser therefore to call the building, "The Temple?"

One of our regrets, amid so much rejoicing on the day of the laying of the corner-stone, was that the inscription was not on the stone. It came about in this way. The design for the inscription was sent to the Maine & New Hampshire Granite Co., at North Conway, N. H., by our architect in September. About two weeks before the laying of the corner-stone, and after the inscription had been cut upon it, our builder, Mr. Fuller, found that the Granite Company had made a mistake in the dimensions of the stone—it was too small. A new and larger one had to be cut. There was no time to put on it the inscription; the place where the words are to be engraved is all polished and ready, and it will be put on when the rest of the carving for the building is done.

In truth the Temple is to be a Westminster Abbey, in the sense that it is to be a place of blessed memories of the good and noble departed. Mrs. Jane A. Miller, of Oberlin, Ohio, sends a check for $100, in memory of her beloved daughter, Harriet Allen Miller, who exchanged the shadows of earth for the sunlight of Heaven about a year ago. Mrs. Miller is doubly bereaved, as she lost her husband three months after her daughter left her. Her grief, however, does not make her selfish, as she expresses the deepest interest in the building of the Temple, and rejoices that she is able to do a small part towards its erection. Mrs. L. A. Williams, of Rose Creek, Minn., sends $5 in memory of her dear husband who died April 15, 1888. She also sends another $5 for herself and two children. She adds, "What little I have belongs to the Lord." Mrs. H. P. Sullivan, Miles Grove, Pa., desires to have the name of her mother, Mrs. E. Batchelor, placed in the book of memoriam in the Temple; for this purpose she sends $5, and adds $10 for herself, which we trust may grow into $100, before the building is finished.

The following names indicate "the graves of a household." The money is sent by Miss Charlotte M. Way, and amounts to $16. Five dollars of this amount was found in little Mary Way's savings bank after her death; she was a cherub of five years. The angels also stole away her little brother at the age of three years; $5 is sent in his memory. Then there is $1 each in memory of the grandparents who have passed into the presence of the King, Jacob Way, Mary Way, Abner Pugh and Charlotte M. Pugh; $1 each for Mrs. R. P. Way and Miss Charlotte. Three dollars and fifty-one cents is sent by Mrs. E. L. Chapline, Hillsboro, Ill.; with it comes the pathetic story of the death, about a month ago, of her only darling child, Love Chapline, a boy of great promise, aged seven years. The money sent was found in his savings bank. Last upon this list in memoriam comes the name of Willa Cox, my own beloved secretary and assistant in the Temple work. Her mother sends the contents of Willa's mite-box for the year, $3.65, which she has filled for her. She writes: "This being darling Willa's second birthday in heaven, please accept this in her name. She loved the Temple work, and no doubt is viewing its progress, as she anticipated she would, from the skies."

All money orders and checks for the Temple should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh, 161 La Salle Street, Chicago, National treasurer, and treasurer of the Temple fund. All information in regard to the Temperance Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, Pres. Woman's Temperance Building Association.

ONLY NOW AND THEN.

Think it no excuse, boys,
Merging into men,
That you do a wrong act
Only now and then.
Better to be careful
As you go along,
If you would be manly,
Capable, and strong.

When you have a habit
That is wrong you know,
Knock it off at once, lads,
With a sudden blow.
Think it no excuse, boys,
Merging into men,
That you do a wrong act
Only now and then!

YOUNG FOLKS AT THE ATLANTA CONVENTION.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:

I was so busy last week talking to the old folks about the convention that I could not attend to you. Yet if you read the account then given, you will see that boys and girls had a large space in that great gathering. I hope you all take The Young Crusader, for there Miss Guernsey will tell you more about it than I can here. Then she took her camera, and I presume will give you some nice pictures, which will help you see some of the beautiful things she saw at Indian Springs.

Atlanta is a city set on a hill, several of them; from one part of it the waters flow east to the Atlantic Ocean, and from another part they flow south to the Gulf of Mexico. There is a church from whose roof the waters run on one side to the ocean and on the other side to the Gulf. That is what your geography books call "a divide."

Just outside the city is beautiful Grant Park, with winding drives, romantic paths, a pretty lake and a lovely waterfall. As we drove round it we saw a whole school of children, with their teachers, out for a picnic. Up this way, a November picnic would not be any fun, but there the weather was like our last of May.

In Grant Park is an old earthwork which reminds us of the sad, sad days of the war. It has been kept in good repair, so that we see its shape, see where the men shot from its shelter, and the cannons still stand in their places. But the sweet, green grass has covered all the blood stains, and flowers bloom where cannon balls plowed, blessed emblems of the peace which now broods over North and South.

But this is not telling you about the children, for they were not alive in war days. The very first evening of the convention they came to the front most beautifully. Anna Gordon had been down there a week drilling them to sing. Friday evening, before the Governor and other great men and women had a chance to welcome us, the children gave us their delightful welcome; two hundred of them marched into the church, following the Temple banner, filed on to the great stage, which they filled, making such a nosegay as shamed the bright flowers with which it was adorned. And how they did sing! Their first song was Mary Lathbury's beautiful one:

"Who are these, a singing band,
Marching through a listening land?
In the tender dew of youth,
In their armour, white as truth,
In the name of Him who calls them
In the morning.

CHORUS:

Sing! Sing! Children of a King,
And march to meet Him early
In the morning.
O the children march away,
In the dawning of their day,
To the battle field that lies
Just beyond their trusting eyes,
And they march away with singing
In the morning."

After this they sang the songs I told you about as being sung at the laying of the corner-stone, Miss Willard's "Saloons, saloons, saloons must go;" and Mrs. Henry's "Rise, Temple, Rise!" Everybody cheered and cheered and cheered their singing, and better than that, men said "The saloons shall go for the sake of the children." If only all men would say so at the ballot box, saloons would go.

I wish you could have seen that house when the children were singing and as they left the stage and marched down the aisle. Back of them sat Miss Willard and a score of sweet-faced, grand women, Governor Northen and other dignitaries who were to address us; bright flowers and beautiful banners were on every side of the children who were brighter, more beautiful than they. In front was the great church full of people, waving their handkerchiefs, clapping their hands and many saying, "God bless the dears!" As they passed out of the church, a dear little tot turned and running back upon the stage shyly gave a beautiful bunch of flowers to Mrs. Carse. She looked as though she wanted to catch the little one in her arms and hug her; but she didn't do it, though I wondered how she could help it.

Miss Lucia Kimball told us of the grand temperance work being done in Sunday-schools; how at the great convention of Sunday-school folks from all over the world that met at Pittsburg last summer, she and Miss Willard asked the men who select our Sunday-school lessons, to give us four temperance lessons each year on some Sunday when we do not have the Review. Only four Sundays a year seems very little when we count the saloons we have to pass every day going to school and to church; but those wise men thought it was too much, so they only gave us two for temperance. When you grow up and select the lessons I am sure you will do better than that—unless before that time the saloons have gone. Meanwhile we will make just the best use we can of these two Sundays, and get all the temperance we can out of every lesson.

Miss Kimball also told us there are 220,000 Sunday-school scholars who have taken the triple pledge, and Mrs. Rice, the commander-in-chief of the Loyal Temperance Legion, told us there are 240,000 valiant Legioners pledged to purity, temperance and truth. Just think what an army that is! It would take you days just to count them. King Alcohol may well tremble because you are growing up.

Did you not give your pennies, nickels and dimes to help buy the juvenile banner? Well, it was at the convention, and is just as pretty as it can be; made of satin, blue as the sky, with a wreath of daisies and ferns painted on it, and the motto chosen by the Loyal Temperance Legions of different states, "Keep Thyself Pure." Each year it goes to the state which has the greatest per cent of increase in Loyal Temperance Legions during the year; that state keeps it for a year, until some other one wins it. This year it was awarded to Colorado, as that state has nearly trebled its membership in the Loyal Legions.

Then there is the Young Crusader banner, in which we at this office feel great pride and interest. Miss Guernsey planned it, and it is given each year to the state which has the greatest increase in subscribers to The Young Crusader, the lovely paper which she edits. The banner is of pale golden brown satin, trimmed with dark plush. On the satin is printed by the same press which prints The Young Crusader paper, a lovely picture of a brave little knight holding aloft the children's flag. This year this banner went to Michigan, because more of the boys and girls there have learned what a good thing it is to take The Young Crusader than in any other state in the Union. I hope ten thousand more of you will learn the same thing next year. CAPTAIN MARY.

THE AMERICAN APPLE.

Our New England Thanksgiving, happily now grown into our National Thanksgiving, is said to be only a modification of the Harvest Festival of England. In every English church the annual festival is held. I chanced to be at Caerleon at the time of harvest, and as I was passing through the churchyard one afternoon on my way to Christ Church Hill—a breathless climb for which, however, I was amply compensated by the delights that awaited me at the top—I observed the door of the south porch open, and people entering ladened with flowers, fruits and vegetables, and coming back empty-handed. "Whenever you see a door open, go in," is a good motto in traveling, and churches anyway are always free of entrance, so I went in. I found the interior all astir with a crowd of people making ready for the Harvest Festival to be held that evening.

On my return at twilight I again looked in. The busy crowd had gone with the exception of a few who were giving the last touches to the decorations. The font was heaped, base and basin, with big marrow squashes, potatoes, turnips, kidney-beans and cauliflowers, all nestling in a fragrant mass of flowers and greenery. The broadly splayed window sills as well as the tops of the piers were hidden under a mosaic of flowers, and on each window sill lay a crusty cottage loaf in its flowery "bed." The chancel rail, too, was hidden by twining plants and flowers, and more loaves of bread alternated with specimens of the few out-of-door fruits the English climate affords. Around the lectern was arranged a row of golden wheat edged with minute pink and white spheres of a fruit unknown to me. The color effect was most lovely, and I put on my eyeglasses to inspect the tiny pink and white spheres more closely.

"What are these?" I asked at last of a woman standing near, having failed myself to decide as to their species.

"These," she replied solemnly and impressively, "these are the American apple!"

Fancy the shock to my patriotism! the American apple indeed! Shade of the Roxbury Russet, the Golden Sweet, the Rhode Island greening, the None-such, the Seek-no-further, the Full-stem! In my astonishment I dropped my eyeglasses and fell back upon my neighbor. I made no reply; I entered no protest; I denied nothing. In silence I submitted to the imputation cast upon the apple-tree of my native land. But I hastened to our lodgings to beg my friend to go up to the Church of St. Cardac and feast her patriotic eyes on "the American apple." We afterwards decided in a strictly private conference that the small pink and white fruit was a minute species of the crab apple.—Frances A. Humphrey in Wide Awake.

A BOY'S LETTER.

CAPTAIN MARY:—I have read some in your paper, and pray the time is near when temperance will reign in our homes and all over the enlightened world. We have "local option" in this township and have not the men to enforce the laws, as there are two saloons in Sherwood, called "Club Saloons;" the town has a population of about three hundred.

What are the women going to do with such—are they men?—who vote it away and then let it stay right here? And even the "dry" voters take a drink now and again (exceptions admitted).

I have heard a woman ask a man, "Well, what are you men doing letting this thing go on this way?" and her answer was, "We men voted it out, now you women keep it out!" An awful hard task to go a few miles and put a little paper in a box, and now "YOU WOMEN keep it out!" I heard the above question and answer at prayer meeting, and it was a man that is a professor of Christ's religion. I would not think it much to keep whisky out, neither would the women, if the voters would only get it out, but putting that slip of paper in the ballot box does not move the saloon if you turn around and go and patronize it yourself; talk to a saloon-keeper as you would be talked to, and if that avails nothing, he is voted out and MUST GO.

The men are putting alcohol out of the United States as fast as they can in two ways, i. e., down their throats, and by law just as the women compel them to. May God speed the day when the universe will be ruled by love and not by whisky and tobacco. God has said that we must be temperate, and He is the one who always is with those who work for Him, therefore let us press on "For God and Home and Native Land."

TEMPERANCE IN THE KITCHEN.

I was visiting, at one time, a very dear friend, whose little son had not yet dropped his lisping accent. The pastor, who was a frequent visitor, was dining with us, and the little boy, a remarkably well-behaved child, was allowed to sit at the table. The flow of conversation passed without interruption, and not a word was spoken by the child, until the dessert was served, with a very delicious sauce prepared after the most approved recipe, with the required proportion of wine incorporated. Then he asked, "Mamma, what ith thith thauth made of? It tathes very, very good." The mother replied, "Butter and sugar," thinking that would satisfy the young inquiring mind. He tasted again, then asked, "What elth ith it made of? I tathe thomething elth." A glance across the table, from the minister, seemed to say to the mother, "You are in a corner now, I wonder how you will get out of it." She then mentioned the spices and other ingredients, still omitting the wine. The child said again, "It ith very good," and continued eating. Presently he looked up, as if from a brown study, and said, "Mamma, aren't you glad we are not the kind of folkths that eaths whithky?"

All present yielded to unrestrained merriment, except the mother, to whom the artless question came like an accusation, and made an impression which lasted through her lifetime. The resolution was formed, there and then, that her boys should never become familiar with the taste of wine or other liquors at her table, and thus fall an easy prey to temptation in after years. From that time she never allowed one drop of intoxicating liquor to enter into any part of the food of the family.

The little questioner is now a strong temperance man, and doing good, faithful work as a missionary of the American Board in China.

THE "Children's League of Kindness," in London, embodies a very pretty idea, its primary object being to induce children to help children and bridge the gulf between those of affluent and unfortunate circumstances with deeds of kindness. The members, children of wealthy parents, give two articles annually, either dolls or toys, to the poor, and the associates (mothers or guardians) give two garments annually. The garments are sold at a very low price, the proceeds of the sale and the subscriptions going toward the children's holiday fund.

PITY.

BY WARNER SNOAD.

I gazed upon the world's deep agony,
The wastes of ignorance, of want and sin,
The pastures fair where but vice enters in,
And from my heart burst forth an anguished cry.
"Small use in that"—thus jeered a passer-by.
"Scant fare is pity for the starved and thin."
"Friend, pray for clearer sight," thus answered I.
It is with pity, light, and truth begin,
White-robed, white-winged she seeks the throne on high,
Her soft voice heard o'er all self's maddening din;
Then quickened by God's breath she turns again,
And gracious deeds fall fast like showers of freshening rain.

CHANGE OF BASE—A PARABLE.

BY MRS. OBED NICKERSON.

It is about a hundred years since the colonies of Utopia united themselves in a compact by which they expressed their form of government. The women very promptly voted themselves in as law-makers for the realm. The state of society had been such as to warrant them in doing this instead of the men. Consequently no objection was made to this movement. Indeed, the men were quite willing that they should do so, as they reasoned that the work of earning home supplies was about as much as they could attend to. Besides, they thought that as the women had in the main the training of the race, they would know better the needs of society and what laws would be best adapted to its prosperity.

Matters moved along very smoothly for a long while under this arrangement. But at length some of the men began to question whether it might not be due to them to have some voice in the government by their votes. This had been by statute denied them, as one of the laws expressly enacted that idiots, maniacs, criminals, and men were not eligible to the franchise.

There were many reasons why they rebelled against this statute. In the first place, it was very humiliating, very, to be placed in such a category; and as we think of it now, we can hardly wonder that many of them became indignant over the matter. Another ground of dissatisfaction was, that although compelled to pay taxes, they were allowed no voice in the disposition of them. They called this injustice. And many of the women at a later day saw it in the same light.

There were many other causes of complaint. One was that they were disallowed any legal ownership in their own children. They said that the mother-love and care might seem to give her a prior right to them. Still, it was going altogether too far to insist that she was sole legal owner.

Furthermore, the women's rulings favored their own interests to the exclusion of the men's in many other ways. In cases where the women were likely to go astray the laws were very lenient, but the liabilities of the men were subjects of severe penalties. Then, in their business and educational interests the women were protected in a wonderful manner, while the men had to labor under such ad verse circumstances and discouragements as might well appall them. Even young girls were afforded every possible advantage of education. Vast colossal piles of architecture were erected, and teachers of the highest grade of mind in the country secured to instruct them; while on the contrary, the boys and young men were absolutely denied the first rudiments of education, being held back from them by what is sometimes a stronger force than the bayonet—contemptuous sneers at any manifestation of inclination in that direction. And even the business projects of the men were frowned upon if they were anything out of the ancestral line.

Although the power of custom is so strong as almost to preclude all thoughts of the possibility of a change, things eventually came to such a pass that some of the men began to question whether there was not something of injustice and even tyranny in such a state of affairs, especially as they also, with the women, were citizens of a republic. The latter had held rule so long that the men seemed wholly at their mercy with regard to any change. But the far-seeing and resolute ones began to agitate the subject. Upon these sarcasm and innuendo began to pour in from all quarters. But so sure were they that they were on the side of the right that they persevered in their agitation by lectures and pamphlets, and even went so far as to petition the women for justice. This was rather a hard thing for them to do, as they knew the rights of citizenship belonged equally to them as to the women.

Many years they waited and worked, patiently and perseveringly, for equal rights. Little by little they gained, but the bars were heavy to move, and the massive bolts were rusted in. Not even the disclosures which were constantly coming to light of perfidy and rottenness in the government in every possible form, were of any avail toward a change, or to persuade them to try the new measure as a remedy.

The liquor curse was stalking abroad in the land, spreading ruin and dismay on every side, but government seemed powerless to check it. The wise, unbiased women, who saw the danger in this point and others, advised coöperation. Anything, they said, that will help save our homes and the country, although it is hard to relinquish power after having enjoyed it for so many years, or even to think others may be capable of sharing it. Some of the officials said, If the franchise is so dear to us, would it not be equally so to the men, and should we not be observing the Golden Rule to allow them to share it? Our brothers will appreciate our magnanimity and high moral purpose, and will no doubt try to prove themselves worthy of the recognition we give them as fellow-laborers for the general good. It is to be hoped that these wise counsels will prevail, and that speedily.—Selected.

WORDS TO THE WISE—DISUNITED MARRIAGES.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

We have considered some of the reasons why many women contract marriage for various unworthy considerations, that is, they go through the legal form, that alone being marriage which is based on mutual love and respect, these being based on a sufficient mutual acquaintance. Other marriage than this is not union but disunion. The amount of unhappiness caused by that disunion, called incompatibility, can never be revealed. Neither has it yet come to be recognized that disunion cannot unite, and that the marriage relation entered into and continued under a legalized disunion is in one sense a criminal connection.

From incompatibility come divorces, these being so numerous, as shown by statistics, that the marriage institution seems likely to become hardly an institution at all, but to a great degree a system of transient conditions.

The evils of such a system are too numerous for our present consideration, but one of these bears so directly on the matter we have in hand that it must not be passed by. The children of these inharmonious marriages must themselves be inharmonious. They can scarcely fail of being faulty in character, are likely, from birth conditions, to be sensual or untrue, or lacking in the nobler qualities, and to this, which is their birthright, must almost surely be added all that would naturally come to them from the probably unsatisfactory kind of home life resulting from this wedded disunion. And these children, be it remembered, will become citizens, and as such they are likely to fill places of influence, to possess large opportunities, to affect the country's interests and reputation, and whatever may be their station, their qualities, manifested in conduct, must affect the moral standard of the community.

The next question is, in how far can we remedy the existing state of things? How substitute true ideas for false ones in the minds of all women? How make them feel that a true single life is far better than an untrue marriage?

BON-BONS.

"What is a woman to think about when she is ironing, sweeping, washing dishes, mending stockings, making beds? Upon something her mind must act and feed—upon the pure spirit of knowledge or upon foul dregs!"

This was the question Mrs. Smith put to herself, and she determined that her mind should have something good and nutritious to feed upon, that she would accomplish something besides mere housework. She could not set apart a certain portion of the twenty-four hours for reading and thinking, but some uncertain part of it she resolved she would appropriate. One book that she selected to read she kept in the foot of the cradle or under the pillow, and when she took up the baby her book was near at hand, and she read a few pages while rocking the baby. Another book she kept in the mending basket, and after one piece of work was done she read a little before beginning on another.

On one of the kitchen shelves along with the cook-books were several volumes, any one of which she could open while waiting for some dish to cook that needed constant attention. This was a very scrappy way of gaining information and "improving her mind," but in Mrs. Smith's circumstances it was the only way available for her. It was that or nothing. These bon-bons thus snatched in hours of toil kept alive Mrs. Smith's interest in the world of books, and whetted her appetite for larger supplies. After awhile her children grew up and away from her knees, and she had time for continuous reading.

Sometimes it is as well to keep cobwebs out of one's mind as out of one's parlor. Often it is better to embroider the intellectual fabric of one's own nature than to embroider one's garments, or ruffle and tuck the children's clothes. The absolute needs of the body are easily supplied; the conventional needs often bankrupt one's resources and leave him a begger.

The life is more than meat. Shall our chief concern be to feed the perishing body with needful food, when the soul is left to starve in ignorance? Between the pairs of stockings we darn for our boys, let us put a page of some profitable book into our brains, that we may better lead their feet in noble paths. The time will come when the question will be, not whether they have sound stockings, but whether they have sound understandings. When they come to stretch their faculties against the tug of this exacting world, they will be grateful for having had wise and intelligent mothers.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.

(Luke 24:28-43; I Cor. 1-6.)

Sunday, 14; Luke 24: 28-43. Verse 28, Our Lord would have gone farther, and not tarried with the two disciples, if they had not held Him back with all the might of love and earnest desire for His helpful presence. The same spirit will keep our great Teacher close to us through life. Verse 34, What eternal hope and joy is wrapped up in those words, "The Lord is risen indeed." He broke the bars of death, and, through Him, we are ushered into the glories of a life immortal, which we now have, and which will never suffer the least harm by the sting of death.

Monday, 15; I Cor. 1. Verse 2, It should be a matter of daily prayer and effort, to have the church to which we belong, be a pure and good church. Paul's object in this letter was to save the church at Corinth from the factions and sins which so sadly marred its beauty and usefulness. Verse 4, Is it, indeed, the chief desire of our lives that all souls may receive the new life in Christ; and that the members of the church may all have graces, and abound in spiritual blessings? Verse 30, May the blessed Lord Jesus be made to each of us, wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption.

Tuesday, 16; I Cor. 2. Verse 2, The tone and compass of Paul's letters to the Corinthians show how much he meant by knowing the crucified Lord Jesus. There is power in a life and work thus guided. Verse 14, The more of spiritual life we have, the clearer can we see God's truth, and the more conscious shall we be of God Himself.

Wednesday, 17; I Cor. 3. Verse 1. It is not well to communicate everything we know to everybody. There are those who are but children in understanding, and they need the truth that will be nourishing and strengthening to them. Verse 9, We ought to abound in work, and prepare ourselves for a rich reward in heaven. Our work should be worthy of God, who helps us in it, and so that it will be permanent in its influence for good.

Thursday, 18; I Cor. 4. Verse 3, We ought to be independent of human opinions in our work, and consider how things will appear to us when we stand before the judgment seat of Christ. Verse 11, How unworthy it is of a Christian worker to think first of a large salary and an easy position.

Friday, 19; I Cor. 5. Verse 2, It is possible for one to be puffed up with pride and conceit, and yet be guilty of the vilest and most offensive sins. Verse 5, Where one's conduct shows that he belongs to the devil, he has no right in the church; and steps of discipline should be taken in order to have him stand openly where he belongs.

Saturday, 20; I Cor. 6. Verse 1, Matters about which they may differ may grow up among Christians. These differences about temporal things ought to be settled without taking them into courts. Verse 12; Good sense will lead us to abstain from things of questionable benefit or influence. Verse 20, It is a strange notion that some have, that in becoming Christians they give only their souls to God; but, as for the body, they go on indulging and injuring it by bad habits and lusts.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Our Heavenly Home. John 14: 2.)

1. We have a right to think of heaven, with its blessed and eternal rewards. The Bible has much to say about rewards, and it is for us to so live that we may be certain to possess them in heaven.

2. We cannot think of the long ago home of our childhood without thinking of it as located somewhere. And we think of its dear inmates, its apartments and treasures, and the beautiful things about it. Heaven is a home, with all that a home means, and it is a "place."

3. The kind and sympathetic Jesus would not prepare for His beloved ones a very strange place. It cannot be a home, and we feel like strangers when we get there. The loved ones we shall meet, that have gone before, will make us very welcome in that home.

4. How foolish it is to live with the end always before us, to get large possessions in this world. The great palaces, which wicked men, by practices that are wicked, are able to build, are nothing at all as a treasure compared with the heavenly home which now is the inheritance of the poorest saint.

MOTHER WALLACE'S ADDRESS AT ATLANTA.

[We are glad to give editorial space to this address. As stated in last week's issue, it produced a profound impression. Mrs. Wallace immediately followed Miss Willard, to whose remarks she refers in the opening paragraph.]

MY FRIENDS:—Humanity is a great, grand, lovable thing; next to God the greatest, grandest, most lovable thing in the universe. If I do not speak so enthusiastically of the nobleness of man as Miss Willard does, it is not that I love man less, but that I love woman more. It is because of my love for man and woman—these two which together make humanity—that I am here to-day.

I am too old to talk sentiment; I have outgrown the poetry of this movement, but I have not outgrown my love for humanity, I have not outgrown my hope for it. Miss Willard has pictured to you an ideal home; what is the greatest foe of this ideal home she has pictured? When she is twenty-five years older she will recognize as I do now, that its two great foes are lack of social purity and the liquor traffic.

A prominent physician said to me, "You work hard to put down the rum traffic, but I speak what I do know when I say that seventy per cent of the suffering in homes comes from lack of virtue." These are homely truths, but we are past the age of sentiment. What is now needed are remedies—action. How long is this thing to continue? Is there no balm in Gilead?

I fully realize what men have done for us; they have conquered nature; they have delved into the earth and brought forth its treasures of iron and coal, of silver and gold; their brains have devised machinery to do the work of the world; but when man has brought his animal nature into subjection as he has the earth, when he can say to passion (stamping her foot) "stay there," he will be as much grander than he now is, as his present self is above the savage.

Woman is held responsible for the moral culture of the world, and this is right; it is not for woman to go out into the world and fight for the almighty dollar; God ordained her for a higher ministry. She is the great character-builder; the developer of soul wealth. For this she needs the broadest culture, the freest liberty.

As you probably know, our W. C. T. U. works in forty different departments, each with a superintendent, and every superintendent thinks her department the most important; Miss Willard thinks this of hers, social purity; Mrs. Hunt of hers, scientific temperance instruction; and I am sure mine—franchise—is the most important of all. A great statesman said that the place where power is felt is at the ballot-box; there is registered the sentiment of the time; there is struck the keynote of progress.

There are only two forces, brute force, that which Bismarck calls the "force of blood and iron," and moral, spiritual force. Public sentiment is expressed through the ballot-box, there it is crystallized into law. Hence the ballot belongs to woman as the conservator of public morals.

There is corruption in the body politic; this I cannot deny, though next to my God, I love my country; but is it any wonder there is corruption, when by the votes of men the government has gone into partnership with 200,000 saloon-keepers, and has thus made every mother's door-yard fence a dead line which her children cross only at their peril? This liquor traffic, with which it has gone into partnership, taxes and trammels honest industry; turns women and children out of doors; lays its hand on legislation; attacks liberty and the right of self-government.

And woman is the one most oppressed by it; the time has come when men are called upon by all the principles of honor and chivalry to deliver woman from the oppression of this accursed traffic. They have not done so, either because they cannot, or because they will not. If they cannot, they are slaves, and should cease to boast that they are free and brave. If they can, and will not, they are worse than slaves, and it is no wonder the body politic is corrupt while ruled alone by them.

Said a noted statesman to me, "Your arguments for the ballot in the hand of woman are unanswerable. Nobody can argue against them three minutes." "But we dread the demoralization of our women," says another; "politics are so demoralizing." "Is the ballot demoralizing, per se?" I asked. He hesitated, as though fearing where his answer might lead him, and finally said, "Well, yes, I am afraid it is."

"If I believed that," I replied, "I should give up all hope of republican institutions, of popular form of government. We don't wish to debauch our husbands, our brothers, our sons; let us give up our free institutions at once, and have an absolute monarchy, that as few as possible shall be forced to dabble in the dirty pool of politics. We might stand the debauching of one Mogul, but when it comes to making all our men grand rascals, that will never, never do."

We cannot stand this, not only because of our love to them, but because if thus debauched they would transmit the evil to their children. The sons of such men would be good for nothing only to twirl their mustaches, swing canes and smoke cigars in a club room. And their daughters would grow into women whose highest aspirations are to squeeze their waist into a sixteen inch dress, mince along on high-heeled, pointed-toed shoes and munch gum. Nothing noble could come from such a parentage. If this is the natural effect of the ballot, women do not wonder that politics are corrupt.

But we do not believe that it is, we believe statesmanship is the grandest study in the world, and that our government is the grandest government in the world; it has developed the highest type of humanity; our men are head and shoulders above the men of any other nation. Because you are so grandly developed we come and ask you not to give up the ship of state, but to work out the great problem for all humanity. Cultivate the tree of patriotism till it shall take deep root and bear its appropriate fruit. The hope of the world is in the United States; by its influence all nations are to be delivered.

Say not politics are necessarily vile: it is not so. The trouble is you have tried to work out the problem of the whole with only the half. You say the voice of the people is the voice of God, but you let only one-half that voice be heard. When the voice of the whole people, women as well as men, is heard, it will be as the voice of God. Every school-boy knows he cannot work out a problem without using all of its factors. Here is this great problem confronting us, and all these years you have been trying to solve it with one of its factors suppressed. The time was when this was necessarily so. While brute force was in the supremacy, woman must be shut up in castle and harem, but just as fast as mankind develops out of this low plane into the higher one where spiritual forces control, woman comes into her heritage.

But, it is objected, women cannot fight. This is a mistake, women can fight. They have led armies; but history is full of instances of women who have fought a braver fight than that fought by any army. But it is in no degree necessary that she should fight. It is good to have some element in government which cannot fight. Such an element will help on the supremacy of spiritual power over that of brute force, and usher in the realization of the beatific vision of Isaiah when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together, and a little child shall lead the forces which will find better work to do than cutting each other's throats and blowing each other's brains out. Woman's ballot will increase the tendency toward arbitration between nations, and thus hasten the time when they shall learn war no more.

Forty years ago the women began asking the men for increased recognition; most things we have asked have been granted, but at the ballot box we are still suppliants, creeping along in the dust, with outstretched hand presenting coffee to Sambo, and Chris and Pat, begging them to vote for the protection of our homes. O men, is that the best you can do for your wives and daughters, cultivated, Christian women? If it is, you would better abdicate, for you cannot rule.

We are classed with lunatics, criminals and minors, but we have less hope than they; a lunatic may regain sanity; a criminal may be pardoned and his franchise restored; the minor soon grows to maturity, but your wives and daughters, those whom you hold responsible for the sanctity of your homes, those who are confessedly the conservators of public and private morals, are doomed to perpetual minority; no matter what her endowments or her culture, woman, deprived of the ballot, remains forever non compos mentis in the eyes of the law.

And you who condemn her to this furnish no protection for her boys and girls. Lotteries, gambling dens, brothels, are setting infernal traps for their feet; the saloons you license line every street to lure them to destruction. You claim to be our protectors; make your pledges good; if you cannot, put the ballot in our hands that we may protect ourselves.

Ours is not a woman's rights agitation; it is a human rights agitation, an agitation for the right of humanity to protect itself. Ours is a nation whose fundamental thought is a government for the people, by the people. Have women ever come to this free legislation to which they have a right as a part of the people? To ask the question is to answer it. Then is not the legislation of a part, where the whole have the right, unconstitutional? What is government for? To protect the people in health, wealth, morals. A government which does not do this is as salt that has lost its savor and ought to make place for a better.

We are taxed; in Boston one-seventh of the taxes are paid by women; if we violate the law we suffer its penalties, yet we have no recompense in protection for our homes. Under such humiliations women can never be the mothers of noble men. I believe the wonderful dearth of statesmen at the present day can be traced largely to this unjust subjection of women. Another half century of such subjection, and such inheritance will eat out the very heart of our social and political structure.

"The nations that forget God shall perish." The truth of this declaration of Holy Writ is demonstrated by the downfall of every nation of antiquity. The nation that forgets God, forgets to be just, and this injustice eats out its life with inexorable fatality. That is where America stands to-day; it is forgetting God in its mad race after wealth and power; it is forgetting the primal law of Eden when God made man and woman co-equal sovereigns; it is forgetting to be just to one-half its people. I beg of you, in the name of God, for the hopes of humanity, stop this fearful forgetting and do justice to women. For we all go down together; you cannot degrade us without being yourselves degraded. And I implore you, don't give up hope in humanity—in our ship of state. I know it is fearfully storm-tossed, but it can be saved if only you will bring out all your crew. Thus far you have kept one-half of the crew fettered beneath the hatches, and the ship is in danger of wreck for lack of their assistance. Bring the women from beneath the hatches, strike off their shackles and leave the result with God.

A CHANGE OF MANAGERS.

Only a month ago we announced with pleasure that Mr. George C. Hall was to remain in the position of business manager he has so well filled for five years; now we have to announce his permanent withdrawal from us. While at Atlanta so strong a feeling in favor of having a woman as business manager developed in the Executive Committee that he offered his resignation and no persuasion could induce him to withdraw it. The stockholders held a meeting and took the following action:

"Moved that it is the sense of this meeting that Mr. Hall be asked to remain as business manager of the W. T. P. A. upon such terms as the Board of Directors and he may arrange. Carried unanimously."

After his return to Chicago most of the employés of the W. T. P. A. signed a petition to him to remain, but he felt that it would not be honorable to hold the position when the desire to have a woman in it was so pronounced in some quarters, and therefore refused to withdraw his resignation. We could do nothing but accept it, though with deep regret. For five years we have been intimately associated in the work of this office and his going now seems to me like the loss of a brother on whom I had learned to rely. Mr. Hall carries with him to his new field of labor the best wishes of every member of our force. He has accepted a position with Funk & Wagnalls, to which he goes in February.

There was not time to summon a directors' meeting, so the business committee met, and with them the directors within reach, to act in this crisis. Present, Mrs. Carse, presiding, Miss Willard, Miss Pugh, Mrs. Plumb, Mrs. Rounds, Mrs. Carhart and Miss West. The result of their deliberations was the election of Mrs. Fanny H. Rastall to fill the vacancy. She brings to the position twenty-five years' experience in publishing business, the reputation for executive ability won by her many years' service as president of Kansas W. C. T. U., the confidence of all her co-laborers, and above all, thorough consecration to the work and to God.

She will receive hearty welcome from us all, and the firm support and coöperation of the directors. It is now in order for all who have faith in woman's ability to take charge of such a large and complicated business, to rally round her royally, and aid her in most practical fashion by rolling up our subscription list to 100,000, and multiplying the sales of our literature. Working thus unitedly with a will, the next year may be made, with the blessing of God, the brightest year the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association has ever known. Will you help to make it so?

A PRACTICAL PHILANTHROPIST.

H. L. Hastings, of Boston, the great distributer of evangelical literature, and editor of the Christian, is a most interesting and unique character. He has been the means of sending out five hundred tons of Christian literature. He is the fifth generation in the ministerial line, although himself a lay preacher. His ancestors were Baptists, except his father, who was a Methodist preacher. He preached on the Common in Boston, and was imprisoned for so doing, staying just long enough behind bolts and bars to accentuate the enormity of the officials who put him there, and to arouse a public sentiment against them. He is a man now about sixty years of age, of gracious presence, great head, blonde face, intelligent, clear blue eyes of most kindly expression, and a patriarchal beard. In conversational tones he gives forth the results of a lifetime enriched with holy purposes and exceedingly bright ideas. In his off-hand way, talking a few minutes with us, he said: "I was at the Board of Trade in London. A few men were sitting in a row, with little boxes, some of them made of wood and some of tin; they had samples of grain; and those men, with their little boxes, controlled the wheat market of the world. They did not look to me to amount to much, until I remembered that back of them were endless lines of railway, ships with their white canvas on every sea; and back of these, immense storehouses and elevators brimming with golden grain; and back of these, boundless fields waving with the yellow harvest; and back of these, strong arms and stout hearts of the faithful husbandman. So, after all, it meant immensity—just those few men with their boxes. I said to myself, 'When Christ came, He laid his hands on a few blind people, touched the ears of a few deaf people, healed the diseases of some groups of smitten ones, raised half a dozen who were dead. If He had come and gone and done this, it would not have changed the face of the whole world. But what He did was just a sample of what He can do anywhere, the law of spiritual dynamics being—according to thy faith; for He can 'quicken your mortal body.' That is the crucial test for healing—your mortal body—and all the context shows that it is your body here and now. It is curious how men look at things. For instance, if anything is the matter with a hat, you take it to the hatter. If your shoe needs looking after, you take it to a shoemaker. But if it is a man, you must not take him to his Creator. Now I think well of doctors. They are a beloved class, and they have done any amount of good to those who are on the plane of cause and effect in the material world, and to whom the greater world of faith was a closed place; but how many a time have we known a doctor to cut a man open after he was dead, to find out what was the matter with him, though he might have been treating him for years. For my part, I want a physician who knows the case from the beginning, who put me together, and if I get disarranged, knows best how to bring me back to a normal condition."

Riding on the grip car, he said: "This reminds me. God's car goes without tiring anybody. Horse cars tire. This method illustrates Emerson's suggestion, 'Hitch your wagon to a star.' If you can only grip on to God's gospel, that is all you have to do. Everything else comes without saying, and is done by Him. If you try any other plan, you are apt to find out that you have got a bigger washing than you have got lines for. We must not be conceited as students of the Bible. We must 'comprehend with all saints.' No one saint comprehends all. Each one gets a segment. It takes all to make a circle of God's truth. You may have a theory about how corn grows, but meanwhile it goes on growing, and very likely has no theory itself. You simply know it takes fifty days to fetch it, and that England cannot grow corn because she hasn't fifty hot days in her summer. So it is with a life of holiness. It is very hard to tell anybody about it. It is a product of heavenly forces working in earthly ground. Meanwhile, we see and know that it is, but to tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth, that is quite another thing."

THE next National W. C. T. U. Convention is to be held in Boston, November, 1891.

Our Book Table.

Fleming H. Revell, New York and Chicago, has added another to his list of capital books for young men, by the publication of MORAL MUSCLE, AND HOW TO USE IT, by Frederic A. Atkins, who stands in the front rank among writers for young men. The book is just such an one as a father would wish to put into the hands of his son, especially if he were going to meet the temptations of a great city. Price 50 cents.

A STUDY IN PEDAGOGY, by Bishop Vincent. This book bears the impress of its author at his best; it puts unconsidered truths in such strong, clear light that all can recognize them. The teaching which he here studies is not done within school-room walls, by conscious tuition of skilled pedagogues, it is the unconscious teaching of the street, the show-windows, the art gallery, the schoolhouse, the teaching of the church, the press, the library, the familiar friend. "These constitute conditions in which lies a power educational, a power little understood by parents and guardians." All will agree with his conclusion: "Let us have books, and teachers, and schools; but let us have churches and homes, a pure journalism, libraries, pictures, laws, social customs, popular sentiment—all of which will combine to commend to our people 'the True, the Beautiful and the Good.'" Published by Wilbur F. Ketchum, 13 Cooper Union, New York.

Another book in the educational line, though differing radically in style and substance from the former, is ELEMENTS OF PSYCHOLOGY, by Gabriel Compayré, translated by William H. Payne, chancellor of the University of Nashville. We are profoundly thankful to find a book which brings psychology, as this does, within the range of high school students. This it does by carefully distinguishing between psychology considered as a science, the object of profound philosophical research, and elementary study in psychology for school use. The latter is the purpose of this book and it is clearly and logically carried out. There is no deep delving into profound theories, but the study of facts of consciousness as we elsewhere study facts in nature—"facts of acquisition, outward perception by the senses, inward perception by consciousness; facts of conservation, memory and representation, imagination; facts of combination and elaboration, creative imagination, abstraction, generalization and reasoning." The book is published by Lee & Shepard, Boston, and sent us by A. C. McClurg & Company, Chicago. Price, $1.

Frances E. Humphrey, whose capital historical book for young readers, HOW NEW ENGLAND WAS MADE, just ready by D. Lothrop Co., is one of the favorite tellers of history for the young. Her book covers the ground from the days of Standish to those of Israel Putnam and the battle of Bunker Hill, a space of fully one hundred and fifty historic years. The story is traced from the beginning of New England's civilization easily and well, and no young reader to whom the book is given can complain of dullness, or find other than interest in its pages. Such books, thus written, serve to strengthen the growing Americanism of our children, and the record of so marked a development of manliness and patriotism as New England's early story presents, can limit its interest to no special section, but is for the reading and instruction of young Americans in every section of our land.

A beautiful volume comes from the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the LUCY WEBB HAYES MEMORIAL. Its frontispiece is a fine reproduction of her White House portrait; its contents, a memorial sketch by Mrs. John Davis; a poem, "In Memoriam," by Mary A. Lathbury; a memorial paper, by Mrs. R. S. Rust, and various addresses. The sketches, by those who knew her intimately, take us within the charmed circle of companionship with her. Miss Lathbury's poem speaks the language of many hearts, and the three portraits of Mrs. Hayes show the beautiful growth of her character traced in her face, from the time she was a school-girl of sixteen till she stood the first lady in the land.

Several of her annual addresses before the Home Missionary Society, of which she was president, are included in the book; they show not only her deep interest in the work, but her ability to grasp its great possibilities. "America," she says, "is the cradle of the future for all the world. The future of America is in her homes, and her homes depend on the mothers of America. Hence the value and importance of missionary societies whose work is done by women in the homes of our beloved country." The object of publishing this memorial volume is to help in carrying on the work which dropped from her dead fingers; all the proceeds from its sale go into the memorial fund with which it is proposed to complete the establishment of a Deaconesses Home and Industrial School, which, by vote of the general managers, has just been located at Washington. The book will be on sale at all Methodist book houses, or can be ordered direct from Mrs. A. R. Clark, 190 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati. Price $1.

A surprise comes to us in a volume of poems entitled A SHEAF OF GRAIN, BOUND BY AN OLD GRANGER, our good friend, James W. Temple. A practical man of affairs is he, noted as being one of the best farmers in his county, quite too busy, one would think, to court the muses. Yet this book proves that he is their favorite. Its opening poem, occupying one-third the book, "Wilfred, a tale of Ancient Hungary," has in it much of the descriptive power and the appropriate setting for unfamiliar facts in history that make Ivanhoe so charming. Henceforth Wilfred and Ulrica, fierce Rupert, trusty Hubert, and the good King Bela, are very real personages to us. The rest of the book is made up of short poems, many of them on local subjects, yet good reading for larger audiences. Among them are many strong temperance poems. Published by J. W. Temple, Victoria, Ill.

THE UNION SIGNAL'S fair young daughter, the Oak and Ivy Leaf, has already felt one of the good influences radiating from our late convention, this one coming in the shape of a subscription list long enough to cover one hundred new names. But the fact of the long list is no more interesting than the circumstances under which it was secured. While the happy crowd of delegates and visitors were whirling along on the steel rails 'twixt Atlanta and Indian Springs, two faithful Y. W. C. T. U. superintendents, Miss Morgan, of Ohio, and Mrs. Bechtel, of Virginia, were busy with pencil and paper setting forth the interests of their national organ and writing down the rapidly responding names. Many delegates left subscriptions for the young ladies of the homes in which they had been so cordially entertained—a Y's (wise) suggestion, by the way. The Y work is attaining goodly proportions, and this year its two organizers were placed among the regular W. C. T. U. organizers. The new Y union organized at Atlanta immediately after the convention has already secured sixty-three names, and arrangements are being perfected for a second union in another part of the city.

Cedarville, Ohio, had a very significant election lately. The question came up of repealing its prohibitory ordinance, and the women begged the privilege of recording their vote. This was granted on condition that they vote in separate boxes and pay the extra expense themselves, which they gladly did. The vote resulted in 215 men voting, of whom 159 voted against repeal and fifty-six for it. Two hundred and four women voted, 202 against and two for repeal. A pitiful story hangs on those two votes; two poor women with brutal husbands, started to the polls with "no" ballots; their husbands stopped them, took their ballots from them and forced them to vote "yes." This story was told by Mrs. Monroe, president of the Ohio union at their state convention. She added, "Some of those Cedarville ladies who voted are here as delegates. We should like to see how they look; will they please rise?" Three ladies rose and were greeted with applause.

The old adage, "precious materials are done up in small packages," is prettily illustrated by the celebrated Finger Testament, issued by Thomas Nelson & Sons, of London and New York. It is the whole of the New Testament printed in clear type, bound in morocco, into a book the length of and width of a man's finger. This marvel in the bookmaking art is accomplished by using the finest grade of paper which receives the impression of type perfectly while occupying the smallest amount of space. The little book can be carried in a gentleman's vest pocket or a lady's reticule, thus having the Word of God always at hand.

A bright woman who found it hard to break away from the use of manuscript, but who has determined to do so, announced the fact to another leader in these words: "I am filling up with temperance talk, hoping to be able, if I am allowed an opportunity, soon to do without notes. The more I think of it the more I cannot see for the life of me why I should not put myself at the head of my own little regiments and lead them on."

The convention had no more self-sacrificing worker than Mrs. Emilie D. Martin, of New York City, who took charge of the convention post-office. There, all through the hours of the convention which she had come to enjoy, she stood, out of sight and sound of the grand gathering, patiently serving from early morning till eleven p. m., not only as postmistress but as an animated Bureau of Information, "Lost and Found," and charge d' affaires in general of all the unconsidered items that have so much to do in making a convention comfortable. She it was who prepared the beautiful motto for the front of the stage: "What hath God wrought?" extra postage came out of her pocket; indeed, she was ready to spend and be spent in the service of the convention. Assisting her were two young men of whom she speaks in highest appreciation, Mr. Marc Morrison, of Atlanta, and Robert Willard, nephew of Miss Willard. Just at the closing hour Mrs. Martin was introduced to the convention and her response was characteristic of her noble nature: "They love God best who love His creatures most, and they who learn to serve here will learn to live with Him forever. I thank you for the privilege of serving." Mrs. Charlotte F. Woodbury, in charge of the Demorest medal matter, was introduced at the same time.

ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

EXPLANATORY.

The department of News from the Field is one which has grown with the growth of the W. C. T. U. It was introduced in the first issue of THE SIGNAL, January, 1880, and retained when THE SIGNAL grew into THE UNION SIGNAL, in January, 1883.

It began with one page, in coarse, leaded type, soon increased to two pages, then to three, and in March, 1883, the material had become so abundant that a smaller, solid type was employed, giving space for at least a third more matter.

It being necessary to confine this department to three pages, and the number of reports being in excess of the space, it was determined, about two years ago, to inaugurate a new feature—reports from states by some one appointed for that special work. Another imperative reason for the change was to secure more condensed and attractive reports, and provide for a more equable representation of the states. Accordingly this plan was presented to the National Executive in 1888, and unanimously indorsed by the state presidents, a majority of whom succeeded in securing the appointment of a UNION SIGNAL Reporter. It was hoped that ere this all the News from the Field matter might be arranged in state reports, thus giving the paper much more of a National character, and facilitating the work of the editor of this department. There are still eighteen states that, according to our latest information, have not selected state reporters; all such are most earnestly invited to do so, and in order that there may be no mistake, we publish below a list of those states having no regular reporter, also those having reporters. If there is an error in the list, it will be most cheerfully corrected.

Every local, county and district union in the states which have regularly appointed reporters is requested to make a note of the name and address of the reporter, and send to her instead of to THE UNION SIGNAL, brief, fresh reports of meetings, workers, and items of temperance interest in its immediate locality. The state reporter will prepare a general report each month, or as often as she may have material sufficient, and send promptly for publication. A united effort in this direction all along the line cannot but result in added force and usefulness to this department of THE UNION SIGNAL.

CALIFORNIA.

THE W. C. T. U. IN STATE CONVENTION.

The eleventh annual convention of the California Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held October 20 to 24, at Stockton. The citizens opened their homes with true California hospitality. Through the kindness of the Southern Pacific Railway Company, the San Francisco & North Pacific, the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, the Stockton Navigation Company, and the various stage lines, in granting reduced fares, nearly two hundred delegates were present.

Rev. S. J. Carroll, pastor of the Central Methodist Church, warmly welcomed the ladies, tendering the use of the spacious auditorium. He paid a glowing tribute to Miss Willard. The flowers and banners made the church a fairy-land. The music was under the direction of Mrs. A. J. Waterhouse, the talented superintendent of song, and was most admirable, especially the services of the Harmonic Club and the Jubilantes, and the Y orchestra and chorus. Master Archie Atwood welcomed the convention for the Loyal Legion, in a poem specially prepared for the occasion by Mr. A. J. Waterhouse. Mrs. M. C. Dorr, president of the Stockton union, gracefully introduced Miss Lou Holt, of Woodbridge, who gave most cordial greeting from the Y's. Her address was forcible and ably pleaded for prohibition. Mrs. Mary Neer McMaster, of Lodi, president of San Joaquin county, represented the white-ribboners with gracious speech, and then spoke with intense ardor upon prohibition, pleading with Christian voters to no longer vote for licensed sin, thus selling their Lord for thirty pieces of silver. The clergy, through Rev. R. A. Sink, gave the right hand of fellowship to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, as one of the strongest allies of the Christian church. Prof. W. C. Ramsey, for the educational department, spoke grand words for the work done by the W. C. T. U. in scientific temperance instruction, prophesying that some time it would be considered as wrong for a teacher to use either tobacco or liquor as for a minister of the Gospel. Mrs. Emily Hoppin, of Yolo, most ably responded, and as she outlined the work of the mother-hearted W. C. T. U. she said with misting eyes, "Our creed is that of Luther, 'We love God and little children.'"

Tuesday morning Mrs. S. J. Churchill conducted fervent devotions; Mrs. R. R. Johnston presided. The county presidents were appointed a committee on resolutions, with Mrs. L. P. Williams, of San Francisco, as chairman. Mrs. H. E. Brown, recording secretary, gave a good report of the work of the State Executive. Every department has been vigorously pushed, as was corroborated in the report of the corresponding secretary, Mrs. D. J. Spencer. The active members number 4,445 and the honoraries over 600. Over $10,000 have been spent in prosecuting the work by local unions. Mrs. M. C. Hart, treasurer, reported receipts for state work as about $2,000, much of which she secured by personal appeal.

As usual, the county presidents brought in with joy a goodly gathering of sheaves. Mrs. B. G. Mast, of Mendocino, told of the good work done in that mountain country recently organized by Mrs. Henrietta Skelton and Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens. Mrs. S. C. Sanford read the splendid report of Mrs. B. Sturtevant Peet, as she reviewed the success of every department in Alameda, which continues to be "the banner county." Mrs. Tillie P. Marston, president of Placer county, has the work well in hand, and she inspires her helpers to concerted action.

The evening session was specially attractive. The Harmonic society rendered most beautiful music. Mrs. J. L. Everts presided. Mrs. O. M. Sanford made a brilliant address on "The Future of America," portraying the unjust laws against women, and the "good time coming" when woman's ballot shall not only blot them from the statute-book, but shall go further and transform the filthy pool of politics to the clear stream of Christian statesmanship.

Mr. A. J. Waterhouse, the "White Ribbon Poet," delivered a most masterly poem which thrilled all hearts by its intensity of thought, and the story of the boy caught in the snare of the high license saloon, legalized by Christian men, brought tears from hundreds of eyes. His bursts of wit were no less moving and were as effective to "point the moral and adorn the tale" of his temperance ode as was the sympathy. He always pleases, both on the W. C. T. U. and Chautauqua platforms, and holds a unique place as a temperance orator who has also poetic genius.

The president's address, by Mrs. R. R. Johnston, was a fine résumé of the achievements of the year, and each department showed gains with a total result of an unprecedented public opinion. The questions of Social Purity, Marriage and Divorce, Prohibition, Woman Suffrage and Sabbath Observance were discussed with no uncertain sound, and the aggressive policy has proved its own success.

Wednesday morning devotions were conducted by Mrs. F. H. Bentley. Election of officers resulted in: President, Mrs. R. R. Johnston; first vice-president, Mrs. B. Sturtevant Peet; recording secretary, Mrs. H. E. Brown; corresponding secretary, Mrs. D. J. Spencer; treasurer, Mrs. Emily Hoppin; auditor, Mrs. L. M. Carver. Mrs. Johnston made a strong inaugural on taking the chair for her third year, and the convention rose en masse pledging loyalty and cöoperation. The other officers made bright speeches. A unanimous vote of thanks was tendered Mrs. M. C. Hart, who declined reëlection. The following were elected delegates to the National Convention: The officers, and Mrs. R. A. Armstrong, Mrs. J. L. Everts, Mrs. C. B. Russell, Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, Mrs. Emma Pow Smith, Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, Mrs. McShafter, Miss Winnie Morris and M. G. C. Edholm.

On motion of Mrs. Eyster, Mr. and Mrs. Allen, who have belonged to a Band of Hope for nearly seventy years, were presented to the convention and made good speeches. Dr. L. J. Kellogg, superintendent of social purity, gave an excellent address on "River Restonica," in which she most strenuously demanded "a white life for two," and an equal standard of purity for man and woman. Mrs. S. J. Churchill ably reported evangelistic work, and Rev. N. R. Johnston gave an account of the ceaseless labors towards Sabbath observance, where the W. C. T. U. have tried to close saloons on the Lord's day, and petitioned the Legislature for a Sunday law. Dr. H. P. Van Kirk told of the success of mothers' meetings, and the study of hygiene, and how the progress of the "gospel of the body" makes more sure the gospel of the soul. Large numbers of locals conduct this department under her direction as state superintendent. No less interesting was the annual report on heredity by Mrs. F. H. Bentley, who has taught hundreds of California mothers the importance of this department.

One of the most tenderly touching reports was that of prison work, by Mrs. A. B. Gove. She has preached in the state penitentiaries, and many "wandering boys" have been reclaimed to mother and to God by her ministry, and aided by Mrs. Bancroft in her Home for Released Prisoners, several will devote their lives to reclaiming others.

Mrs. Joel Russell, superintendent of fair work, told of the good results of the W. C. T. U. booth secured at the State Fair at Sacramento. Mrs. S. C. Borland reported work among the soldiers, and on the flourishing condition of the temperance cadets, the manly young fellows who, by the ballot, not the bullet, will give King Alcohol his death wound.

Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster showed unswerving enthusiasm in the juvenile department, and reported 4,000 little folks in Loyal Temperance Legions. By her spirited appeal a memorial fund of $600 was almost immediately subscribed —mothers pledging various amounts in the name of a little dead child—whereby an organizer in juvenile work might be kept constantly in the field.

Mrs. Henrietta Skelton has pushed the German work, and Mrs. Mary B. Edon, work among the sailors, Mrs. C. E. Babb, the press department, and Mrs. S. G. Chamberlain, drawing-room work, though they were not present to formally report, Mrs. Skelton being in the Nebraska campaign.

Rev. J. B. Silcox delivered for an evening lecture, "The life of John B. Gough," which was most instructive and entertaining. His plea to Christian men to vote the liquor traffic out of America was fine indeed.

Mrs. L. P. Williams presided Thursday morning. Mrs. L. J. Whittemore reported progress in the department of narcotics, the state having passed a law against the sale of tobacco to minors, by petition of W. C. T. U. women. In the place of Mrs. A. M. Weed, Mrs. Gates reported the splendid victory for law enforcement by the Berkeley union in enforcing the state law forbidding saloons within one mile of the state university, whereby they had compelled several saloons violating the law, to close. The state promised financial aid in their heroic efforts the coming year.

Mr. J. E. Arnold proffered a complimentary ride on the electric motor to Fair Oaks, which was eagerly accepted by the convention. The Pharos and its change to a stock company was discussed with interest; Judge L. W. Elliot, a stanch prohibition W. C. T. U. brother-in-law, ably explaining legal intricacies, for which he was tendered a vote of thanks.

The Stockton Y's tendered an elegant banquet to the visiting Y's, which was greatly enjoyed.

Mrs. S. J. Churchill read a thoughtful paper, "The Sabbath for Man." Mrs. J. L. Everts read the essay prepared by Mrs. Mary Frank Browne, editor of The Pharos, on the "Light of Temperance Literature," by which she proved the wonderful influence of the press. Mrs. R. A. Armstrong, president of Yolo county, reported the temperance hosts as marching steadily forward; all departments are aggressively pushed. Mrs. D. S. Dickson, of Sonoma county, told of the determined onslaught on the saloon in that wine-cursed valley; especially cheering was the success in fair work. Mrs. Emma Pow Smith, state organizer, reported success in Plumas and Sierra counties where she has worked most energetically. Mrs. J. L. Everts, the indefatigable president of the Tri-county, reported her lieutenants and the rank and file as steadily pushing forward for prohibition. Miss S. M. Severance read a most logical paper, "Political Economy and Woman Suffrage," proving the necessity of the latter to institute the former. On motion of Mrs. E. P. Stevens, the convention ordered it to be printed.

Mrs. Hawkins, of Tulare county, and Mrs. Emma Colwell, of Fresno county, both had glowing reports of the year's work and both rendered tribute to Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, who had organized twelve unions and raised $400 for the work. Miss Maggie Willis represented Sacramento county; the principal work of the year is the building of a temperance temple to cost $20,000. Mrs. Mary Neer McMaster reported San Joaquin county as having 335 active, 95 honorary members and 191 children in Loyal Legions. Mrs. L. J. Mills is prosecuting with success, temperance labors in Contra Costa county. Mrs. Negus, of Chicago, sent a telegram of greeting. Mrs. Ada Van Pelt presented greetings from the Grand Lodge of Good Templars. Good reports were given by Mrs. Viola Tays, of Napa, Mrs. L. P. Williams, of San Francisco, Mrs. L. E. Everett, Nevada, Mrs. H. E. Brown, Santa Clara, and Mrs. H. P. Powers, of Solano counties. Mrs. General John Bidwell, wife of the nominee on the Prohibition and American tickets for governor, was introduced to the convention and received with the Chautauqua salute.

Miss Severance presented Mrs. Hannah Tracy Cutler, of Brentwood, the veteran suffragist. Mrs. R. A. Armstrong, associate National superintendent of heredity, read one of the finest papers of the convention on "Heredity and Environment," full of research and practical conclusion. It will probably be printed for general distribution.

Perhaps the most charming evening was that devoted to the Y's. Dr. Van Kirk beautifully presided and a fine program was rendered.

Friday's session was full of business. Mrs. L. T. Williams, chairman of resolution committee, read the resolutions which embodied usual W. C. T. U. doctrine. A special resolution of sympathy to Mrs. H. V. Brownell, superintendent of young woman's work, was sent her on account of declining health. Miss Winnie Morris was elected superintendent of Y's with Dr. Van Kirk as associate. Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens gave the report of foreign work. Through kindness of W. C. T. U. friends she had sent Mrs. Grubb $25 for literature for Nebraska, and through kindness of Mrs. Skelton and Dr. R. H. McDonald, had distributed many thousand pages in California. M. G. C. Edholm, official reporter and superintendent of railroad rates, reported kindness of all transportation companies, and 250 columns of original matter in 200 state papers, including San Francisco and Oakland dailies.

A grand Prohibition rally was held in Stockton on the evening of adjournment, at which A. J. Waterhouse presided, and which was ably addressed by Rev. Ray Palmer, Mrs. R. R. Johnston, Miss S. M. Severance, General John Bidwell, Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens and Professor G. M. Miller. The enthusiasm was intense. The convention of 1891 will be held in Oakland.

WISCONSIN.

State motto: What ought to be done can be done.

Walworth, St. Croix, Waupaca, and Rock counties have held conventions since I last reported. Waushara county has held a Training School, and Waukesha its semi-annual W. C. T. U. Institute. All these meetings were characterized by an earnest, enthusiastic spirit, and practical work.

The first, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth districts have also held their annual conventions, all but the fourth and sixth in October. All were grand meetings, where a consecrated spirit prevailed, and the coming year's work was wisely planned. The eighth district meeting was the largest ever held in this, our grand "Banner District." The seventh has not yet been reported to me, nor has the first, these having been very recently held. The sixth district convention elected Mrs. Ella M. Phelps, of Berlin, of whom I wrote you in my last, as president, and we expect good work will be done in that district the coming year. The ninth district includes a large portion of our state, and the most thinly settled portion, and is, of necessity, the most difficult to work in, but the convention was a fair one, and gave promise of a year of good work. The fourth district reported itself to you, so I do not need to mention it.

I wish to correct one mistake in my last letter, a typographical error. In my report of the work of Mr. Burdick, at Superior, I was made to say that 500 signed the pledge, whereas 1,500 signed it!

The "Membership Crusade Day" was observed by some of our unions, and quite an increase in membership was the result. The day of consecration and prayer for the National Convention was also quite generally observed. The local union of Madison had a very precious meeting, which had been planned for, and we know prayed over, by the president, Mrs. Hanchett, as well as by the members. Our spiritual strength was truly renewed.

The Madison local union has very pleasant new rooms in a building formerly a Jewish synagogue, in a central and pleasant part of the city. The W. C. T. U. and the Y. W. C. T. U. unite in renting this building, and their meetings, as well as those of the Loyal Temperance Legion, are held there.

Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, of Illinois, has been doing good work in Wisconsin, especially in the first district. She was present and lectured at two district conventions. She gave two lectures at Madison, one on the "White Cross and White Shield Movement," on Sunday evening, October 26, at the Congregational Church, and the other at the Assembly Chamber of the capitol on Monday evening. Her audiences were large notwithstanding the fact that there was a political mass-meeting Monday evening in another part of the city. Mrs. Rounds met with the ladies at the rooms of the local union Monday afternoon, and by her Bible Reading, and helpful, informal talk, gave new inspiration and strength to our work and workers, a goodly number of new members being added to the union. She has strengthened the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as an organization wherever she has been.

Work at the county fairs was very successful throughout the state, several county W. C. T. U's having secured permanent headquarters on fair grounds.

Mrs. Annie J. Bradbury, state superintendent of the juvenile department, is greatly strengthening the Loyal Temperance Legions, as she travels about the state, and has organized several new Legions. More than this, she is arousing our women to see the great importance of this work with the children, and is giving them not only enthusiasm, but also a knowledge of how to work along this line.

IDAHO.

EARNEST WOMEN IN COUNCIL.

The Idaho W. C. T. U. held its fourth annual convention in the Baptist Church, at Blackfoot, September 22 to 25.

The delegates, though few in number, came together from lonely outposts and scattered towns animated by a zeal for the cause and a spirit of hearty good-will which made the sessions thoroughly enjoyable.

The papers read before the convention were exceptionally bright and entertaining; Mrs. Senter's on "Woman's Progress," Mrs. Miller's on "The W. C. T. U. as an Educator," and Mrs. Black's on "Organization," were full of helpful thoughts, while Mrs. Mitchell's paper, "The Ark," sounded the keynote for prohibition in no uncertain tone.

Our work in Idaho is now, and will be for some time, principally educational in the very fundamental principles of temperance. We are few in number and poor in purse. We have a mighty evil to overcome, but we are humbly and earnestly determined to win Idaho for Christ and temperance. The reports from superintendents of departments were more complete than at any former convention. We realize that our work, to be effective, must be adapted to our peculiar needs. Some departments we cannot use, and we are to concentrate our strength on those which seem most important.

Our committee on plan of work heartily recommended THE UNION SIGNAL for distribution, as many will treat a newspaper with respect while scorning to notice a leaflet. An evening's collection, $13.11, was given to Nebraska. Our "question-box" proved very instructive and interesting. The "mothers' meeting" had but one fault, it was too short.

As Mrs. Holbrook, our worthy president, decided that her business interests would not allow her to serve us another year, we elected Mrs. Sarah Black, of Nampa, whom we believe to be the woman for the place, as president for the ensuing year. The other officers are: Corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. E. McGee, of Nampa; recording secretary, Mrs. J. H. Barton, of Boise; treasurer, Mrs. C. W. Moore, of Boise; vice-president, Mrs. E. E. Givens, of Blackfoot.

VIRGINIA.

The annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of the state of Virginia met in Norfolk, October 21 to 23. Reports of all departments show a hopeful advance in our work. The enclosed resolutions were adopted by a unanimous vote:

WHEREAS, It has pleased our Heavenly Father to bring us again to our annual meeting, be it

Resolved, 1. That we reconsecrate ourselves to His service and pray for Divine guidance in all things.

2. That we sympathize with and will aid, by all right means, in any movement that looks to the enlargement of woman's sphere of usefulness, and her elevation and advancement in life.

3. That we keep our pledge of total abstinence for ourselves and for our families.

4. That at the next meeting of the Legislature of this state we ask for a prison matron for the penitentiary.

5. That we accept no compromise from the liquor traffic, but wait for absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

6. That we express earnest sympathy with all efforts being made to close the World's Fair on the Sabbath day, and enter a protest against the sale of liquors on the grounds.

7. That we urge our members to subscribe to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Mrs. Buell, Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Rice and Mrs. Fessenden were with us and added much to the interest of the convention. Mrs. Buell presided by request of our state president, Mrs. Jones. Mrs. Buell, Thursday evening, said to the convention just before adjournment, "To-morrow is my birthday. Twenty-seven years ago I spent a birthday in this city [Norfolk], and it is a pleasure to be with you here at this time, which to me is crowded with tender, sorrowful memories." Of all who heard her, knowing what brought her here, that long past sorrowful time of strife and bloodshed, not one loved her the less, knowing the one beloved of her heart gave up his brave, young life, wearing the blue, where ours wore the gray.

Friday an excursion by invitation of the railroad company took the W. C. T. U. convention to Virginia Beach, and back to Norfolk.

During the short ride a little present was made up for Mrs. Buell, as a birthday gift. Though no great sum, it carried a great deal of love with it, and that made up for all deficiencies.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The W. C. T. U. of Washington City held their annual meeting on October 16 and 17.

A large audience was in attendance both days, Mrs. S. D. La Fetra, president, in the chair. The roll-call showed seventy-two delegates, officers and superintendents, with the presidents of twenty-three local unions, present. This year has been the most prosperous since the organization of the W. C. T. U. in this District. Fifteen superintendents read full and encouraging reports. The treasury, from all sources, has received $3,455.92. The membership has increased twenty-five per cent, having enrolled 625 names. All the former officers and superintendents were reëlected. Mrs. La Fetra was unanimously reëlected president. A basket of fragrant flowers, and a large bunch of heliotrope tied with white ribbon, the chosen emblem of the District, was presented to Mrs. La Fetra. Mrs. Wells, National organizer, was introduced; she stated that the past year had been the most successful year of temperance work since the Crusade. Mrs. Livermore who was introduced confirmed Mrs. Well's statement. Mrs. Livermore told the white-ribboners not to heed any slander or opposition, but to march forward and work with a will, as victory was certain, our great Leader never having lost a battle. Mrs. Livermore spoke at night to a crowded house on "The Perils of the Home." Thanks were renewed to the Republican Party of South Dakota for espousing the cause of prohibition; sympathy for Nebraska in her great struggle was expressed; thanks were sent to Secretary Proctor for his influence for total abstinence; the fifty-first Congress was thanked for the passage of the "Original Package Bill;" the rum traffic in Africa was deplored; bereavement in the loss of General Fisk was expressed, and loyalty to the officers of the National and District W. C. T. U. was re-affirmed.

CONNECTICUT.

SEVENTEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

New Haven, the "City of Elms," and a center of culture, opened wide her hospitable doors and welcomed warmly the representatives of our 119 unions and twenty-one Y's which assembled in Calvary Baptist Church on the morning of October 28.

The edifice, large and pleasant, was made doubly attractive because of the beautiful decorations, and the earnest women, gathered from all parts of the state, were not slow to appreciate the kindness that had prompted the preparation.

The organ front bore a large banner with the inscription, "For God and Home and Native Land." Over the center of this banner was festooned the American flag sent by Connecticut W. C. T. U. to the Paris exposition. On the platform were displayed the banners of the state union, the Y, the county banner and many Loyal Temperance Legion banners. In front of the platform were flowers and vines artistically arranged.

Mrs. S. B. Forbes, state president, presided in her bright, wise way. Upon the platform with her were Mrs. M. M. Andrews, corresponding secretary; Mrs. F. P. Partridge, recording secretary, and Mrs. S. K. Luce, treasurer. About three hundred and fifty delegates were present when the first session convened. The reports of the county presidents were encouraging, especially that from New Haven county.

Rev. Phœbe Hanaford, of New Haven, conducted the devotional exercise of Tuesday afternoon and also one noontide hour service. The address of welcome by Mrs. Phillip Evans, of New Haven, was very cordial, and was gracefully responded to by Mrs. E. M. White, president of the Windham county W. C. T. U., who beautifully expressed the feeling of the convention in accepting the welcome so heartily offered.

The annual address of the president was, as always, to the point. She sketched the various lines of work performed during the year. Among the topics considered was the text-book for Scientific Instruction concerning the effects of alcohol on the system. The book now used and prepared by the state is not effective in the work, and teachers who desire to teach the matter thoroughly must use other aids. She recommended that a superintendent be appointed to look after this line of work which is to be entered upon during the coming winter, namely, the securing of a more satisfactory volume. She also recommended that the union be incorporated, as the time had come when, by its large numbers and increasing activities, such an organization is really necessary. In closing, Mrs. Forbes paid a touching tribute to the memory of Miss E. A. Landfear, our former state organizer.

Mrs. Andrews reviewed thoroughly the work of the past year both as to the formation and disbandment of local unions. She said, in substance: "The shadows of amendment defeat proved too overpowering for some of our weaker locals, and for this reason more have disbanded than usual, but the new links added make our state chain longer and stronger than ever before. The year began with 112 unions and eighteen Y unions, but closed with 119 unions and twenty-one Y's, and a total membership of ,800 active and 262 honorary members.

In regard to Loyal Temperance Legion work it is reported that eighty-five companies have a "local habitation and a name," but still some are without leaders. How strange that this, our most hopeful field of effort, should ever need to beg for leaders!

The birthday thank-offerings amounted to $375.73. Our state paper has been a success, and 14,000 copies have been printed and distributed.

The report of the treasurer was very interesting, and showed the union to be in a very prosperous condition.

The various superintendents gave full and interesting reports of their work. Several songs, recitations and short speeches not "on the program" occupied spare minutes. One of these pleasant pauses was spent in listening to an excellent paper on the "Band of Mercy," read by Miss Fogg, of New Haven, and one in hearing an account of Miss Remington's missionary work in the city, given by herself.

Tuesday evening the church was packed with a fine audience who gathered to listen to Colonel Bain, of Kentucky. The opening exercises were very pleasant, the singing being especially good. Rev. H. P. Nichols, of Trinity Church, conducted the devotional service, and Rev. Mr. Poteal cordially welcomed the convention to the church and city. Colonel Bain, always eloquent, held his hearers' interest until the close of his address. The collection for the evening was $117. The second day of the convention, Wednesday, was a dark, rainy day, but the delegation was full all day. Mrs. C. H. Fitz Gerald conducted the prayer service, and after the minutes of the previous meeting were read the business of the day was commenced. A letter of greeting was sent Mrs. Divan, our former superintendent of work among foreigners, who is now in Washington. A telegram to be sent Mrs. C. B. Buell, our honorary secretary, was read, and later in the day, to the surprise of all but a few favored ones who knew what was coming, Mrs. Buell walked into the church and was called to the platform, amid the enthusiastic clapping of hands and waving of handkerchiefs. The joy of the women in welcoming her was apparent, and all the more hearty because she came so unexpectedly.

The afternoon session was opened with a memorial service conducted by Mrs. R. N. Stanley. This was followed by a "Talk on Evangelistic Work," by Miss Elizabeth W. Greenwood, National superintendent of that department.

The Y hour was most interesting, and the exercises consisted of singing, recitations and readings. The bright superintendent of this department, Miss Helen G. Haskell, gave her report, which showed that the Y's are marching on.

The children's hour was perhaps the most interesting of any of the day. At the appointed time when all was ready, about 300 children marched in, carrying banners on which were mottoes and the name of the company. Some of the mottoes were: "No Alcohol, Tobacco, or Swearing;" "We speak for those who cannot speak for themselves;" "Dare to do right," and "In God we trust." The recitations and singing of the little ones were thoroughly enjoyed by the congregation, which filled the church to the utmost capacity. It is but rarely that children acquit themselves so creditably, and both they and those who drilled them deserve great praise. The exercises were presided over by Mrs. C. H. Fitz Gerald, state superintendent of juvenile work. At the close Miss Greenwood, former general superintendent of juvenile work, gave a very interesting and instructive talk to the children.

The evening session opened with an anthem finely rendered by a quartette, followed by devotional exercises. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, who delivered an able lecture upon Scientific Temperance Instruction. After this the county banner was awarded for the second time to New London county, Mrs. Buell making the presentation speech, and Mrs. Denison, the county president, accepting it with a few gracefully spoken words.

The exercises of the third and closing day of the convention were attended by fully as many ladies as the previous days. The session opened as usual with devotional exercises and reading of the minutes, after which Rev. Mr. James, of Rockville, secretary of the Connecticut state temperance union, made a short address. It is hoped that in the future the two organizations, the W. C. T. U. and the C. T. U., may labor together in the various lines in which they can aid each other.

Mrs. Mary H. Hunt followed with a fine talk on "Suggestions for Work," which was of untold value to those who were present. She urged the need of instructing the children, and dwelt upon the fact that such teaching, the teaching of scientific instruction, should be made obligatory. The great need of our state is a better law and text-book; neither as they now stand are of much value.

The vote for officers resulted in the renomination of all the general officers. The superintendents remain the same except that two departments are left without superintendents, one having gone from the state, and the other declining reëlection because of other duties.

The convention closed with appropriate exercises, after a Bible-reading by Miss Greenwood, and the report of the committee on resolutions.

The meeting, as a whole, was thought by many to have been the best that has ever been held. There was a spirit of harmony that pervaded all the sessions; the reports from superintendents and county presidents showed advance. The general officers seem to know almost by instinct the right thing to do, and Connecticut is marching on grandly. The Loyal Temperance Legions and Y unions are growing stronger and larger. The state paper has won its way and improves with age. Mrs. R. N. Stanley, the editor, has spent much time and has traveled many miles in its interest.

The ladies of New Haven, who had charge of the collations, did a great amount of work, and made every one feel very much at home. The tables were bountifully supplied, and all the delegates and many of the visitors made welcome.

Those who furnished music aided materially in making a pleasant convention. The collections were large, and Mrs. Luce, the state treasurer, was made happy by the full baskets that were deposited in her hands. May God be with each union and each member of the union till we meet again.

STATE ETCHINGS.

The trees are golden and red in their autumn dress; the towns and cities brilliant with the bright sayings and doings of our women in convention assembled. Since my last monthly letter the first, third, seventh, eighth, ninth, eleventh and twelfth districts have so met. The programs were all par excellence, and the texts of Scripture something wonderful.

The first district held its annual meeting at Detroit. Twenty-two unions were represented, four Y. W. C. T. U's; membership, 1,100, with 169 honorary members. Sixty-one unions were organized during the year, ten Loyal Temperance Legions and nineteen medal contests reported. Interesting papers were read on "Narcotics," "Almshouse Work," "Why should the Churches Aid the W. C. T. U.?" and "The Relation of Intemperance to Insanity." The latter created much interest. Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols, state president of Indiana, gave the evening address. All were delighted, as they were the day previous when she gave a report of her Paris work. The Harvest home exercise, in commemoration of Miss Willard's birthday, was conducted by Mrs. Green, district superintendent of juvenile work. This did great credit to herself and her Loyal Temperance Legions. The collection, $8, was sent to Nebraska. No change of officers was made for the ensuing year, Mrs. Helen Gougar, of Indiana, was given forty minutes Thursday afternoon. From the opening of the convention, when the Y's (who, by the way, were delightful hostesses) entertained us, it was a continual feast of good things.

The third district annual meeting was at Battle Creek. The newspaper gave two columns to the report and headed it very properly, "God and Temperance." Seventy-five delegates were present and many visitors. The county presidents' reports were encouraging. At the Y evening, Mrs. Dickie of Albion read a fine paper on the mission of the Y's. Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols gave an able lecture on "Home and the Government." Mrs. Lucy Thurman, of Jackson, spoke on the work North and South. The closing evening was given to Lydia J. Newcomb who gave a lecture on physical culture. Twelve new unions this year and thirty Loyal Temperance Legions, numbering 2,200 members, are reported.

Genesee county in the sixth district has just held its annual convention, which was a very good one. Two state officers were present, one of whom was district president, also the district recording secretary who had a very fine paper. Another guest was Miss Adams, of Lansing, speaking for the kindergarten. Miss Adams was most helpful in her thoughts upon the care of the nerves and eyes. The second evening a medal contest was held under the direction of the state superintendent, Mrs. C. H. Johnson. John Hughes, aged seventeen, took the prize in a class of nine. We went as a county union to the Fair ground, had a booth where we served refreshments and cleared $60 for county work. One of our unions had an exhibit in Floral Hall, took ten premiums and taught temperance by eye and ear. The Temple, flower mission, and physiology by chart were the themes.

I have no report from the eighth district convention, but I have an item from St. Louis: "In our membership crusade work we did not follow the plan in THE UNION SIGNAL, but each one worked in the way that seemed good to herself. At the next meeting we found our membership doubled, and think we will continue crusade work." Mrs. Lathrap gave a fine address at this point.

From the ninth district I learn that Muskegon "Union of unions" have had Mrs. Rice, of Boston, for one lecture, subject, "The Master's Call." She was also an inspiration to some of us in Sunday-school work. Big Rapids raised $22.90 for South Dakota. Their Fair episode reminded one of Crusade days. At a late hour they learned there was to be a saloon on the grounds. Dodgers were circulated headed thus: "A SALOON ON THE FAIR GROUND. DOWN WITH IT, AND THE MANAGEMENT THAT ADMITTED IT." An indignation meeting was called, signed by the best citizens, a committee of seven were chosen to call on the board of directors; the saloon had to go, and the church bells rang as it went.

Mrs. Campbell of the twelfth district writes: "We observed Membership Crusade Day, received fifteen new members at Manistique, and several subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. I tied the white ribbon on one dear shut-in sister who said she never had been asked before. 'I can not come,' she said, 'but I will wear the colors; tell them to hunt up the other shut-in ones.' Who shall say her prayers shall not count for more than the work of some more active members?"

Nohma sends me word Mrs. A. S. Benjamin lectured there three evenings. En route to Nebraska, her own letter tells me that while in the Upper Peninsula she gave twenty-two lectures, twenty-two drills, three addresses to children, organized one union and visited the most prominent cities and villages under Mrs. Campbell's planning, "who has faith and courage, and persistence and energy beyond what has been written."

"Come! for the year rounds out to completeness;
Each waiting garner says, come!
Spring is for sowing and summer for growing,
But autumn for Harvest Home."

MANISTEE COUNTY CONVENTION.

The fifth annual convention of this county was held at Bear Lake, in the M. E. Church, October 15 and 16. The convention was called to order by the county president, Mrs. Susan McPherson. After the devotional exercises, the usual order of business was taken up. Seven unions were represented. The reports from them were exceedingly encouraging. At least twelve lines of work are observed and for the most part carried on vigorously. THE UNION SIGNAL is well supported in most unions.

Mrs. Emma Obenaur gave us a good temperance lecture in the evening, which was full of strong arguments for the cause she espoused. Remarks were made by our county president, on the past, present and future outlook of the W. C. T. U.

Wednesday morning found all in their seats at nine o'clock. After consecration hour, some time was spent in listening to Mrs. Obenaur, the matron of the industrial school, which heretofore has been carried on by the Manistee union. She now called on all the unions to lend a helping hand, which they will willingly do. Dues were paid for 157 members. Rev. Anna Shaw held a Franchise Institute at Manistee in May, and also lectured at Bear Lake.

MARY E. ALLEN, Rec. Sec.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

REV. GEORGE H. VIBBERT, one of the most forcible speakers on the temperance platform, will be in Chicago from December 10-31, and will be glad to speak for the W. C. T. U. in the vicinity of the city.

UNDER the auspices of the W. C. T. U. of Hansen, Adams county, Nebraska, there have been held, within a year, forty-seven silver medal contests, nine small gold medal contests, and one grand gold medal contest. In this way the question of prohibition has been kept before the minds of the people, and has attracted the attention of many who could not have been reached in any other way.

MRS. CLARA C. HOFFMAN will give the months of December and January to her own state. She will hold district conventions at Louisiana, Carrollton, La Belle, King City, Bonne Terre, St. Louis, Odessa, Carthage, and Aurora, lecturing at Brookfield, Shelbina, Mound City, Graham, Minnesota Valley, Savannah, Montgomery City, Wellsville, Houston, Springfield, and many other points, and will spend the holidays with her son in Kansas City.

A BRAVE Iowa worker writes: "I saw the crusade call for membership for September 27. So arranged my work, put my house in order and at fifteen minutes to eight was ready with pencil, paper and some copies of THE UNION SIGNAL and our National constitution and pledge. I secured nine members to our union, six of them gentlemen, and three subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL. We had our mass-meeting yesterday and send the collection to aid the Nebraska work."

THE union which meets at Robertson's Hall, Cincinnati, O., has thoroughly systematized its work. The first Thursday in each month reports from all superintendents of departments are given to one woman who superintends all other work, makes visits, helps the poor financially and spiritually. Down on the river bank, below the Southern bridge, is a settlement known as shanty-boat town. Here, more than a year ago, a body of temperance women secured donations and erected a tent. Every Thursday and Sunday evening, services are carried on there. These poor people will not go to church, so a church has been brought to them and they have accepted it with gratitude. Every Sunday two or more women go to the House of Detention. There they find from six to twenty women, all behind the bars, directly or indirectly from drink. Two of the members of the union, who began the work with the Crusade, make weekly visits to the jail, and go once a month to the work-house and infirmaries. About once a week a visit is made to the Home for the Friendless. Many a poor young heart, breaking with the weight of sin, has been comforted—yes, saved, by a few healing words from a Christ-like woman. From the country Temperance Unions flowers are received all through the summer. These are carried to the hospitals, with text cards and literature for the poor, weary men and women. Literature is distributed everywhere. In some public places you will see little tin cases labeled "Woman's Christian Temperance Union—Take One." These are kept filled with temperance and religious (they are both the same) literature. A class of about one hundred boys is instructed once a week in temperance. This union wants a home or headquarters, where they can have a place to bring poor, homeless women for shelter; where they can have a library in which to put their books, so that young women may come in and read instead of walking the streets at night; where they can have a permanent place of meeting. They have one hundred dollars to start with, and want to secure a thousand honorary or active members at one dollar a year, which will enable them to secure a place for headquarters.

A NEW WORLD'S SECRETARY.

Miss G. E. F. Morgan, Buckingham Place, Brecon, South Wales, England, has been chosen secretary for Great Britain of the World's W. C. T. U., and will work up the great petition there against the traffic in liquor and opium. Miss Morgan is an earnest Christian and accomplished scholar, and an experienced philanthropist. She is a friend of Lady Henry Somerset, who recommends her for this place.

FRANCES E. WILLARD,
Pres. World's W. C. T. U.

AN EXPLANATION.

ATLANTA, Nov. 19, 1890.
Executive Committee Room.

To My Dear W. C. T. U. Sisters of Montana:

The item I sent to our national organ might as well have mentioned any town in any state of the new Northwest, as the great state of Montana. Please to consider that I hereby "rectify the frontier" of that illustration, placing it outside your borders. The publication was only meant to illustrate how some local W. C. T. unions sometimes live or die independent of any praise or blame to the organizer, and dependent wholly on local conditions. There was not the faintest intention of singling out Montana. Your secretary, my former pupil and dear friend, Mrs. Alma Coffin Kirkpatrick, knows that I, as a teacher, never singled out anybody for special reprobation, and certainly, as National W. C. T. U. President, I would not select for criticism a proud young state, that under tremendous difficulties, has made so excellent a record as has Montana.

Be assured, I will always do all I can to serve its highest interests, and believe me your affectionate sister and comrade,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

A Bee Line.

In taking a serious step you need encouragement. You know where you want to go well enough, but are puzzled how to get there. In a case like that, suppose you happen upon a lot of people who have made exactly the same journey you contemplate; won't they be an assurance to you? Well, here's precisely the same case.

You are sick and you need to recover. A bee line to that end is what you want. A 200-page book, free to you, will give you the names and addresses of men and women who have recovered from dangerous illness by the use of Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen Treatment. This treatment has been used in over 55,000 cases, by physicians in their practice and by individuals independently.

It is a grand specific in cases of asthma, catarrh, consumption, hay fever, headache, neuralgia, rheumatism, bronchitis, and all complaints of a chronic nature. 200 pages of testimonials, each concluding with the name and address. You will know exactly where to find every gratified man and woman who has so heartily indorsed the Compound Oxygen Treatment.

Return mail will bring you the book without charge if you will send your name and address. Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter St., San Francisco, Cal.

Publisher's Notes.

The Best Value.

Have you thought of it? THE UNION SIGNAL, The Ladies' Home Companion and The Housekeeper's Cook Book all for $1.10? The cook book alone is worth that, and just as soon as your neighbor sees the book or even gets a good fair understanding of the offer she will give you her name and the $1.10. Sure, no mistake about it! What worries us is that the time is so short. The offer positively closes January 1, and it takes time for you to get the book to you, investigated, captivated—ditto your neighbor. Why not positively assure your neighbor that there is no risk in accepting without waiting to see the book and The Ladies' Home Companion? Indeed, we will stand behind you in a guarantee to that effect—will return the money to any dissatisfied neighbor!

AN HONEST OFFER.

In last week's number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be found the advertisement of the great firm of J. D. Larkin & Company, of Buffalo. This firm is quoted in the Commercial Agencies as being worth $100,000. They have been in business a great many years, and their Sweet Home Soap, and Toilet articles are well known throughout the United States. Much pleasure is taken in calling the attention of the public to this firm's advertisement. The firm shows its reliability in the fact that it is willing to let anybody have its goods on 30 days' trial. The following is taken from the New York Illustrated Christian Weekly, dated Sept. 27, 1890.

COMPLETE CONFIDENCE.

If a business house is willing to send out its goods to any part of the country and ask for no pay, unless the goods after thirty days' examination are found to be as represented, they show their confidence to satisfy the public. We would advise our readers to carefully read the advertisement of J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., which appeared on the last cover page.

We print a few of the many letters of appreciation Messrs. J. D. Larkin & Co. receive from parties who have ordered their goods. These letters need no further comment from us.

NEW YORK, June 28, 1890.

Messrs. Larkin & Co.:

Your package received in good order, and I am pleased to state that your advertisement was not at all verdrawn, as everything was as you represented. How you do it I do not know, but the facts prove for themselves. Yours truly, 51 E. 83-street. H. S. STEELE.

CLYMER, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., April 12, 1890.

J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y.:

Sirs:—We were not at all disappointed in the box of soap you sent us some time ago. The children had a good time in unpacking the different articles. Enclosed find $6.00 in payment for the order. Please send receipt. Respectfully yours,

REV. JOHN HOFFMAN.

HARTFORD, CONN., June 2, 1890.

J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y.:

Gentlemen—Please find enclosed check to pay. I think I am giving you no soft soap when I tell you that your hard soap is good, and to see the children unload the trinkets, some of them useful as well as instructive, would pay any father for the outlay of money. Yours truly,

C. W. B. EDWARDS.

Remember, in writing to this firm, to state that you saw either this notice or their advertisement in this paper.

In Atlanta

A bright, inspiriting and comical duet, "Samantha and Josiah," was sung one evening. The crowd took in the lesson so enthusiastically that the song was asked for again and again. The demand for the book in which it was found became pronounced, and so Flora H. Cassel's "White Ribbon Vibrations" was most favorably introduced to the army of white-ribboners in Atlanta during convention days. The book has been well advertised in THE UNION SIGNAL, but we give this notice as a gratuitous word of praise for a meritorious publication. Address Flora H. Now it means you can be preaching eight good sermons on temperance, love, faith and purity without ever a bit of a congregation in front of you. Yea! Canst invest $1.50 in any way that will make a better impress or do more good? Nay! Have you been saying to yourself when urged to do something definitely good, "But what can I do?" Here is the answer. Try it; it's home missionary work. Over a hundred and fifty responded to the other notice of this import. Look, now! It counts up!

Timely Talk No. 7, by Rev. J. C. Fernald. "Our Drink Bill and the People Who Pay It,"—"a nation cannot drink its wine and have it too." The money which is spent for liquor cannot be spent for anything else. The saloon is sucking the blood from every honest industry. It is keeping us poor as a nation in spite of our splendid resources, just as the individual drinker is kept poor, though earning ample wages. The sober people of the nation suffer with the intemperate, just as the drinking man's family suffer with him. But the temperate men of the nation have a resource which the drunkard's wife and children have not. We can enact prohibition to stop the manufacture and sale of intoxicants and put an end to the waste of treasure. National prohibition would be worth $1,000,000,000 in cash to the people of the United States.—From The Advance.

This is a magnificent argument; it can be handed to the skeptical farmer as well as to the doubting merchant; do send for one cent's worth anyhow, and see if we are not right. The article is reprinted from The Advance, a paper here that believes somehow, somewhere, the Republican party will yet successfully tackle the liquor traffic question in a national way.

Publisher's Dep't.

A Last Call.

A new business manager of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association has been chosen, and will assume the duties of the place January 1st. We cordially wish her greater success than ours has been. It is not to be wondered at, however, that we use the pen with something of regret in this "last call." After five years of pleasant and cordial relations with the subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL, it seems as if we were leaving a lot of personal friends to go out and make new ones, and you all know that isn't the easiest thing in the world to do. But what is this "last call"? Ah, you know! And can it be done before January 1st? With some papers we would say, "No; it can not be done. It is impossible to gain fifteen or eighteen thousand new names in that short time," but with you it is different. You have the courage of your convictions; you have shown to the world what women can do in setting up beacon lights that shine out with their protesting light against the world's evils; you are part of an organized effort to put these protests unanswerably before the American people. So, then, we have appealed to you not in vain in the past years to lend a hand in sending forth THE UNION SIGNAL's printed pages as the educator that is needed. Another pen is hereafter to do this work, but in the few weeks left of 1890, will not those who have so kindly, so patiently, and yet so cordially responded to the many plans presented here from week to week to build up THE UNION SIGNAL, once more respond? We have given full particulars of our offer to send THE UNION SIGNAL a year, The Ladies' Home Companion a year, and a fine new Temperance Cook Book for only $1.10. We have no right to extend the offer beyond January 1st, and it is highly probable that the new management will not do so. There is no time to lose. This paper will hardly reach you before December 8th.

Dec. 8th to Dec. 31st Means only twenty days, counting out the Sundays. If you would send in the name of one or more new subscribers before then, as thousands of others are doing under this generous $1.10 offer, that much-written-of h-n-r-d thousand mark would be reached, and the present business manager would be just conceited enough to take it all in as a friendly and cordial good-bye to him! Yes, he would, and there are so many other ways used to rid him of all surplus conceit he can safely promise not to be too much elated if that (aforesaid) mark is attained at the time named. We hope, then, for a speedy and unusually full response to this $1.10 offer. You can renew under it if you wish. No matter when your subscription expires it will be extended for a year beyond its present limits, and you will get the Cook Book and Ladies' Home Companion besides. The Cook Book alone is worth the $1.10—well worth it.

SPLENDID PROGRESS.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. Those who want homes in a "clean city," where the rumshop, brothel and gambling den are perpetually excluded, should buy soon, as prices are rapidly advancing.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

Stock in the Demorest Home, Mining and Improvement Company will pay large profits. There are also good opportunities to make paying investments in several manufacturing enterprises. For full information address

BETTER THAN GOVERNMENT BONDS.

The ordinary living expenses of a family of five persons, living in the customary manner of American people, amount to not less than $1,500 per year. It would require nearly $40,000 in government bonds to produce this income. Ten acres of land in the Willamette Valley planted to prunes, with an ordinary crop, at ordinary prices, will net more than $1,500, after paying for all labor placed thereon. You can buy this land of the Oregon Land Company, of Salem, Ore., in tracts of ten acres or more at from $55 to $75 per acre.

Signal Notes.

A CONGO chief, lately tried, convicted, and executed for assassination, was asked just before his death if he would like anything, and said, "Yes, gin;" he drank half a bottle, and was then shot.

IT is said that the doctors partly attributed the malady from which the late king of Portugal suffered to his excessive smoking. It was no uncommon thing for him to smoke a hundred large green Havana cigars in four days.

AT a temperance meeting in Spicer street, London, a man stood up and said: "You know there is a public-house called, 'The Blind Beggar.' Do you know the meaning of that sign? I will tell you. They go in blind, and come out beggars."

IN the annual report of the Army Temperance Association of Great Britain for the year 1889-90, it is shown that the association has now 158 military and eight civil branches, with a total membership of 13,486—all total abstainers. The honorary members—non-abstainers—number about three hundred.

DR. NANSEN, the Greenland explorer, is a teetotaler. Never in his direst straits did he cheer himself, he says in his newly published book, with anything in the shape of alcoholic liquor. "The only use I ever made of brandy during my tour through Greenland was," he tells, "to melt the snow when we wanted water. It does that admirably."

NOT long ago Sir Wilfred Lawson, the leader of the Prohibitionists in England, while visiting at the house of a friend, made the acquaintance of a bright little boy, some ten years of age, with whom the genial baronet talked and romped. After a while he said: "Well, my boy, we have been great friends, but it's odd we were never introduced. I don't know what your name is, and I am sure you have not the slightest idea who I am." "Oh, yes," said the small boy, "I know very well. You are the celebrated drunkard."

THE Prince of Wales was about to visit the blind asylum in London, of which Dr. Campbell is the famous head. Some of the directors, in anticipation of this visit said to him, "You will have to lay aside your American prejudices, doctor, on this occasion, and furnish your guests with wine." The doctor endeavored to excuse himself. "It won't do," was the reply. "The Prince would think himself insulted if he came here and no wine were offered him." The doctor made no further argument, but when the Prince arrived he introduced the subject himself. "I am aware, your highness," he said, "that it is usual to have wine provided on such an occasion as this, but it is against my principles and those of this institution. I can only offer you the best tea and coffee I could obtain." The Prince not only thanked him at the time for his consistent adherence to his principles, but is reported as saying everywhere in London society, "I am glad to know that we have one institution in London which is consistent, and will not lay aside its principles even for a Prince."

REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS sends out the following timely appeal: "Let every church, every society, every citizen that believes the Columbian Exposition should obey the laws of God and of our country, endorse the following or some other protest or petition and send by mail to Columbian Commission, Chicago, Ill. To the Columbian Commission: The undersigned societies, churches, and citizens earnestly petition you to decide at once that the Columbian Exposition shall NOT, by Sunday opening of any department, increase the toil and traffic and turmoil of Chicago's Sunday, which its churches and workingmen alike are seeking to reform; shall not break the Sunday Laws of Illinois and disregard the Sunday laws of the states, which both Commission and Exposition are expected to represent; shall not trample on the rights of conscience and the liberty to rest of the exhibitors, and the army of employés whose powers will be taxed to the utmost in transporting and feeding visitors, and working the Exposition on other days; shall not, under the shallow plea of gratifying workingmen for a Sunday or two, help to destroy their Rest Day altogether; shall not proclaim to the world that since the Centennial our country has surrendered the American Sabbath, the most distinctive of American institutions, and enthroned in its place the Continental Sunday, 'the holiday of despotism;' shall not endanger its own success in the country at large by outraging the Christian sentiments of the best citizens to gratify the miserly greed for gold and the prodigal greed for amusement and the infidel hatred of Christianity that together make most of the clamor for Sunday opening."

The Senate confirmed the nomination of Mrs. Anita H. McKee to be receiver of public moneys of Jackson, Miss.

Among the prominent failures last week was that of the banking house of Delamater & Co., Meadville, Penn.

The steamer Ethiopia of the Anchor line, concerning which so much anxiety was felt, has arrived in London with a broken shaft.

The Treasury Department has rendered a decision that the bondsmen of "The Angelus" are liable for $16,500 duty on that picture.

Stanley's lectures have attracted great attention; his style is excellent, his delivery somewhat faulty because of a habit of dropping his voice at the close of the sentence so that the audience lose some words. He makes no criticism on Barttelot.

Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap spoke Monday night in Dr. Henson's church, Chicago, under the auspices of the South Side W. C. T. U., and Colonel Bain spoke in the Eighth Presbyterian Church, under the auspices of the West Side union last week.

MISSES KATE AND CARRIE MANN, recent graduates of Iowa Agricultural College, propose to put their knowledge to practical use; they are starting a small fruit farm in Kossuth county, and will also experiment in raising sugar beets. They propose doing the work themselves, and no doubt will succeed.

THE theory that whisky is necessary in the treatment of pneumonia has received a blow from Dr. Bull, of New York City, who discovers that in the New York Hospitals sixty-five per cent of the pneumonia patients die with alcoholic treatment, while in London, at the Object Lesson Temperance Hospital, only five per cent die.

BOSTON held a School of Methods December 4 and 5, in the Bromfield M. E. Church. Mrs. Bittenbender presented Amendment Work; Mrs. Fessenden conducted a Parliamentary Drill; Dean Wright gave directions concerning Bible Study; and Mrs. A. J. Gordon had charge of the devotional exercises. John G. Woolley gave a strong no-license address in the evening.

SINCE Miss Willard, in her annual address, recommends us to "wait for the wagon, the solid old farm wagon," we are interested more than ever in what goes into that wagon. If there be any suspicion of a jug of cider under the seat, or if there be a halt at any political corner, to take on a keg of beer, be sure we will not "all take a ride." We want to hear the drivers speak out against the saloon as heartily as against the desecration of the American Sabbath.

THE latest "Yankee notion" in Chicago is a pneumatic tube plan for sending packages. It proposes to lay under ground two iron conduit pipes side by side, each inclosing a brass tube for the transmission of the package carrier; the motor power is to be electricity. An ordinance was introduced into the City Council Monday night, for permission to lay the pipes. It provides that two miles in each of the divisions of the city, North, South, and West, shall be laid within two years.

GENERAL MILES thinks that ghost dances and religious fanaticism are not the real causes of the Indian troubles. He says, "The Indian agents have persistently cheated the Indians out of their just dues—have robbed them of their rations until in sheer desperation, and goaded by starvation, they have taken their present stand. Not until this demoralizing feature is removed from among the Indians can we hope for anything like a permanent peace to exist."

MR. PARNELL having refused to leave the Irish party, the party left him. The split occurred last Saturday, after a stormy scene, in which personal violence was not lacking. After vainly trying, first to persuade the chairman to resign, for the good of the cause, and failing in that, to get a resolution before the body, declaring his leadership terminated, forty-seven of the seventy-two members left the room. They proceeded at once to organize a new Irish party, with Mr. Justin McCarthy at its head. As it has the majority it is believed it will be recognized by the government. Five of the six delegates now in this country will support Mr. McCarthy. Parnell goes to the Irish people with his cause at once.

MISS KATE DREXEL, or "Sister Katrina," the nun heiress, at the head of the order of the Blessed Sacrament, is about to establish a school for colored children at Washington, having purchased a property of 220 acres for that purpose. She has already expended over half a million dollars in Indian missions. Headquarters of the order are building now at Andalusia, near Philadelphia, where will be a normal institution for training missionaries to work among Indians and negroes. The negro is not naturally attracted by ritualism. He is a spontaneous creature, and craves personal liberty of expression for his religious emotion. If to any extent he accepts Romanism it is because Protestantism has failed to occupy the field that has waited for it during the twenty-five years of the reconstruction period.

THE National Farmers' Alliance, in session at Ocala, Florida, is developing a strong feeling in favor of a third party, the farmers feeling that they have thrown away their [illegible] long enough, voting for candidates who do not [illegible]on platforms embodying their principles. A plan [illegible]nion with the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association and the Industrial Union was discussed. T. K. Carskadon, of West Virginia, our good Prohibition friend, is a member of the convention, and offered the following resolution, which passed without opposition:

Resolved, "That we, the National Farmers' Alliance, believing that obedience and veneration for the laws of God are the conserving and saving force of human government, do hereby respectfully request that the directors of the great national fair of 1893 do not desecrate the American Sabbath by keeping open the gates of the same on the Lord's day."

THE Boston Transcript quoted on election day the words of the New York Evening Post, that "as a matter of fact, the interest of women in municipal reform is much greater than that of men. To women, far more than to most men, the objects of municipal administration, the condition of the streets, of the sewers, of the school-houses, of the hospitals and almshouses, and of the police, are of daily and absorbing interest. In capacity for dealing with municipal matters, as really household matters, the educated women of the community are as competent as the great bulk of the men." And the Transcript sensibly adds: "Why not, then, have their assistance in securing good municipal government as a regular, instead of an extraordinary thing? There is no reason why, except habits and prejudices which have no sound, respectable basis."

THE Baptists of Minneapolis are to have a chapel upon wheels traveling all over the Northwest, to carry the gospel to those whom the churches cannot reach. It will be sixty feet long and ten feet wide. By contract it is to be finished and delivered in Chicago, March 1, 1891. Two missionaries will occupy it, and a space of eighteen feet long, at one end, will be fitted up for their living room. The car will run on the Northern Pacific and Wisconsin Central railroads, where new towns are springing up in which the saloon always gets the start of the church. This car grows out of the wise thought of Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of Minnesota, which materialized through the financial aid of his brother, Colgate Hoyt, Charles L. Colby, of New York, and other gentlemen. The American Baptist Publication Society has accepted the car, and it will be put in charge of Boston W. Smith, Sunday-school missionary.

THE use of money at elections is becoming such a flagrant outrage that even New York is arousing to the need of doing something to check it. The plan now in vogue there requires all candidates to file at Albany, within a definite time after election, a sworn statement of expenditures during the campaign. Mayor Grant reported his personal assessment for campaign purposes as $7,238, while his defeated opponent reports only $20.85, which was used in car and cab fare. Candidates are ready to itemize so far as printing, hotel bills, cigars, and the like are concerned, but often lump into one, large sums as paid to the local committee, for "legitimate campaign expenses." There is just the place where the "illegitimate" comes in; when a candidate for Assembly pays $819 for his election, and one for Congress, $1,806, it is hard not to help suspecting bribery. To be effective the law must be strengthened so as to stop this leak.

QUAY, CLARKSON & Co., who have been carrying on the business of the grand old Republican party the last two years, are soon to make an assignment. It is understood that the assets and liabilities are about as follows:

GOD'S WAY IS LONG, HIS PURPOSE VAST.

BY J. E. RANKIN, D. D., LL.D.

God's way is long, His purpose vast;
While we one step are winning,
He sees the future in the past,
The end in the beginning.
His days are as a thousand years,
Slow round their course revolving,
Man as the morning mist appears,
Before the sun dissolving.

Why doubt, and why grow sick at heart,
Truth's prospect seems so dreary?
He will not let His word depart,
Nor faint He nor grow weary.
The mother may forget the child
That nestles in her bosom,
Not He from what He plans beguiled,
'Twill come to perfect blossom.

The planets may forsake their path,
The sun forget his rising,
He'll make to praise Him man's proud wrath,
Weak faith full oft surprising.
He sees the sparrow in its fall,
And all the stars He numbers;
Think not He loses great or small,
Or that His purpose slumbers.

He'll bring His purpose still to pass,
Feet shod with preparation,
Though man may wither as the grass,
Nor see truth's coronation.
He still is walking on the sea,
Right well His pathway knowing,
Still mindful of His own, will He Establish well their going.

MRS. MYRTLE'S PARLOR-MEETING, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY MRS. E. J. ARCHIBALD.

(Concluded.)

The days flew swiftly by towards the Thursday afternoon when "Mrs. Traill requested the pleasure" of her friends' company "at a parlor meeting to be addressed by Mrs. John Myrtle." These cards of invitation had proved a source of much discussion, and expectation was on tip-toe.

Mrs. Myrtle address a meeting?

Mrs. Myrtle! What! that quiet little woman? Some laughed at the idea, others scoffed, more condemned the action as unwomanly, sensational, presumptuous. But nobody thought for a moment of refusing; curiosity was too much in the ascendant for that!

Meantime, little Mrs. Myrtle went on her placid way, and made her few and simple preparations. Not at all times did she feel as placid as she appeared; for the thought of the boldness and the unconventionality of the step she was about to take filled her timid spirit with alarm. She shrank, too, instinctively from the idea that "people were talking about her." Sometimes these recollections would make her cheeks flame and her heart beat so rapidly that she was fain to retire for a few moments to the solitude of her own chamber and there seek the calming touch of the Master's hand, to soothe her perturbed spirit. How often she thus fled to her Rock for strength and wisdom in those days of intense realization of her utter dependence upon Him!

Mrs. Traill's spacious rooms were well filled on the afternoon of the long-expected parlor meeting. The scent of lovely flowers was everywhere, like a sweet suggestion of good things to come.

Much of the heavy furniture had been removed and camp chairs and benches were placed in rows. At one end of the room stood the piano, the top of which was covered with piles of newspapers and booklets. A few choice roses were carelessly grouped in a vase on a small table, behind which were two or three cozy arm-chairs.

There was a subdued buzz of conversation going on; everybody was asking questions, which, apparently, no one could answer. All Aylestown was there. "I should say so, indeed!" remarked old Mrs. Scoffington as she put up her eyeglass and took in the assemblage.

"My dear! Such a mixture! did you ever?" whispered the exclusive Miss Horty to her neighbor. "Just see that parrot woman! and actually Smiley, the butcher's wife! and well! I never did! Mrs. Lathers, the wife of the barber!"

"And both the school-mistresses, just see! and, well, I do declare! that old Miss Stedham, of all people!"

Just then a lull occurred in the proceedings, and every eye turned towards the lower end of the room where Mrs. Traill appeared, followed by Mrs. Myrtle. Both ladies looked a trifle conscious, Mrs. Traill far more so than her friend, as she cleared her throat nervously, and then said:

"LADIES—I scarcely know what is fitting to say upon this occasion, except that I am very happy that so many of our friends—Mrs. Myrtle's and mine—have felt disposed to give us the pleasure of their company here to-day. My friend, I may say our mutual friend, Mrs. Myrtle, has something to tell us all, which, knowing her as I do, I feel must be something that she considers very important for us to know, and which must also be good for us to hear, since she has so far conquered her natural timidity and diffidence as to be willing to challenge your criticism. And although I have a presentiment that she will have the first innings in this regard, and will criticise us pretty freely, I will not detain you any longer, for I feel sure that if you are anything like myself, you are one and all consumed with curiosity! Dear Mrs. Myrtle, you have the floor, will you not gratify us?"

Mrs. Myrtle, smiling, stepped forward and said: "My dear friends, Mrs. Traill has, I fear, led you to suppose that I am going to make a speech. If any one has that idea, please let her dismiss it. If you will let me talk to you as a woman to women, as a friend to friends, as a wife and mother to other wives and other mothers, quietly and simply, but oh! so earnestly! then, indeed, I shall be most grateful. I am going to talk about what it is hard for us to hear, but what is still harder for us to ignore—about this so important, because so deadly, so ruinous, matter of strong drink. Of our responsibility, yours and mine—for the misery, and the ruin, and the crime it causes. And of our duty, yours and mine, with regard to its extermination; and of our accountability to each other, to our God, to our homes, to our country, for its continuance in our social customs, its use in our households, its presence on our sideboards and at our dinner tables. But, dear friends, this is a difficult task, because the theme is a distasteful one to so many here present, and because I feel so utterly inadequate to present the subject of total abstinence to you in a way that shall appeal to your reason and your intellect as well as to your heart. It is a solemn subject, and I dare not approach it in a light or trivial manner. I am, as you all know, a firm believer in the power of prayer. Many of us here to-day can echo these words; shall we not then seek the blessing of Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, on this gathering, before we proceed any further? Miss Stedham, will you ask the divine presence and the divine guidance?"

A profound hush had come over the audience, and all heads were bowed, some in genuine devotion, as the quaint words of old Miss Stedham fell on listening ears.

"Master, there are many here to-day that don't know what they came here for. They haven't an idea they came here to meet Thee! There are plenty that would be real surprised to think they had come here for any such a purpose! But, thank God! there are some of us that have known Thee this long while back, and we bless Thee that we knew Thou wert coming here too, to-day. We knew it the moment we heard what Thy dear servant was a-going to talk about; we just felt that moment that it was by Thy command and that this meetin' was Thy meetin', and that Thou wouldest be with the two or three of Thy children gathered here in Thy name. So we don't need to plead with Thee to come, because Thou art here already, standing in the midst of us, 'cordin' to Thy Word. And now what we do want is for Thee to hold the right hand of Thy dear servant who is to speak to us. Say unto her, 'Fear not!' O, dear Lord! may she feel Thy touch; may she realize Thy nearness; may she speak Thy words; and may those words so spoken go right home and sink right down deep into stony hearts and worldly hearts, and fashion-filled hearts, and let heaven's own daylight in! Some hearts'll be sore and smart when touched, dear Lord, we know that right well! But, oh! we ask Thee to bind them up Thyself and to cure their pain and their sorrow as Thou alone canst do. And now, dear Master, just stay with us and so fill this room with Thine own radiance, that every soul may be conscious of the sunshine of Thy presence. We ask it all in Thine own name, Amen."

What Mrs. Myrtle said would be too long to give here, but perhaps an outline of her address might be attempted. She reminded her hearers of the terrible events daily chronicled in the newspapers as the consequences of indulgence in intoxicating liquors. She asked them to recall incidents in their own town connected with the drink habit. She begged them to go still further and each, as before God, to ask themselves whether their own family connection or circle of acquaintance was wholly free from the taint of this deadly curse of strong drink. She pictured, in a few graphic words the heartache, the misery, the poverty caused by it everywhere over the broad earth. Was any nation, any class, any family free from it? Even where the parents were total abstainers, who could be quite sure that an inheritance of misery and woe had not been bestowed upon the innocent children through some drink-loving ancestor?

Then she went on to ask, who was safe? In a land where, even if all alcoholic liquors were excluded from the family use, saloons reigned supreme; traps were set at every street corner; the tempter lurked in refined society, lightly disguised in the bubble of sparkling wine offered by the hand of beauty; prescribed as medicine by the family physician; insisted upon by the three modern fates, Custom, Fashion, and Culture, as the price of admission to their innermost circles! Then she inquired, "Who is responsible for all this? Not only for your boy's drinking habits, but also for your neighbor's son's dissipation. Alas! are not we guilty? We, their mothers, we, the wives, the sisters, who so thoughtlessly and blindly thrust temptation in their way? Are not you responsible, young ladies, who take your glass of wine, and expect your partner to do the same? What if he were struggling with a temptation, the force of which you could not know? What if he needed but the thrust of a finger tip, to push him over into the abyss of dissipation? What if your hand made the fatal move? Ah! you shudder, and you wonder, and perhaps scornfully say, 'These are but idle words, fanatical ideas, wild and exaggerated notions; they are not truths!' Ah! but they are—only too sadly true; and you, you, my sisters, are responsible. Can you calmly entertain the idea? Will you continue to use wine as a customary thing at your table, when once you realize that there is a demon lurking in it, which may drag down to the lowest depths not only your own son or brother, but the very friend to whom you offer it so carelessly, and so smilingly? Do you know that alcohol is a deadly poison, cumulative in its effects, creating a desire for itself that moderate drinking (so called) is of all delusions the most deluding?"

Here Mrs. Myrtle paused, genuinely affected by her earnestness, when the sweet notes of Carrie Mathews' contralto voice filled the room, as she sang with a power and pathos exceedingly touching to hear, the beautiful words of Mary T. Lathrap:

Only a glass of sparkling wine,
Is that all? Is that all?
Tempting a moment with ruby shine;
Is that all?
I've seen a soul in a passion of pain,
Cry out at the wine that with iron chain
Held it in thrall! Held it in thrall!

Only an idle, an evil word,
Is that all? Is that all?
Only a darksome thought thus stirred,
Is that all?
I've seen the wreck of an honored name,
The sunless gloom of a path of shame
After the fall, after the fall.

Only a trifle! Be gay as we go.
Is that all? Is that all?
Only a few "wild oats" to sow,
Is that all?
I've seen the reaping in loss and tears,
The harvest growing of sorrowful years,
And this is all, and this is all!

Many of the ladies were deeply affected; the gayest and most frivolous were hushed into something like solemnity. Old Miss Stedham sniffed approvingly as she gazed round with a satisfied air, whilst she whispered softly to her neighbor, Mrs. Judge Dallas, whose bowed face was hidden in her hands, "Cheer up! honey! there's brighter days comin' for you yet, please the Lord! He is mighty to save—just you lay a-hold of that word, and keep on a-tellin' Him so, and see if He don't do wonders for you and yours!"

As the last sweet words of the song died away, there was perfect silence in the room, when Mrs. Traill with a break in her voice said impulsively, "Do tell us what can be done, and what we could do to help all this? If what you say is true—and it seems to me it must be—we have all been blind hitherto. What can we do here in Aylestown to make amends for our want of knowledge?"

And then Mrs. Myrtle told them how everywhere over this wide land, and in the sister country across the border, and in every nation, women were banded together to protect their homes and their dear ones from a common foe. That as this foe spared neither age nor sex, rich nor poor, a sense of a common danger had bound heart to heart so that neither social rank nor religious denomination, nationality nor color might stand as a barrier against the great sisterhood of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union with its glorious working motto, "For God and Home and Humanity." How it recognized the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; sought to raise the poor and the down-trodden out of the mire, to rescue the fallen brother, the lost sister, to uplift the morals of society, to influence legislation for the better protection of women and innocent children; to elevate the masses by showing them the better way of clean living and high thinking, to reform the social circle, making it the center of a purer standard of refinement and culture, by banishing from it that which would tend to degrade the intellect and enslave the passions. And how always and everywhere the W. C. T. U. waged a peaceful but uncompromising battle with the poison of alcohol, as the deadliest weapon of the great enemy of the human race, and whether disguised ever so cunningly under the various forms of cider, beer, ale or light wines; lurking in the sacramental cup itself, or lying in wait for its victims under the specious excuse of a necessity to the invalid to whom it was prescribed as a tonic; its deadly character was dragged into the white light of scientific truth and there unsparingly denounced. She also dwelt lightly but tellingly on what was to her hearers a new thought, viz, the study of heredity as connected with the alcohol habit, and of hygiene and temperance physiology, which she contended should be taught thoroughly and exhaustively in the public schools in the best interests of the children of the nation, themselves heavily weighted with an "accumulated heredity."

All these things were new and startling to the ladies, but they were intelligent, educated women, and their interest once aroused, and the "arrest of thought" obtained, they were not slow to perceive that here were fit studies to occupy their best and brightest mental powers. Then, when in closing, Mrs. Myrtle spoke of her own dear home in a far distant city, and told with tear-dimmed eyes and faltering voice of the sweet seasons of communion and fellowship with her white-ribboned sisters, the friends she so dearly loved, spent in pleading for some lost one, or in seeking needed strength for some new undertaking, there was scarcely one present who did not realize that this quiet little woman possessed a secret power which they had not and which they longed to possess. And, as she thanked them for their kindness in listening to her so patiently, a murmur of admiration and sympathy went round and found utterance in the words of Mrs. Judge Dallas, who said, "Ladies, the best vote of thanks that we can give her is just to go right in and help her along; don't you agree with me?" And many voices answered in the affirmative, and so the meeting broke up into friendly groups, all eagerly discussing what they had heard. Carrie Mathews drew the attention of her girl friends to the leaflets and papers on the piano, telling of "What young ladies can do," and of the "Y's work," etc., while at her suggestion several young ladies distributed copies of the Woman's Journal, THE UNION SIGNAL, and The Young Crusader, together with leaflets for "Mothers' Meetings," "Health Talks," and many more. Everybody waxed more and more confidential over the tea-cups, and Mrs. Myrtle was in danger of being smothered with an avalanche of questions, when Miss Stedham, suddenly attracting attention by rattling her teaspoon violently in her cup, cried, "Ladies! how many of you are going to sign the pledge and wear the white ribbon?" The utter silence that followed this would have been painful but for the ludicrous way in which each looked helplessly at the other. Miss Stedham solved the problem by announcing: "Well, in case you all speak together, I'll just lead off myself, and say I will anyhow, and facts bein' thus, I move that all in favor of havin' a W. C. T. U. meet in the Baptist Church parlor on Wednesday afternoon, and let's have a church parlor meetin' to organize. That'll give everybody time to think over the matter and to get their objections settled!"

With a hearty laugh, Mrs. Myrtle begged to second the motion, and Mrs. Traill put it to the assemblage. It was carried most heartily, in spite of a few muttered objections.

And so it came to pass that, not without much discussion and many objections on the part of some very conservative minds, that in the course of ten days Aylestown possessed a regularly organized W. C. T. U., in which leading society women sat contentedly beside those whose acquaintance they had hitherto ignored outside their shops or places of business. Mrs. Judge Dallas was president, and Miss Stedham sat close beside her and made her quaint suggestions whenever she felt so inclined. And as for Mrs. Myrtle, when she went home from the first meeting of the union, she confided to Baby Myrtle, as she undressed him that night, that if it had not been for him, she never could have done it, never in the world!

THE NETHER WORLD.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

There is no civilized country on earth, beyond all, no civilized city, in which one may find precisely the type of life at its dreariest, so thoroughly, as in London, the great epitome of English thought and action. The "East-end" has come to be an old story to all of us, and our thought of the utmost wretchedness for the poor sums up in that word, yet the East-end is but part of it; nor do we, when we have obtained some conception of what its meaning may be, know more than a fragment of the whole.

South London, and the whole region beyond, has its masses of struggling and suffering humanity no less than the East and North or West; go where one will, the same type confronts one, and the same problems arise. No casual glance of the "slumming" tourist suffices. One must go day after day, and week after week, watching the tide that flows ceaselessly through the black streets at night-fall or early morning, from dock laborer to charwoman, or, lower still, the thousands upon thousands of needle-women whose fate is linked with the sweating system.

Two books are before me as I write. One, the last "Report on the Sweating System," prepared by the Earl of Dunraven, chairman of the committee of the House of Lords, appointed to inquire into the system, and another as literally true, "The Nether World," a novel, by Rudolph Gissing, the author of "Demos."

In the Official Report may be read precisely the conditions, which are the foundation of the novelist's work, as real as Zola, but with none of the foulness too often the undercurrent in Zola. It is neither cynical nor malignant. It is simply the record of ruin and shipwreck in human existence, with the horror and catastrophe that hedge about all hopeless degradation. Artisan life, striving honestly for the meager livelihood it brings, and with aspirations crushed out in the struggle, and another form in which the intelligence it presupposes is turned by want of conscience and want of training into ways in which the man ends as felon and brute. Every type of working and pauper life is in these pages. The married woman who has taken to drink and who signs and keeps on the wall before her innumerable pledges broken within the hour. There is the girl, filled with wild, tigerish, animal impulses, to whom one civilizing influence has never come, and who ends a monster, guilty of every crime. There is her rival, the sewing girl, ignorant of everything save this one poor craft; pretty, and helpless, making a thriftless marriage and seeing her children die like flies about her. These, and many another as real, are the foils of two characters, a working man and a working girl, who, though deep in this hideous slough, never lose a jot of moral nobleness, and whose lives in the end are the only suggestion of possible help for their companions in misery.

Never was clearer demonstration of how a poor family, respectable in the beginning, and with the best intentions, may go down hill, ground to the dust by the pressure and misery of poverty; never, too, was plainer picture of how pauperism brutalizes and deadens. The history of a "soup-kitchen;" the life of a little "slavey," tortured by an unmerciful mistress; the hideous home-life of the poorest, the food they eat, ill-cooked and unwholesome, and leaving the craving for gin that all ill-cooked food produces for this class; these, with street pictures of fights between men and women as well; of coarse merry-making, of marriages within a few shillings of utter destitution, are some of the remembrances as one closes the book with a shudder.

Why should these words be written of a work sad and infinitely dreary? Why should the book itself have been written? Because these conditions are not for London alone. Because, here in free America, in our great cities, sights may be seen, and life is lived as abject, as foul and as full of menace to the Republic as anything that London has to show. Clearer skies, freer air, lend an element of hope lacking in the fog, and soot, and smoke of London. but every board of organized charities, and every department of charities and correction has the same story of a mass of poverty, crime and wretchedness, increasing beyond any ratio of help, and facing public officer or private investigator with the same problems.

Drink is very often the prime cause, but it is not drink alone. It is the masses for whom the church has at last roused to the fact that they are outside the church, and of whom Archdeacon Farrar has lately written:

"The national education act of 1870 was meant to cultivate their intelligence. It is the daily and hourly effort of the clergy in their parishes, and by agencies without number, to give them higher aspirations. Yet the tide of vice and pauperism seems to roll on with ever deeper and muddier waters as the number of the unemployed becomes more and more unmanageable. The gin palaces are still the prolific curse of all the most squalid neighborhoods, and the rotting rookeries in which infamous generations of harlots and felons have herded together remain unimproved and undestroyed."

These are the words of a man who is optimistic by nature and conviction. Add to them other words from one of the wisest thinkers the century has owned—Professor Huxley.

He writes of the physical misery, and astonishing, almost supernatural deadness of the East-end parish in which he was born, and which he left to make a voyage about the world. After seeing savage life and all phases of savage degradation, he assures us that he found "nothing worse, nothing more degrading, nothing nearly so intolerably dull and miserable as the life I left behind me in the East-end of London. I would deliberately prefer the life of the savage to that of those people in Christian London. Nothing would please me better—not even the discovery of a new truth—than to contribute toward the bettering of that state of things which, unless wise and benevolent men take it in hand, will tend to become worse, and to create something worse than savagery,—a great Serbonian bog, which, in the long run, will swallow up the surface crust of civilization."

Appetite, Interest and Greed, each with its own army, and all combined, have defeated many an effort toward betterment. People cannot believe that matters are as bad as represented. It is necessary to rouse attention again and again and to hold it till some method takes shape. The guilt of modern luxury must be felt; the duty that man owes to man, and woman to woman; the individual work to be done in which each must sweep before his own door. What we call civilization has crushed out natural blessedness. It is for us to restore it, and in a thousand ways this is possible for each one. The curse of drink is to be done away. Rookeries are to be rebuilt; slums to be swept away. Just pay to all workers and an education as to the meaning of just pay; larger lives, a better chance; this is the lesson bound up in such books as the one quoted here—in every report from commission or society, every appeal from the human faces that look at us with eyes in which only pain and want are seen.

Till this work begins in deeper earnest than anything we have yet known, we have not learned why we are here or what our real object must be. Long, slow processes have brought about the results now visible. We must wait and be patient if equal time passes before such work is undone. But right has swifter feet than wrong, and for this at least a day with the Lord is as a thousand years. To remember steadily, to work steadfastly, is our chief business, till the day comes when such record will be impossible of > "The deep, dark underworld of woe

> That underlies life's shining surfaces;
> Dim populous pain, and multitudinous toil,
> Unheeded of the heedless world, which treads
> The piteous upturned faces underfoot
> In the gay rout which rushes to its ends."

INTERNATIONAL TEMPERANCE STUDIES.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD, M. D.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Poison Problem," etc.

X.—INDIA.

India, in the widest sense comprising the Island of Ceylon and the Valley of the Bramapootra River, is divided between the followers of three creeds: The Mohammedans, the Brahmans, and the Buddhists, and it is a curious fact that among the Brahmans, whose scriptures contain less direct interdicts of intoxication, the temperance movement of the West has found by far the readiest sympathizers.

That apparent paradox can, however, be explained as follows: The Moslem have received little but spoliation at the hands of the European conquerors. Once the masters of Hindostan, they have been degraded to the rank of tributary vassals, their cities have been pillaged, their hereditary princes were treated like bandits by supercilious assistant clerks of the East Indian Company. They have yielded to the gunpowder logic of the British troops, but they have never recognized the moral right of the conquest, and as far as possible avoid all social intercourse with the usurpers.

The Buddhists do not share that political prejudice, but their creed is a barrier that separates them from all sympathy with the secular reforms of their fellowmen. The modern coquetry with "esoteric Buddhism" has been aptly defined as "dalliance with a death-head," and the distinctive doctrine of their founder tends, indeed, to subvert the basis of all other religions whatever. To the Christian Trinity, to the Monotheism of Islam, to the Polytheism of the Brahmans.

Buddha opposes a radical anti-theism, a belief in a supreme demon, a denial not of the existence of a creator, but of his benevolent purpose in creating this world. From the most charitable point of view Buddhism might be defined as atheism combined with devil-renunciation. "The hope of earthly happiness, according to the theory of Buddha Sakyamuni, is a chimera, a phantom that lures us from error to error through endless toils, and robs even the grave of its peace, for he who dies uncured of his delusion must return to earth and continue the hopeless chase in another life. Life is a disease, and death the only cure. All human knowledge is vain, the great object of life being the suppression of our natural instincts. All worldly blessings are curses in disguise, and the only rational pursuit is self-affliction carried to the length of turning the love of life into a love of death."

The followers of that anti-natural creed shunned wine as a pleasure; they denounced stimulants as they denounced all luxuries, and abstained from convivial indulgence, not on account of its evil, but on account of its supposed tendency to brighten the gloom of earthly existence. If the Buddhist self-tormenters had more clearly recognized alcohol as the chief enemy of earthly happiness, they would probably have prescribed it to their followers as they prescribed wormwood and loathsome food. In their Thibetan monasteries, where even singing-birds are banished as ministers of worldly pleasure, unnatural stimulants are, indeed, said to be as popular as they were among the world-renouncing monks of the Christian Middle Ages. Total abstinence, as a means of self-affliction, might have commended itself to such fanatics; as a means of happiness it can expect no favor from the followers of the life-renouncing Patriarch of Pessimism.

The Moghul conquerors who subjugated the larger part of India about the beginning of the sixteenth century, were nominally Mohammedans, but in the practice of daily life they retained many habits of their nomadic ancestors, and the memoirs of the Sultan Mohammed Baber (translated by Prof. William Erskine), contain the following remarkable passages: "We continued drinking wine in that boat till prayer time, when, being completely drunk, we mounted, and taking torches in our hands, came at full gallop back to the camp from the river side, falling sometimes on one side of the horse and sometimes on the other. I was miserably drunk, myself, and next morning when they told us about the manner we had entered the camp, I had not the slightest recollection of the circumstances." And again: "Next morning we had a drinking party in my tent. We continued drinking all night. On the following morning we again had an early cup and getting intoxicated went to sleep. About noon-prayers . . . Syed Kasim was so drunk that two of his servants were obliged to put him on horseback, and brought him home with great difficulty. Dost Muhammed was so far gone that his companions were unable to get him under way, though they poured a great quantity of water on him. At this moment a body of Afghans appeared in sight and Amin Terkhan gravely gave it as his opinion that rather than leave him in the condition in which he was, to fall into the hands of the enemy, it was better to cut off his head and carry it away. Making another exertion, however, with much difficulty they contrived to throw him on a horse, which they led along and so brought him off."

Yet the author of those astonishing confessions was not a barbarian with an incidental penchant for autobiography, but as the historian Jeffrey describes him, "a prince who, though passing the greater part of his time in desperate military expeditions, was an educated and accomplished man, an elegant poet, a minute and fastidious critic in all the niceties and elegances of diction, a curious observer of the phenomena of every region he entered; a great admirer of beautiful prospects and flowers."

If the chosen companions of that prince indulged in such revels, what must have been the habits of his rude camp-followers? Already, during the reign of his successor, there was, however, a decided reaction against the dissolute manners of the court; the climate, too, enforced temperance on permanent residents, and that the countrymen of Mohammed Baber have progressed in the path of reform may be inferred from the fact, vouched for by the scholarly traveler, Vambery, that in their settlements the traffic in intoxicating beverages has practically ceased, and that, since the increase in the price of tobacco, manjum, a sort of confection, slightly mixed with narcotic drugs, is the only stimulant used by the poorer classes.

The Brahmans have carried dietetic purism to a degree practiced by the followers of no other creed, but that certain stimulants were considered lawful luxuries even in the classic period of the Vedas, is proved by the constant praises of soma, an intoxicating drug which the authors of the Sanscrit scriptures extol beyond every other blessing of earth, and in their ecstatic prayers offer even to the gods as the richest offering a devotee could sacrifice on the altars of his faith. Wine, too, was occasionally used at the festivals of the ancient Hindoos, but, as Victor Jacquemont well observes, special temperance legislation was almost superfluous among a nation whose frugality and habits of moderation had become constitutional character-traits. The modern Hindoos are in matters of diet certainly the most abstemious people on earth. Rice, with a little butter, a handful of fruit and a drink of water cooled in the shadow of a tree or pit, is considered a plentiful meal; millions of farm-laborers have nothing but rice alone, and during the siege of Lucknow, when the daily ration per man had been reduced to six ounces of rice-gruel a day, the native soldiers volunteered the proposition to let their British comrades have a double share, as, for themselves, they could for a while manage to subsist on rice-soup, i. e., the water in which the commissary rice had been cooked.

"Rice-fed and muslin-dressed dreamers," an English traveler describes the natives of Bengal, and there is no doubt that the climate of the Indian coast-lands is not favorable to the development of Caucasian energy; but that perfect health is compatible with absolute temperance even in the most unhealthy districts of those lowlands, is proved by the remarkable longevity of the Bengal peasants, and by the often apparently almost superhuman agility of Hindoo jugglers and acrobats. The wealthy Hindoos, the Brahman merchants of Bombay and Calcutta are, on the whole, the most intelligent natives of modern Asia, and the reform movement which has awakened the dreamers of the ancient continent from Yokohama to the banks of the Indus, has made every larger Indian town the headquarters of a reform-club, devoted to the promotion of science, education and abstinence from all intoxicating poisons.

NOTES FROM AUSTRALIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Since my last letter no startling developments have taken place in our reform work. Remember that scattered over our great territory (nearly as large as the whole of Europe) we have a population of less than four millions of people, a majority of whom are children, so that the difficulty of pressing the temperance question into the region of practical politics is very great, still, the world moves, and future prospects are always improving.

The twenty-sixth great convention of the year, the annual breakfast of the Victorian Alliance, held in the Melbourne Town Hall, was attended by delegates from every part of the continent, and amidst unanimous applause it was decided to strengthen the lines of our work, and that local option without compensation shall now be the battle cry.

The year's work in local option contests has proved that an option to the devil is just as likely to be successful in a Christian community as not. Speaking broadly in districts where the supply of licensed groggeries is equal to the demand the local option vote prevented any increase. In nearly every instance where the licensed house had little or no existence, the vote went straight for an addition to the number. Our peculiar law is that every district can, by a local option vote, insist upon maintaining a certain statutory number of licensed houses. The war is therefore waged round the question of increase up to, or decrease down to the statutory number. The legal allowance being one licensed house to the first 500 population and one additional for each 250 in any given district. So it is that local option has proved itself to be in Australia the same wooden-headed delusion that experience has proved it to be in the states.

Mr. Richard Coad, of the Alliance in Great Britain, is making a tour of this country and accomplishing good work. During the next seven months he will labor in Victoria. Mr. Smith, also from England, and known as the second Gough, is here. Unfortunately for both workers, and indeed for the whole of our land, we are at present under the baneful influence of the great strike. For seven weeks now the greatest conflict ever waged in these lands between labor and capital has been fought and there is no sign of any truce; indeed, it seems as though the struggle must go on to the death. Beginning in a very small and paltry squabble, it has now become a question of unionism or non-unionism, the employers having decided to break the power by which the working men of Australia have forced a recognition of their just rights. In each capital the military have been called out and an expenditure of many thousands of pounds incurred to prevent rioting.

Some 50,000 men are out of employment to-day, and as all the good coal mines are closed it is only a question of time when a general stoppage must take place. The masters have imported coal from Japan, 30,000 tons are now on the water, and lively times are expected when the ships arrive. In the meanwhile the suffering public, beaten by both parties, can only endure with patience the sorrows of the times. Already the Insolvency court business has largely increased, and it is painfully evident that overwhelming disaster is at hand. So far the labor party has shown itself most careful to prevent any more suffering than is inseparable from such a severe contest. But the employers, by steadily refusing a conference, and by other high-handed proceedings, have shown themselves in anything but a favorable light. One result of this has been that the Chief Justice of Victoria, a man of unrivalled ability and power, has sent an official letter to the labor party, expressing his sympathy with them and enclosing a check for fifty pounds. Of course the work in our reform must suffer as well as everything else, and we can only hope that the sharp lessons of adversity may be the means of arousing many of our people to the importance of temperance and thrift.

The W. C. T. U. is steadily advancing; the new rooms and offices they have taken in one of the leading thoroughfares of Melbourne is a bold and noble step in the right direction. Unions are steadily increasing and the future of the W. C. T. U. is assured. Their coming conference will certainly show a growth and improvement all along the line that must encourage all who long for the day when the curse of alcohol shall be removed.

The Independent Order of Rechabites is the most wealthy benefit society in proportion to its numbers in Australia. A living testimony to the virtue of abstinence is the fact that year after year their sick pay and their death rate are below the average expectancy. Strong efforts are being made to enroll the children in juvenile tents, and success is the result.

The Good Templars, Bands of Hope, Blue Ribbon Society, etc., are all in more or less active operation in all parts, molding public opinion, building up, line upon line, precept upon precept, a future people who shall look back with amazement upon society as it at present exists, and who shall be filled with praise that the blighting, withering power of strong drink has been forever banished.

THE VOTE ON THE ADMISSION OF WOMEN TO THE M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE.

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—The time having expired for the taking of this vote, we are looking with peculiar interest for results. It may be interesting to your readers to note the returns up to this time as given by the official organs—the eleven newspapers published by the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Last week the New York Advocate gave returns from fifty-seven churches, casting 1,638 votes for, and 1,850 against. The Northern Christian Advocate published in Syracuse, N. Y., seventy churches—1,047 for, and 1,053 against. The Philadelphia Methodist, whose editor, a progressive man, bravely stood for the women, reported 125 charges, with a vote of 2,014 for, and 3,269 against. The North Western, published in Chicago, gave from about ninety charges, a vote of 3,002 for, and 977 against. The Western published in Cincinnati, noted sixty-seven churches, with 2,656 for, and 1,306 against. The Michigan Advocate, eighty-eight churches reported 1,634 for, and 289 against. Zion's Herald, published in Boston, gave a list of sixty-one churches voting, 1,261 for, and 25 against. The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate reported forty-one churches, giving a vote of 1,269 for, and 759 against. The Buffalo Christian Advocate reported twenty-nine charges in the Genesee Conference, giving 811 for, and 330 against. The California Christian Advocate, published in San Francisco, Cal., for twenty-six charges, reported a vote of 939 for, and 132 against. The Nebraska Advocate, published in Omaha, reported in twenty-two charges, a vote of 660 for, and 145 against. Making a grand total of 16,931 for, and 10,135 against the admission of women into the legislative councils of the church.

It is possible that the future ingathering—the final summary, may change the aspect of things, but it is not probable.

We are still singing, but with renewed emphasis, a verse we learned in our childhood from a song entitled "The Old Israelite's March."

"What though some in the rear preach up terror and fear,
And prophesy failure—defeat!
Though the lions before with great fury may roar,
We resolve we will never retreat.
The camp on the road cannot be our abode,
But as oft as the trumpet shall blow,
We are glad of a chance for a further advance,
And to take up our baggage and go."

MARY SPARKES WHEELER.

THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR RESPOND TO THE W. C. T. U. GREETING.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In former years a fraternal delegate has represented the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in the National Convention of the Knights of Labor, and vice versa. The conventions of both these organizations occurring in widely distant localities and nearly the same date, it was the request of Miss Frances E. Willard that a lady of this state represent the W. C. T. U. in the Knights of Labor convention during its deliberations in this city.

On Nov. 12 a delegation of ladies, consisting of Mrs. Anna Steele, state superintendent of the department of "Relation of Temperance to Labor," Mrs. M. E. Brazee, vice-president Colorado W. C. T. U., Mrs. M. A. Cassell, president Arapahoe county W. C. T. U., Mrs. J. B. Belford, state superintendent "Legislative Petition," Mrs. E. C. Benton, state superintendent "Unfermented Wine," Mrs. A. W. Hogle, president Colorado Cottage Home, Mrs. T. M. Chase, superintendent day nursery, were escorted into the presence of Grand Master Workman Powderly and the assembled Knights, by Mrs. A. P. Stevens, of Toledo, O., Joseph H. Magee and Ed. L. Jordan.

The address of Mrs. Steele was attentively listened to, and at many points elicited hearty applause. Her remarks were as follows:

General Master Workman and Brothers of this Convention:

It is my privilege and pleasure, authorized by Frances Willard, to bring to this federation of labor the greetings of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and also of the local unions of Denver.

In doing this I speak to responsive hearts beating sympathetically with the saving problem which stimulates to ceaseless work 250,000 energetic women of the United States, who are organized against the saloon powers and for the protection of home and humanity. The greeting of our vast organization comes with better grace, since, not politically, but as an overwhelming necessity, the strongest possible temperance sentiments have been uttered and accepted by the Knights of Labor in every convention assembled, thus challenging the admiration of all noble men and women who have undertaken the work of reform. Not even the church itself has been more outspoken in this regard. It is fitting that we should stand together on one common platform, and that the motives and aims of each organization should be understood by the others.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union echoes most emphatically the sentiment demanding from capital such equivalent for labor employed that every man shall be enabled to have a home and something more than the bare necessaries of life. It protests against child labor; against the reduction of wages to the point of starvation; against the arrogance of corporations in the oppression of the individual, and like the loyal Knights of Labor, unhesitatingly demands for women "equal pay for equal work." To your federation we owe the practical insistence of this latter idea borrowed from the old-time chivalry and lifted out of the romantic and ideal into the matter of fact application. The Union congratulates you upon the vantage ground you have taken, since women are organized in similar assemblies, informing themselves on every phase of the questions bearing upon the welfare of all who are banded together as Knights. This comes of the true conception that mutuality of interest in all the affairs of life, particularly where labor, where progress and the home are concerned, affects all alike without regard to sex.

Equally interwoven with every matter you are called to consider is the temperance question in relation to labor. The railroads, the banks, the stock companies, which forever menace the individual who must toil or starve, whose liberty is set up against the powers which help him or ruin him, will bear constant watching. But the corporation which stands for $900,000,000 towers above them all. This is the giant whose great arms are thrust out to fill the land with poverty and woe. His strength has mingled in all forms of legislation and of corporate power until he dictates even to the masters of the republic. Shaking his money bags in the face of conservatism, he puts a quietus, where we have a right to expect unmistakable denunciation.

That unrequited labor produces intemperance and that intemperance causes poverty, are equally true. Squalid homes, disheartened wives, pinched faces of children, crushed manhood driven to forgetfulness in drink, women and girls flying to prostitution because starvation wages have been doled out by the greedy, close-fisted capitalist or employer. All this our temperance union has seen. It has ever lifted up its voice and influence against this organized tyranny, and stands with you to demand, by legislative interference, by arbitration, by every moral effort that can be used, justice for the oppressed.

We know, too, that the saloon is preëminently the foe of the laboring man. With all other corporations under your feet, with all questions of supply and demand regulated on a satisfactory basis, yet to leave the liquor saloon as it stands now, seemingly hedged by statute and enactments, would be suicidal, inasmuch as the greatest wrong would completely overshadow all lesser things. Nine hundred millions of dollars would go a long ways towards making every laboring man's home comfortable in these United States. We have 475 saloons in Denver, and the common council adds to the number at every meeting. The population of this beautiful city, including conventions, is about 150,000. This gives a saloon for every 315 people. If one-half this number are women and children, then there is a saloon for every 157 of the men and grown boys in the city.

The rich keep their wines at home or in the club-houses. The saloons are stationed everywhere, and into their open coffers go the wages of the laboring men. More than the money goes into them. The sweet laugh of the children, the rosy faces of girlhood, the hopes and ambitions of the little men, all the brightness and courage of womanhood, and the home grows shabbier day by day. Comfort walks out of one door and want walks in at the other. The strong arm of support becomes feeble and nerveless.

The corporation grows fat and strong and arrogant on the homes and the lives mortgaged to it. Knights of Labor, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, girding the world with a purpose as white as the ribbon emblemizing it, and as undying as immortality itself, bids me greet you with the announcement that we are fighting poverty as you are; we are fighting organized money as you are. We stand for the rights of the weakest as you do. We believe that every child has a right to be well born, and you believe that. We believe in the supreme right of every human being to all the happiness and comfort he can get in this world between the cradle and the grave. We know that intelligent, well-directed and well-organized labor can accomplish all it aims to accomplish for the good of humanity, and believing this our work is one, and that is: "For God and Home and Native Land."

In answer to this able address, Master Workman Powderly responded in behalf of the assembly:

"If I had been aware of the number of saloons you had in the city," said he facetiously, "I would have been more apprehensive of the temptations we resisted in coming to the hall to-day. But I want to say, in all seriousness, that the assembly is deeply grateful to your Union for the coöperation you extend to us in the great work we have in hand. As for the grand Christian undertaking which engages you and so many thousand other noble women of your Union, no praise can be too high. From the earliest memory of man, we have been indebted to woman for all the sweetness of our lives, all the loveliness of our homes, and all the hope of our hereafter. Now, she stoops to the gutter and patiently tries to lift fallen and besotted man up to his forgotten manliness again. Certainly we will assist you, every gallant knight here, to fight the demon you have so justly denounced. And we want to place you in a position politically where your influence may be exerted to more immediate and telling advantage. We will help to put the ballot in your fair hands, that you may be equal in every sense with your brothers here, and be able to write after your name the word American, with a big A."

ELLA C. BENTON.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Official returns from the vote on the extension of suffrage to women and Indians in South Dakota show woman suffrage to have been defeated by 24,000 and Indian suffrage adopted by 6,000 majority. In less than one month these new voters start out on the war-path. If being compelled to submit to the control of this irresponsible element was not fraught with so grave consequences to intelligent, patriotic and long-suffering women, the situation would be one of the most ludicrous in the annals of the century.

Men have long conceded the fact that the voice of Pugilist Sullivan in government is more trustworthy than that of Frances Willard. This is a cause for mild enthusiasm compared to that of Susan B. Anthony at the feet of Sitting Bull, in war paint and feathers, imploring him for her ballot! In my imagination I can see, in the near future, Elizabeth Cady Stanton making one of her masterful addresses for just divorce laws before Hole-In-The-Day, and Lucy Stone pleading for equal property rights before Cane-In-The-Winds, while Mary H. Hunt humbly pleads with Tail-Of-Black-Horse for the scientific instruction law, and Esther Pugh beseeches Git-Up-And-Git-Over-The-Ranch for her pet anti-tobacco statute, while Mary Allen West evolves wise editorials to be read in the electric light of the tepee by Heap-Squaw.

As soon as the present ghost dance is ended and these new voters come out of the ambush of the Bad Lands, and gentle spring smiles peacefully over the plains of South Dakota, I want the N. W. C. T. U. to appoint me "lecturer," with ample body-guard, to the white voters of South Dakota. I want to "eddicate them up to the p'int of votin'." It is too humiliating to ask these noble red men, native-born, to associate with the ignorant herd of interloping whites at the ballot box. It is the mission of women to teach, not to vote, so say the majority of South Dakota men. I hope that our foreign missionaries will be called home and sent for a time to South Dakota; they are more needed there than they are in "Darkest Africa" or "Darkest England." I am ready for the sacrifice. Let us begin a new crusade. HELEN M. GOUGAR.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Don't forget that a two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, Temperance Temple bulletin, and descriptive card. If you cannot do more for the Temple, send at least for a mite-box in which to gather your own and your friends' pennies.

The Moundsville, W. Va., W. C. T. U. sends $1 to the Thompson Memorial fund. Mrs. Olive P. Haney, Russellville, Ark., sends $1 for the same purpose; she writes: "This mite is sent by friends who love and honor Mrs. Thompson." Mrs. Millie M. Lewis, Paynesville, Mo., and Mrs. Hattie Bacon, Milton, Iowa, each send $1 to the fund.

Christmas, with its loving gifts and good-will to all the world, is almost upon us. We wish to remind our friends that we have received a great many beautiful things which have been sent to be sold for the benefit of the building fund. They would make charming Christmas gifts, besides, we will sell them much cheaper than they can be purchased elsewhere. The W. C. T. U. of Nemgumbe, South Africa, have sent many rare articles, the work of the natives. Among the collection are necklaces and belts made of beads, hair ornaments, African dolls, Kaffer snuff-boxes, and broom brushes, spears, long walking canes, wooden spoons, satchets made of grasses, Zulu strainers for liquids. These are made by hand, of grasses woven beautifully fine, and are cornucopia in shape, some of them being quite large; trimmed with ribbon they would make nice catchalls, and would prove very ornamental. Small palm leaf fans come covered with native grasses and immortelles, angola rugs, etc.

In addition to the above we have some fine photographs which give an excellent idea of Africa and its inhabitants, as they are taken from life. Some are groups of natives. The larger views are buildings, mines and scenery. These pictures we will sell for 25 and 50 cents each. We have some fine photographs of Japanese scenery, also groups of Japanese singing and dancing girls. The price is 75 and 50 cents each. The higher priced pictures are large enough for framing. Among articles received and not noted in this column before, is a beautiful hand-painted celluloid mouchoir case sent by Mrs. I. E. E. Perine, Allendale, N. J., it is worth five dollars, but we will sell it for three. Miss M. F. Higby, Edinburg, Ohio, sends a collection of old American coins and scrip. In this connection let me say we have also a few gold and silver coins from China for sale. Mrs. J. Hostlander, Ridgeville, Ohio, sends some crochet edging for an apron, one and one-fourth yards, made by a member of her union. Mrs. Elizabeth Branch, Menomonie, Wis., aged seventy-five years, sends a silk quilt, made by her own hands. We have a great many silk quilts that have been sent in that we would like to sell. Some very elegant and beautifully embroidered, are worth at least $50; we will sell them for $25. Then we have some silk quilts not quite so elegant, for $10 and $12 each. The wife of a working man, Mrs. M. E. Smith, Hokah, Minn., has three little children to care for and her own work to do—not having any money to give she shows her love and interest in the Temple by sending a linen splasher, her own handiwork.

One of the most notable figures seen on the platform at the late National W. C. T. U. convention at Atlanta was that of the noted Quakeress and prisoners' friend, Mrs. Elizabeth Comstock, of Union Springs, N. Y. Although the snows of more than seventy winters rest upon her brow her face is lit up with the light of eternal youth. On the platform she discarded her bonnet and wore a quaint white mull cap, which made her fair, smooth skin look still more transparent and beautiful. She was an interested listener to all the proceedings, but kept industriously at work knitting with all speed for the Temple, in which she is greatly interested. She knits most beautiful and dainty articles. She has lately sent a box of such, consisting of baby's socks, needle cushions, wristlets, hairpin balls, and the daintiest little doll hoods and shoes imaginable. Mrs. M. B. Evans, New Haven, Conn., is the latest addition to the Comstock Knitting Band; she has just sent seven pairs of children and babies' mittens.

We have for sale all sorts of knitted goods, dainty shoes for ladies, delicate fascinators, babies' socks, mittens, sacks, afghans; mantel scarfs, embroidered and painted; picture scarfs of all kinds. Miss Amy Leonard, Taunton, Mass., sends a blue silk scarf and sachet bag, beautifully painted by her own hand. There is a band of dear little children in Castine, Maine, "The Rainbow Band," who meet every Saturday to work for the Temple. Besides sending money they have sent lately a box of dainty little articles made by their own fingers, consisting of pinballs, sachet and puzzles. The prices are very modest, five cents each for the balls and sachets, and fifteen cents for the puzzles.

A small painting of Mount Hood, Oregon, has been sent us by Mrs. L. A. Nash. It is painted in the pink glow of sunrise in that clear clime; we will sell it for $5. A member of the W. C. T. U. of Rock Falls, Ills., sends a most unique picture frame, inclosing the new, delicate and exquisite aquarelle-tint picture of Miss Frances E. Willard. The frame is about five inches wide, formed of dainty shells and pebbles gathered from the shores of almost every clime. These are ingeniously grouped into pretty forms, making a rare and beautiful frame. Accompanying it is a key which gives the country from which each pebble and shell has been gathered. The frame is quite remarkable when we consider that it was made by a lady over seventy years of age. We will sell it, with Miss Willard's picture, for $25. The amount realized is to be credited to the Rock Falls union. Mrs. M. M. Latham, Meridian, Miss., and her mother, Mrs. M. M. Redwood, send two books containing "The Life of Gen. Grant," and two entitled "Thorn in the Flesh."

If our friends desire to purchase any of the above goods, they can send the amount they wish to invest, giving some idea of what they would like, and we will select for them to the best of our knowledge.

Mrs. J. R. Tyley, of Chicago, has the honor of raising a Baby Band of 114; she sends a check for $11.40. Mrs. G. G. Kenney sends $16.20 for a Baby Band numbering 132, raised by the Carrollton, Ill., W. C. T. U. Mrs. Mary I. Bradley, Lee, Mass., sends $12 for a Baby Band raised by her. We have arranged with the builder for a receptacle in the cap-stone of the building for the names of all Bands to be raised before the Temple is completed.

Our Children.

THE TEETOTAL ALPHABET.

[This can be spoken by twenty-six children, each advancing, saying one verse and then retiring.]

A—Is for Alcohol, with poisonous breath,
Brings us misery, wretchedness, death!

B—Stands for Brandy,—its use we know well
Brings woe to our homes, is of hope the death-knell!

C—Constitution, so ruined by drink!
Then folks shouldn't use it—so all of us think.

D—For the Drunkard. God help him, say we;
May he soon take the pledge, and he'll happier be.

E—For the End which the drunkard must reach;
For he cannot gain heaven, the Scripture doth teach.

F—For a Fuddle; a glorious name!
Which means getting drunk, or slewed—all the same!

G—For the Gammon the landlord tries on,
While he gets all the money, then bids you begone!

H—For the Home which the drunkard neglects,
His happiness ruins, and his prospects wrecks.

I—For the Inn where the liquors are sold;
Where they soften your brains, and swallow your gold.

J—For the Judge, who fines you a crown
Because you get drunk, and make rows in the town.

K—For the Knowledge which oft comes too late;
Of the way drink can sting—see the poor drunkard's fate!

L—For the Land where they license such sin,
And where neighbors get drunk upon government gin!

M—For the Money that's wanted at home;
To the landlord's big till it will oftener come!

N—For the Noddle who drinks night and day,
While the stuff kills him hourly, his brains steals away.

O—For the Outcast the drunkard becomes;
Thankful to gather the landlord's poor crumbs!

P—The good Pledge which I'd have you to sign,
Against liquors of all kinds, gin, rum, brandy, wine!

Q—For the Quarrelsome, beer is the thing,
With quick, angry words, friends, to make a house ring.

R—The Resolve which we all ought to make,
Never to touch liquors, taste, handle nor tax.

S—Is for Substance; beer hasn't any!
Though of folks who think different, there are sadly too many!

T—For the Toper who drinks all the day!
Who staggers and reels as he goes on his way.

U—Means United; so let us stand
In arms against drink, a strong, hopeful band!

V—Stands for Viper; and such is strong drink!
You nurse it, 'twill sting you before you may think.

W—For Water so pure and so bright;
God's drink for his creatures, and each Rechabite.

X—Two or three, means a strong sort of ale;
But it makes the men weak, as I can go bail.

Y—For the Youth of Columbia's fair land;
Who 'gainst liquors intoxicate make a brave stand.

Z—For the Zany; no sense much remains,
As he puts in his mouth what makes off with his brains.

[Our Band of Hope superintendents are clamoring for suitable recitations for their entertainments. Here is a grand one. Each child should have the letter they represent marked on an illuminated card and hung around the neck with a blue ribbon.]

A POSTPONED THANKSGIVING.

BY WILLIAMETTA A. PRESTON.

"Mamma, guess when my birthday comes? And you promised me a party." Sadie Grover looked up from the almanac she had been studying for the last ten minutes, by the fading light of the short November day.

"The twenty-fourth of November, dear, as it has for the last eleven years," replied Mrs. Grover, not pausing in her work of preparing supper for the farm hands who would soon come in.

"Oh, you are a witch, mamma," exclaimed Sadie, noticing a mischievous gleam in her mother's dark eyes. "You always know everything. It really will be Thanksgiving, and I can have my party. How shall we manage?"

"Manage the birthday, child? Why, let it come, and enjoy it. What could be nicer than a Thanksgiving party? Grandpa and grandma are coming, Uncle Clarence, Rosie, and all the rest," replied Mrs. Grover, well pleased at Sadie's surprise.

"That's what you have been so pleased about, and wouldn't tell me! I'm ever so glad, only"—the fair face clouded a little—"I did so want a different party. I never thought about it's being Thanksgiving. Yes, I did, too; I mean I didn't know grandma and all the rest were coming."

"What did you want?" inquired Mrs. Grover, kindly. "It is too dark to read any longer; suppose you help me set the table, and tell me about it. Perhaps we can arrange it."

"What made me think of it, little Patty Cole—you know she is the washwoman's daughter, she does most all the work, and takes care of those little ones—she said she never saw a Thanksgiving dinner. We were in at Mrs. Meacham's, and she, Mrs. Meacham, had been telling us about what great times they used to have. She said she hadn't tasted turkey these ten years. Then, there is old Uncle Pete and lame Teddy, and Roxy and little Sue,—I wanted to have them all come, and give them a Thanksgiving to remember. It's almost naughty, but I don't know whether I am most glad or sorry."

"We can't plan any differently for Thanksgiving," remarked Mrs. Grover, thoughtfully, unwilling to discourage Sadie, who was just beginning to think of others. "Perhaps we can have the party a little later."

"That would be splendid—only it won't be Thanksgiving."

"You can write them about it, so they will get the notes Thanksgiving Day, and tell them why you were obliged to postpone it."

That satisfied Sadie, and during the two weeks of preparation she was the nicest little helper a busy mother could wish.

Thanksgiving Day, and the house was crowded with uncles, aunts and cousins, and the dear grandparents. Of all the merry company that assembled in the large kitchen for their dinner of roast turkey and its accompaniments, no one was quite so happy as Sadie.

With each of her little notes of invitation she had sent a chicken and a mince pie, that the real Thanksgiving Day might be a happy one. Sadie had asked that she might do this instead of having her usual presents.

"So this is your birthday party?" inquired Uncle Clarence, pinching Sadie's rosy cheek. "It's a pretty good one for a twelve-year-old."

"No, it isn't, uncle," laughed Sadie; "this is just Thanksgiving Day. The party is coming next week."

"Your mamma wrote us it was for your twelfth birthday, so we came. Rosie and I always go to birthday parties," fitting a pearl ring to Sadie's finger as he spoke. "It's Thanksgiving that's postponed, papa," added Rosie, Sadie's favorite cousin, to whom she had told her plans. "Come up here, both of you, and explain." So they sat down by his side, and Sadie told him of Mrs Meacham and Uncle Pete—of Patty and the babies—of lame Teddy, of little Roxy with her flower-like face, and her pictures which she loved to draw, and of little Sue.

Uncle Clarence was so interested in all this that he told Rosie they would stay and help Sadie through with it Sadie was delighted. She had never had a happier birthday than this, and it was all the better because she was going to give so much happiness the next week. What if she had given up the pretty muff and set of books she had been promised?

After a week of busy preparation, the Thursday came. Early in the morning Uncle Clarence took the team and went for the expected guests.

Sadie and Rosie were ready for them The sitting-room was bright with firelight and sunlight. An easy-chair stood by each of the two south windows, in which were some geraniums and a cactus in full bloom. Above was a canary singing cheerily There were games for the little ones, books, pictures and a basket of red and green apples.

What a short morning it seemed! Sadie and Rosie made the time pass so pleasantly. Then came the dinner—a true Thanksgiving one. Uncle Clarence helped here, and made them laugh more than once at some funny story.

"You call this a postponed Thanksgiving, do you?" asked Teddy, as he freed the wishbone from its last bit of meat and held it up. "I wish you'd postpone it every year."

The others might have echoed the wish. Mrs. Meacham forgot her loneliness, and became quite cheery, telling the happy children many stories of her past life. Uncle Pete related a bear-hunt, in which he had had a prominent part. Then they asked Uncle Clarence for a story, and he told of one of his many college scrapes. The day was all too short, and all were sorry when it began to grow dark, and Uncle Clarence got the team to take them home again. He gave them each a pretty present, while they were getting ready—a warm overcoat for Uncle Pete, a shawl for Mrs. Meacham, a box of paints for Roxy, a dress for little Sue, and some books for Patty. Instead of giving Teddy a present, Uncle Clarence asked if he would go to the city with him, and be cured of his lameness.

"God bless you all," Mrs. Meacham said, as she bade them good-night. "I never dreamed a put-off time could be so good. It is a good thing for us that you had to postpone your Thanksgiving this year."

Sadie laughed merrily. "It's a good thing I did, because Uncle and Rosie made it so much nicer. I wonder," she added, coming back to the sitting room to her mother and Rosie, "if that's the way God does when He has to make us wait for a good time—if He more than makes it up next time."

"Of course it is," answered Rosie. "He has to punish us when we are naughty, and reward us when we are good, just as papa does. He is our Father."

"And we shall be sure to get it all in heaven, even if we miss it here," added Sadie, thoughtfully.

TEN GOLDEN RULES.

1. Never put off till to-morrow what ought to be done to-day.
2. Never trouble others for what you can do yourself.
3. Never spend your money before you have it.
4. Never buy what you do not want because it is cheap.
5. Pride costs us more than hunger, thirst, or cold.
6. We never repent of having eaten too little.
7. Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.
8. How much pain have those evils cost us which never happened.
9. Take things always by their smooth handle.
10. When angry, count ten before you speak; if very angry, count a hundred.

GIVING.

Christmas is coming and everybody is thinking about Christmas presents. Stop a minute, look sharp into your "thinkery" and see if you do not find there more thoughts about what you shall get than what you shall give. But "it is more blessed to give than to receive," for the dear Christ, whose coming made Christmas, says so. I wish each one of you to have this blessedness this year. It is good to give gifts to your friends; father and mother will cherish as precious treasures something your own hands have made for them; but this is not the kind of giving I am thinking of now.

Can not each one of you think of some child who but for you would have no Christmas present? That is just the one for you to give to. Put on your thinking cap now, so that you will make sure you have just the right one, and that you choose just the right thing to give. Of course you would not give some old thing you don't care for yourself; nobody else would care for it either. You need to think just what you would most like to have if you were in their place, and then give it, if you can. Don't wait till you have spent all your Christmas money in buying presents for those who will be sure to have ever so many without yours, but save out one-tenth of it to buy something for one of Christ's little ones who might never know the beautiful story of the Christ child but for you.

If you have no Christmas money, set your wits to work to plan some other way of giving; try to earn some money, or to make something out of what you have. There are ever so many such things you can do, if only you will think. If you live in the country you have a great many things which would delight the hearts of poor little children in the city; nuts and apples and popcorn; if you are where it grows, you can make up packages of ground pine, or holly to brighten dark tenement homes; perhaps you have maple sugar which you can run into egg shells, or other cunning molds; you can make lovely things out of birch bark, pine cones and little evergreen twigs, even out of cockle burs, as I did when a child. If you live in the city you can buy worsteds for a few cents and knit wristlets; you can make scrap-books out of the many bright cards and pictures that are lying about; you can make doll's clothes from pretty bits your mothers will give you, and nothing will better please some little girl who has taken such good care of her one dolly that it has outlived all its clothes; you boys can whittle and saw out ever so many nice things to give away; there is no end of pretty presents you can make, if only you take pains to think them out. Some of you have money with which you can buy books to make the long hours of sick or crippled children brighter; just think what a joy a bound volume of Babyland, or "Little Men and Women," with its cute pictures, and short, easy stories would be to a little crippled child shut up in a dreary room while its mamma must be off at work; or how much an older one would enjoy Wide Awake, or some other bright, cheery book. Perhaps you have some such book which, though you have read it, is still just as good as new, and which you can give if you cannot buy a new one. Whether your gift be great or small, be sure that love goes with it; this only can make it worthy of the dear Christ child for whose sake you give it.

CAPTAIN MARY.

The Household.

IN THE AMPHITHEATRE.

BY ADALINE HOHF BEERY.

[A reminiscence of the Sunday service at Chautauqua, July 27, 1890.]

A morning balm breathes through the sacred grove,
Where sun-glints dally with the shy green leaves,
And trails of vapor put them all to blush.
Glad of the hour, and burdened with its strain,
The full-voiced organ, with surcharged pipes,
Trembles abroad, and calls God's worshipers.

Into their place are come ten thousand feet,
Gathered from climes 'neath every sun; the youth,
Decked with their summer bravery and smiles,
Next to the snow-strewn hair; the care-free child
The sainted sage beside; mothers and brides;
A sea of faces, cast in infinite mold.

"Who is my neighbor?" All these pulsing souls,
And all the world besides in need of help.
The beat of brotherhood vibrates across
Th' assembly, and a burst of loud "All hails!"
Leaps from all tongues, and round the rafters clings.
Dying in infinite waves far through the blue.

The sense of Fatherhood above the world,
That makes and holds and rules the peopled vast,
Thrills heart and song, and once again the swell
Of choral "Hallelujahs" shakes the air
In widening waves until the last broad crest
Breaks with sweet murmur on the shores of heaven.

O heaven, is this thy spectacle? Like this,
Do angels sing around the dazzling throne,
Source of thy light and rapture? O let me,
Gazing with tear-filled eyes at this earth scene
Mingle my quivering notes with that pure song,
When this sweet memory shall cease to be.

CHRISTMAS, AND HOW TO CELEBRATE IT.

Suggestions from a Kindergartner.

BY ELIZABETH HARRISON.

All festival occasions, when rightly used, have a unifying effect upon the family, neighborhood, Sunday-school, church, state or nation, in that they direct all minds for the time being in one direction and toward one central thought outside of self. The family festival is an enormous power in the hands of the mother who knows how wisely to use it. By means of the birthday anniversaries, Fourth of July, Thanksgiving, and above all, Christmas, can she direct her children's powers into channels of unselfish endeavor.

Of all festivals of the year, the Christmas festival is, perhaps, the least understood; that is, if one judges by the general observations of the day. Why do we celebrate Christmas? What are we celebrating? Is it not the greatest manifestation of love, unselfish love, that has ever been revealed to man? And how, as a rule, are children taught to observe it? Usually by expecting an undue amount of attention, an unlimited amount of injudicious feeding, and a selfish exaction of personal presence, thus egotism, greediness and selfishness are fostered. Christmas season should be the season in which the joy of giving is so much greater than that of receiving, that the child, through his own experience, is prepared to perceive the great truth that God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son. For weeks beforehand the mother can lay her plans by which each child in the family can do without something, can earn money for the purchase of something which is to add to his Christmas joy by enabling him to give to those he loves, and also to the unfortunate of earth. In this course the mother must join with heart and soul, else the giving can become a mere formal obligation. Little children, when rightly trained, enjoy the putting of themselves into preparations by which they are to surprise and please others, fully as much, if not more, than they do the receiving of presents. So near, as yet, are they to the hand of God that unselfish love is an easy thing to inculcate.

Let me contrast two preparations for Christmas which have passed under my own eye. In the one case I was in one of those crowded toy shops where hurried, tired women are trying to fill out their lists of supposed obligations for the Christmas season. All was confusion and hurry, impatience, and more or less ill-humor. My attention was directed toward a handsomely dressed mother leading by the hand a profusely dressed little girl of eight years of age. The tones of the mother's voice struck like a discord through my soul.

"Come on!" said she petulantly to the child who had stopped for a moment to admire some new toy; "come on, we have got to give her something and we may as well buy her a couple of dolls. They'll be broken to pieces in three weeks' time, but that's no matter to us. Come on, I've no time to wait."

Thus, what should be the joy of Christmas giving was made to that child a disagreeable, unwilling and useless expenditure of money. What part of the real Christmas spirit, the God-spirit "which so loved the world," could possibly come to that child from such a preparation of Christmas as this? Nor is this an unusual instance. Go into any of our large stores or shops just before Christmas, and you will see scores of women checking off their lists is a way which shows the relief of having got "that present settled," at least. All the great, true, beautiful spirit of Christmas joy is gone, and a mere commercial transaction, oftentimes a vulgar display, has taken its place.

On the other hand, go with me into one of our quiet kindergartens where the sunshine without is rivaled by the sunshine within. See the white-aproned teacher seat herself and gather around her the group of eager children. Listen to the tones of her voice when she says,

"Oh, children, children! You don't know what a happy time I am going to let you have this Christmas. Just guess each one of you what we are going to do to make this the gladdest, brightest, happiest Christmas that ever was."

Look into the eager little faces anticipating a new joy, knowing from past experience that the joy means effort, endeavor, self-control and self-denial, nevertheless, that it means happiness, too. Listen to the eager questions and plans of the children, and then hear the announcement,

"No, better than that, better than that! I am going to let each one of you make not only mamma and papa happy, but some dear little child, who might not be happy on Christmas but for what we do for him."

Listen, as I have listened, to the clapping of hands after such an announcement. Look at the light which comes into the eyes, notice the eager look of interest upon each face, as all seat themselves at the work-table and the plan of work is more definitely laid out. Go, as I have done, morning after morning, and see these same children working patiently, earnestly and continuously upon the little gifts which are to make Christmas happier for some one else. Will you then need to ask the question as to which is the wiser way to celebrate the holy Christmas time?

Not that I would have you deprived of the pleasure of giving to your children, any more than I would have the children robbed of their pleasure of giving to others; but let me beseech you that your gifts be not gifts of useless profusions of such articles as cultivate self-indulgence, vanity or indolence. Give to your children few and simple gifts, such as will suggest and aid them in the future drawing out of their own inner thoughts or ideals. Give to your little ones blocks with which to build, dolls to dress and undress and take care of, horses and wagons with which they can imitate the traffic world about them. Let the toys be simple, strong and durable, that the child may not gain habits of reckless extravagance and destruction, such as flimsy toys always engender. Remember, a few good toys, like a few good books, are far better than many poor toys. Toys in which the child's own creative instinct has full play, are far better than the finished toys from the French manufacturers. In fact, too complex a toy is like too highly seasoned food, too elaborately prepared a book, too old society, or any other mature thing forced upon the immature mind. It is not so much what the toy is, as what the child can do with it, that is to be considered. Give to your older children paint boxes, chalk, crayon, scroll-saws, cabinets in which are arranged the beginnings of various collections. This instinctive delight in putting his own thought into his plaything rather than to accept the thought of the manufacturer, is why most boys delight in presents of tool chests.

Books, of course, when wisely selected, are always good presents for children. Each well-selected book gives a child a glimpse of the great world of which he is not yet a part. Various games in which all the children may take part, in which good-humored competition comes into play, are also judicious presents for older children, but, above all things else, let that glad joy of having given of his best to some poor and needier life be the chief thought of Christmas time. Such stories as Dickens' "Tiny Tim" will be well for you yourself to read as preparation for this Christmas time.

BUT one woman did Christ reprove, and that was Martha, who was so "careful about many things" that she had no time to develop intellect and soul. Flesh has its claims, which should be met conscientiously; but the "other things" should not be left undone. Mary had probably done enough, and when the Master came, instead of useless offerings that would not promote His comfort, she gave her heart, her attention, her sympathy, to the great issues which make for righteousness.—Selected.

The Still Hour.

FOR THE WEEK BEGINNING DECEMBER 21, 1890.

BY REV. C. C. HARRAH.

DAILY BIBLE READING NOTES.
(Luke 24:44-53; I Cor. 7-16.)

Sunday, 21; Luke 24:44-53. Verse 44, How dear to us are the parting words of dear friends, that we shall never meet in this world again. So we love to think of Jesus' parting words, in which He brought before His disciples a review of His earthly career. Verse 45, Our Lord, in His earthly life, constantly referred to the Scriptures. Pray that Jesus may open the Scriptures to us, that we may understand them. Verse 49, Pray that all of God's people may be endued with power from on high, for only thus can they be fitted to do the work to which each is called.

Monday, 22; I Cor. 7. Verse 18, It is true in general of the relations and occupations of life, that we should be content to remain where in the providence of God we are placed. Verse 32, We should be very careful, in forming the relations of life, not to involve ourselves so as to interfere with piety and God's service.

Tuesday, 23; I Cor. 8. Verse 1, Love should guide us in forming our opinions, and in our treatment of others. Verse 4, Some matters of belief are unimportant. The great truth that there is one God lies at the foundation of religion. We ought to be settled in what is fundamental truth. Our opinions change, but these beliefs should never change. Verse 13, Apply this text to the use of liquors, questionable amusements, etc. We should not do that which may be the occasion of leading others into sin.

Wednesday, 24; I Cor. 9. Verse 19, May we have more of anxiety, such as Paul had, to save men. Verse 22, It is wrong to needlessly offend others. Be kind to all, and always be loyal to Christ.

Thursday, 25; I Cor. 10. Verse 6, The world is no example for us, and we should avoid all practices which are inconsistent with our Christianity. Verse 12, Any soul is likely to be ruined that thinks lightly of temptation.

Friday, 26; I Cor. 11. Verse 5, The bad state of society and morals at Corinth made care necessary in order that Christian women might be rightly understood, and have the best influence. This explains much in this chapter and in chapter fourteen. Verse 17, The low state of morals brought irreverence and profanity into the observance of the Lord's Supper.

Saturday, 27; I Cor. 12. Verse 3, Our claims to be Christians are all false if we do not acknowledge and honor Jesus Christ. Verse 13, However much we may differ in other matters, if we are Christians the spirit that binds us together is one spirit.

Sunday, 28; I Cor. 13. Verse 1, Whatever other endowments we may have, without love we cannot be Christians; and we cannot exalt too much its excellency and power. Verse 13, Faith brings salvation; hope looks toward eternal life; love is salvation and life as manifested toward God and man.

Monday, 29; I Cor. 14. Verse 3, It is our duty in the use of all of our gifts, to study what will edify and assist the church. Verse 33, The great rule that should guide us in settling all matters relating to the church, is that God is the author of peace. The devil is the author of confusion.

Tuesday, 30; I Cor. 15. Verse 4, Everywhere the apostles preached that Christ arose from the dead, and that there would be to all a manifestation of life from the dead. This blessed truth of immortality drew the troubled hearts of men everywhere toward the Gospel. Verse 55, The doctrine of the resurrection, properly understood, should fill the mind with joy and peace; for it means the complete triumph over all the evils of sin.

Wednesday, 31; I Cor. 16. Verse 1, Giving should always be regarded as a religious act, and we should be as regular, conscientious and systematic about it as we are about any other part of worship or religious service. Verse 13, The dangers and temptations which surround us in this world make the exhortation a very necessary one, "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong." Dear reader, take this for your motto for the coming year, and until the Lord calls you home.

THE PRAYER MEETING TOPIC.

(Head Over All Things; "Bible Reading Leaflet," August, 1889,—Eph. 1: 22.)

1. Christ is head over the church, as a good shepherd to confer upon us all He can do for our good.

2. We should have no fear or anxiety, for Christ is head over "all principalities and powers" as well as the church. Col. 2. 9, 10.

3. We can submit our ways and services to the Lord with great confidence, that He will order all things and bless all good work, so that "judgment" and "justice" may be established "from henceforth even forever." Isa. 9: 6, 7.

Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness and hath no light? Let him trust in the name of the Lord and stay upon his God.—Isa. 50: 10.

At even time it shall be light.

UNDER THE WEATHER.

Last month Mary Lowe Dickinson sent us this broad beam of sunshine. Press of Convention matter crowded it out till now, but it is just as good to brighten this dreary December day as though it were November, and altogether too good for selfish hoarding, so we share it with you:

It is a common thing in journalism for its columns, especially its editorial columns, to become at times what might be called a little "under the weather." If the season is cold or dreary, or bright and sunny, somehow the dreariness or the cheer runs down to the pen point and that is written which the editors are accustomed to call suited to the season. Now we women, as a whole, have to be subject to so many other changeable and distressing phases of life that we, of all people, ought not to be "under the weather." We are, most of us, manufacturers of our own sunshine, and have been at the practice so long that we ought to be able to make enough of it to keep it bottled up, and have it ready for use whenever there is a lack. Hence, why should we not, in our thoughts, just make a jump and skip—November? Away beyond it lies the jolly and merry Christmas time, and Santa Claus is already jingling his bells and cracking his whip from afar.

October has been, this year, such a radiant month, that I asked an old farmer, with whom I was driving over the Vermont hills, what was the secret of such beautiful fading of the leaves? Why it was that some years they seemed to take a leap from the most vivid and beautiful green over into dingy russet and brown, and other years they just moved on through the gold of the birches and the crimson of the maples, and every possible radiant tint, passing from glory unto glory, until the change seemed upward into a transfiguration instead of downward unto death? And my old farmer struck off the heads of the golden-rod with a sort of slow swing of his whip-lash, and said, "he kinder reckoned that, as a gineral thing, the colors were all in the leaves, only sometimes they just ripened nat'ral and gradual, and other times just got nipped enough by the frost to sort of spile 'em before the shine in them could get outside." And in my heart I answered, not the homely words, but the truth behind them.

The fact is, there is in us all the possibility of a beautiful growing old, of such a beautiful changing and fading out of our younger life into our older life, out of our life here into the life beyond, as would make our passing seem just a natural ripening to all those who watch us as we go. God has put into each one of our lives all the colors that make the possibility of beauty, even in the time of fading. We have had our share of warmth and frost, of sunshine or of rain, and the effect of all those should be such changing and fading as is only beautiful to behold. Those things ought to bring out the colors, and we have to look out that we do not let the little nipping and frosty trials make us "spile" before our time, and so lose the beauty that ought, in fading, to be just "finding its way out" where other people can see how sweet and fair it is. We want to ripen and not "spile." We want the close to be a glory, and not just a pale, dim fading. We want, in our lives as well as in our months, to skip November; to make believe it is not going to rain, and that the chill isn't coming; but that only the cheer that lies over there in the Christmas beyond the chill is to be our own.

"How are we going to do it?" asks one poor sufferer; and "Wouldn't that be making believe?" asks another; and "Isn't it wicked to make believe?" Well, if it is, we won't make believe. We will just make it real by reaching out beyond November into December, and begin to enjoy and steal the joy from Christmas six weeks before it comes; and here just below is a wonderful recipe for doing that:

Look over the list of friends who are already "spiled," those who, though not yet old are getting sour and cross, and who are tired of themselves, and who have a gift at making other people tired of them, and see if you can't do some bright and loving thing that will bring back for a little while, at least, the glow and color of a genuine gratitude and love into such lives. I am sure each one of us knows somebody who is disagreeable enough so that other people will not care very much about making them merry at Christmas. Choose the hateful people and the cross people, and get them, or make them a little Christmas gift. Very likely they will only scold you for it, and say they didn't want it, and wish you would let them alone; but all that only adds a little zest to the fun. Down in their hearts, very likely, they are the very people who will care the most for a little genuine, loving kindness. Then, after you have done something for the unthankful, find some little child, or somebody who will get no Christmas if you do not care for them, and see if you can add to the brightness of the holy time for such a one. "What are you going to do if you haven't anything to do with?" we hear you ask. There is always something to do with; something hoarded up or tucked away; something that you are saving for the time when you shall need it, that better be used now if somebody else needs it. There are always kind words that can be said or written, and smiles and pleasant looks. We told you once about the dear old lady who said she could not help much at the church festival, but "she put on her best cap and smiled." If we have not got anything else to give, we can put on a clean apron and smile. If we keep our heads and hearts busy with plans like these, we shall not know whether it is November or May. Try it, and let me know if the recipe does not succeed.

HOW THE WOMEN WORKED.

The Independent Women Voters of Boston are organized for thorough work. At their head is Mrs. Eliza Trask Hill, a W. C. T. U. woman, superintendent of prison and jail work for Middlesex county. She comes of good stock, being the daughter of Rev. George Trask, the anti-tobacco apostle before anti-tobaccoism was as popular as it is to-day. He was also an ardent advocate of total abstinence, and his daughter inherits much of his fire. She is one of the women who can have "many irons in the fire" without their proving to be too many. Just now, besides all the W. C. T. U. work she is doing, she devotes much time to this organization of the Independent Women Voters, being president of the ward and city committee, and editor of its organ, The Woman's Voice.

Our readers will enjoy this glimpse of their ways of working given by a Boston Herald reporter, who, as he says, looked into the room where the women voters keep their campaign machine, to "see the wheels go round." This is what he saw:

Mrs. Hill led him to a little cupboard, or closet, which showed, when the door was opened, a division for each ward in the city. Each section contained several books, one for each precinct of that ward. Each book bore the number of its precinct, and the name of the woman whose duty it is to canvass that precinct. In the books are the names and addresses of all the women entitled to vote in the city, the names being arranged under several heads, such as, "Old voters," "new voters," "interested," "not interested," "assessed," "registered," "not naturalized," "husbands object," etc.

The totals from these books show at a glance the situation in every part of the city. At least the ladies think they do. "This," said Mrs. Hill, "is only a part of the most perfectly systematized political organization in the country. Just now most of our women workers are doing lots of missionary work."

"Distributing tracts?"

"Well, yes; that is part of the work, though the most of that is yet to be done. But the women go from house to house, urging all unregistered women to register at once, explaining their duties to all who are uninformed, and pledging as many as possible to vote for the candidates of the party. There are now 400 women engaged in this work in the city, and we have such good methods of communication, that in one hour I can have every woman in this room. I know this, for one morning in September something happened that made it necessary to call the women in suddenly. I sent a call at 8 o'clock. Before 9 o'clock every woman was here."

When asked if they were going into the mayoralty fight, she answered:

"Not at all. We are going to let the men entirely alone and keep quiet.

"We not only have the names of all women voters in the city, but have also the names of the male voters, every one of them, with their addresses, and volunteers are now at work addressing upward of 100,000 envelopes, to contain our circular, list of candidates and other campaign matter. By Saturday night next preceding the election, one of these envelopes will be in the hands of every voter in the city.

"Public meetings? Yes, plenty of them. Our grand central rally will be held in Tremont Temple, with good speakers, a band and a chorus. There will also be ten ratification meetings, one in each division of the city."

"Couldn't you succeed in agreeing on school board candidates with the Republicans?" Mrs. Hill was asked.

"We tried hard enough," she said, "but it was impossible. The Republicans treated us very shabbily. They broke faith with us, and showed themselves cowards. As you know, there are eight candidates for the school board. The first six of these names the Republicans proposed, and we agreed to them. Then they brought forward the names of Dorcey and Churchill. We said: 'No, we don't want them. We want Tufts and Dunn.' Charlestown already has its representatives on the board, and Roxbury has none. This is not just. The Republicans brought forward the names of these two Catholics, with the plea that they had to do it to carry the mayoralty vote. They have gone even farther than that. Yesterday, one of the very prominent leaders of the Republican party came in here and said: 'We put forward those two men as a sop. When it comes to voting, we shall vote for your men.' Several others have said the same thing to me. It is a cowardly piece of work.

"People ask us if we take the stand that there shall be no Catholic on the school board. We say most emphatically—no; we take no such stand. With the Catholic religion we don't meddle or interfere. It is only when the Catholics are, as we believe, opposed to our public schools that we interfere."

"Are the women to be on hand on election day?"

"Yes, two in each precinct—416 women throughout the city. One of these women will check the names of voters, and the other will hold herself in readiness to go with the carriage at her disposal, to bring to the polls any woman too old, too feeble, or too sick to walk. We have all the carriages we want for that purpose.

"Money? Plenty of it. Our fair last March netted us over $3,000, and there have been a good many private contributions. Oh! there's money enough. We don't have any professional politicians and heelers to support."

"How large a vote do you expect to cast?"

"Enough to easily elect our candidates. We shall poll about 11,000, and that represents the balance of power. We are not in this campaign to be defeated."

Then the newspaper man thanked Mrs. Hill, and, being a man, went away wondering how long it will be before the old question, "What shall we do with our daughters?" is changed to "What are our daughters going to do with us?"

A TRIBUTE FROM THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION.

The appreciation of Atlanta for our organization is thus gracefully voiced by its leading newspaper:

"The Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Do you know what they are doing?

"Doubtless you have glanced at the accounts of their meetings. Perhaps you have read a little of the story of their work and—wondered.

"Quiet, unostentatious, claiming no glory for themselves; asserting nothing in a bravado spirit for the holy cause that they advocate,

"But theirs is a sacred theme. In the highways and byways they are forever going about doing good. Nothing of that fanaticism which makes men rebellious; none of that pugnacity which give their enemies cause to complain. They but advocate that which every intelligent man and woman must sanction; the strengthening of the bulwarks that are raised by their patient hands, for the defense of mankind in its weakness; the advocacy of all the nobler principles that elevate the human race.

"They are not entering the arena of public discussion for the sole object of securing frivolous and empty triumphs, they seek not, neither do they covet the vainglorious applause of a giddy multitude. They come not arrayed in the gaudy paraphernalia of some selfish band of loud-mouthed theorists, supported by waving banners and the crash of the drum and the blast of the bugle, to herald forth their doctrines in such a way as to give the idler and the vagabond an opportunity to while away an hour of listless observation.

"Humbly, prayerfully, unassumingly, they carry on the work to which their pure, true lives are devoted. Trusting in the divine assurance of the meek and lowly Nazarene, they take neither scrip nor staff for the journey, but do with all their might what their tender hands find to do."

THE ANTI-NUISANCE LEAGUE.

The following was referred by the National Executive Committee to the General Officers, and by them signed and forwarded to the Anti-Nuisance League in New York.

The recent decision handed down by Judge Field, of the United States Supreme Court, in the California case, seems to emphasize the subject matter of the resolution.

WHEREAS, The license of any evil or crime injurious to society is an outrageous perversion of law and justice, and

WHEREAS, Any license to any crime, such as polygamy, burglary, stealing, distributing infected rags, or poisoned food, comes under his catalogue, and

WHEREAS, The sale of alcoholic poisons are among the most injurious and terrible evils in the annals of crime, and

WHEREAS, The highest tribunals of the country, including the Supreme Court of the United States, have in their dictum declared the manufacture and sale and importation of alcoholic liquors to be the prolific source and cause of crime and misery in the community, therefore,

Resolved, That we, the members of the W. C. T. U. Convention, do most heartily endorse and promise to co-operate with the Anti-Nuisance League, of New York, in bringing before and testing in the courts, with the expectation of finally bringing before the Supreme Court of the United States, the fallacy and unconstitutionality of a license to the terrible evil, the dangerous, insidious curse and monster crime of the liquor traffic.

UNTIL recently the farmer, as such, has been an unfelt force in American politics. His hand is now close upon the rein of power. We shall be willing to see him put bit and bridle upon government, to lead it whithersoever he will, if in his fight against monopoly, he break the hold of the distillers and brewers, who so long have had it by mane and nose. We regret the statement made by a prominent member of the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association: "The Prohibitionists had no aid from the Alliance during either the canvass or election in Nebraska." Farmers cannot afford to be cowardly before their chief foe, the saloon. If called to the kingdom at this time for the special purpose of breaking monopoly, let them remember that the greatest and worst of monopolies is the allied liquor interests. The financial policy demands that silver coin be placed upon equal footing with gold; that government currency be issued directly to the people; that there be equalization of taxes, and graduated taxation of incomes. Prohibition of alien ownership of land, ownership of transportation lines by the government, and election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, received indorsement. A call, originating with the Kansas delegation, and signed very largely by all the delegates, provides for a conference "in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, on Monday, February 23, 1891, at 2 o'clock p.m., for the purpose of forming a national union party based upon the fundamental ideas of finance, transportation, labor and land in the furtherance of the work already begun by those organizations and preparatory to a united struggle for country and home in the great political conflict now pending that must decide who in this country is the sovereign—'the citizen or the dollar.'" The W. C. T. U. is in hearty accord with the Alliance policy of eradicating sectionalism. At the close of one of the evening sessions of the National Alliance, an Indiana veteran moved that the old union soldiers in the delegations, who approved of the sentiments of Mr. Foulk, of South Dakota, to the effect that "the war is over," rise and be counted. Nearly fifty arose. Then a Wisconsin veteran called upon the ex-soldiers for three cheers for the confederate braves. These were given with a will, whereupon the confederates in turn cheered the union soldiers lustily, and perhaps for the first time the "rebel yell" rang without discord in patriotic ears. The estrangement growing out of the war is accounted disastrous as war itself, because it is the spirit of strife. It is natural that the class whose common interests cover the largest area, should be first to come together. One speaker, heartily applauded, said: "In the holy war which we have declared against sectionalism, the firesides of the farmers of the north, east, south and west are the citadels around which the heaviest battles are being fought."

A PATHETIC offering comes to the Temple; five dollars from the widow of Rev. Archibald Kenyon, of Hoopeston, Ill. She said: "It is the last money my husband earned; he sent two songs to Robert Lowrey which were accepted and five dollars sent in payment. When the money arrived he had joined the heavenly choir." Some suggested that the money go to missions; she said, "Temperance work is the best missionary work; my husband was a strong Prohibitionist and no work was nearer his heart than temperance work. His last service was to sustain the Sunday afternoon temperance meetings in Hunnewell Park." All his life long he had been known as a temperance worker, and no more fitting place for his last earnings than in this memorial Temperance Temple.

Our Book Table.

FAR AND NEAR, Volume 1, Number 1, is received. It is published under the direction of the Association of Working Girls, New York, of which Clara Sidney Potter is president, and Grace H. Dodge, vice-president. Marie Bowen Chapin, New York, is editor. It thus announces its purpose:

"If we could have called it NEAR AND FAR, the title of this paper, which is to represent the Working Girls' Societies of America, would have been equally appropriate as expressing the feeling we have about our clubs. They begin with nearness. A few girls who are already near each other in location wish to gain opportunities to grow nearer in sympathy, in mutual comprehension, and in aim, and the first club is formed. From this the suggestion passes to other girls, who in their turn unite in a society, and the idea constantly spreads from the near to the far. After all, however, our name as it stands is more satisfactory, for the principal office of this paper is to bring those who are far apart near to one another. We are glad to have the circle of clubs widen indefinitely, but we hope that the twelve yearly issues of FAR AND NEAR will, like the spokes of a wheel, unite all its parts to a common center.

"'That one should die ignorant who has capacity for knowledge, this I call tragedy.' Carlyle wrote these words in the forties, long before the birth of the club-idea, whose development averts this tragedy of ignorance.

"Ignorance may be of the hand, the head, the heart. The woman wage-earner spends her day in bread-winning, and the night finds her weary. Outside of the meager necessity of daily routine, she has taken little thought of training hand, head, or heart. 'Opportunity' might be written in letters of gold on the walls of every working girls' club. Opportunity for what? To grow—to develop hand, head, and heart. By coöperation with others she gets what she could never procure alone."

Since "Rab and His Friends" won the hearts of the English speaking world, there has been no more touching tribute to faithful dog nature than GYPPY, AN OBITUARY, by Helen Ekin Starrett. Frances Power Cobbe writes the introduction, and thus characterizes the book: "The special value to me of Mrs. Starrett's account of 'Gyppy' is that she unconsciously betrays the way in which people who have had no experience with dogs and cats, too commonly regard them—as mere domestic machines, animated mouse and rat traps, which only require to be fed instead of to be baited nightly, and which, when so fed and housed, claim nothing more of their owners. . . . But dogs, like men, 'do not live by bread alone;' they want freedom, sympathy, guidance, affection. Till he receives these from his master, a dog is restless, unsatisfied, undeveloped in the higher faculties of his nature. He would prefer to be a little plagued rather than at all neglected. 'Let me be of the party,' is his entreaty on all occasions when his friends go out or come in. 'Give me a little affection,' he pleads in every gesture, 'and then I will bear everything from you and for you.' This story should do for the dog what 'Black Beauty' is doing for the horse. Mrs. Starrett knows how to make us acquainted with Gyp in such a way that we cannot help loving him from the moment he is introduced, a pert, saucy-looking fellow, whose ugliness was commented upon, and who was scolded and abused roundly for any little misdemeanor, till when, 'in some wonderful way he seemed to realize that a strange and awful change was impending,' and drew close to his mistress' side, stretched his little trembling paws out to her, in almost human entreaty, and was dead."

The sweet story has a beautiful setting; it is printed on cream laid paper, bound in white leatherette, printed in black and gold, and illustrated by the artistic pencil of Miss Searle. We take great interest in this book not only because of its author, but because it is the first book venture of a firm of young lady publishers, Searle & Gordon, 185 Dearborn street. It can be procured of them, or at the leading bookstores. Price 50 cents.

The first Calendar of the season comes from A. C. McClurg's, Chicago, a dainty booklet where each month has for its emblem a quaint picture in which cunning children and dilapidated umbrellas play the most conspicuous part, with birds and flowers thrown in for variety. The only month that has no umbrella is November, probably because it has more rain than any other month. Pauline Sunter is the author of these cute designs. Price 50 cts.

ENGLISH BIBLE STUDIES; First Year's Course. By Rev. J. C. Murray. Cranston & Stowe, Cincinnati.

This book gives sixty studies in the life of Christ, real studies, which must be pursued, Bible in hand. 1st. The lesson analysis, brief, but comprehensive. 2d. Comparative readings. 3d. Notes and suggestions. 4th. Important lessons, maps and enough of geography are given to make the text clear, not enough to obscure it. Six lessons are devoted to reviews, and a dozen pages of Bible Dictionary complete the furnishing of this useful hand-book. Price 50 cents.

The Milton-Weston Co., Chicago, has published for the Columbian Exposition, a timely book, WORLD'S FAIRS FROM LONDON, 1851, TO CHICAGO, 1893, by C. B. Norton. It gives a sketch of each World's Fair, short, of the earlier ones, and lengthening as they come nearer the present time, giving most prominence to the Paris Exposition, 1889. Then comes the history of the Columbian Exposition up to date, including the act of Congress creating the Commission, names of its members, alphabetically arranged, and also classified in their committees, the lady managers, the local directory, and many other facts of interest, here put in convenient form for reference. The volume is very fully illustrated with views of the buildings of the various Expositions, portraits of prominent officials, pictures of the Chicago dual site, and of many prominent buildings in this city; all printed by the Maas Arttype process.

The Watch-Tower.

The key-note of this hour is nationalism as opposed to sectionalism. When the yeomanry of Kansas and Georgia fraternize in politics, the bloody chasm is not only bridged but buried.—Frances E. Willard.

The National W. C. T. U. Executive Committee voted to request the W. C. T. U. of Coldwater, Mich., to place flowers on the grave of Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, on each Decoration Day, at the expense of the National, in token of the loving remembrance in which it holds his gracious and brotherly memory.

Miss Gurney, of London, is the founder of the Christian Policemen's Association. She will probably come to America within a year or two to try to do something in the way of establishing work among our policemen. Mrs. Andrew writes: "I would that she might have a welcome in the hearts of the white-ribboners. She is so true, so real, so earnest and thorough. Indeed, so are nearly all these English women who start out to do anything for God. I cannot tell you how much I love their spirit. When I think of the need for work among our policemen, of the toils of corruption in politics in which they are entangled, I feel that something must be done for them."

A wonderful thing is a seed,
The one thing deathless forever,
The one thing changeless—utterly true,
Forever old and forever new,
And fickle and faithless never.
Plant blessings and blessings will bloom;
Plant hate and hate will grow:
You can sow to-day—to-morrow shall bring
The bloom that shows what sort of a thing
Is the seed, the seed that you sow.

Mrs. Buell writes: At a General Officers' meeting held Saturday, November 29, the following resolution was passed: "That the plan presented to us by Mrs. J. E. Ray, of Asheville, N. C., commends itself to our judgment as practicable, and we hereby appoint her as a standing committee on missionary work, both home and foreign, among colored people."

A missionary lady in Mexico writes: "I have just received October 29 UNION SIGNAL, and see about the bonds; I have found a way to save a little this year, and this is just the thing for my few dimes. . . . I send my SIGNAL to two or three American ladies here regularly, and recently I have sent some numbers to the penitentiary where are two Americans in for twenty years. . . . God speed the day when prohibition shall win! We see the great need of it here more clearly every year. It seems as if evil would run riot there if the saloons are to have free course. But perhaps this is to be the year when all good people are to have their eyes opened and be ready in earnest for prohibition. God grant it."

Miss Frances E. Griffin, of Montgomery, Ala., one of the twelve National organizers of the W. C. T. U., spoke in the Congregational Church, of Evanston, Ill., Rev. Dr. Whittlesey, pastor, on the evening of November 30th. Having been a teacher in first-class schools for nearly thirty years, Miss Griffin has an assorted mind, and an admirable vocabulary. Added to these, she has native wit, life-long wisdom, and a deep and loving purpose toward humanity of good, and loyalty to Christ. She is a success on the platform. Her voice is clear and powerful; her action, perfectly self-possessed. She is a typical Southern woman of the best sort, and her broad, genial spirit of fraternity is no small factor in the good work she is doing both North and South.

A good brother suggests a new line of work for the W. C. T. U. It is the adoption of friendless children into homes rather than the huddling of them together in institutions where their own crude estate forms a moral atmosphere that keeps them crude, whereas each one of them needs a surrounding atmosphere of higher and more developed beings. Why not have a National superintendent of this work, with state and local superintendents? Experts say there are many more families willing to adopt the little ones than there are children to be adopted. He considers it an infinitely better way in which to dispose of friendless children than to put them into institutions. They are far more likely to become good citizens, because their heart-needs are met in the home as they cannot be in the orphanage or county house. Vastly more is expended on their civilization, education and general development, and it would be well if all other methods of dealing with waifs, orphans and deserted children were done away with and this one substituted. ON DUTY.

News from the Field.

EXPLANATORY.

The department of News from the Field is one which has grown with the growth of the W. C. T. U. It was introduced in the first issue of THE SIGNAL, January, 1880, and retained when THE SIGNAL grew into THE UNION SIGNAL, in January, 1883.

It began with one page, in coarse, leaded type, soon increased to two pages, then to three, and in March, 1883, the material had become so abundant that a smaller, solid type was employed, giving space for at least a third more matter.

It being necessary to confine this department to three pages, and the number of reports being in excess of the space, it was determined, about two years ago, to inaugurate a new feature—reports from states by some one appointed for that special work. Another imperative reason for the change was to secure more condensed and attractive reports, and provide for a more equable representation of the states. Accordingly this plan was presented to the National Executive in 1888, and unanimously indorsed by the state presidents, a majority of whom succeeded in securing the appointment of a UNION SIGNAL Reporter. It was hoped that ere this all the News from the Field matter might be arranged in state reports, thus giving the paper much more of a National character, and facilitating the work of the editor of this department. There are still eighteen states that, according to our latest information, have not selected state reporters; all such are most earnestly invited to do so, and in order that there may be no mistake, we publish below a list of those states having no regular reporter, also those having reporters. If there is an error in the list, it will be most cheerfully corrected.

Every local, county and district union in the states which have regularly appointed reporters is requested to make a note of the name and address of the reporter, and send to her instead of to THE UNION SIGNAL, brief, fresh reports of meetings, workers, and items of temperance interest in its immediate locality. The state reporter will prepare a general report each month, or as often as she may have material sufficient, and send promptly for publication. All local reports sent to THE UNION SIGNAL will be forwarded at once to the chosen state reporter, to be embodied in her regular letter. The letters of the state correspondents will have preference (in time of publication) to the local reports of those states having no regular correspondent. Will not all state W. C. T. U. papers give space to this "Explanatory" article, and thus acquaint the local workers with the necessary rules which must govern the News from the Field? A united effort in this direction all along the line cannot but result in added force and usefulness to this department of THE UNION SIGNAL.

KANSAS.

NOTES FROM THE STATE CONVENTION.

The annual meeting of the Kansas W. C. T. U. was held at Sabetha, September 24, 25, 26 and 27. The "rainy season" was upon us, and the weather the first three days was unpropitious, but what is a little rain to the energetic and determined women of the W. C. T. U. in any state? Are we not then "in our element," so to speak, as water is our watchword?

The ladies of Sabetha, assisted by the Y's and a committee of the Sons of Veterans, had made all needed preparation for the comfort and entertainment of the convention. The sessions were held in the G. A. R. hall, which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion. The usual business routine was carefully gone over. Reports received showed good work done the past year, but, sad to relate, there was about the usual lack of faithfulness in reporting the "littles" done by so many of the local unions.

Twenty-eight unions had become auxiliary to the state since last convention, eight others had paid partial dues, while still others had been organized lately, and will become auxiliary the coming year. Four counties have been organized, also. The treasurer reported $3,784 raised by local unions the past six months, exclusive of dues. More money had been received from dues than the preceding year, but as there was still a deficiency in salaries of general officers, and in order to make a better record in the future, the Executive Board recommended that a reduction of twenty per cent be made on all salaries the coming year, which was adopted by the convention, and now it is to be hoped that a strong effort will be made to raise the full amount allowed each one. Several pledges were made toward reducing the debt already incurred.

Our state paper, Our Messenger, came through the year with flying colors, and the editor reported that instead of a balance on the debit side of her account, there was a balance on hand of $1.22, and this, too, when the paper had been considerably enlarged the present year. The subscription list had been increased 223 names.

Three new departments were taken up, namely, flower mission, work among railroad employés and the relation of temperance to capital and labor. Legislative and franchise departments were consolidated, and the kindergarten work was discontinued.

It was voted that persons who are not able to pay dues, but who still desire to work in local unions, may be considered as "pledged members," but without the privilege of a vote, and also, that, inasmuch as the amount necessary to erect "headquarters" at the Ottawa Chautauqua had not been subscribed, it was thought best to abandon the project, and, with the consent of those who had subscribed to the fund, to apply it toward the purchase of a large tent for that purpose, which could readily and with but little expense be removed from place to place and be made to do duty at each of the state assemblies, the state fair, schools of methods, camp-meetings or conventions, at any point in the state. This is certainly a wise move, for wherever duty calls, we can "arise, take up our tent, and walk." A long list of "good resolutions" was passed.

The evening sessions were, as usual, crowded full of good things. The address of greeting by Mrs. Wickens, of Sabetha, and response by Miss Dora Cady, of Topeka, together with short addresses from state workers, occupied the first evening. Mrs. Clara Hoffman, president Missouri W. C. T. U., gave an able address the second evening, and the third was devoted to a temperance "Love Feast" which was thoroughly enjoyed by all present.

The old corps of officers was reëlected, and, as in the past so in the future, we may expect faithful service from each. The ladies of Sabetha united in serving lunch to the entire convention at noon each day, and they received as they deserved, unsparing praise and grateful thanks from all who participated.

A PLUCKY UNION.

In consequence of the letter received (and already noticed in THE UNION SIGNAL) threatening the lives of the leaders of the W. C. T. U. in Kansas, and declaring that any church or other public building in which we were allowed to hold our meetings should be blown up by dynamite, as 500 brave (?) men had banded together to forever put a stop to our work and our influence, the Lawrence union therefore passed the following ringing resolution, showing the "mettle" of those to be "annihilated": "In view of these facts we resolve to work assiduously, until there is not one stone left under any brewery, distillery, saloon, package house or joint in the United States, and when this is accomplished we purpose to look beyond the seas for new fields of conquest."

The Douglas union sends a good report; several lectures under their auspices; a large Loyal Temperance Legion and a juvenile club; also a Y newly organized.

The fourth district convened in Topeka, September 10, 11 and 12. President, Mrs. J. C. Haines, of Augusta. Twenty-eight unions reported. Two Y's organized the past year, seven Loyal Temperance Legions with about five hundred members; $300 had been raised exclusive of dues; twenty-four departments reported.

The W. C. T. U. of Coffey county by timely appeal secured a modification of plans and enlargement in designs of the new county jail, in the interest of morality and decency. The contract had been let when their appeal reached the proper authorities, but the modifications were at once made. Lyon county reports prisoners converted. The "original package" liquor dealers brought work for the W. C. T. U. in the district and aroused the old fire against the traffic.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

NOTES OF THE STATE CONVENTION.

The eighth annual convention of the South Carolina W. C. T. U. opened its session at Newberry in the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, November 5. An executive meeting had been held the day before, and important matters discussed. There had also been a children's mass-meeting in the afternoon, and an address of welcome by a bright little representative of Mrs. Mower's Band of Hope, to which Mrs. Chapin responded.

We were all on the qui vive looking for our beloved Mrs. Zerelda Wallace, who had promised to come from her suffrage campaign in Missouri to embolden the hearts of the women who follow her lead in conservative South Carolina. A telegram to Mrs. Chapin, while we were in church, gave "to the winds our fears" that she might not be with us, and strong in faith we went that night to a church in the outskirts of the town, where the factory people and children had assembled to hear us.

While we were singing the first hymn, the "Mother of Ben Hur," as we call her in the Palmetto state, came to the front. How our hearts rejoiced at the first glimpse of that serene and steadfast face. Mother Wallace was so kind as to supplement my talk to the children, she having been introduced by Mrs. Chapin.

The feature of the first day's meeting was the presentation by Mrs. Jessie McCown, of Charleston, of a plan for the establishment in that city of a "W. C. T. U. Home," where temporary aid can be given to young men and women in need. Mrs. McCown has demonstrated what can be done in that way by one unaided woman and we hope and believe her appeal will be responded to, not only in the W. C. T. U., but by liberal souls everywhere. She it was, who for seven weeks nursed Henry D. Howren, the young temperance evangelist, so feelingly spoken of by Miss Missouri Stokes, in THE UNION SIGNAL. Many young men go to the city on pleasure trips and while there, turned out of the safe path by one social glass, become the prey of the saloon offering the "free lunch." For such, will be provided a temporary abiding place, where coffee will take the place of whisky, and motherly counsel and countenance be given instead of those wiles and snares that lead to destruction.

A beautiful and touching paper was read from the first state corresponding secretary, Mrs. Harley Rutledge Walter, now a resident of Alabama, and an invalid for probably the remainder of her life. Resolutions expressive of gratitude for her important services in the past and sympathy in her present affliction, were put on record.

Mrs. Sarah Amelia Gause, at one time president of the Philadelphia W. C. T. U., now a resident of Aiken, sent a valuable paper on "Heredity," which was read by Mrs. Young. An excellent new worker from Gaffney City was Mrs. W. H. Smith. She is a woman of force and spirit, and will undoubtedly help to advance the cause in our state.

The election of officers resulted in the reëlection of Mrs. L. F. Chapin, president; Mrs. Viola Neblett being no longer a resident of the state, her place was filled by Mrs. Virginia D. Young; Miss Nettie Farrow was continued as recording secretary, and Mrs. Mower of Newberry, a woman of marked executive ability, was elected treasurer in place of Mrs. W. K. Blake, resigned. She was honored with the office of vice-president, which will be a partial rest from active work.

What will make this convention memorable is the coming into the state, in pursuance of the work of her department of franchise, of Mrs. Zerelda Wallace. She spoke the first night in the Opera House to a good audience, which was auspicious in the first place. Not only was she listened to with profound attention, but was enthusiastically applauded. Applause had been given to the Mayor's address of welcome, to Mrs. Chapin when she presented the beautiful new state banner, to Mrs. Young when she received it, but in no case was the applause so strong and so repeatedly renewed as that which followed Mrs. Wallace's masterly demonstration of woman's sacred duty to take part in the government by the ballot!

On Thursday night the Presbyterian Church was full of people, evidently eager to hear Mrs. Wallace's last words. That majestic lady went into the pulpit as if hers by right, and no one gainsaid her. Her serene face bears the unmistakable stamp of that divine love, which has compassion for all mankind.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

CONVENTION NOTES.

The eighth annual convention of the Southern California W. C. T. U., beginning October 8, and continuing through the 10th, was held at Pasadena, not only the city of beautiful homes and cultured people, but a city that has made an enviable record for its staunch prohibition principles in municipal affairs. We were all glad to convene there; we had been there before at the county convention, and we knew how smoothly the wheels went round, the clear brains, loving hearts and deft fingers of the women combining to make beautiful and orderly arrangements.

Our convention numbered one hundred and fifteen delegates, not so large as the one a year ago, but enthusiastic and harmonious all the way through. Looking into the earnest faces of the brave women brought together by one common purpose, my heart was exultant and could but repeat, "Thou shalt drive out the Canaanites though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong."

The first hour of devotional exercises, led by our state superintendent of evangelistic work, Mrs. Annie T. Armour, took us to the Mount of Transfiguration. By faith we saw our Lord with His face "bright as the sun and his raiment white as the light" and our spirits were enraptured by the beatific vision revealed.

At the beginning of the session, the door of welcome was opened wide to us by Mrs. Sarah J. Allen, president of the Pasadena union, who, standing upon the threshold, greeted us with cordial words. Miss Hathaway, president of the Los Angeles union, introduced her most fitting response to our royal reception, in these words: "It is a privilege to be a voice to-day responding for this honorable convention of women to the graceful welcome of Pasadena W. C. T. U. We have come to you, dear sister workers, not angels straight from Heaven's atmosphere, but women from our earthly environment of care and sorrow and sin. We have come to you not to spend a few idle days in serenely sipping this nectar of the gods that distils about us in your perfume-ladened air, nor in culling with dainty fingers the choicest beauties from Pasadena's gardens. No, we have come from busy lives to sit in sober, earnest council together, upon the myriad hideous evils that flourish under the deadly upas shade of the liquor traffic, and to probe to its inmost corruption the ulcer that eats at the vitals of our most Christian nation."

In our president's address the work of the year was fully reviewed, and every reason for encouragement emphasized, in spite of apparent defeats. The language that defined our position towards the Third party had no uncertain ring. "Shall not we stand by the party that believes in God, laughs at impossibilities, and cries, It shall be done!"

The corresponding secretary reported eighty-four unions with a membership of 1,575 active and 351 honorary members, being a total of 1,926. Amount of money raised by the unions, $3,955.55; number of lectures and gospel meetings, 348; number of subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL, Oak and Ivy Leaf, and The Young Crusader, 942.

I wish I might introduce to your readers our twenty-seven superintendents of departments, each of whom thinks her department the most important, all of whom have planned comprehensively and labored faithfully to secure good results. Many of their reports were full of a thoughtfulness showing how into the very life of each an intensity of purpose runs to help on the reign of righteousness by putting herself into the work God has called her to do. The influences from these various lines of work are like lustrous threads of gold woven in and out of the woof of human life into patterns of perfect loveliness, such as God approves. Mrs. Ida Russell, superintendent of juvenile work, summed up the grand total of the children's bands in Southern California as follows: Number of juvenile societies, forty-two; number of members, 3,009, and ninety-one honorary members; receipts for the year $622.97; medal contests, eight.

Miss Alice Sudduth, of the flower mission, was sure Miss Casseday would start her wonderful music-box to playing, "Praise God, from Whom all Blessings flow," when she received the report of the flower missionaries' work in Southern California. Twelve hundred bouquets of flowers were distributed through the agency of eight unions, to the inmates of jails and hospitals, as well as to the sick, accompanied by sympathetic words and friendly service. The department of Sabbath Observance with its capable superintendent, Mrs. Crow, at the head, has been pushed vigorously during the past year. In Los Angeles it is in the midst of the din and smoke of battle, saloonkeepers and their allies on one side, those in favor of Sunday closing on the other. Shot and shell in the way of petitions, public meetings, sermons, leaflets, columns in the press, fly thick and fast; the final contest to be decided by the ballots of the citizens.

The report of the franchise department, by its able superintendent, Miss Harriman, showed a great deal of practical work done in the way of making sentiment preparatory to petition work the coming winter. Last year a prize of five dollars was offered by Mrs. McComas, wife of State Senator McComas, of Pomona, to the local union which should do the best suffrage work. The convention appointed a committee to award the prize, and the Riverside Union won it.

I wish I might dwell on the various departments of work; they show so forcibly that we are moving on, that this point and that point are being captured for Christ's kingdom. It was a fitting close to the reports of the work done to choose for our state flower the California palm with its emblem "victory," and to hear the voices of the women singing the triumphant song, "Palms of victory, palms of glory, we will bear."

One interesting "happening" was a pleasant surprise. Mrs. Hewitt, of Riverside, in behalf of the union there, presented to the convention, to adorn the walls of the headquarters in Temperance Temple, a large crayon picture of Mrs. Button, our state president. Mrs. Higgins, of Santa Barbara, made a very bright little speech of acceptance for the convention, introducing it with a very apt reference to the old game of our young days, "Button, button, who's got the button?"

The first evening meeting was held in the beautiful Presbyterian Church. There was a fine musical program, followed by an able and plain-spoken address by Miss Victor, formerly editor of The Tap Root, a radical prohibition paper, published in Philadelphia. She uttered the truth, as she is convinced of it, without any sugar-coating. She hit right and left with good strong blows, and gave the men, especially, a good shaking up. On the second evening there were brief and pointed addresses from the pastors of the various churches of Pasadena, and from one layman, Mr. Glass, a deacon in the Presbyterian Church and Prohibition candidate for the state Legislature. He talked about as pointedly as the sister the evening before, and said he was in politics because the saloon men everywhere were in it, and he was going to stay in until they were driven out. Let us have a few more such deacons.

In this eighth council of the white-ribboned women of Southern California, although reports showed many discouragements and some defeats, there were unmistakable indications that our march for the year has been onward. We have not been sitting idly in camp these twelve months, coming out occasionally on dress parade. We have had our armor girded on, and borne on high our standards most of the time; there have been many skirmishes and some few pitched battles; and from the reports of these our women gained fresh enthusiasm for the duties of the coming year and a keener realization of the infinite power of our great Leader.

INDIANA.

STATE JOTTINGS—NEW INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Miss Palmer, state organizer, has been constantly on the wing since our state convention. Eight new unions are reported.

Miss Ida Clothier delivered the address at the Parke County Harvest Home, held at Rockville, November 1.

The State Central Committee met at headquarters, Monday, October 27, and held a very profitable meeting under the direction of our new president, Mrs. Haggart.

The Organizer Board of Directors also met on the above date. Officers for the ensuing year are as follows: President, Mrs. C. E. Edgerton; secretary, Miss S. B. Whistler; treasurer, Mrs. K. Loftin. Miss Reed was elected as editor, and Miss Hay as business manager. From the present outlook the Organizer will soon appear as a sixteen page weekly.

Contributions for the Mother Wallace and Mary F. Thomas tablets in the Temperance Temple are coming in rapidly.

Mrs. Nichols attended the laying of the corner-stone of the Temperance Temple, in Chicago, and her letter to the Organizer is full of the inspiration of the scene.

The 28th of October was a red-letter day for the Indiana W. C. T. U. This was the day set apart for the visit to "our farm," at Hadley, and to receive the gift legally, at the hands of the generous donors, Addison and Martha J. Hadley. The whole country round about came out to receive the W. C. T. U. representatives. Appropriate exercises were conducted to the interest of all concerned. The deed was presented by Mr. and Mrs. Hadley to the state officers, and accepted with rejoicing and prayer. Mrs. Haggart presented the need of industrial training for girls. J. G. Kingsbury, of The Indiana Farmer, set forth clearly the agricultural pursuits in which women can engage with profit. Prof. McWhirter, of Greencastle, made a rousing speech upon the work of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Nichols spoke of the origin of the enterprise which had brought the assembled company together. Colonel Ritter, the legal counsel of all parties concerned, was then introduced to make the closing address. Among the pleasant things of the day were the bountiful dinner provided for the guests by the country people and the pleasant drive over the farm so generously given us. Upon the beautiful site chosen, within a few months suitable buildings will arise, and our Industrial School for Girls will be a blessed reality.

Mrs. Haggart, in her letter of greeting to her co-laborers, says, in closing:

"Dear sisters, lives compassed and hallowed by inspirations for the good of humanity, cannot always be restrained by that tame conservatism which is a twin to indifference. We should emulate the dauntless courage of that high-spirited mother in Israel who spurred Barak on to Mt. Tabor with his ten thousand men, and sung her matchless song of triumph over the salvation of her nation. We have joined our fortunes for the redemption of our homes and native land. I am one of you, and will travel all the stony road with you. The meaning of my office to me is to go before you, making the way easier. We have adversaries in league with the darkest fact of civilization who do not treat us with that courtesy which the 'good time coming' will gratefully accord us. I cheerfully and prayerfully cast my lot in with yours, and, with hearts and hands united, we may many times construct victory out of seeming disaster. In looking over the field, I anticipate, with your hearty coöperation, such growth, prosperity and power for our state union, that all along the line will be sounded that joyful message, 'The Lord giveth the word! And the women who publish the tidings are a great host.'"

Rev. E. P. Whallon, of Indianapolis, in an editorial entitled, "The Synagogues of Satan," written for the Herald and Presbyter of November 5, says of our own fair capital: "Indianapolis has within its corporate limits 110,000 inhabitants and about one hundred churches. There are 360 licensed saloons, seventy-five wine-rooms, fifty beer-gardens and three barrel-houses, besides the drug-stores and family groceries where liquors are purchased. There are eighteen gambling rooms running, known of by good men and the police. There are 111 houses of ill-repute with 375 inmates who are registered at the police stations, besides 400 other known shameless women. There are fifty-four houses of assignation known to the police. There are 20,000 young men in Indianapolis between the ages of sixteen and forty; 2,500 are members of Protestant evangelical churches, and that 15,000 never go to church."

In the town of Brazil, a place of 7,000 inhabitants and twenty-eight saloons, 347 men and boys were in the saloon on Saturday night from ten to eleven o'clock, and that in all the Protestant church services next morning there were just seventy. Terre Haute has 151 licensed saloons; there were found in seven of them on Saturday evening from six to seven o'clock 1,045 men, while in all the churches at service the next morning there were found just 175.

Mr. Whallon's figures are startling yet correct, and what grieves us of the white-ribbon host most is the fact that our state, for $250 license, permits this work to go on, and Christian men and women stand by with arms folded and sanction this iniquity, or, at least, they enter no protest. How long, O Lord! SADIE B. WHISTLER.

MONTANA.

A NEW UNION'S RECORD.

Last May Colonel Woodford organized a union in Helena (East Side), of thirty members, without weakening in the least the old union (now called "Central Union"). We named ours "Frances Willard" Union; we have headquarters at "Adams Hall" with piano, etc. We observed Crusade Day with excellent results, securing a club of ten subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. We have had four medal contests and sent a contestant from our union to the state convention to contest for the gold medal. Several public mass-meetings have been held, one by Mrs. Bateham, who pronounced herself delightfully entertained by our union. She gave us a grand lecture on Sabbath evening. Another public meeting held by this union was one which we were pleased to call "An evening with our state superintendents." The hall was filled, beautifully decorated, and our children sang "Marching Songs;" three of our state superintendents read excellent papers. It was a splendid meeting. Another time the state president addressed a well-filled house, under the auspices of this infant union. We have opened a reading-room for railroad men, and have given one fine social for them. These are a few of the things done by a union in Montana not six months old, and the Central Union is doing equally well.

Of the vigorous unions in Montana you do not hear as much as you should; they are modest, but in reading letters from other parts, our women can tell of as much done, in a quiet way, as any reporting to you.

COLORADO.

W. C. T. U. ANNUAL GATHERING.

The eleventh annual convention of our state convened at 3 p. m. Tuesday, September 23, 1890, in the First Baptist Church in Pueblo. Mrs. A. D. H. Thompson, the state president, was absent from the convention owing to the recent death of a brother. Mrs. T. M. Wallace, of Boulder, vice-president, presided over the convention until called home by telegraph on account of the serious illness of her husband, after which Mrs. Eva Higgins, president of the southwestern district, presided during the remainder of the convention.

The treasurer, Mrs. Geo. A. Shapleigh, presented a concise account of moneys received, showing an indebtedness that it is hoped may soon be cancelled. Mrs. Jennette Tompkins, auditor, reported books examined and found correct. Mrs. Wallace, from Boulder, presented a report on "Parliamentary Usage." Great interest was evinced in the practical usages of this department.

Mrs. Telford made the motion that an effort be made to place $1,500 in the treasury the coming year. Carried by a rising vote. Mrs. Shapleigh moved that unions give pledges towards the amount. Pledges making the sum total of $320 were given. The children's hour was conducted by Mrs. B. T. Vincent.

Mrs. Leonard gave report on penal and charitable institutions. Grand work has been accomplished in many instances; flower mission day has been observed with special services; visits have been made to the jails and other public institutions of the state; petition sent to the Governor of the state to remove officers in charge of prison at Canon City, and condemning their treatment of inmates. An appeal was presented to distribute through the union that the incoming governor should appoint a warden of penitentiary, a conscientious Christian man. It was recommended that the pastors be asked to preach on jail and prison work, the third Sabbath in October being designated as prison day.

Committee on credentials reported fifty-two members and visitors in attendance upon the convention, fifty being delegates.

All delegates and visitors were invited to an elegant reception in the parlors of Dr. Dora Slemmons in the Allen Block, during the hours from five to eight p. m. This charming variation of the exercises of the convention was prompted by the liberality of the Messa Y's. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded. Evening meeting was conducted by the Y. W. C. T. U. The committee on plan of work suggests, through Mrs. Telford, the printing of membership cards combined with the pledges, for distribution among persons who cannot actively engage in the work. This was indorsed and steps at once taken to order the printing of the same.

In the absence of Mrs. Sabine, superintendent of franchise, Mrs. Tyler, from Denver, stated the workings of the "Suffrage Association" recently founded in that city, urging greater interest in the furtherance of this branch for mutual benefit and improvement.

Report of foreign work was ably presented by Mrs. J. A. Temple, who is never "weary of well-doing," and great good has been accomplished during the year.

The juvenile work was briefly presented by Mrs. Maryate, of Del Norte.

Committee on constitution reported. Mrs. Beach read the first amendment as presented at the last annual session, viz: the sum of two dollars per year be paid into the treasury. Motion to adopt was lost. The second amendment, as presented by Mrs. Hicks, amended to include one delegate to every ten or fraction thereof. Adopted. The third notice as to time of change of constitution was amended to read "notice to be given at the last quarterly meeting of the executive committee."

Election of officers resulted in the choice of Mrs. Eva Higgins, president; Mrs. M. E. Brazee, vice-president; Miss Winifred Spaulding, corresponding secretary; Mrs. E. C. Benton, recording secretary; Mrs. George A. Shapleigh, treasurer.

RESOLUTIONS.

WHEREAS, During the past year our Heavenly Father has permitted the removal from this life of three friends of our beloved president.

Resolved, That we, the Colorado W. C. T. U. tender to her our most heartfelt sympathy in this her hour of affliction, asking the Master to give her the consolation of His presence.

2. WHEREAS, We view with dread the nervousness of a people making haste to be rich, and the growing inclination to seek quiet through anesthetics and narcotics, therefore

Resolved, That we warn against the dangers of opium, morphia, and tobacco so often fostering and being fostered by the alcoholic habit. We further urge that the coming General Assembly of Colorado make it impossible that opium be sold without the prescription of a physician, and that a rigid statute be put upon the books utterly prohibiting the sale of cigars, tobacco or cigarettes to any person under eighteen years of age.

3. Resolved, That as a band of patriots we deplore corruption, fraud and complicity with sin in our own country in which the general government, state, county and municipality have such a full share. We are glad of the protection of the Prohibition party ticket in this state, with its pure and honorable names, and we hereby pledge these brothers both of prayer and earnest endeavor to take our glorious West for God, home and humanity.

4, WHEREAS, "The Mormons are locating in Colorado at different points

Resolved, That we will send the best literature to the women of our state to warn them of the dangers of Mormonism, and that we will do all in our power to arouse public sentiment on this subject."

5. Resolved, That we request the next legislature to enact a law to appoint a matron for the state penitentiary, to take charge of the female prisoners, and that our superintendent of legislative and petition work draw up a petition signed by members of unions and others, who favor such a law, and that it be presented to our next legislative assembly.

6. WHEREAS, The history and experience of our country prove that legislation by one-half of the people for the whole is unjust, and often disastrous to the unrepresented class, and that men who advocate good measures are placed at a greater disadvantage in being deprived of their sisters' votes, we, the members of the Colorado W. C. T. U.,

Resolve, That we unite with the Equal Suffrage Association in petitioning the coming legislature to remove all restriction of sex in citizenship.

THE WORK IN THAYER COUNTY.

Thayer county W. C. T. U. has just held its fourth annual convention at Belvidere. The lovely weather favored us, so the large M. E. Church was literally packed. Mrs. Mattie Bruning welcomed us to the homes and hearts of Belvidere in loving words of encouragement. Colonel Holt responded with many a good hit and lively sally. The president's address had in it the ring of the true worker, and although she gave it as her farewell address, yet against her protestation she was unanimously re-elected.

Rev. Kuhlman, of Wilber, gave an interesting address, Colonel Holt and a gold medal contest were the chief attractions of the second evening—the medal was taken to Davenport by May Brittenham.

Reports from the superintendents of departments showed that the work of the county had been mainly for the amendment, but the sentiment, embodied in the resolutions adopted, was to take up the departments after election and work in them as "we have never worked before," for in these does the W. C. T. U. differ from and excel all other temperance organizations. Officers elected for the ensuing year were: President, Mrs. M. S. Putnam; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mattie Bruning, of Belvidere; recording secretary, Mrs. E. P. Griffin, of Alexan dria; treasurer, Mrs. Town, of Belvidere; vice-president-at-large, Mrs. Traver, of Davenport. A purse of ten dollars was made up for our president to aid her in county work. The local unions have planned going to the polls on election day, furnishing free lunch, and seeing to it that the ballots for each party have on them for the prohibitory and against the license amendment.

MRS. E. P. GRIFFIN.

ELECTION DAY AT ELWOOD.

The ladies of our town met and decided to have a free lunch of sandwiches and coffee on election day at the court-house, where the voting was to be done. Early on Tuesday morning we went to the court-house with our mottoes, and, with the aid of a good temperance man, soon had them on the wall. An arch, with "Free Lunch" on one side and "Vote Right" on the other, was placed at the top of the doorway opening into the lunch room. The motto, "Take the Safe Path, Father, Your Boy is Coming After You," was placed close to the voting-room door. The other mottoes were, "If not Prohibition, Then What?" "If not To-day, Then When?" and "Save Our Homes."

A gentleman pinned a piece of paper on each end of the arch, and on one was printed, "A high licensist believes in putting whisky into a boy through a $1,000 funnel, and then putting the boy into the gutter; the Prohibitionist believes in putting the whisky into the gutter and saving the boy." As a drunkard dies every eight minutes, the church bell was tolled that often during the day.

The voters had to go past the lunch-room to vote, and they were very quiet and orderly all day. Some of the men argued loudly on the street, but would not do so at the court-house. All seemed well pleased with the lunch, and one gentleman said, "I hope you will get pay for your trouble, and I think you will." The table was covered with a white table-cloth, and blooming house-plants were placed on the table and in a window, which made the room look very cheerful. We served lunch from noon until six p. m., and during that time fed 135 men, and the provisions left were distributed among the poor. The Temperance Temple mite-box was not forgotten, and was placed on the table, and when opened was found to contain sixty-six cents. When the votes were counted we found we had carried the day by a majority of twenty. Although we are disappointed at the result throughout the state, yet we feel proud of our own precinct.

MRS. J. W. ELLIOTT.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

SIX Demorest contests have been given by the Salem, Ill., union, and the good results upon the community are already apparent.

ONE good rule that they have in a Utah town—Ephraim—is a curfew bell, which rings at nine o'clock every evening, to give warning to girls under fifteen and boys under seventeen, that they must leave the streets and seek their homes.

MRS. LINDA W. SLAUGHTER, of Bismarck, North Dakota, appeals for help for her neighbors suffering through recent prairie fires. She makes no plea for herself, but quite incidentally says: "Did I tell you I lost all my crops,—the first I had had in three years—my farm buildings, etc., by the prairie fire? Otherwise I could have done all myself. There are five poor families of Swedes, who lost all, and whom I shall have to provide clothing for all winter and help to start next spring. Through our new state department, Charity, we may enlist the public in their behalf, and for all who will suffer if not helped in our new state—and there are hundreds who will need help this winter, as they did last winter. Our state W. C. T. U. has acted wisely in creating this department and seeking to prevent a repetition of last winter. We shall appoint a local superintendent of charity in each county union, who shall look up the needy in each county, and so get the work systematized. We shall appreciate anything you may say in the press that will aid us in this work, which though not temperance work, is the outcome of the Christian spirit that animates our organization and leads to works of charity. This is the first time I have written in our new headquarters. It is a meet christening of the place."

DURING the past year, the union at Eureka Springs, Ark., has become incorporated under the laws of the state. A lot has been purchased in the most desirable part of the town, upon which it is proposed to erect a building for headquarters. A second lot, given the union by Mr. A. J. Freeman, will be sold to provide for the erection of the building. Three medal contests have been given and the good work is progressing in this little town famous for its hot as well as cold springs.

SINCE September 16, 1890, the following sums have been received to apply to the fund now being raised, to obtain a portrait bust of Susan B. Anthony, to be placed in the gallery of eminent women at the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893: Mrs. H. E. Fransburg, Albany, N. Y., $5; Madame Willard, Evanston, Ill., $5; Mrs. Clara M. Greenlee, Butler, Pa., $1; Mrs. Mary J. Coggeshall, Des Moines, Ia., $1; W. C. T. U., Galesburg, Ill., $1; Equal Suffrage Association, Rockford, Ill., $5; Drs. A. W. and Jennie M. Lozier, N. Y., $5; Mrs. Emma C. Bascom, Williamstown, Mass., $1; Friend in Wisconsin, $3; Mrs. Alice J. Clark, Vincennes, Ind., $1; Mrs. Rachel R. Austin, Vermillion, Dak., $1; Mrs. T. M. Seabrook, Keyport, N. J., $1; Woman's Suffrage Association, S. Byron, N. Y., $5.40; Mrs. L. F. Long, Barry, Ill., $1; Miss Mattie Lewis, Galva, Ill., $2.50. Total, $38.90. MARY E. HOLMES.

MRS. L. E. BAILEY, who gave a year's active work in Nebraska, in the interest of the prohibitory amendment, delivered a course of lectures in Iowa on her way East, speaking to large and interested audiences at Riceville, New Hampton, and Fredericksburg. All appear anxious to hear about the facts of the Nebraska defeat, of which she is so well posted, having thoroughly canvassed forty counties during her work there. Mrs. Bailey is now visiting friends at Elkhorn, Wis., and in the meantime is giving a few lectures in Walworth county. Mrs. Bailey will spend next year in New York state.

CHARITIES carried on by the Central W. C. T. U., Chicago, are: Bethesda Day Nursery and Kindergarten, 406 South Clark street; Talcott Day Nursery and Kindergarten, 169 West Adams street; (these nurseries and kindergartens have cared for 15.929 children during the past year;) the Anchorage Mission for Women, 125 Third Avenue; (this home has sheltered during the year, 4,000 girls, 500 having found homes;) Hope Mission and Reading-room (for Scandinavians), 166 North Halsted street; the Bethesda Mission, 406 South Clark street; (gospel temperance meetings are held nightly at these missions; the attendance at the two during the past year has been 37,000;) the Bethesda Inn, 408 South Clark street; (the Inn is a lodging house for men, where beds can be procured at ten cents to fifteen cents a night, free baths and a reading-room are provided for all lodgers; the Inn accommodated 52.540 men during the past year;) the Bethesda Free Medical Dispensary, 406 South Clark street; the Hope Free Medical Dispensary, 166 North Halsted street; (the Bethesda Dispensary has treated 1,651 persons during the year, physicians have made 206 visits; the Hope Dispensary has just started;) the Bethesda Sunday-school, 406 South Clark street; the Hope Sunday-school, 166 North Halsted street; (the attendance for the year at these two Sunday-schools has been 8,000.) W. C. T. U. workers, visiting the city, will find that a study of any one of these charities will repay them richly for the time expended.

THE Dallas county, Iowa, W. C. T. U., in session at Earlham, Iowa, early in November, passed the following terse resolutions:

Resolved, That we endorse the policy of the National Union in granting liberty to each individual and to all the unions to endorse the action of any political party that may take a favorable stand for prohibition, or to endorse no political party.

Resolved, That we do not endorse the action of the Iowa delegation last year in seceding from the National union, nor the decision of the last Iowa union in expelling delegates who remained loyal to the National union, neither do we approve the action of the majority so illegally organized in severing their auxiliaryship from the National union.

MRS. ANNA R. SIMMONS, superintendent of juvenile work for South Dakota, has changed her place of residence from Columbia to Canton.

THE Cattaraugus county, N. Y., Sunday-School Convention, in session at Yorkshire Center, October 21, 22, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we as Sunday-school workers are opposed to the license of the liquor traffic in any form, and never will be satisfied with anything but the entire suppression of the same."

MRS. HELEN L. BULLOCK, national organizer, spoke in Washington, D. C., November 30, and added thirty new members to the local union.

JAMES CLEMENT AMBROSE will spend January in Wisconsin and Minnesota, February in the South, speaking at the Florida Chautauqua, and other points; March in Illinois, and in April go to the Pacific Coast for three months. His home is Evanston, Ill.

MRS. S. M. PERKINS writes as follows: "Our dear brave Mrs. Thompson, to whom we all owe so much for starting the Crusade influence which has extended around the globe, has written me to take back my two words, 'Saint Eliza.' Therefore, to please her I recall them, yet they run on in head and heart the same as ever. These are her words: 'I am not a saint. Far from it. I hope to have grace for every day of trial, and finally find myself among the white-robed company who come up through great tribulation.' I am reminded by this of a scholarly, Christian man, a revered minister and teacher whom I knew in my childhood. In his last illness we all flocked to see him, for he had won all our hearts. His dying request was this: 'Do not let people praise me. Put on my tombstone "A sinner saved by grace."' A score of years later I stood beside his grave and searched for the inscription. There was a beautiful marble shaft erected by his former pupils, and many good, true things inscribed thereon. I feared that his dying request had been neglected. But pulling away the grass close to the ground I found it, 'A sinner saved by grace.' Even so with our revered friend; we will write her words of humility down near the sand, but will treasure her precious example as an inspiration to high and holy endeavor."

Irritating Medicines.

"For diseases, unless they are extremely dangerous, must not be irritated by medicines." This is sound doctrine, if it is old. Now, there is a well-known remedy, neither a drug nor a medicine. It is as easy to take as to breathe, in fact it is inhaled into the lungs. It is the Compound Oxygen Treatment of DRS. STARKEY & PALEN. We have a vast number of testimonials. You can obtain them free of charge, by writing us either a letter or postal card. Don't fail to send for our brochure. It is no medical almanac, with the signs of the zodiac, and old jokes, but a well-written and thoughtful medical work, the result of years of study and experience. There is evidence enough to convince all the juries in the country. Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter St., San Francisco, Cal.

The American people ought to be proud of these four periodicals. It is no exaggeration to say that the steady influence exerted upon the life and thought of the nation from the publishing house in Franklin Square is at least equal to that of one of the great universities. . . . All four of the Harper periodicals are better now than they ever were before. How much that means, everybody knows who has been Harper bred.—N. Y. Sun, Feb. 10, 1890.

Seeing is Believing!

Generally—but it is not always necessary to see in order to believe. This truth has come to us with fresh power of late. Since a call for agents to sell the Aquarelle Tint Picture of Miss Willard appeared in these columns recently, a steady flow of applications for terms and territory has been coming in, although not one of the applicants has seen the picture. This shows that our good friends who study this part of the paper believe all that we have said about it. And this confidence is not misplaced. Proofs of the picture submitted by Prang & Co. at different times the last few months have been freely criticised by those who know Miss Willard best, and after a good deal of writing and telegraphing to and from Boston, we are finally able to offer the truest and best likeness of the National W. C. T. U. president ever sent out from this office. We believe that thousands will be sold and an awakened interest in the work of the white-ribboners will be the result, as a picture of this kind will provoke inquiry. After the question, "Who is she?" will come another, "What is she?"

Many of our agents are very enthusiastic over it, and of course you can, undoubtedly, sell a great many! Why? Because,

1. It is an unusually fine work of art, being a fac simile reproduction of the original painting, which cost us a large sum.

2. Miss Willard is well known by her life work and through the book, "Glimpses of Fifty Years," of which nearly 50,000 have been sold. Most of the purchasers of the book will want the picture too, and thousands of others who did not care to buy the book. It is not yet too late to get the benefit of the Christmas trade, and you will do well to send in application at once, before the choicest territory is taken.

The Best Value.

Have you thought of it? THE UNION SIGNAL, The Ladies' Home Companion and The Housekeeper's Cook Book all for $1.10? The cook book alone is worth that, and just as soon as your neighbor sees the book or even gets a good fair understanding of the offer she will give you her name and the $1.10. Sure, no mistake about it! What worries us is that the time is so short. The offer positively closes January 1, and it takes time for you to get the book to you, investigated, captivated—ditto your neighbor. Why not positively assure your neighbor that there is no risk in accepting without waiting to see the book and The Ladies' Home Companion? Indeed, we will stand behind you in a guarantee to that effect—will return the money to any dissatisfied neighbor!

HARVEY.

NEW AND CHEAPER LOTS.

A PLACE OF THE GREATEST ACTIVITY.

The only thing lacking is houses in which to shelter people, and those I am building at a rapid rate, and other parties are building many more, and yet the supply is nothing like equal to the demand; we need boarding-house keepers and parties to build and rent houses.

The three hundred lots in my addition are rapidly selling at the low prices put upon them, and the business lots in this addition afford the greatest opportunities for investment.

My addition to Harvey lies a little more than a quarter of a mile south of the present shops, with other factories and business going straight in that direction, as will be seen by reference to the town plat, mailed free on application.

The main business street of Harvey runs through the middle of this addition, which is situated about four short blocks south of the new bank, and within one block of where lots are selling on the same street for $800, and only four blocks from where they have sold for $1,500, and only across the street from the best of the 240 lots sold in the last 90 days, principally to the subscribers of THE UNION SIGNAL.

A person needs only to examine the plat to see the many advantages that these lots have, at an average price of about $350, which includes sidewalks, graded streets, water supply and excellent drainage, some lots being as low as $200.

Terms one-fourth cash, balance 6, 12 and 18 months 6 per cent, with abstract and guarantee of title.

I own a lumber yard in Harvey, and will supply lumber, one-half cash, balance monthly at cash prices to parties desiring to build, or will build and sell on payments.

I am now building extensively, and expect to build more, and can supply work to a large number of workmen all winter; preference given to those who buy property and make Harvey a home.

I have refused $5,000 for the best business corner in my addition for a saloon, but will accept $700 for it, to be used for any mercantile business; no saloons in this subdivision for any price. Each deed has a prohibition clause.

Write for a plat of the whole town, and all information.

I will let a contract to 100 different men to build a house this winter, and apply their labor in payment of a lot, with a cash payment on the lot of $25, and I will furnish all material; I will sell a house and lot on same terms, with a cash payment of $300.

TO INVESTORS: 20 PER CENT ON YOUR MONEY.

To persons not desirous of coming to Harvey I will sell one of 20 houses just completed in Block 93 for $1,200, and accept $500 cash and $75 quarterly. These houses are well and substantially built, being sheeted and papered all over outside, with hard wood kitchen floor, and with sink and water supply in the kitchen, pipes being connected with the water main in the street.

The house is 20x30, four rooms, pantry and vestibule on first floor, with an 8-feet ceiling upstairs, and all rented for $12.50 per month.

The investment figures this way:

Cost of house and lot	$1.200	Yearly rental	$150
Cash payment	500	Yearly interest on amount due	49
Amount still due, 7 per cent	700	Amount of yearly rental clear	101

This pays more than 20 per cent clear on the $500 invested, to say nothing of the advance in real estate, which will no doubt double in 18 months.

I will agree to collect the rent and take charge of the property exactly the same as if I owned it, free of charge, and apply the rentals in cancellation of the amount due, or on the quarterly payment.

Do You Know Where You Can Get Larger Returns on Your Money?

These houses would bring a higher rental in view of the great demand, but my policy has been to be satisfied with what the houses are worth, and not impose upon people simply because it is possible to do so. Write for a photograph of the house, and all information. Now is the time to buy lots, as the Spring-time will witness an advance of one-half in prices. I sell now simply that I may be able to buy more acres to subdivide in the Spring.

The shops and factories are getting about ready to begin work, and any day long train loads of machinery and material may be seen on the tracks there, and the whole town has an appearance of the greatest industry and enterprise.

The temperance clause in each deed has had the effect of keeping out all undesirable people, and the community is a collection of persons such as seldom come together for temperance and good citizenship.

Remember that Harvey is not simply a booming town, that depends on nothing but excitement to keep it up, but that it has the resources within itself to make it a permanent and established city, and that the factories and business capital are already established there, and he who buys now cannot fail to realize great advances.

Write for plat and price-list and all information. I will pay 5 per cent commission to agents.

I refer to any of your friends in Harvey, to the Atlas National Bank, Chicago, or THE UNION SIGNAL.

Publisher's Dep't.

60 Cents Value for 25 cents.

Here is something for you to consider. It's a new idea. A new channel for temperance endeavor. Some folks don't care to hear about new ways to work—the old ways are good enough for them, for they have learned well how not to do anything in the old ways! Not so the W. C. T. U.! Here then is the idea. The great system of public schools—why not attempt to utilize their power to crystallize the present teachings of temperance? It can be done, but not by gazing at the suggestion.

Somebody must take an interest in the matter. Are you somebody? Yes? Well, then, dear Somebody, know that The Young Crusader has exceptionally good Grammar Grade Readings, Christmas, Fourth of July, Harvest Home, etc., exercises, Lessons on Government, and teachings on Loyalty, Kindness, Courage and Temperance. The regular price is 50 cents per year, but for this educational purpose

We Cut that in two!

That is

The special price for public schools only, in quantities of five or more to one address, each 26 cents per annum! To secure this special reduction, you must state when ordering the papers, that they are for use in school, and give the name of the teacher, This offer holds good to January 1, 1891.

Be not weary in well-doing. It's easy to go down hill, but a climb up means growth, health and exercise. Let's climb the hill to the schoolhouse! Come, what does Somebody say? To accomplish this, send for sample copies of The Young Crusader, Show them to the public school teachers (of grades where ages run from nine to sixteen), gently but firmly insist on their sympathy and attention till you get a promise to present the whole matter before the school. The subscription can be taken for six months, if desired, at the 13 cent rate for each subscription, a marvel of cheapness and goodness combined? The idea is a new one, but it calls for the same generous self-denying-ness you have shown before—and will again?

Signal Notes.

A SOCIAL innovation in New York City is the "Blue-ribbon Invitation" to dinners, indicating (by a knot of blue ribbon in the lower left-hand corner) that wine will not be served.

A RECENT issue of The Brewer's Journal had the following testimony: "The old prohibition states, Iowa, Kansas, five Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont show a decreased production during 1887 and 1888, of 78,589 barrels of beer, while the high license states of Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska and Michigan show an increased production of 253,114 barrels."

MR. ISAAC PITMAN, inventor of phonography, is seventy-eight years of age. He still presides over the Phonetic Institute in Bath, England, supervises a correspondence of 20,000 letters annually, besides editing and compiling numerous books and one journal. He is a staunch vegetarian, teetotaler and non-smoker, and is found at his desk every morning at six o'clock.

THE British Medical Journal remarks that the many medical passengers on railways, in common with the general traveling public, are deeply interested in the capacity and fitness of the employés of our railway companies. In the United States and Canada the management has, by expensive experience, arrived at the conclusion that the sobriety of their servants is the surest guarantee of the adoption of every precaution to promote the safe conveyance of the passengers. Fifty-four American companies enforce abstinence while on duty, and twenty-five, abstinence without the restriction to the time of duty.

ARCHDEACON WATKINS, at the late convention of the British Women's Temperance Association lately held in Sunderland, Eng., deploring the fact of the spread of the evil of intemperance among women, even the so-called higher and middle classes, repeats the statement, "that no small part of the evil, at least in certain classes of English society, is to be traced to grocers' licenses." Lady Henry Somerset spoke strong words of encouragement to all temperance workers. She said that hope beat high in their hearts; there were better times coming when the tide had set in which would sweep before it all that had so long been an obstacle. The year had been a memorable one. For the very first time those who knew nothing of the forces that were gathering around the cause, were obliged to recognize the invincible power of the few; for in all great moral questions, it was not majorities that were going to prevail, but the men of conviction against the men of theory. She hoped to see the time when women would vote side by side with men, for then they should have a true sentiment on great social questions. It had been found that during three hours on one Saturday night in London, 86.008 human beings—48,805 men, 30,784 women, and 7,019 children, entered 200 public houses. If that was the case with 200, how many in the same period entered the 10,000 public houses which disgraced the metropolis?

THE Abstainer's Advocate of recent date contains an interesting history of the London Temperance Hospital, and a woodcut of its handsome new building costing, "with freehold and furniture," £55,000, all of which debt has been paid. The hospital began work in 1873 in a small building with only seventeen beds for patients. In 1881 a portion of the new building was opened in Hampstead Road by the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex; in 1885 the west wing was completed and opened by the Bishop of London. Since the opening in 1873 until the end of last year 39,145 patients have been treated for almost every kind of disease with the most gratifying results. The first president was the veteran abstainer, Mr. Samuel Bowly, followed by Mr. Samuel Morley, and he by the Duke of Westminster, who is now president. The last annual report of the hospital states: "Evidence is continually accumulating of the wisdom of the fundamental principle of this hospital. In few public institutions of this kind is there a persistence in the former 'rush to alcohol' as a curative agent, useful in most cases, and indispensable in some. A healthy skepticism is effecting a reduction in the administration of alcohol, whether in a drug or beverage form. We do not desire to claim for our hospital more credit than it deserves in relation to this auspicious change; we know that it has been accelerated by the weighty counsels and weightier testimonies of distinguished members of the profession; but independent observers have admitted that the practice and experience of this hospital have been productive of much good, beyond the benefits conferred upon its patients."

Sitting Bull and seven other Indians were killed by the Indian police while resisting arrest, Monday.

All the original package houses in Pierre, S. Dakota, were simultaneously raided by the police Saturday.

DR. KATE C. BUSHNELL wishes it stated that she proposes to cross the Atlantic during the latter part of January instead of June, as stated in Miss Willard's sketch in a late UNION SIGNAL.

DR. JOHN A. BROOKS, who was driven from his church in Mexico, Mo., because of his Prohibition principles, is now pastor of a large and rapidly-growing congregation in Kansas City that has just completed a $25,000 church.

IN Miss Willard's annual address for 1889 she recommended the preparation of a New Year souvenir leaflet, "as a present to editors, reporters and journalists in general, for their information, and as a token of good-will." Such a leaflet has been prepared, and will be ready December 20. For particulars see Publisher's column. Look there, also, for description of a new set of cards containing quotations from "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life." How can they be otherwise than welcome, since the love for that book is world-wide?

WE give this week the first of two articles on General Booth's "In Darkest England," by Dr. Bessie Cushman. It will add to our readers' interest in these articles, and their faith in her ability to deal with the problem of a city's poverty and woe, to know that Dr. Cushman is the superintendent of Bethesda Gospel meetings, a W. C. T. U. mission in the very heart of the "Black Hole of Chicago." Her work brings her right into contact with the worst, most desolate of our city poor, and so fits her to understand the awful problem confronting us, as well as to judge of the feasibility of plans for solving it.

THE big brewers of Chicago are enacting the role of temperance reformers a la high license logic, though not by high license methods. All the syndicate brewers of the city have decided to stop advancing money to saloon-keepers to pay for their licenses, and it is estimated that this will close 1,600 saloons in this city January 1st. According to high license logic this means reducing the sale of beer, but according to business common sense it does not, for the brewers are not going to bite off their own noses to spite their faces. But the move is encouraging as showing that the saloon business is not so prosperous that the brewers can afford to advance money on it, and feel sure of their pay. The estimate is that the closing of these saloons will decrease the brewers' sales 1,000 barrels a week. Saloon-keepers must be poor pay if brewers find it necessary to cut off so large a per cent of their trade in order to secure themselves.

AN application has been filed in the District Court of Polk County, Iowa, for a permanent injunction restraining the sale of intoxicating liquors in the State Register building, Des Moines, owned by Clarkson Brothers. One of the rooms in the building has been occupied as a drug store for about two years and has gained a hard reputation as a liquor joint; more than a year ago the place became notorious, and seizures of liquors were made there by the constables. The proprietors of the drug store have varied, but there has been no variableness in their methods. Not one of them has held a druggist's permit for the sale of liquors, as required by Iowa law, and not one has failed to sell liquor. All the time the Register has been talking prohibition and extolling the wisdom of the feature of the law which allows the issuance of an injunction against buildings in which liquor is sold. The present action is brought under this section of the prohibitory law, and in the January term of court, William Priebe, occupant, and Clarkson Brothers, owners, will be called upon to show reason why the Register building shall not be declared a nuisance.

ENOUGH applications for admission to the W. C. T. U. Training School having been received, the school will open in this city, Tuesday, January 6, 1891. It will be conducted according to the plan presented in the Convention UNION SIGNAL, subject to such modifications as experience may dictate. Tuition will be free; board can be obtained at from five to seven dollars per week. A few of those willing to share a room with others can be accommodated at the Home for Self-supporting women. 275 Indiana street (not avenue), at from $2.25 to $3.50 per week. Application for accommodations there should be made at once to Mrs. V. L. Smith, matron. Furnished rooms for light housekeeping can be rented near the school and thus the expense of board materially decreased. All communications concerning the Training School should be addressed to Miss E. A. Kellogg, 359 Claremont avenue, Chicago. One important feature of the Training School is giving opportunity to see the working of the various organizations in this city and vicinity. Presidents of local unions, Y's as well as W's, will help the work in this direction by sending to this office at once, the date and place of their regular meetings, also list of missions, kindergartens, day nurseries and other lines of work they are carrying on, with such particulars as are necessary to facilitate visiting them. We shall be glad to have similar particulars concerning cognate lines of work not under the auspices of the W. C. T. U.

THE daily papers have given ludicrous accounts of Buffalo Bill's expedition "in ball dress" to capture Sitting Bull. A valued correspondent, resident in Dakota, gives this explanation of the fool-hardy performance: "Buffalo Bill received his orders from General Miller to make the attempted capture when both had been drinking heavily. When Buffalo Bill and his two white companions reached Fort Yates, they were in the midst of a protracted spree, too drunk to realize the utter impossibility of the proposed undertaking. Sitting Bull had mounted scouts out every two miles in every direction from his camp, and the 'invaders' would never have reached him alive. They would simply have been killed, a general uprising precipitated, and all unprotected whites on the reservation, as well as settlers on the borders, would have been massacred. Major McLaughlan is the person who averted this awful calamity, by securing the withdrawal of Buffalo Bill before he reached the hostile camp. Bill's equipment for the capture of Sitting Bull consisted of a two-horse spring wagon in which was a full supply of whisky, two white men, both drunk, and two sober Indians as escorts. Major McLaughlan, seeing the danger, telegraphed General Miller, begging him to withdraw Buffalo Bill, but he would not. He then telegraphed President Harrison, and the great originator of the Wild West Show was, by the President's orders, overtaken and recalled when within seventeen miles of Sitting Bull."

MRS. H. C. RUTH read a paper before the Illinois Woman's Press-Association on "Women Farmers of the Northwest," which had so many points of interest that we asked the privilege of printing parts of it in THE UNION SIGNAL, and shall do so soon. "She can be only an ideal farmer," said some as they noted the quiet, lady-like little woman. But they were mistaken. She now owns twelve hundred acres, the remainder of much larger possessions which she has sold. She manages her estate herself, attending to the sale of farms sold and the practical workings of those she retains, the purchase of farm machinery, harvesting, threshing and marketing her great wheat crops, and all the other things necessary for successful farming. When asked if she personally superintended these operations, she modestly replied: "I never have a business manager." So successfully has she conducted her own business, that two gentlemen in New York, owning large acreage of Dakota wheat land, give her entire charge of their interests there. Her home is New York City, whence she goes in the summer to attend to the Dakota farms. This she has done for nine years. Her time is thus divided between the metropolis and the far west by the necessity imposed upon her by an invalid brother's need of her help in his business. Thus this lady is successfully carrying on two distinct lines of business, one in New York, the other hundreds of miles away on the plains of North Dakota. The New York business has so increased that it is proposed to open branch houses in Chicago and New Orleans, of which Mrs. Ruth will have the supervision.

THE Independent of December 11 devotes over four pages to a symposium on the question: "General Booth's Plan, Can it be applied to the outcasts of New York?" The answers demonstrate the truth of the motto, "It is the unexpected that happens." The first surprise is that leading Christian ministers, in discussing the plan, leave almost entirely out of sight the power of God as a factor in the problem, in General Booth's mind the prominent factor. Even Dr. Schauffler seems, by implication at least, to teach that the dissensions of Christians are a greater power than God. Henry Wilson, D. D., of the Protestant Episcopal Church, takes a much more hopeful view of the matter and brings the thought of God much more definitely into the problem. John Swinton declares that among the outcasts and the starving poor of London, "there is a growth of thought that to the devil must be the most alarming thing since the apparition of Calvary. I believe that the old man must be shaking with fear at the outcome." He thinks that relief must come not through philanthropy but through justice, and broadly hints that an instrument "invented by a distinguished doctor—Dr. Guillotine," might help on the cause of justice. The most astonishing statement in the symposium is that made by Justice Kilbreth, of the Tombs Court: "More than ninety per cent of female outcasts are so from choice—not as the result of misfortune or misery, but from choice. Nearly all of them have been brought to their condition through a vain desire for display and a love of dress—so that they would refuse to be 'reformed' by any means." General Booth's statement on page 8 shows that sixty-five per cent of these rescued women are altered characters and stay reformed, if only the grace of God gets into their hearts. The symposium affords much food for thought.

GOD OF NATIONS.

BY REV. JOSEPH COOK.

[TUNE—Italian Hymn, or America.]

God of the nations, rise,
Fix on Thyself our eyes,
  Wisdom, Love, Might:
Draw Thou as noontide nigh,
Flood Thou the earth and sky;
Keen, white, pure, vast and high,
  Let there be light.

God of our fathers' day,
Make us as wise as they,
  Thy truth our guide:
Ours be Thy bugle call,
One plan Thou hast in all,
As the new ages fall,
  In us abide.

God make our eye-sight clear,
Duty as freedom dear;
  Right all our wrongs:
Strong in Truth gladly heard,
Loyal to all Thy word,
Nations with hope deferred,
  Fill Thou with songs.

God in all faces shine,
So make Thou all men Thine,
  Under one dome;
Face to face, soul to soul,
East to West, pole to pole,
As the great ages roll,
  Be Thou our home.

TWO CHRISTMAS EVES.

BY REV. GEORGE H. VIBBERT.

The Rev. Dr. Henry, pastor of All Soul's Church, in the city of Lakedale, announced that he would preach a Christmas sermon on the first Sunday of December. His people were curious to know why he would preach a Christmas sermon on any but the Sunday preceding Christmas Day.

There was a larger congregation than usual.

In his peroration the Doctor said: "My friends, cannot we celebrate Christmas in a more Christian way than we are accustomed to? The Saviour whose birth we are to commemorate was a Gift, God's best gift to a needy world. And the Saviour came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and He gave Himself for the world's salvation. Those who follow Him, those who most richly partake of His Divine Spirit, forget themselves, give themselves in loving service for others. They minister unto those who are needy. They give good gifts to the poor, and comfort those who, in the bitterness of their hearts, cry: 'No man cares for my soul.' How so well can we celebrate Christmas as by giving, not receiving, by giving to those who are in sore need of help? Why load a Christmas tree with presents for those who are not in want? Why not make a Christmas for those who are poor, and in distress? Surely a day memorable for the most blessed Gift of God would be best kept not so much by getting as by giving. Let us have a Christian Christmas festival. Let us load our Christmas tree in this church with generous gifts for those who really need them."

The people went away discussing the sermon. Dr. Henry was a good man, beloved and respected, and his simple, earnest words were pondered carefully, prayerfully, and the parish decided to have a Christmas service unlike any they had engaged in before.

Many remembered the Christmas tree of the last year. It was loaded with valuable presents. Parents brought rich and glittering gifts for their children who all their lives had hardly known a want unsatisfied. The large tree twinkled with colored lights. There were gold watches and jewelry and precious stones, and most cunning devices of the toymaker's art. There were sealskin jackets and silken and lace fabrics, costly articles of apparel, and there were skates and sleds, and dainty ornaments, richly bound books, and quaint and expensive bric-a-brac.

Few poor people were remembered, and those in humble circumstances did not like to bring their simple and cheap gifts to hang beside the costly and beautiful things for the darlings of richer men and women. So the Christmas tree was heavy with beautiful presents for those who already had at home many comforts and luxuries.

Dr. Henry, in the first part of his sermon, had described the poverty and wretchedness he had seen in their city, and solemnly enforced the lesson that his hearers' possessions were from God to be shared with His poor.

It was decided that if possible Dr. Henry's idea should be realized, and the interested people busied themselves in informing every person, old and young, in the parish of the plans for the Christmas festival. Each one was asked to learn who were the poorest and most forlorn in the vicinity, and what their most pressing needs.

To this most unusual occupation nearly all faithfully attended. The poor, the sick, the drunken, the abandoned and helpless, the hopeless and miserable were found and visited, and those able to go were cordially invited to the church on Christmas eve.

Such plans were made, and sacrifices, too, by children and others, such importunate requests and coaxings and demands were never before known by fathers and mothers and good-natured or crusty uncles and aunts!

All who had contributed were interested to be present, and they packed the galleries and the aisle pews, and thronged even the passage ways. Every carriage owned by the members of the parish had been sent to wretched homes for their poverty-stricken inmates, and when the loads arrived, the young men of the congregation opened the carriage doors and escorted the excited guests to the central pews, which they filled from pulpit to doors.

These invited guests were white and black, men and women whose faces were bloated by drink, or seamed by poverty and care, pale-faced seamstresses, hard-working washerwomen, over-burdened, sad-faced wives of drunkards, and such boys and girls! bootblacks, newsboys, street gamins and waifs; they were ragged, and their clothing was coarse and untidy, yet their faces and hands were clean and their hair had been combed, and pathetic attempts they had made to bedeck themselves with bits of shabby finery.

The Church of All-Souls had never such a motley throng in its well-upholstered pews, nor had so many sad and care-worn and pinched and sin-scarred, yet eager faces ever been seen there.

Dr. Chapin's Christmas hymn,

"Hark! hark, with harps of gold;
What anthem do they sing!"

was sung by a large choir of the children and young people to the pealing notes of the grand organ. The Lord's prayer was repeated, and all who could sang,

"I think when I read that sweet story of old."

Then Dr. Henry invited all guests to a Christmas supper in the church parlors and dining-room. It was the best repast that the parish could provide. The waiters were young men and women, and the older people of the church helped in the kitchen and at the carving and distributing tables. After supper Dr. Henry told the guests that each one would have taken home, after the festival, food for a plentiful Christmas breakfast. Then the guests filed back into the church again.

There were four stately Christmas trees, blazing with lights and bending with presents, while their trunks were banked by large parcels too cumbrous for the branches.

They were useful gifts, though the craving for beauty had not been forgotten. There were sweet and lovely flowers for the sick rooms and potted plants and simple pictures to delight weary eyes, and cheer lonely pain-burdened hours.

The gifts were distributed by the young people of the church. Every guest was remembered, and things sent to squalid homes, for those who were too ill or too old to be present. There were several letters directed to poor sickly people who needed change of climate and surroundings for recovery, each letter giving ample directions for the journey to some healthier place, with railroad tickets, and also money for other expenses. There were checks in three letters, for two poor young men and a poverty-stricken girl who had shown rare ability for study, and a desire to prepare for the Christian ministry, sufficient to pay expenses for each student for four years. There was a generous donation for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and money for several charitable institutions of the city. An impoverished cripple was helped to a famous surgeon's care that promised complete restoration to strength and activity, a blind man was aided to seek a skillful oculist who felt sure of restoring his sight. There were proffers of employment for several who had no work, and Christian homes opened, and Christian care ready for four girls who had been rescued from lives of shame. As the letters were read and the offers made by "God's folks" for the aid of the ignorant, sick, crippled, and sin-smitten, the guests shouted and sobbed for joy, and strong men and gentle women among the guests and audience cried, and blessed God. It was the happiest congregation that had ever been gathered in that church, and more devout gratitude to God was expressed, and a keener understanding of the blessed Saviour's love and helpfulness than ever before had been kindled there.

Dr. Henry announced before they separated that checks and promises were sent to him that evening for four times the largest contributions ever made by his people for home and foreign missions. When they all tried to sing,

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow," voices trembled and joyful tears ran down cheeks of men and women who thanked their Heavenly Father for the blessed beginning of their first Christian Christmas festival.

A "SCHEME."

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

One book is undoubtedly destined to stand out in this age of endless bookmaking as the most remarkable production of the closing year. "In Darkest Africa" had its thousands of readers; "In Darkest England" has its tens of thousands.

It is a good sign of the times that a work which bids for attention solely upon the ground of offering a plan to "help the workless," should awaken so much interest among those who are housed and fed because fortunate and faithful enough to be workers. If this wide-spread interest shall crystallize into practical helpfulness—in short, if General Booth's scheme obtains support, and proves successful, the figures 1890 may indeed mark "the acceptable year of the Lord." Certainly the great leader of the Salvation Army counts himself commissioned to loose the bonds of wickedness, to let the oppressed go free, and to break every yoke.

If I know the heat lightning that leaps from William Stead's pen, I see its flashes over the black facts collected by General Booth and his ministering aides, betraying the brilliant editor-philanthropist as the nameless "friend whose literary help" is acknowledged by the accredited author in the preface. No soldier of the Lord better deserves epaulette and sword than he who, unarmed and without troops or staff, made war upon the women slavers of modern Babylon. His light is such that it can not be hid, and his fascinating style stamps these dark pages as surely as the gilt-lettered red ribbon across the lassie's bonnet distinguishes it from the creation of a fashionable milliner.

Comparing the environment of the lowest layer of society with the Congo forest, the point is made that the most unfavorable condition of the abject poor is their abjectness—their hopelessness, and the contagion of hopelessness which spreads to those who attempt their relief. Mr. Stanley entered the Congo jungle with forty stalwart natives, armed with axes and determined to cut their way through. They came upon a race of dwarfs, whom they vainly tried to convince that there were subjugated lands outside, where sunlight touched the very ground. The pigmies wagged their little heads, waved their little hands and cried: "No! All like this!" until at last the native pioneers lost heart and recalled the superstitious belief of their tribe, that there is a boundless forest lying near the end of the earth, and that the end, when reached, is in the coil of a hideous serpent. General Booth says: "Civilization breeds its own pigmies." He might have added, it also has its faithless pioneers, who seeing no way out of the moral morass, go in to prey upon its denizens for selfish profit. Such are those anomalous beings in the moral and spiritual world known as "High license Christians." In taking the name of Christ they undertake to cut their way through Satan's bramble-covered territory and take it for their Leader, but considering the density of the undergrowth and the unbelief of those who live in it, they lay down ax and sword—civil law and divine commandment—saying: "Drunkenness and prostitution have been, and will be, while time lasts. It is just as well to make them pay by putting license high." So the rightful deliverer becomes the enslaver.

The book is in two divisions; one describes, briefly and comprehensively, the malady, the other prescribes a remedy.

PART I—THE DARKNESS

is made up of facts taken from the log-book of an explorer, who for thirty-five years, aided by his saintly wife, has made close study of the sinking classes. For more than twenty years General and Mrs. Booth have been in command of a great life-saving service. In the result, "The rescued are appallingly few—a ghastly minority compared with the multitudes who struggle and sink in the open-mouthed abyss."

The reader is constantly impressed with the effort of the author to keep his statements under, instead of allowing them to transcend the line of facts. "The grimmest social problems of our time should be strongly faced, not with a view to the generation of profitless emotion, but with a view to its solution," is the key-note. A careful survey of public records of crime and pauperism, together with an industrial census of East London, taken by Mr. Booth and a large corps of trained assistants, show that in Great Britain—exclusive of Ireland, where the pauperism is much worse—there are three million struggling, sinking souls. These amount to one-tenth of the entire population, named "the submerged tenth." They are classified in three circles; the outer and widest and most fluctuating, according to depression or prosperity in trade, "is inhabited by the starving and the homeless, but honest poor; the second, by those who live in vice," while the center is occupied by those who exist by crime. "A population sodden with drink, steeped in vice, eaten up by every social and physical malady, these are the denizens of Darkest England, amidst whom my life has been spent, and to whose rescue I would now summon all that is best in the manhood and womanhood of our land. . . . I appeal for, first, those who, having no capital or income of their own, would in a month be dead from sheer starvation were they exclusively dependent upon the money earned by their own work; and, second, those who, by their utmost exertions, are unable to attain the regulation allowance of food which the law prescribes as indispensable, even for the worst criminals in our jails."

Mr. Booth nowhere dodges or denies the drink factor in this triple zone of wretchedness. "Darkest England has many more public houses than the forest of the Aruwimi has rivers, of which Mr. Stanley sometimes had to cross three in half an hour. . . . The gin shop stands at every corner, with its river of the water of death flowing seventeen hours out of the twenty-four for the destruction of the people. . . . The drink difficulty lies at the root of everything. Nine-tenths of our poverty, squalor, vice and crime spring from this poisonous tap-root. Many of our social evils, which overshadow the land like so many upas trees, would dwindle away and die if they were not constantly watered with strong drink."

No prejudice-blinded temperance fanatic ever made stronger charge than that, or more sarcastic suggestion than this:

"While recognizing that the primary responsibility must always rest upon the individual, we may fairly insist that society, which, by its habits, its customs, and its laws, has greased the slope down which these poor creatures slide to perdition, shall seriously take in hand their salvation. . . .

"The problem of what to do with our quarter of a million drunkards remains to be solved, and few more difficult questions confront the social reformer."

Some years ago a great deal was said, and rightly, both in England and America, about the housing of the poor, but "there is a depth below that of the dweller in the slums. It is that of the dweller in the streets, who has not even a lair in the slums." Let no one reading this book in a comfortable home send his thought across the water in search of these unfortunates. Rather let him go into the alleys that constitute the slums of his own city. The tale of Darkest America is yet unwritten, but the wretched facts for volumes are heaping up every day. Our pigmies are just as dwarfed, our pioneers just as cowardly as those of the Old World civilization. The records of our Anchorage and life-saving stations are just as red with the shame of outraged womanhood as are those of London Rescue Homes. In the Chicago Bethesda Mission I meet men almost every evening who tell me of having spent the previous night, sometimes many previous nights, walking about the streets, having no lodging and no money. Their haggard faces and weary movements confirm their statements. A few evenings ago I approached a young man sleeping heavily at the close of the meeting, supposing him to be overcome with drink. His companion, a more nervous lad, said, "No, ma'am, he's just wore out. You see we've been huntin' a job all this week, and our money give out night before last, so we've tramped two nights."

One of the most sagacious of the General's staff was detailed to look after and report the actual condition of the homeless of London. Some, in whom the home instinct is ineradicable, have their habitual nooks in sheltered places, all over London. A case coming specially to notice was that of a young woman who habitually slept under a wagon in one of the yards. Some men, learning of her haunt, surprised her by dashing a bucket of water over her. Depleted by starvation the shock of fright was more than she could endure, and she died of the resulting illness. Of the homeless, collectively, the report says:

"Between the Temple and Blackfriars, I found the poor wretches by the score; almost every seat contained its full complement of six—some men, some women—all reclining in various postures, and nearly all fast asleep. Just as Big Ben strikes two, the moon, flashing across the Thames, and lighting up the stone work of the Embankment, brings into relief a pitiable spectacle. Here on the stone abutments, which afford a slight protection from the biting wind, are scores of men lying side by side, huddled together for warmth, and, of course, without any other covering than their ordinary clothing, which is scanty enough at the best." Many of these were hereditary paupers; many had sunk through illness from self-support; some were intelligent and of good blood, as their conversation indicated. Let it be remembered that as a class they were "sodden with drink." Women and children were found sleeping out—decent charwomen who could not get work. The city police kindly overlook them; as one explained: "There's seldom many rows here, because everybody's tired out and too sleepy to row." The condition of the out-of-works is not overdrawn. We who have seen men in quest of employment, know well that "of all heart-breaking toil the hunt for work is the worst." Nothing could be more plaintive than this voice from the so-called "inarticulate classes, who speak as seldom as Balaam's ass." An unkempt orator addressed a group of twenty or thirty men thus:

"My lads," he commenced, with one hand in the breast of his ragged vest, and the other, as usual, plucking nervously at his beard, "this kind o' work can't last forever." (Deep and earnest exclamations, "It can't! It sha'nt!") "Well, boys," continued the speaker, "somebody'll have to find a road out o' this. What we want is work, not work'us bounty, though the parish has been busy enough amongst us lately, God knows! What we want is honest work. (Hear, hear.) Now, what I propose is that each of you gets fifty mates to join you; that'll make about 1,200 starving chaps—" "And then?" asked several very gaunt and hungry-looking men excitedly. "Why, then," continued the leader. "Why, then," interrupted a cadaverous-looking man from the farther and darkest end of the cellar, "of course we'll make a—— London job of it, eh?" "No, no," hastily interposed my friend, and holding up his hands deprecatingly, "we'll go peaceably about it, chaps; we'll go in a body to the Town Hall, and show our poverty, and ask for work. We'll take the women and children with us too." ("Too ragged! Too starved! They can't walk it!") "The women's rags is no disgrace, the staggerin' children'll show what we have come to. Let's go a thousand strong, and ask for work and bread!"

Three years ago, in London, there were some such processions; Church parades to the Abbey and St. Paul's, bivouacs in Trafalgar Square, etc. But Lazarus showed his rags and his sores too conspicuously for the convenience of Dives, and was summarily dealt with in the name of law and order. But as we have Lord Mayor's Days, when all the well-fed, fur-clad City Fathers go in State Coaches through the town, why should we not have a Lazarus Day, in which the starving Out-of-Works, and the sweated, half-starved "In-Works" of London should crawl in their tattered raggedness, with their gaunt, hungry faces, and emaciated wives and children, a Procession of Despair through the main thoroughfares, past the massive houses and princely palaces of luxurious London?

For these men are gradually, but surely, being sucked down into the quicksand of modern life. They stretch out their grimy hands to us in vain appeal, not for charity, but for work.

Work, work! it is always work that they ask. The Divine curse is to them the most blessed of benedictions, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread;" but alas for these forlorn sons of Adam, they fail to find the bread to eat, for Society has no work for them to do. They have not even leave to sweat. As well as discussing how these poor wanderers should, in the second Adam, "all be made alive," ought we not to put forth some effort to effect their restoration to their share in the heritage of labor which is theirs by right of descent from the first Adam? When a rich man cannot employ his capital he puts it out at interest, but the bank for the labor capital of the poor man has yet to be invented.

The steps from pauperism to crime are clearly shown by incident and influence. The children of the lost, poisoned by nightly association with debauchery, are sinspores in the public schools where compulsory education sends them, to impart their contaminating knowledge of evil to the children from honest homes.

The report of the officers engaged in rescue work for women constitutes a chapter of horrors too great for our pages. But let it be told that one of the Salvation Army Rescue Homes is located in the "Woolwich Dust Hole," a neighborhood so dangerous that abandoned men will not accompany home the women who live there. Policemen dare not go down that street alone at night; one died not long ago from injuries received there. British soldiers are forbidden to enter there on penalty of twenty-five days' imprisonment, and pickets are stationed at either end of the street to enforce the order, yet two brave Salvation Army lassies go there "unharmed, and loved at all hours, spending every other night upon the streets." Educated girls have been drawn from that pit, and when washed in Christly love from its horrible odors, they were found to be women of tenderness and refinement. Such a mission can only be compared to that mysterious one, when between cross and sepulchre, the Master visited "the spirits in prison."

It is one thing to see your road, another to cut it.—George Eliot.

COURTESY AMONG WOMEN.

BY HOPE LEDYARD.

A writer in the North American Review calls woman the "mannerless sex," and gives pretty good proof of her right to the name. After speaking of woman's insistence for the first place at ticket offices, shop-counters, etc., and of her rudeness to her fellow-woman, he closes with this sentence: "I do not mean to declare in broad terms that man is mannerly while woman is not, for I observe, with regret, in many of my own sex, an indifference to the rudimentary courtesies which is fatal to their reputation for good manners, and I recognize in many women a watchfulness for the rights of others, a gentleness in the assertion of their own, that deserve a respect little short of veneration. What I do insist upon is this; that in public the average woman shows an inconsiderateness, a disregard for the ordinary courtesies of existence (which amounts sometimes to positive insolence), to a degree which is not anywhere nearly approached by the average man. . . . . But I leave for others the task of pointing out the causes of this difference between men and women, and indicating, if they will, the remedy for the present state of affairs."

One's first impulse on reading this is to exclaim: "He is unfair! Because some women act disgracefully the whole sex should not be indicted!" But, let us calmly consider the matter. Is it not true that there is more discourtesy shown by women than by men? Who push the hardest (for their size) in a crowd? Which sex shows the most consideration when marketing or shopping? Again and again a man will change his seat to allow companions to be seated together, but how often does a woman make such a move? Why should it not be as incumbent on a young woman to offer her seat to an old person as for a young man so to do?

Now what is the remedy? We mothers alone can find and apply it. It lies in watching our own and our children's conduct most carefully. Insist on chivalrous conduct on the part of our boys, but also insist on true, unselfish consideration for her brother with the girl. Train your little daughter to express gratitude for any service rendered to her, and to consider the needs of others equally with her own if not before them.

I was standing near a bargain counter one day last summer, watching the rapid way in which some pretty dress-goods were selling. A lady with her little daughter had succeeded in getting near enough to grasp a very pretty piece of blue and gray; a poor woman had her hand on a piece of the same.

"Ten yards in that," said the clerk to the mother, "six in that," to the woman.

The latter gave a sigh. "Have you no more of it? It's so pretty!"

"Last of the pattern." The woman turned, but the mother's hand was laid on her arm.

"Take the other piece, please, I would rather."

"Oh, mamma," said the little one as they passed out, "it was so pretty!"

"We will have other chances, dear, and perhaps that woman hasn't much time to shop. It would not have been courteous to take it," said the mother quietly.

Take, on the other hand, an illustration of the training in unmannerliness that children are constantly receiving. Men and women are standing up in a crowded car; mother is seated with her little daughter. The child, instinctively polite, starts to offer her seat, but the mother holds her down, saying quite loudly, "Keep your seat, I paid for it and it's yours."

Again, are we careful to teach our children habits of courtesy to women as women, or do we not discriminate between women? The hope for the next generation, as to this, lies in the broader views as to woman's work. The banker's daughter who is thoroughly interested in some Working Girls' Club has a real respect for every shop-girl because she knows the true womanliness, even heroism, of certain self-supporting girls. Club life will do much to teach women courtesy and consideration for each other.

Again, why should a child expect certain privileges because she is a girl? Perhaps it was but right when women were shut out of so many good times that these sops of extra courtesy and consideration should have been thrown to her, but now that she can earn her own support; can even "go out after dark," can share her brother's sports with racket and bicycle, can she not afford to take her turn as to being served, seated and so on?

Having acknowledged that we have, as a class, been somewhat lacking in courtesy, let us assure the writer of "The Mannerless Sex" that we are learning better. Here and there you see a silver Maltese cross gleaming on the dress of a woman—the cross is worn by washerwomen and writers, by clerks and ladies of leisure—and, whoever wears the cross, is expected, as the King's daughter, to be pitiful and courteous to old and young of either sex, and seldom is that expectation disappointed.

A DAY AT HARRIMAN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—To all who believe in prohibition in law, the successful experiment of prohibition in title deeds now being made at Harriman, Tenn., is full of unusual interest.

The argument against the saloon has largely stood on those high moral grounds which compel self-sacrifice for final achievement; and as there is but a small heroic element in any civilization, the growth of sentiment has been slow, and the growth of effective action slower still. But the day has come when prohibition is recognized as in harmony with the best political economy, by some of the wisest capitalists of the country.

Harriman is the crowning success along this new line of thinking and action.

It was the privilege of the writer to spend a day in this magic city when returning from Atlanta, and, believing many will be interested, a brief record of some things seen there is here written.

Take the map of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad and find the station once known as Keathly, but now called Harriman Junction, and you have the locality of the new city without saloons.

When you step off the train you are surrounded with the quiet beauty of the Tennessee Mountains. Through Emory Gap close by comes the winding stream which cuts out God's gateway for the commerce of men.

The Emory river sweeps around the town site, mountains on both sides of it, but with a low level stretch of land along its banks, devoted to the manufactories already in operation and the many yet to be.

The East Tennessee Land company, composed of a roll of honored names, well known to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, are building for the future in this charming spot.

Gen. Clinton B. Fisk was the first president of the exceptional company, and when he went away from a nation that mourned him, Hon. Thomas L. James, of New York, was chosen his successor. Among the officers and directors are found the names of A. W. Wagnalls, A. A. Hopkins, W. H. Russell, W. C. Harriman, John Hopewell, J. B. Hobbs, F. Schumacher, Frederick Gates, I. K. Funk, and others of equal reputation in the world of business and of thought. These capitalists are not organized into a temperance society, or a Prohibition party, they are shrewd, keen business men who know the saloon to be a material waste and a moral curse, and therefore, rule it out of the coming city of the South.

No foot of land can be secured by the rumseller. And if, with the usual aggressiveness of sin, any attempt is made at liquor selling, the penalty is a forfeiture of the land, all of which is set forth in the title deeds.

Can such a town succeed? will be the question of the doubter who has been educated to think it necessary to float the public credit on the rum revenue, and pave the streets with stones on which should be cut the epitaphs of the slain of our people. Let the simple record of the facts be the answer.

Nine months ago Harriman was part farm land and part wilderness. Now, you find yourself in a city of two thousand inhabitants, living in beautiful new homes, from the tasteful Queen Anne cottage, to the really stately residence. You ride over several miles of well-graded streets, lighted by electric lights. You find a system of water-works, which is soon to be extended to meet the needs of the people farther from the center. Good business blocks are already occupied, and many new ones are in process of construction. Three new churches are being built, and a hall to be occupied by the Y. M. C. A. and the W. C. T. U. A beautiful new hotel will be open in a few weeks. The school-house on the hill has three grades, and one of the best known teachers of Brooklyn, New York, is the principal, and she wears the white ribbon. A daily paper is published, and a real breezy journal it is, full of interest, without being spiced with saloon brawls.

The high, pure air from the mountains is not more grateful to the lungs than the clean moral sentiment which pervades the social life.

Harriman is not built, however, for a moral or sentimental paradise; it is founded for business, and its resources are a marvel even in the eyes of a novice. Brick and lime are being made and stone quarried within the city limits. In the Exposition building I saw more than a dozen specimens of wood, cut on the town site, suitable for building, furniture making and all purposes. Three manufactories are in operation already, and in the blast furnace we saw the second casting of iron taken from the Harriman mountains.

Coal and iron mines are in active operation, and rolling mills which will employ fifteen hundred men, will open in the early spring. The iron ore of the section includes such as goes to the making of Bessemer steel, and the coal produces, when burned, a coke equal to the best.

All these things are to be seen in the Exposition building, which is an art gallery as well, hung about with views of the lovely scenery on the wide domain of the company. There are literally thousands of acres of mineral and coal deposits, so this is no boom on paper, but has for its foundation the solid and well-nigh unlimited wealth of nature.

There are two W. C. T. Unions, one at Harriman, the other at Walnut Hills, a beautiful suburb only a mile away. These tendered a public reception to the writer, and we had the opportunity of meeting the kind of people who choose to live in a town founded on prohibition. They are gathered from nearly a score of states, and are "our folks," as Miss Willard sometimes says of those she delights to praise.

We had coffee, cake, speeches and song, a most delightful evening before the train left for the North. The directors were having a meeting, so we met, most unexpectedly, some of the gentlemen who are at the head of the great enterprise. This city of hope is growing so fast, that although a new dwelling is started every few hours, the problem of where to put the new-comers is often present.

We found a Michigan white-ribboner living in three rooms over the hall where the reception was held; it was as cozy as hands could make it, and she said, "I shall hate to leave it," although she goes to a beautiful house now building. Another lady said, "Harriman is rest and health for soul and body." If any one thinks this a rose-colored picture, let him go and see all this and more.

Where the fair, eternal mountains
Rest you as a psalm,
And the cares of life grow lighter
For their strength and calm.

A fitting close to this record of a day is the testimony of a New Yorker who recently spent a month at Harriman and went home to say, "I have never been a Prohibitionist, but I have found at Harriman the most profound argument in favor of that principle ever brought before me. There is a city of two thousand souls, with no city government as yet, not a police officer within fifty miles, and yet, all goes on in peace."

We called Harriman an experiment. It may be better named a demonstration; although it stands only at the gate of a still more glorious future, because it is a city founded in righteousness. MARY T. LATHRAP.

HOME PROTECTION READING COURSE.

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
EVANSTON, ILL., U. S. A., Dec. 6, 1890.

To my Comrades of the Local Unions:

For sixteen years one question has come to me by word of mouth and through correspondence, from every part of the world. The question is as follows: How can we make the W. C. T. U. interesting?

Women who were my hostesses, but were not members of our society, have said to me over and over again, "I used to attend the local meeting, but found that I came and went like a door upon its hinges, neither giving nor receiving help, so I concluded that I could better invest my time." Now the key to the position is a sustained interest in the meetings of the local union. We have tried every method in our power to help the officers and members of our local auxiliaries in this particular. For this purpose "The Responsive Readings" were introduced, and have done excellent service; indeed, if I were president of a local union, I would send by next mail for a full set of these readings, selecting from those I thought most helpful, and ordering enough of each to supply every member with a copy for herself when she should put in an appearance at the next meeting. I would also send out a postal card to each, notifying her that we had a new way of opening the meeting, and saying that I hoped she would be present next time to see how this was done, and to participate in the exercises, which were all furnished for us in print from the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association in Chicago.

But we "grown-ups" are only children of a larger growth: no single method satisfies us; we want something new, so here comes a new way of making the local meeting interesting and educational.

A bright New Jersey woman, Mrs. J. C. Fernald (whose husband must be well known to you if you read prohibition literature), undertakes to get up a program for us. It seems to me the plan is excellent, and I earnestly ask you to throw yourselves into this new undertaking with your usual enthusiasm.

She will prepare a course of instructive monthly programs, including readings collated from the most reliable sources for use in temperance meetings, mothers' meetings, etc. These programs are to be simple, instructive and entertaining, and will help those following them to "give a reason for the hope that is in them." It will be inexpensive, will be cheaper, in fact, than anything yet offered of like value (see Publisher's column, page 15), and will save both time and money when such information is desired—time for research and condensation, for references will always be given, and the documents or books drawn upon can be secured when desired. An added attraction—another tie to bind—will be the personal letter from some of our National leaders each month to those using the program, upon the topic under consideration.

Subjoined is a sample program. They will doubtless grow in interest as we leave the historical to consider existing conditions and the best way to meet them.

Senator Blair's book will make any woman intelligent on the temperance reform, if she will read and talk it over, little by little, in the wide-awake group of a local union. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so does man the countenance of his friend." Oliver Wendell Holmes tells us that he does not care so much what others say to him, as he does what they make him say, and we are all a good deal on that plan ourselves. We like the person who reveals to us our own powers, and a group of genial, quick-witted white-ribboners can "set each other going" with wisdom, logic and repartee at a surprising rate.

A page from Senator Blair's book, read in an attractive way by some young woman who otherwise would not be present at all, furnishes the text, and then away you go into a really valuable conversation.

Without my knowledge or consent, somebody has put "Glimpses of Fifty Years" on the program of books to be read. It would ill become me to go back upon that book, much as I criticise it in my mind, for it was indeed, a "distressful experience," as Josiah Allen's wife would say, to be shut up for six weeks turning the eyes of one's spirit in upon one's self, thence to evolve, excogitate and set going the coiled up recollections of one's past life; but this is what I had to do, and with all its faults, I can but think the record has some points that would be valuable for mothers and sisters to talk over. For instance, the plans for self-government in public and private schools and colleges. It is my earnest belief that some such method would greatly diminish the teachers' cares and increase the pupils' best development. Then my mother's suggestions on the bringing up of children would be good texts on which to talk. Also, the distinguished characters outlined in what I always call "my poor, dear book."

THE UNION SIGNAL is always bright, fresh and entertaining; an extract from that will be in order at every meeting.

"Time cannot dull, nor custom stale its infinite variety."

Our versatile Editor of Publications, Miss Alice Guernsey, can put you on track of the very best leaflets, for she knows them from "A to izzard." Be it remembered, that for one cent a package of our leaflets can be carried around the world. At this rate each Christian Temperance woman may hope to reach some drinker who thinks that nobody cares for his soul; some voter who opposes because he does not understand our purposes; some woman who is at ease in Zion; some little child whose home teaching does not defend him from temptation.

We have had our Membership Crusade, and a grand one it was. It seems to me now that we need a Post-office Crusade. All the world meets at Uncle Sam's delivery window. Blows dealt there are sure and swift. No other method of striking home to consciousness compares with striking here. No other distribution of temperance literature is so direct. If now we had such leaflets as Hannah Whitall Smith's Bible Readings; Mrs. Nichols' "Beer—What It Is and What It Does;" "A German Professor on the Alcohol Question;" "The Delusions of High License;" "The Story of a Great Conviction;" "Doctor and Druggist;" "Society and Society Women;" "The Black Anchor;" "Somebody is Praying for You," sent to those that need them, and sent directly and impersonally from our Publishing House, what a multitude we could touch through the long arms that reach out to every state and nation! Let me urge upon you earnest work, seasoned with prayer, along this new highway of power.

Sitting here in my quiet "Den" at Rest Cottage on this 6th day of December, surrounded by tokens of the love and faith of our white-ribbon army, my heart goes out to each and every one of our local members with a devotion and loyalty greater than I can possibly feel for any other class of women in the world.

May I ask you to read my special message to these faithful comrades as given in my annual address this year? It would be specially gratifying to me if this message might be read to the local unions.

This home of ours, Rest Cottage, is really your home, each and all, in every sense of give and take. If you could hear the prayers that go from our family altar to heaven for you, and for the homes you love so well, I am sure it would be the deepest bond of sympathy that could unite our already trusting hearts to one another.

Believe me, with every tender wish at this happy season of the year (in which dear "St. Courageous" and Anna Gordon earnestly join).

Your loving sister in the blessed service of Christ and of the humanity He came to save,

Frances E. Willard.

SALUTATORY—BY MRS. J. C. FERNALD

Dear W. C. T. U. Workers the world over:

We welcome you all as co-workers together with us in our plan for extension. We have taken for our motto the excellent advice given by Grace Dodge at one of her manual training meetings. When asked how to begin to accomplish the thing desired, she responded; "Educate, Agitate, Co-operate."

It was my great pleasure a few years ago to listen to an address by Bishop Thoburn from Calcutta, India, to the graduating class at Painesville, Ohio. In it he said:

"Life is full of problems, and education helps us to solve them. The scholar is accustomed to sit down to his example. The more difficult it is, the more time and thought he must consume in working it out. Does he give it up because it is difficult? Never! if he is the real scholar. Does he go to his class and say to the teacher, 'The easiest problems I have solved, but the more difficult and intricate I have left until my mind is prepared to grasp them, and I feel more like studying them out. I find my classmates also disposed to let them alone, so we have all concluded to do only what we are able easily and naturally to do.'"

Shall we be such scholars in the great school of life? One of its most intricate problems set before us is this of the temperance question. Shall we leave it alone, or shall we, in our quiet homes, study out the problem, and never rest until it is successfully solved?

You say it is intricate. Yes, there is the addition of woes, terrible beyond description. There is the subtraction of happiness beyond computation. There is the multiplication of sorrows and distresses, and there is the division of estates, of homes, of lives. There are questions of profit and loss—profit to the saloon-keeper, to be balanced by loss to the nation, the state, the church, the community and the home.

There are questions of proportion; if a saloon-keeper pays $200, how many homes worth $2,000, $20,000 or $200,000 may be ruined? How many manly forms may he bring to drunkards' graves? How many mothers' hearts may he break? How many children may he keep barefoot and starving through the cold winter?

Ah, Christian women, is the problem beyond our solving? Shall we not join hands and hearts and brains to study out this stupendous question in its various relations?

Let us call to our aid clear minds that have given their best thought for years to its solution. Let us choose their words rather than our own in presenting these thoughts to others.

Let us sit low at the feet of these teachers and prove diligent and ready scholars.

Let us ask the blessing of the Divine Teacher on our every effort and seek His presence and benediction first of all. Let us pray.

PRAYER.

SINGING.—"I am Thine, O Lord."—Gospel Hymns.

We are glad to choose to-day for our Bible talk from our noble leader, Miss Frances Willard.

*"The Master calleth for thee."—John 2:28.

The last words in this verse are, "The Master has come and calleth for thee." Each principal word in the phrase is like a telescope pointing to a star, luminous and bright. One sister long ago bore this message to another, even as I would gladly carry it to you. Christ himself asked the question, How can ye serve two masters? "Be not many masters," that is the curse of life. "One is your master, even Christ," the Master. Unity is a prerequisite of power.

He is first of all the great Teacher, the Master, not a master. Let us remember then that Christ is the Master, chosen out from all others, not a master contesting the palm with several others; He can never be to us what He must be if we are to attain a Christian character until He is the autocrat of our heart's mystic realm.

Master: One is your master. It is idle to say that we will not take upon ourselves the yoke of Christ because we wish for freedom. All of us have a master. Some yoke is on our necks already. The common vocabulary of the human race proves it. There is no phrase more common than the "god of money," the "god of fashion," the "god of wine." Each heart confesses a master passion. With some it is for love, for fame with others. A quick temper is the master passion of more persons than can be designated by any other single phrase. A passion for adventure sends men into the wilds of Africa with its blazing heat, or to the pallid regions of the pole, where stripped of every comfort and in daily peril of their lives, men spend not only months but years. Nobody says to the adventurer that he shall go; but Schwatka traveled three thousand miles on sledges with the thermometer sixty degrees below zero, and Stanley spent the years of his splendid manhood in the company of the lowest Africans, and in the most vicious climate on the globe. The same law holds good of the athlete, the actor; indeed, of every specialist; he has one master. Alas! so often that master is a tyrant who does not say, "Take my yoke upon you, for I am meek and lowly in heart," but with ruthless force thrusts the yoke upon the neck of poor humanity, perhaps through the laws of heredity, or prenatal influence, or environment, and the man can no more escape them than he can change the color of his eyes.

The golden test of character is in Colossians 3:17, "Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." That is life's topmost round, its loftiest ideal, one that would carry with it happiness for others and for ourselves, and would bring out all the power there is in any one of us. If this is your ideal the forces of the universe are on your side, there is a momentum from the great Parental Spirit of the world. No harm can come to you on any planet if the supreme law that gives unity to your life is this one Master. It is a very practical thing to carry out this law, and if we are sincere it will make Christ master of our money, master of our time, master of our tongues, master of our influence; and if it does not, then what we claim concerning consecration is sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, nothing more.

And calleth: He calls by joy, and I have thought when that suffices He does not call by grief. The sunshine, not the storm, is the preferred method of approach by Him who weareth light as a garment.

In my temperance work I often ask white-ribboners what enlisted them to fight this battle, and in nine cases out of ten I find it was the call of joy. Even as a lovely Southern woman said to me in a city of Virginia where I was forming a society, as she stepped forward to give me her name: "Just because my home has been so bright, because my husband and my sons never wish to spend an evening out, and have no habit that a woman might not cherish, I am glad to give my name and pledge my work. It is a token of my gratitude."

But if we will not be won by the sweet south wind, then comes the tempest, and He who loves us too well to give up calling, sends the call of grief. How many of us have sorrowfully proved that this is true! What scars upon the heart, known perhaps only to God, testify to the scourging of Him who doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men!

Jenny Lind was asked what she thought about when she was singing, and with a rapt gaze she answered, "Oh, I always sing to God!" The words were eloquent; they tell what every life should do—it should sing its noble psalm to God who gave it. Fra Angelico, who has left the most spiritual faces that canvas ever caught, painted always on his knees, and made out of his work his most eloquent prayer. It was so with Frances Havergal. Her rare gifts of poesy were consecrated to Him whom she loved best. Mary A. Lathbury, the dainty creations of whose pencil have enriched so many children's lives in these last years, told me that when converted at fifteen years of age, as she knelt in her prayer of consecration, she definitely asked a heavenly baptism of brain and hand, and consecrated what she knew to be her dawning gifts of song and pencil to Him who is the best friend that woman ever knew. What a heritage is coming to us from that consecration!

He calls by opportunity. A rich man's daughter in the city of Boston told me that when she joined the church, at seventeen years of age, she went to the kind, conservative old pastor, and said: "Now, I have promised loyalty to Christ, and if you know of any way in which I can be of service in the household of faith to which you have admitted me, I want to tell you that it will be the highest joy to work as you direct." She said the kindly face grew puzzled and disturbed, and, after some reflection, the old man said, rejoiced to find a way out of his dilemma: "Why, Nellie, if I should ever find anything in the church that you could do, I'd send and let you know!" She told me that five years had passed since then, in which she had heard nothing. All this is changed. To-day, grown to maturer years, the same lady is a leader in the Foreign Missionary work—that blessed John the Baptist that prepares the way for women, and opens highways to the great causes of home philanthropy—the Woman's Home Missionary work, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its beckoning hand and its stirring voice, "For God and Home and Native Land," the Christian Endeavor Societies, working so bravely "For God and the Church." The King's Daughters, with their glorious motto, "In His Name." He calls by opportunities like these, in a more winsome voice than Christian women ever heard before.

RECITATION.

"WHATSOEVER THOU DOEST, DO QUICKLY."

A. E. R.

"Whatsoever thou doest, do quickly,"
The moments are flying apace;
Each one of them precious in privilege,
How soon will they finish their race:
And not time but eternity open,
The gates on the vistas before;
With all wasted time passed by forever,
And nothing of treasure in store.

"Whatsoever thou doest, do quickly,"
Hast thou given the Savior thy heart?
Wait not till to-morrow for action,
But take now for Heaven the start;
Each day makes thy coming more doubtful,
The fetters of sin growing strong,
Are tightening their hold of thy heart-strings,
Will hold thee forever ere long.

"Whatsoever thou doest, do quickly,"
Say not there is nothing to do,
But do rather the work that is nearest,
For that is the work best for you;
Dream not of great deeds in the future,
And wait till they come to thy hand;
Allowing the moments that vanish,
To slip by as thou idly dost stand.

"Whatsoever thou doest, do quickly,"
Heed not the world's praise nor its blame,
It may scoff in its pride at thy mission,
And cast at thee titles of shame;
But the moments are flying so quickly,
No time can we waste as they go;
When we think of the judgment awaiting,
And remember, we'll reap as we sow.

"Whatsoever thou doest, do quickly,"
The future will well repay all
The care, and the trouble, and anguish,
The scorn, and the cross and the toil,
If only the crown will be radiant
With gems we have gathered in tears;
And the Lord say, "Well done, faithful servant,"
Thou'st done what thou couldst in thy years.

"Whatsoever thou doest, do quickly,"
The flesh is so weak, but we know
That the grace of the Lord is sufficient
To help us each step as we go;
So we cry in our weakness, as children,
To the Father in Heaven for grace;
That He'd give us the courage so needful,
And help us the rest of our race.

CLOSING WORDS.

OUR TRUST IN JEHOVAH.

There shall come a time—it is coming even now—we hear the steps of God's viewless warriors through all the upper air, when, in many a want and sorrow-stricken home, little children, clinging to the mother's tattered gown, shall ask, "Oh, mamma! is it true that bad men can't sell papa liquor any more, and he will buy bread and clothes and shoes for us; and will he be kind, and love us all as he used to do?" And the mother will answer through tears of joy, "Yes, my darlings, it's true! thank God, it's true." Mothers and wives, with faces yet worn and care-lined, but with a light as of a new youth in their eyes, shall hasten to meet each other, and rejoice together, with joy greater than their own hearts can hold. The joy must be brought to God. There will be such a Thanksgiving Day as was never known in all our history; church bells ringing peals of joy, hundreds crowding to the sanctuary, even the tempted and almost ruined swelling the crowd with hope in their hearts, that what no strength of shattered will could do, may now, at length, be done, by the helpful providence of God, who hath broken the snare, to let the oppressed go free, and brought government up to its great duty of shielding the citizen against the destroyer, and staying the faltering steps of those who would else go down to death. Such will come with trembling hope that now, at length, they may find the grace of Christ and be redeemed. A host of young men whom the occasional glass now keeps from the cross and the church of Christ, shall come crowding to the sanctuary of their God. A revival shall begin, such as shall be a light and star in all coming story.

From all Columbia's hills and vales and forest-crowned slopes and flashing streams shall go up one triumphant shout, Alleluia, Alleluia, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. From height to height across all the broad land the watchmen shall answer. From New England's rocky hills and wave-resounding shore, the Atlantic surges shall thunder Alleluia; prairie hamlet and village and city shall answer the anthem, as they brighten at the advancing sunrise, the still heights of the Rocky Mountains shall re-echo the shout far up in heaven, and all the Pacific shore respond with glad reply.

Other lands will hear the far echo of our triumph, and in many a sad home far over the sea, the hearts of fathers and mothers, wives and children shall turn with plaintive hope and prayer along the track of the westering sun toward that land where at last men can be free from the tolerated and legalized curse of intemperance. They shall come to the light of that better freedom, saying, "We will go with you for we have heard that God is with you!"

There shall be joy in the presence of the angels of God. The heart of Christ shall be glad in heaven over this new triumph and reward of the travail of His soul.

Onward speed thy conquering flight,
Angel, onward fly!
Long has been the reign of night,
Bring the morning nigh!
Tread the idols in the dust!
Heathen fanes destroy!
Spread the Gospel's holy trust!
Spread the Gospel's joy!

DOXOLOGY.—"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

Our Children.

"WHAT BOYS CAN DO."

BY MRS. ANNA STAFFORD JEANS.

[Written for her little boy, Philip, to speak at a Loyal Temperance Legion meeting.]

So many people seem to think
That just because we're boys,
We're not of any earthly use
Except to make a noise.

But these wise and earnest ladies
Of the W. C. T. U.
Have banded us all together,
A "Loyal Legion" true.

They see the possibilities
In boys like you and me,
The future hope of their dear cause,
Their aids to victory.

For "National Prohibition,"
The object is in view;
And when we all are grown up men
We'll see what we can do.

We'll vote for it and work for it
With all our might and main,
'Till from this blessed land of ours
Is wiped its dreadful stain,

And like the boys who chased the geese,
The smallest in the van,
And routed them, and scouted them,
Nor lost a single man,

We'll fight our foe, "Intemperance,"
Until it turns in flight,
And ours the bloodless victory
In battle for the right.

HOW SEVEN LITTLE GIRLS RAISED MONEY FOR THE TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

BY MRS. A. E. SIGSBEE.

"Oh, dear!" said Bessie Freeman as she stood with her class in the yard after the Loyal Temperance Legion had been dismissed, "I do wish our class could do something to help build the Temperance Temple."

"Why can't we, if we want to, just as well as others?" said little Amy Dutton, who was the smallest and youngest of the seven. "My mother always tells Georgie and me when anything needs doing, 'Where there's a will there's a way.' "

"That's easily said," exclaimed Jane Hammond, who was the oldest and biggest in the class; "you just find the way and we will find the will, and see how much we'll get. Miss Ames said she hoped every member would give something, if it was ever so little, by the end of the month, but if I give anything I want to give as much as any one!"

"That is not the spirit at all. You know she told us that when the Temple of Jerusalem was built, the people all gave what they could, and gifts were brought from all over the land to help build the Temple. And that is just what they are doing to build the Woman's Temperance Temple. Why, I read in THE UNION SIGNAL the other day of a woman eighty years old, who was very poor, but wanted to give something towards the Temple, so she saved for a long time till she had a dollar, which she gave. Yes, and they have sent even from Africa, and Japan and China, and O! I can't tell how many other countries to help build this Temple in Chicago which is to stand for the world's memorial temperance offering. Isn't that grand?" said Bessie.

All joined in the talk except Sadie Fisher, who stood intently listening and wistfully looking on. She was the only one out of six children who had clothes fit to attend the meetings. Her father was a day laborer and spent nearly all his weekly earnings as regularly as pay day came at Duncan's saloon. With the proprietor's eye always watching the pay day, he had no trouble in getting whisky on credit during the week. The mother took in washing, using every cent of her hard earnings for food and shelter.

So Sadie could think of no way to get even the smallest mite; she stepped forward and timidly said, "We can all pray that the Lord will show us some way to make money for the Temple," softly adding, "but I am afraid praying won't help me." Just then the eyes of all looked over her neat but scanty garments, shabby shoes, and probably, had their thoughts been expressed, would have said, "I am afraid so too."

"Oh, but that is not the way we must pray. You know our text on the board was, 'Whatsoever ye ask in faith, believing ye shall receive, it shall be given you,' and I know it will be right to pray to help give to the Temple. And now let us all pray to make some money and believe we shall get just what we ask for. If we are the smallest class in the Legion, I believe we can do something," said Bessie, who waxed warm in her enthusiasm. And they parted, each one going to her home.

During the week every member of the class received a tiny note of invitation to be present at Bessie Freeman's birthday party on Saturday at three p. m.

They all came but Sadie, who staid at home to help her mother. She had not forgotten to pray, and you shall hear how her prayer was answered.

At the party, the plans for raising money for the Temple was the theme of conversation. "I know what I can do," said Bessie, "I can give my chickens when they are hatched; there are thirteen eggs, but it will take too long to wait until they are big enough."

"Oh! I know what every one of us can do. We can just do as they do in Lent," said Amy.

"Lent, what's that?" asked several.

"Why, don't you know? Every one of us can do without something. We can do without something to eat, or to wear, or if we are going on a visit, we can stay at home and save the money it would cost and give to the Temple. You know that's the way our church does when we have Lent. Last Lent I did without butter the whole season, and mamma gave me seventy-five cents which I gave for church work, and I will do the same for the Temple. I know she will give me as much."

"I can do without the new dress my mother promised me," said another.

"I know what I could do without, but I don't know whether I will; that is the new sash which will cost a dollar and a half," said another. "I could wear my old one. Oh, we must all do something."

"Yes," said Emma Long, "and who knows but we'll be the banner class. I guess I will have to wear my old hat, and do without the new one I was going to get."

"I don't know what I can do without unless it is a book that I want so much; I have been saving my money for a long time. I have seventy-five cents now, and the book costs a dollar. Papa promised twenty cents if I got the rest," another said. Each one had answered for herself what she could or would do except Sadie Fisher, who was helping bear the home burdens.

"There's Sadie," said Bessie, "we mustn't leave her out. But what can she do? She has but little to wear, and often not much to eat. She could have enough, and so could all the rest, if her father only brought the money home that he spends for whisky. It just seems too bad that they have such places to spend money in."

"Yes, and it's a perfect shame, that is just what it is, that any Christian will vote for saloons; that's just what my mother told papa when he voted for high license," said Jane Hammond.

"Oh, I know what Sadie can do; she can get baby names to go in the Temple," said Bessie. "That will count more than all the rest, for you know they are called babies until they are six years old. There's Mrs. Ellis has two, and so has Mrs. Jones. That counts; I know there are as many as forty or fifty babies in our town. She must begin right away."

"That is the best thing yet. If we could go around and help get names we would not have to do without anything," said Jane.

"Oh, but that wouldn't be right. Just let Sadie have that job herself, she has a hard time any way. I will tell her what she is to do, to-morrow."

So it was settled that each one would do something and put the money all together and give it to Miss Ames, their teacher.

Sadie was very much surprised when Bessie told her what she was to do. The burden she had carried all the week was gone, and when Bessie left, she said to herself: "I could not think of a single thing I could do," adding softly, "I wonder if it is an answer to my prayer?"

When the time arrived, each class had an offering ready. Miss Ames' class, being the smallest in the Legion, came last, and when the amount given by them (nine dollars and fifty cents) was named, surprise was manifest on every countenance.

Miss Ames stepped to the front, and after telling the different ways in which the money had been raised, said: "I think what this class of small children has done in denying themselves for Christ's sake, would shame many of us older Christians. Some complain about the Temperance Temple costing too much, a million dollars! Why, many of our churches cost a hundred thousand or more, and that is only for a single denomination. Some of our state-houses cost several millions, that is just for one state. No complaint is made about having a nice church or a magnificent state-house. Why, then, should we think a million dollars too much for this Temperance Temple, when it memorializes an issue which embraces the whole world? It will be built by voluntary offerings coming from all over the world. Even Africa, China, and Japan have sent in their gifts, and we stand wondering and complaining about the cost! You remember how the poor woman brought her box of precious ointment and poured it over the Master's feet? There were men there who complained about such a costly waste; you remember His answer? This is a great moral issue, such an issue as has never been in all the history of the world, which is but the incarnation of Himself who has said: 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.' Now it is in memorial of this issue that this Woman's Temperance Temple is to be built, and just think how quickly it would stand as an object lesson before the world if all the women would follow the example of the smallest class in the Legion, and go and do likewise."

INSPIRING CONFIDENCE.

Henry Ward Beecher certainly owed a debt of gratitude to his teacher in mathematics, not only for the knowledge acquired through his tuition, but for lessons tending to strength of character. He tells this story to illustrate the teacher's method.

He was sent to the blackboard, and went, uncertain, soft, full of whimpering.

"That lesson must be learned," said the teacher, in a very quiet tone, but with a terrible intensity. All explanations and excuses he trod under foot with utter scornfulness. "I want that problem; I don't want any reasons why I don't get it," he would say.

"I did study it two hours."

"That's nothing to me; I want the lesson. You need not study it at all, or you may study it ten hours, just to suit yourself. I want the lesson."

"It was tough for a green boy," says Beecher, "but it seasoned him. In less than a month I had the most intense sense of intellectual independence and courage to defend my recitations. His cold and calm voice would fall upon me in the midst of a demonstration, 'No!'

"I hesitated, and then went back to the beginning, and on reaching the same spot again, 'No!' uttered with the tone of conviction, barred my progress.

" 'The next,' and I sat down in red confusion.

"He, too, was stopped with 'No!' but went right on, finished, and, as he sat down, was rewarded with, 'Very well.'

" 'Why!' whimpered I, 'I recited it just as he did, and you said 'No!'

" 'Why didn't you say 'Yes!' and stick to it? It is not enough to know your lesson. You must know that you know it. You have learned nothing till you are sure. If all the world says 'No!' your business is to say 'Yes!' and prove it.' "—Youth's Companion.

A CHAPTER OF BLUNDERS.

The Midget corrects Captain Mary of making a big mistake, two of them. I said that its editor was eleven years old when she is only eight, and that the subscription price of The Midget is a quarter when it is only a dime. The way the last mistake came about may have been that knowing how much it costs to run a paper I thought it was not possible to publish such a nice paper as The Midget every month for a year for less than twenty-five cents, and I am sure that to edit it so well as is done would be good work for a girl eleven years old, and, of course is much more wonderful when done by a child of eight.

But the real trouble was that I did not have a copy of The Midget by me when I wrote; I heard about the paper and saw it at the Ohio convention, but did not have a copy for my very own to take home; so my memory played me tricks. And it did just the same thing about the name of the dear little girl who spoke "The First President," at Atlanta. Just think of calling her a Broadax, yet that is just what I did. I did not have her name and did not remember it rightly. But in the Stenographic Report it is all right, little Louise Broadstone, and a dear little girl she is. If she were my little girl, however, I should not like to have her up so late nights as she had to be at the convention. I would rather have her asleep in her own home gaining strength to grow into the noble, healthy woman we wish her to become, than to have her delight even such grand audiences as she did at Chillicothe and Atlanta. I am just that old-fashioned.

I wish every one of you could read the beautiful story of the Christ-child in the December Kindergarten, for I am sure it would make you more full of the blessed Christmas spirit. After all, the best part of Christmas is having the Christ-child come into our hearts, as He came into Mary's arms at Bethlehem.

CAPTAIN MARY.

The Household.

IN MIDDLE LIFE.

BY AUGUSTA TEALL STOCK.

I bore my life as a heavy load,
No thanks to the Author giving,
And I thought, as I plodded a weary round,
That I was tired of living.

I came one day to the entrance gray
Of the realm unknown to mortals,
But my Father's hand led me back again
To the old familiar portals.

And I find there's a joy in the common air,
In the green stretch of the meadow,
In the human face, in the human voice,
In life's varied light and shadow.

And I've come to think, while we're here on earth,
Whatever our days are giving,
That nothing is quite so noble and true
As to gather the good of living.

The things that are not—tell them all "Good-bye,"
Use your life, with its joys and sorrows;
And, trust me, that life can be wealth for you,
With a store of glad to-morrows.

MOTHERS' INFLUENCE ON POSTERITY.

BY MRS. C. R. M'CARTNEY.

I have, at times, as doubtless most mothers have, been deeply impressed with a sense of my responsibilities as a mother. I have thought of my children as being, in a very few years, the busy, active men and women of the day, helping forward the cause of right and justice and goodness, or taking their stand on the side of the enemy, and dragging themselves and others down to wreck and ruin. And I have trembled at the thought that I have now a say as to which it shall be. But I confess that until lately my vision stopped there. I thought not of my influence on my posterity of succeeding generations. I will ask you, mothers, to come and make a few calculations with me.

Suppose one of you to have five children, and that they in their turn will each be the parent of five children. Suppose these twenty-five grandchildren also to be each the parent of five children. You have one hundred and twenty-five great-grandchildren. Now that is not a far-off thing. It lies in the near future; yes, you might almost say in the present, for many of you will probably live to see your great-grandchildren. I know, and doubtless you do too, many hale, hearty great-grandmothers. But let us proceed in our calculations one step further and there are six hundred and twenty-five human beings—immortals, who, in form, in complexion, in vivacity, in intelligence, in morality, in religion, in destiny, are, in a great degree, shaped, colored, moulded, propelled by the influence which you, mother, living in ———, in the year ——, are now, at this time, exerting.

You are familiar with the story of Rip Van Winkle, who slept for twenty-eight years, and waked up to find such marvelous changes. Let us, mothers, close our eyes and take a long, long sleep—longer than his. Let us sleep for several generations—sleep till these multitudes, which we have been computing, are treading with busy feet the tortuous mazes of life.

An angel, with dark-lantern in hand, glides into the silent room. At his gentle touch a sleeper awakes to consciousness, though the body sleeps on. On the wings of the Light your guide has transported you far hence. You stand with him all unseen at the entrance of a bar-room. It is blazing with light, and the clatter of glasses and the din of angry voices reach your ear. The door opens and a man staggers out and falls heavily on the pavement, and the gushing blood reaches to your feet. Instinctively you stoop down to help the fallen, but you recoil with a shudder as the angel flashes his mystic torch full on his face and reveals to your spirit's ken that your own flesh and blood lies before you. Ere you have time to collect your bewildered thoughts, your guide has transported you back three generations, and you are in a small, comfortable house in your native town. The door of the pantry stands open, and you see inside a young, pale-faced woman. She leans her head on her hands and sighs as though her head ached. She opens a private press in the pantry and, taking down a bottle of spirits, pours out a half glass and drinks, and as she resumes her seat, with lightened step and enlivened eye, the angel's light falls upon her and illumines that countenance, and you recognize your own self of former days—and immediately the mystic torch is turned around and the hidden cord that binds these two scenes is lighted up with a lurid glare. Now the angel is at your side, mother. Arise in spirit and follow him. One sweep of his wing and you are in the streets of a great city. It is late at night. The sober, respectable citizens are in their homes, retired to rest. Who are those women walking the streets at this hour of the night? What gaudy attire for such a time and place! There comes meeting them a simple young man, now proceeding to his place of abode. With bold effrontery they accost him, and as they turn with him and pass you by, the painted cheek and brazen brow, and shameless talk, tell you that you are in near proximity to a pair of the abandoned women of the town. With natural revulsion you gather yourself together, lest the hem of their garments should graze your feet; but in that instant the revealing light of the angel envelops them, and in dismay you hide your face from your own posterity.

Snatching you from the humiliating scene, the angel seats you in your own happy home of early wifehood and motherhood. A fair young woman reclines on a sofa, dressed in a loose morning robe, with hair dishevelled and a dime novel in her hand. The cheeks are fevered and the eyelashes sometimes wet as she pores over the alluring page. The hours of night are passing, but she heeds them not. She fears not disturbance, for her husband's business takes him from home many days at a time. At length the book drops from her hands and she lies dreamily gazing at the dying embers, voluptuously revelling in the details of the licentious story.

Curiosity tempts you to pick up the book and learn its name, for it has a familiar look. As you do so the angel holds his lantern so that you may read the title, and in its light a ruby on the finger of the dreamer flashes in your eye, and lo! it is your own wedding ring! Turning your gaze down Time's pathway, the electric light of your guide sparkles along the invisible but indissoluble cord that joins the woman on the sofa with the women on the street.

Once more the angel enters the room and this time his touch awakens you. Away you fly with him, and in an instant you are gazing through the bars of a prison cell. A young man—a mere boy—is the lonely occupant. Already crime has written its characters on his face, and you wonder that one so young should have found such a lodging. With the angel's leave you inquire of his jailer, how came he hither? He tells you that several times he had been arrested for petty thieving and that his last act was to open a money-safe, and that as he was about to abstract the gold, the night-watchman had sprung upon him, and in the scuffle that ensued, the boy had drawn a revolver and shot the man so that he died the next day. You sigh as you turn away from the poor lad, who must spend weary months and years in that cheerless cell. Carelessly you ask his name, and a tremor goes through you as there falls on your ear a name, strange and meaningless to the outside world, but familiar and fraught with meaning to you. Surely it cannot be, you think to yourself, but who else outside of my family would think of giving such a name?

With the speed of lightning your angel guide has caught you up and you are seated in a railway car. The express is slowing for the last stop before reaching the metropolis. The whistle has sounded; the conductor has shouted the name of the station; passengers here and there are hastily collecting the various articles. One of them is the lady in the seat with you. As she abruptly rises something falls into your lap. It feels like a purse, but it is dark, you cannot see. She steps forward to go out. She has not noticed it. You had wished so much to buy a winter wrap when in the city, but you had not money enough to buy it and the other things you must purchase. The purse feels heavy—you could get it easily now. I hope she will not miss it till the train has started. No! We are off. No one knows. No one has seen it. I did not steal it from her. It dropped into my lap. Surely it was a providential incident. Looking up at your angel guide he turns the eye of his mysterious lantern and sends its light flashing along the line from the purse in your lap to that desolate prisoner in the cell.

The rustle of a wing is heard again in the sleeping-hall and the touch of the angel is on your hand. With his invisible power he bears you away to a city of the far west. You are in the midst of an immense gathering. You are pushed forward by the seething, surging crowd until you are in front of a scaffold. A middle-aged man is there, with hands bound and the rope around his neck. The clergyman, with Bible in hand, is endeavoring to extend to the wretched man the mercy which cometh from above. The executioner stands, cap in hand, ready to let the drop fall. But ere the pale, haggard features are hid forever from human eye, your guide holds up his torch and illumines for a moment, with ghastly gleam, the countenance of the murderer, and reveals to you that the miserable being before you, who is about to be ushered into the presence of his Maker, is your own offspring! With a cry of horror you clutch at the arm of your guide, and he bears you away from the dreadful scene, and places you in an elegant little country home. A pretty, girlish wife is stepping lightly around from room to room, giving a touch here and a touch there. Everything is neat and orderly. But a frown clouds the pretty face as she enters the apartment which an hour before she had left faultless in its arrangement. Her husband is lying on the lounge; his wet shoes drying on the newly whitened hearth, his hat and coat are flung on the table; his manuscripts are scattered over the room. The cloud deepens. Her cheeks flush with rage and she seizes the shoes and dashes them through the window-pane and gathering up the scattered leaves and crushing them in her wrath, she flings them into the flames ere he has time to remonstrate. Memory is at work and your head sinks with grief and shame, as the mysterious torch once more sends its unerring flash along the line that links the hand, which in a moment's wrath, destroys the labor of months, and the hand of that murderer, who in a frenzy of passion, plunged the dagger into a brother's blood.

Mothers! mothers! mothers! "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness."—II Peter 3: 11.

"Oh! that there were such a heart in them that they would fear me and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them and with their children forever."—Deut. 5: 29.

THE ART OF GIFT-MAKING.

The secret of success in gift-making is not in the expending of large sums, but in loving thought upon each gift provided. Everything is usually successful in proportion to the amount of thought that has been put into it, whether it be a banquet, a costume, a book, or the making of a simple gift. If you are cramped for money, do not think you need to spend much for Christmas gifts. The thought shown in a loving Christmas letter, a simple verse, or a pen and ink sketch, may give as genuine pleasure as a present of pearls. Reflect well upon the peculiarities and needs of the friend whom you wish to please. Then choose your gift carefully. Finally, after it is chosen and delivered, do not refer to it again in the way of self-congratulation upon your cleverness.

This was a peculiarity of a certain old lady who was not ungenerous. She had an invariable habit of contemplating the gifts which she had presented with great and undisguised satisfaction. "How glad I am," she would exclaim, "that I found just that chair for you! How much comfort you must take in it, and how nicely it suits your room!" Or, again: "I enjoy looking at that picture every time I come here. It is a great pleasure to me to think that I made such a good selection." The recipients of her favors naturally felt rather overwhelmed by them. The high value placed upon them is embarrassing. One thinks, "How can I ever do anything for her which will seem to her half a return?" It is a good plan when a gift is bestowed to let the matter, as far as you are concerned, drop out of mind.—Harper's Magazine.

WHAT A MAGAZINE COSTS.

"Few readers of American magazines," said a prominent publisher the other day, "know what it costs to produce even a single issue of one of the great monthly periodicals which now stand at the head of publications of their class, the world over. The illustrations for the Century and Harper's Magazine cost on an average about $5,000 per month, but with these two established magazines the cost is diminishing rather than increasing, as both are using the 'process engraving' more and more. With Scribner's, on the other hand, large sums of money are being expended upon the engravings, as this young periodical seems determined to equal its older contemporaries at no matter what cost. A careful estimate of the money spent in illustrating the Christmas numbers of Harper's and Scribner's puts the sum at $7,000 each, as both magazines contain about seventy pictures, the average being about $100 for an engraving. Many of the full page 'blocks' cost $300 each, and some of the half-page illustrations, which readers often pass by unnoticed, cost from $200 to $250 each. These prices are easily accounted for when it is remembered that men like J. Allen Weir, Elihu Vedder, Will H. Low, A. B. Frost, receive from $100 to $150 a drawing. Ten years ago the highest price paid for the same work was $50 a drawing for a full page illustration. As to the literary matter—the expense for articles and stories—a large proportion is prepared to order, costing on an average about $25 a printed page, and I have known $100 a page to be demanded. The 'fixed charges' on the large magazines for literary and artistic matter alone is therefore from $8,000 to $10,000 a month, enough to eat up the profits on 100,000 copies."—New England Homestead.

THERE is no thought so grand but what the flavor of religion can enrich; there is no thought the output of a Christian faith, but what is noble; there is no noble thought evolved, but gives the mind some growth and sturdiness, as the tiny shoots endow the parent stem.

Fear not, O Jacob, my servant, and thou Jeshurun, whom I have chosen. For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring —Isa. 44: 2, 3.

PLATFORMS.

There is a good deal of variety in the platforms offered by the Prohibitionists of the several states, and they sometimes, in one or more features, lack dignity or lack wisdom. While uniformity is in itself no object, a somewhat complete concurrence of temper in all the formal expressions of the party, indicates strength, and adds to that strength. It seems to us that Prohibitionists would do well to leave to the two old parties all acrimonious criticism of opponents, and to satisfy themselves with a clear definition of their own position. The sweeping way in which Republicans condemn all Democratic action, and the unhesitating manner in which the Democrats retort on the Republicans, give to our current politics a very captious and dishonest character. We see at once that these words stand for prejudices, not convictions; are shaped for narrow partisan purposes and not for the well-being of all. The "all" the Republican pursues scarcely includes the Democrat, and "the country" the Democrat is defending is made up chiefly of his own party. Party policy and party opinion are the program of principles.

The Prohibitionists would do well to leave—at least in their platform, which should be a grave and reserved statement of general truths—detraction, perversion and wholesale condemnation to the old parties with whom they have become the staple of politics. Any sharp cuts, or well-merited censure they may bestow on their adversaries on the weighty occasion of a state or National convention, will be more than compensated in their value by their apparent participation in a method which has so long lost even the semblance of honesty. Their platforms should show none of that temper which reduces abuse to a science. Their forbearance in this regard will not only evince a superior hold on righteousness, it will also have the winning power of something new, pure, temperate and self-contained in the arena of political strife.

A yet more important direction in which their platforms should show the wisdom of reserve is in the adoption of specific measures from the numerous organizations which are seeking the improvement of one or another class of citizens. They ought to have a hearty sympathy with most, if not all, of these efforts. They may well express that sympathy in general terms. The measures, however, which are proposed in furtherance of these desirable ends, are not, unfrequently, of doubtful wisdom, or wholly inadmissible. Any acceptance of these devices in detail by Prohibitionists is premature. It can only be done advantageously when general discussion has been directed to them, and something approaching unanimity of opinion has been reached. The party necessarily bears a good deal of the reproach of being hare-brained, impractical, speculative. Prohibitionists ought not needlessly to add to this impression. They will certainly do so, if, with any complacency, they allow doubtful planks to be added to their platform, simply because they bear the label of reform. For the sake of the great and very difficult undertaking they have preëminently espoused, they must show some caution and reserve in reference to projects which have not been sifted; which have not, in fact, reached the foreground. If, as they move forward, they are to gather in every crotchet, as a sheep catches burs, they will soon present a most discouraging and disreputable appearance. This is not a superfluous caution, as shown by both national and state platforms.

While they should leave no doubt as to the breadth and depth of their philanthropy, they should not stand in the door of their tent to entice in every man who is at large with a scheme of improvement in his head or his hand. It is high time that Prohibitionists fully appreciated how great, how difficult, how far-reaching is the undertaking to which they are committed; what sobriety of counsel it calls for; what patient waiting for the vindication and diffusion of first principles. Our strength lies chiefly in the tenacity with which we hold and defend a few impregnable positions. The community will come to recognize their character, if we are possessed of absolute patience and untiring reiteration. Events work for us, in that all the devices of our adversaries lead from evil to yet deeper evil; from error to overthrow. The moment men wish to go forward they will look to us for leadership. Prohibition platforms ought, therefore, with fullness, sobriety, and convincing statement, to unfold our primary purpose in all its changing variety of relation. They should plant the standard in its old position in fresh colors, as if it were for the first time unfurled.

They should add to this amplified and glorified declaration the companion principle, succinctly and unwaveringly stated, which the party has with discussion, deliberation and conviction accepted, that of universal suffrage. They may, from this high social and political position, send forth words of encouragement to more remote and more isolated efforts, but they should not aim to make the camp of Prohibitionists a common rendezvous for the schemy and discontented of every stripe. Their bid for votes must be purely a matter of principle, or, in very victory they will find themselves involved in that perpetual failure which dogs the footsteps of political cunning.

NEW JOURNALISTIC VENTURES.

Nothing indicates more truly the trend of thought than the multiplication of books and papers treating of social questions. The latest journal of this kind is The Brotherhood, of Boston. It strikes one as at once singular and suggestive, that all the officers and directors of the Brotherhood Society, whose organ the paper is, are ladies, Mrs. Mary E. Chapin, being president; Mrs. Lucy Lee Norris, secretary, and Mrs. Abby Morton Diaz, one of the directors. From the salutatory we learn that the society makes all its observations from the standpoint, "God is our Father, and we are brethren;" that its work will be largely educational based upon the ethical and spiritual; a work for which women are eminently fitted, hence it is largely the work of women.

The paper proposes to put thought against thought in open fairness, by employing the best and most candid writers to represent all sides of great questions, having the different sides presented in the same weekly issue. For example, in this opening number, Col. Albert Clark writes in favor of protective tariff, and William Lloyd Garrison against it.

Here are some extracts from its leading editorials showing the spirit which actuates its founders:

"We have as much right to sin in our individual capacity as in that of a corporation, trust or state. All legislation and all commercial combinations must first conserve the ends of brotherhood, must first become instruments of the public weal.

"We must carry our religion into our economics, into business and politics. This is not asking too much. It will make business a sacred service. Yes, we propose not less than Christ proposed—the Kingdom of Heaven here on earth. We believe that the soul-inspiring life which Christ lived, will some day so possess the lives of people as to expel all self-seeking. Then man will live for the good he can do, and the words, 'The Kingdom of Heaven is within you,' will have a meaning, and 'Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven,' will be understood. * * *

"Poverty as both cause and effect of misery and crime; the ever-present saloon as both cause and effect; free-born women with hearts aching to be free; ever-increasing opulence and its accompaniment, poverty; the ever-developing questions in the political and economic world; what is to be and what not to be; are all great open doors before us which we hope to enter, how well to occupy the world will judge."

That our sisters across the water have taken up press work in earnest is evinced by the appearance of "The National Bulletin, for the use of journalists only," edited by Mrs. Ward Poole, superintendent of the press department of the British Women's Temperance Association. This sheet is issued weekly, and demonstrates the ability of Mrs. Poole to successfully conduct the department assigned her. The Bulletin is filled with just the kind of paragraphs editors will be glad to use, bringing news of temperance work done all over the globe—by the B. W. T. A. itself, by the United Kingdom Alliance, the Army Temperance Association, the Royal Navy Temperance Society, the Bands of Hope, the Order of Rechabites, the Coffee House Associations, the British Medical Temperance Association, the American W. C. T. U. and other organizations. Work reported is done in various parts of the British Isles, in Norway, Finland, Vienna, Paris, Australia, Russia, Iowa, Nebraska, Ontario, and other places.

From the Bulletin we learn that the only actual total abstinence society in Russia was formed three years ago by Count Tolstoi; that the government would not allow him to print its rules, but in spite of opposition it now numbers one thousand members.

The British Medical Temperance Association now enrolls four hundred and twenty active members, medical practitioners, and one hundred and thirty associates, medical students. It has offered prizes of ten and of five pounds to medical students in the third year, for the best written examinations on alcohol and its effects upon the body. That non-alcoholic medication is gaining the respect of leaders in the profession is shown by the fact that at the recent temperance celebration held in Dublin, the president of the Royal College of Physicians and the president of the Royal College of Surgeons were both present.

The hall of the College of Physicians was used for the breakfast which was given to Dr. B. W. Richardson, which was a happy innovation, as the college reserves the use of the hall exclusively for meetings of the Academy of Medicine. Sir Wilfred Lawson was one of the speakers.

There are 13,486 members of the Army Temperance Association, all total abstainers. At the end of May, 1890, the military branches were one hundred and fifty-eight, and the civilian branches eight, the latter containing one hundred and ninety-eight members, and the entire membership was 14,318. The officers' branch of the Royal Naval Temperance Society, which includes officers of all grades, numbers over a hundred members. The rank and file consists of some thousands. The temperance men are very energetic in forming committees on their appointment to fresh ships.

At the Sailors' Rest at Portsmouth, one of the cabins was given by the Empress Frederick, of Germany. A beautiful portrait of her sailor son, H. R. H., Prince Henry, hangs in it. When the Lords of the Admiralty visited the Sailors' Rest, they expressed much pleasure with these comfortable places. Miss Weston hopes to extend the work, and proposes to build a new block, containing recreation and reading rooms, and 120 more cabins, as the beds are engaged three nights in advance, so greatly are they appreciated by the sailors. "Your only difficulty," said an officer, writing to Miss Weston, and enclosing £15 to found a cabin at the Sailors' Rest for seven years, "will be this, that every man whose name is on the long list I enclose, declares that, when the ship arrives at home, he will sleep in this particular cabin!"

Our English friends seem to have reached a class we have not yet drawn within our lines. Temperance work among showmen is rapidly progressing. There are about 50,000 people in the country who travel about in caravans, out of which 7,000 have signed the pledge at the meetings of the Travelers' National Total Abstinence Union. The union was formed at York eight years ago, and is proving a great security for the show people, as three-fourths of them are true to their pledge. They have a quarterly organ called The Caravan, and 2,500 copies are regularly sent out. When the show people came to London for a six weeks' residence in the metropolis, Mrs. Stewart, of the British Women's Temperance Association, and others, started a school for the children. Instruction was given by voluntary helpers, and an average of forty children attended every day.

During last year, in England, fourteen hundred women were rescued from the streets. Out of this number respectable employment was found for over a thousand. General Booth (through whose agency this has been effected) says, "Experience and averages carefully calculated for several years, prove that only thirty-five per cent return who are thus helped. Sixty-five per cent are altered characters." In this work the principle of total abstinence is as important as the shibboleth of faith.

The Glasgow Auxiliary Branch of the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Traffic, recently held a public meeting in the City Hall, Glasgow. Canon Wilberforce, in his address, referred to the opium wars, which he said England was responsible for. Dr. Dudgeon, from Peking, spoke of the wrongs inflicted on the people of China by the traffic in opium, and said the Chinese were as strongly opposed to the traffic now as they were before the two wars which arose out of the action of the British Government forcing opium upon them.

There are three suburban estates in London owned by the Artisans, Laborers and General Dwellings Company, Limited, containing 4,400 houses, but no shops for the sale of intoxicants. The annual rental during 1889, payable on the property, came to £104.000. The rent not recoverable from all causes, amounted to less than three shillings, six pence for each £100.

Special Difficulties.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

The press of other matter has crowded out this department for several weeks. We make amends by giving it larger space this time.

QUERY 1.—Is a woman expected to sign any pledge in order to be considered a loyal member of the W. C. T. U., or can she become a member by putting on the white ribbon?

QUERY 2.—If a woman signs our pledge, but does not join the union by paying membership dues, has she a right to wear the white ribbon?

ANSWER.—She must sign the total abstinence pledge, and pay her dues to some local union. The conditions of membership are unvarying throughout our ranks, signing the pledge and paying dues.

QUERY.—In the eighth volume of the Riverside Library for Young People, by Miss E. Chester she quotes Dr. Weir Mitchell, who declares that nervous diseases among women have destroyed the happiness of more families than intemperance; is this in any measure true, and if so, how much of the nervous diseases is indirectly due to intemperance?

ANS.—That nervousness among women is a great foe to domestic happiness, no one doubts; that it has destroyed the happiness of more famiiies than intemperance has, few believe. The burden of proof rests on the one making an assertion, not on the one denying it. Let Dr. Mitchell bring on the proof of his statement and we will try to overbalance it.

No categorical answer can be given to the second question, but the best medical authorities agree in tracing a large share of nervous diseases among women to the hereditary effects of alcohol and tobacco, and to the poisonous effects upon women and children of tobacco used by the husband in the home. All physicians agree that what is transmitted in alcoholic heredity is not simply an appetite for liquor, but a weakened and diseased nervous organism; this may manifest itself in the drink craving, or in hysteria, epilepsy or the myriad other forms of nervous disease. The daughters of drinkers are most liable to suffer in this way, while the sons become prey to the drink mania. This subject is treated much more fully than is possible here, in "Childhood, its Care and Culture," where the testimony of Dr. Henry N. Hurd, superintendent of Johns Hopkins Hospital, and other noted physicians is given.

A lady quotes from a paper in the Century, written by E. J. Glave, one of Stanley's officers, "Nature has provided the African with the juice of the palm tree, a most palatable beverage, resembling, when fresh, a very strong lemon-soda, but intoxicating in its effects." She asks, "Does it ferment during the time of its flowing (it is collected every morning) or is it a natural alcohol?" I do not know, and give the question here that some one wiser may answer. My impression is that it is not intoxicating when first drawn from the tree, but becomes so by fermentation. Or, it may contain some other intoxicating principle than alcohol, as is the case with the soma juice of India. I shall be greatly obliged to any one who will answer this query.

QUERY.—When was temperance first organized in the United States, where and by whom? When was the first prohibitory law passed?

ANS.—I hardly know what to give as the date of the first organized temperance work in the United States. Moderation societies were started as early as 1737. Dr. Rush's celebrated pamphlet which is counted as the foundation of temperance work here was published in 1785. In 1805 the paper makers of Philadelphia associated themselves for the purpose of restraining and prohibiting the use of ardent spirits; April 30, 1808, Dr. Clark and Lebbeus Armstrong, of Saratoga, organized the temperance society of Moreau and Northumberland. This is usually accounted the earliest distinctively temperance society, but at Atlanta the claim was made that an earlier one existed in Georgia.

The first prohibitory law was given in Eden—and disobeyed. Sweden had prohibitory law from 1753 to 1756, and again from 1772 to 1775, and reported "enormous benefits effected in moral, economical and other effects" from its workings. In the United States, Maine has been under prohibitory law longer than any other state.

QUERY.—How can the pledge given at the head of Special Difficulties be kept literally? What is to be done with our medicines put up in alcohol? Tinctures and herb tonics must be put up in alcohol, and I think there are times when that pledge can not be kept.

ANS.—This is exactly the work of our Temperance Hospital, to demonstrate that our pledge can be kept. Instead of tinctures, use saccharine preparations, which are better than the tinctures because always of definite strength, while evaporation of their alcohol makes tinctures variable in strength; herb tonics can in most cases be prepared as syrups; if the principle desired can not be extracted except by alcohol, it can be thus extracted and the alcohol afterward fully evaporated.

QUERY.—Is it necessary for a man in business to drink with customers in order to keep trade? How would you convince one that it was not necessary?

ANS.—No. Trade that must be kept by drinking seems to me not worth keeping. Total abstainer buyers are the best paymasters. It is poor business policy to encourage a customer in habits that may interfere with his paying his bills.

QUERY.—Here is a question with so much virility in it, that I guessed the sex of its author before learning that it was sent by a gentleman, who enclosed $25 for franchise work: "Rev. 20:1, 2. When Satan is bound a thousand years, will Christians up here keep open and run the saloons for him? if so, not much use to bind him; they will do his work."

ANS.—Brother, your question presupposes an impossible state of affairs. Satan bound and saloons open don't m-

Our Book Table.

One of the most notable books of the season, both in respect to the interest of its theme and the years of labor which it represents, has just been issued by S. C. Griggs & Co., Chicago. It is HINDU LITERATURE, OR THE ANCIENT BOOKS OF INDIA, by Elizabeth A. Reed. It brings within reach of common readers sufficient knowledge of the Vedas, around which so much of mystery gathers, to understand their character and scope. Mrs. Reed reviews with simplicity and directness the work of the Sanskrit scholars, Max Muller, Sir Monier Williams, Sir William Jones and others, and then gives a remarkably clear, concise survey of the great Indian epics, with sufficient extracts to illustrate their character. Some of the legends are of great beauty; for example, in the legends of the Maha-Bharta is found a story of wifely devotion which for pathos and power is not excelled in all literature. With consent of the author and publishers, we propose giving this story to our readers at some future time. The Rama-yana, from which her extracts occupy over an hundred pages, has been termed "The Iliad of the East," and it has many points of resemblance to the Greek classic. In both the subject is a war undertaken to recover a wife carried off by the hero of the other side; Rama corresponding in this respect to Menelaus while in other respects he represents Achilles. But Sita, the chaste and beautiful wife of Rama, is immeasurably the superior of the treacherous Helen; Ayodhya may be compared to Sparta, and Lanka to Troy, though in each the Indian descriptions imply a higher degree of refinement than do the Grecian. The story has all the fascination of the Iliad, with a more tropical luxuriance of description and metaphor. Just here the Asiatic poem falls far short of the Iliad; it is absolutely burdened with description and simile, with wearisome repetition and amplification, stretching its interminable length through formidable volumes. It rambles and wanders, having nothing of the polish and rounded proportions which in the Iliad and Odyssey remind us of Greek sculpture.

Beautiful bits of description abound; for example: "The great Himalaya, with raiment of cloud and robe of sunlight, seems to commune with the stars that crown with radiance their snowy brows; in their wild crags are the silvery fountains of the rivers which flash and sparkle through forest and vale. The Ganges, the 'Bride of Heaven,' receives in her crystal tide the sins of her people and bears them away between her flowery banks. The wild swans float amid the lotus blossoms upon her bosom, and the gazelles come down to slake their thirst at her sacred brink."

"Delicate butterflies float slowly away on the fragrant air, and golden bees nestle amid the rose petals and revel in life and beauty. Down by the gleaming shore of the ever-sounding sea, the white-crested waves come marching in; with song and psalm and chanted praise, they come, and the children of the wildwood hear in their waves the song of the sea-nymph, and see in the coral groves the home of the ocean green. So they bring oblations to the fair goddess of the sea who is robed in azure and pearls, with garlands of scarlet flowers in her heavy hair, and her snowy hands gleaming amidst the darkling waves." To her Rama goes in his distress, crying, "A demon has stolen my wife away and crushed my heart beneath his feet. My beautiful bride is a prisoner on yonder isle—help me to bridge this pathless deep and avenge her wrongs." The bridge is builded, Rama leads his troops over it to the isle of Lanka, and then follows the Indian siege of Troy.

Beautiful as are their legends, the book has a higher mission than mere story telling. It contains very much valuable historical information, and its chapters on Indian mythology show the common origin of all mythologies. One thing which impresses me as of especial value is its furnishing means by which the Vedas can be compared with the Scriptures and weighed in a true balance. Thus weighed they are found wanting in those attributes which distinguish a divine revelation. Beauty and power they possess, but mingled with much that is vile and weak. Nor do the Vedas give any aid to the history of India, for chronology and historic data are utterly lacking. Those who would set them above the Scriptures, show us only their gems, omitting their rubbish; here they stand before us, like Nebuchadnezzar, a mingling of fine gold, silver, brass, iron and clay.

The Watch-Tower.

Mrs. Josephine Nichols has entered the popular lecture field, with illustrated lectures on Rome, Italy, Paris, with its palaces, gardens and most famous pictures, and the Universal Exposition, including the Eiffel Tower, the Central Dome, the Trocadero, the magnificent buildings of the fine arts, and other striking features, reproduced by aid of the stereopticon. She is a very inspiring speaker, and the thorough study she made of her themes during nearly a year's residence in Paris fits her admirably for their discussion.

Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, in response to an invitation from that body, addressed the Georgia legislature in behalf of a temperance education law, on Thursday evening after the close of the National Convention at Atlanta. The large Hall of Representatives was packed, and though hundreds were standing, the morning paper said the great audience was so absorbed in the address that one could have heard a pin drop. At the close of the lecture members of the legislature gathered about Mrs. Hunt with congratulations and assurances of support for the measure. The State's Attorney said, "She has annihilated the Constitutional objection, and there is nothing left but to pass the bill."

The banner for the department of non-alcoholic medication was designed by its National superintendent, painted by one of the Y's of Louisville, and sent to the Paris Exposition, where it hung with other Scientific Temperance Instruction banners in the educational department of the United States exhibit. It also appeared in the children's procession, at the laying of the corner-stone of the Temple in Chicago, November 1st.

Edward W. Bok, the young editor-in-chief of the Ladies' Home Journal, of Philadelphia, is a firm believer in the temperance cause, and the women associated with it. Mr. Bok has just celebrated his 27th birthday, and has never tasted liquor or beer. He believes that difficult brain work can only be accomplished by a strictly careful life, and a strong hatred for accursed drink. The young editor was a warm admirer of Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes, and regarded her the noblest of American women on account of her bold advocacy of temperance.

The Dawn, Boston, makes a new departure—A Home Department, edited by Mrs. Anna R. Weeks, of Chicago. In announcing her purpose she says that her constant thought will be, "What would Christ do?" and by this touch-stone try all things. She means to show that woman suffers from competition in every way; as a housekeeper, through needless labor, and in the tax laid on all the raw material she requires; as a mother, in the excess of demands upon strength which should be sacred to the rearing of little ones. She holds that the true socialist will oppose war, and lend hearty support to arbitration between nations; that socialists should study the methods and leading ideas of the kindergarten, and the manual training school; that they should follow the example of the W. C. T. U. in its press work, should stand by the American public school, and should study the problems connected with municipal affairs. In all these lines the Woman's Department proposes to bring news and cheer. "The woman who cannot think is pitiable; the woman who will not think is criminal."

Of the thousands who have sung—often while tears were falling—

"Shall we meet beyond the river,
Where the surges cease to roll?
Where, in all the bright forever
Sorrow ne'er shall press the soul," few probably know that its author is H. L. Hastings, the philanthropist of Boston. Delegates to the Atlanta Convention had this fact impressed upon their memories by receiving from Mr. Hastings a dainty booklet tied with white ribbon, containing the author's complete edition of this beautiful hymn. It consists of fourteen double stanzas all breathing the same spirit which make the ones given in hymn-books such favorites.

The letter of "Scriptor," in the New York Christian Advocate entitled "Woman's Invasion of the South," and that of Isabella Webb Parks, in the Northwestern, Chicago, are among the best of the many helpful notices that the National Convention has received. "Scriptor" says: "The women came. They worked and talked, argued and preached from the 14th to the 18th of November. And they captured Atlanta! This means as much to their cause as the taking of Atlanta meant to Sherman. The South is now open 'from Atlanta to the Sea,' and their cause is marching on, woman suffrage and all!"

News from the Field.

ILLINOIS.

THANKSGIVING ECHOES.

The official Thanksgiving day has come and gone, and yet there comes to me a fresh call to a new thanksgiving service, "all my very own," as I revive the memorable days of our annual feast of ingathering. Faithful reporters have wisely chronicled many good things, but I wish to send a kind of aftermath, called forth by the sight of the annual minutes and reports of the Illinois Woman's Christian Temperance Union of 1890, covering two hundred and fifty pages.

Not unmindful of the fact that "boasting is excluded" from our ranks, I nevertheless wish to call to mind special causes for thanksgiving brought to light by our last Illinois W. C. T. U. convention. And first, I give thanks for a presiding genius in the chair and at the helm, who knows what our craft was built for, which way it is headed, and how deep the waters are over or through which it sails. Our wise leader, both captain and pilot, "Rounds" all the points of difference we meet and doubles all our good hopes as we annually cast anchor and ask, "Watchman, what of the night?" With abundant thanksgiving, I treasure up the memory of long columns of figures, with their black lines and red lines, and say what a treasure(r)! Long may she count and be counted upon, to ford the mazy labyrinths of receipts and disbursements; of dues, district, state, hospital and Temple funds.

Glancing down the list of twenty district presidents, my sympathies are aroused when I think that they were expected to give a bird's-eye view of their fields of labor in five minutes! And when I "press" my way to the superintendents' departments—twenty-five in number—and think how all the marchings and counter-marchings of a year were condensed into a brief little ten-minutes race of words, with each trying to reach the goal "on time," and cram all in before the gavel in the hands of our dear Miss Cram (time-keeper) should fall, I marvel and give thanks that it is possible to say so much in ten minutes.

Then as my thoughts run over the summing up of W. C. T. U. work in Illinois the past year, done in the dear Master's name, and for His sake, I say in my own little meeting, "Praise the Lord, O my soul!"

All the doleful predictions of the Sanballats and Tobiahs at the beginning of last year were unheeded, and did not discourage genuine, earnest workers. Each went on, building the wall of public sentiment against the dramshop curse. With prayer and song, faith and works, the law and the gospel—"so they builded." Is it any wonder that when the topmost stone of service was laid, there should be shoutings of "Grace" unto it? "Hitherto hath the Lord led us." An increase of thirty-four unions, while the general work of the unions increased fifty per cent over the previous year, is cause for special thanksgiving. One million and a half pages of literature distributed is good seed-sowing and is a half million in advance of the former year. An increase of 1,169 members, and $16,000 more of money for the general work is cause for rejoicing. And so one might find satisfaction in examining the whole lists. The increased amount of work done in the evangelistic department gives tone and color to the whole fabric. The sweet harmonies that fell on the ear and heart in those four days of sitting together will linger long with us and give the keynote for the music of the coming year while we say, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously."

The devotional hours of the convention were full of blessed inspiration. There was glad rejoicing as fresh new sheaves were garnered amid the accustomed ingathering; and was not the presence of our dear Miss Willard an added benediction to the whole?

And when the quiet hour for the memorial service for our "promoted soldiers" was come, the thought of one hundred and twenty-seven names on that memorial list made all hearts tender, and drew all closer together as we thought of the "home over there," where there "shall be no more curse." Miss Willard asked that the W. C. T. U. help to inaugurate the better way of speaking of our dear ones who have passed on before us, not as "dead," but as having "entered into life."

The telegram that summoned Mrs. Sanford, state treasurer, to the bedside of her sister, called forth loving sympathy as she hastened to the dear one who was about to join the company of "promoted soldiers." A few days she lingered, an example of the power of Christian faith, to sustain and cheer, and then another white-ribboner fell asleep, "For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

It is not strange that W. C. T. U. workers went forth from that convention stronger in purpose to wage this peaceful warfare in the interest of humanity with no uncertain sound. As special correspondent, I will from time to time report how the battle goes forward, for there will be "beautiful fighting all along the line." Already I hear the marshaling of the forces. There is the true ring in the Illinois war cry, and no faltering step as the columns march forward, closing up the ranks, and advancing toward fresh conquests in the coming year.

MRS. G. H. READ, Special Correspondent.

NEW JERSEY.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW.

New Jersey was not heard from on the evening at the National Convention, when the state presidents had two minutes each to represent their state. It was ten o'clock when M was reached in the list of states, so following the lead of the president of Missouri, we tried to shorten the program by appearing on the stage in a group, hoping that would suffice. I left immediately after, not expecting that there would be any further reports. I now wish briefly to state what I might have said on that occasion.

The work of the year just ended has been mainly along educational lines and in cultivating the ground previously preëmpted for our work. We have a small state (embracing less than 8,000 square miles) and the ground is already well covered by more than 200 local unions. Every county is organized, and we number a little less than 8,000 paying members. We have 10,000 children in our Loyal Temperance Legions, three-quarters of them pledged against the use of ardent spirits, tobacco and profanity. We prosecute successfully twenty-three departments and allow each state superintendent ten dollars for her work. This we shall increase as circumstances favor. Our workers are earnest and devoted and are advancing along all our lines. We have established a state "School of Methods," which meets in July of each year at Ocean Grove. This has been of incalculable value to us.

We have also held twenty-three county "Schools of Methods," much to our profit and edification. Our corresponding secretary and myself are constantly in the field, organizing and striving to build up the weaker unions by education and encouragement. While our increase in numbers has not been very marked, our advance in intelligence and interest has been decidedly so. The work of the Y. W. C. T. U. has been excellent, and their influence is widening everywhere. Physical culture, as connected with our health department, is receiving much attention, and under the leadership of Miss Mattie O. Waters, who providentially came to us shortly after the death of our much lamented Julia Thomas, our Y's are developing great possibilities.

As a loyal state we stand solid for the principles which made our platform when we were organized. We have never wavered, and there is no organization in the state with prefix or suffix to the W. C. T. U.! We were true blue then, and we are JERSEY true blue now. So may it ever be.

SARAH J. C. DOWNS.

NORTH DAKOTA.

NEEDS FOR THE PROHIBITION LAW.

The temperance question is not definitely settled in North Dakota. While we have a prohibition amendment to our constitution we have many men willing to defy the law and take the chances. Public sentiment must support the law, and we are working hard to make that sentiment. We had in the state during October, Mrs. Bessie Starr Keefer, who has spoken all over the Red River valley counties to crowded houses and with marked success. She is a grand platform speaker, sound reasoner, and her heart is in the work. She has made hundreds of converts during her stay, and we hope she will be able to return to help us to maintain the law on our statute books. We want an enforcement league that will handle the question in any part of the state and bring cases for trial before judges that we know will be favorable to the law and not positively opposed to it. If we had a few more workers in the cause like Mrs. Keefer, North Dakota would be a cold place for the rumseller.

Yours on guard, J. T.

OREGON.

A TEMPERANCE LIGHT-HOUSE IN A DISTANT STATE.

We see Oregon credited with contributions to the Temperance Temple far too seldom. But the temple-building spirit has reached us, and I want to tell of a dedication I attended November 22, at New Era. This is a small country place on the railroad twenty miles from Portland, only a railroad station, post-office and store combined, with a saw mill, a grist mill, a few cottages scattered over the steep hill-sides, a Catholic Church and a spiritualist camp ground. No church edifice, no school-house, no place where public meetings can be held, except the camp ground, which is only available for summer, and where rankest infidelity has been proclaimed. This heroic union has maintained its fortnightly meetings for five years, with a membership of from ten to eighteen, who live on farms adjacent, some of the members going from five to eight miles through summer's heat and winter's mud. But with a baby in front and a steady, plodding horse to carry them, they have faithfully attended their meetings at each other's homes. A year ago the inspiration came to their courageous president, "Arise and build." I am sure no more touching incidents of self-denial, nor of patiently gathering up the littles has been demonstrated in the erection of your great thirteen-story temple, than could be told of this brave band of ten women. The treasurer said she spent one-half day last week in gathering in funds, and had splendid success. When asked how much, she replied, $3!

Through the opposition of the infidel orators, the district school-houses, even, have been closed against them, but now they are independent and have a building where preaching, Sunday-school, temperance lectures, etc., can be held, and where the neat, home-made banner, of white letters upon a blue ground, proclaims that somebody has an interest in God, and Home and Native Land. The local grange has united with them and owns half of the lot and building, but there is no conflict in the objects of the two societies, and they both participated in the dedication, which was conducted by reading the Oregon Psalm (46th), by prayer and song, and addresses by several of the friends of the cause who were present.

Politicians toss the interests of this state about as freely and carelessly as a boy with a rubber ball; but, thank God, we have many true-hearted women, laboring and praying while they wait for the redemption of this lovely country from the grasp of the destroyer.

M. L. DRIGGS.

VERMONT.

HOW THE HIGH-LICENSE MOVEMENT WAS CRUSHED.

For thirty-eight years Vermont has had a prohibitory law on her statute books. Over a third of a century she has stood firm as one of the strongest prohibition states of the union, setting the seal of her disapproval upon the traffic by the strongest enacted laws her legislatures could formulate and pass. It has worked as well as any prohibitory law of any character, not alone on the temperance question, but those dealing with crimes of all sorts.

In the past two years a class of men have begun the agitation of high license, and that has been their watch-word in season and out of season, whatever the people thought. They confidently expected a majority vote in the legislature just closed, but were defeated by the overwhelming vote of one hundred and fifty-four to sixty-seven, with sixteen absent and not voting. Surely temperance reform took no backward step when that vote was recorded. The friends of the measure did not meet this ignominious defeat from a lack of proper presentation of the subject before the legislature convened or afterward. The ablest managed daily in the state is owned by the man who is head and front of the high license movement. The liquor dealers of New York poured out their money freely, if popular report can be believed, to aid in the establishment of their ideal plan of dealing with temperance issues. It was all to no purpose. The farmers voted solidly against it, and stand to-day the all-powerful champions of the law which has forever closed the saloons, which would otherwise be enticing their sons to everlasting destruction.

Ethan Allen once said: "The gods of the valleys are not the gods of the hills." This fact is no less true to-day than it was when uttered a century ago by Vermont's great champion of freedom. If some of the larger towns could have their way the law would be changed. But, fortunately for good morals, the hill dwellers, the farmers, are still in the majority, and they propose to keep temperance legislation where it stands now, going forward rather than backward. They will doggedly watch and crush any attempt to tamper with the present salutary laws, let who will be the leader of the opposition movement. They believe it to be right, and though it does not entirely stop the sale of liquor any more than capital punishment prevents murder, it does regulate in the most effective fashion. There is no use trying to overcome the argument of facts regarding this point. The traffic is regulated well nigh out of existence.

When friends of temperance all over the land hear of the headway of high license in Vermont, let them read the above figures, and remember that willful distortion of facts is one anti-prohibitory argument. It was in such a decided manner that Vermont crushed the movement.

BURTON H. ALLBEE.

NEW YORK.

AN ANNUAL INGATHERING.

The sixth annual convention of the Greene county W. C. T. U. was held in the Presbyterian Church of Greenville, October 22 and 23. Since last year four new unions have been organized, auxiliary to our county, through the efforts of the president, Miss E. Brandon, making our number seven. The prospect is very hopeful and encouraging for another year. A good number of delegates and visitors were in attendance. Very cordial welcome was extended us by Rev. Mr. Stratton and Mrs. F. Wakely, and responded to in a pleasing little speech by Mrs. Wm. Shufect. Reports of corresponding secretary, local unions and departments show progress in our work. The most hopeful and successful departments are juvenile, evangelistic, flower mission and fair work. Sixty-four dollars was netted at our county fair this fall, to be used for county work. Our president gave a very earnest, stirring address. A most excellent report of the state convention was given by Mrs. J. J. Dean.

The evening session was largely attended, and addressed by Rev. J. J. Dean, who gave a very earnest and convincing argument against high license, and showing prohibitory measures to be the only sure and right way to bring about temperance reform. Rev. J. Thayer, a missionary of China, also spoke of the vice of opium-smoking and the great need of temperance workers there. The choir rendered fine music, and a liberal collection was given. Altogether we were unanimous in feeling it was the most profitable and enjoyable of our conventions, and that we had all received the most courteous and liberal entertainment.

JENNIE TOWNSEND.

ANOTHER SUCCESSFUL CONVENTION.

The seventh annual convention of Kings county W. C. T. U. was held October 21 and 22, in the Lewis Avenue Congregational Church, of Brooklyn.

The convention was opened with prayer offered by the president, after which Miss E. W. Greenwood gave a splendid Bible exposition, taking for her subject, "Assurance, or How may I Know that I am a Child of God." We wondered, as we listened to her strong and helpful words how any one having the true spirit of God within them could longer be a "doubting Thomas." The National may well be complimented upon the wisdom it has shown in its selection of a superintendent of evangelistic work.

After the roll-call and appointment of committees, a letter was read from Rev. Mr. Kent, welcoming us to his church. Several other churches had been offered us, which is really a new departure for which we feel truly thankful. Not long ago we could not secure the use of any church.

Our treasurer reported over seven thousand dollars expended in county work during the past year, leaving a balance in the treasury of $1.86. Our county has carried on twenty-four lines of work during the year, and the various reports showed good work accomplished along nearly every line. In press work one thing is noticeable. Two years ago we could get scarcely anything published in the local papers unless it was paid for. Now we need only pay for advertisements, the daily press sending reporters to all our public meetings, and giving us very good reports of the same.

Mrs. Stonehill gave us a spirited address on social purity. She has worked for years in this line of work in the British Isles, and now comes with a willing heart and ready mind to help in America.

On Wednesday morning we were again privileged in hearing another grand Bible exposition, this time by Mrs. Josephine Braman, whose subject was, "Three Shekels of Gold."

Mrs. Goff, superintendent of police matron work, offered a series of resolutions which were passed by the convention unanimously, deploring the condition of our station houses, or rather the condition of those unfortunates who find themselves within their walls with no womanly hand or heart to minister to them in this hour of great need.

A series of ten resolutions were presented by the chairman of the committee, Mrs. L. C. Partington, and passed by the convention. They were in favor of increasing our evangelistic work; educating the foreign element in our population up to the idea of temperance from a financial as well as a moral and religious standpoint; arousing public opinion to the true aspect of the social purity question; thanking God for the "Men's Christian Temperance League," formed in Mr. Kent's church; petitioning and soliciting legislative bodies to pass a law giving to women equal suffrage with men in all particulars; thanking the pastor and people of the church for giving us the free use of it; for the use of text-books in our public schools wherewith to impart scientific temperance instruction, and against impure literature being admitted into our homes, as well as the legalization of the liquor traffic and social impurity.

Tuesday evening's entertainment, given by the children, was considered by many the most important event, since it was presented to an audience which filled the church, and although largely made up of old party followers, the children's bright way of teaching prohibition was so very entertaining that they were listened to with the closest attention, while the short, but pointed addresses of the Revs. Kent and Carson at the opening of the meeting were also given favorable attention. It was the best children's entertainment ever given in Brooklyn.

Our hearts are filled with gratitude to our Heavenly Father who gave us such a blessed and happy time at our annual convention.

BANQUET OF THE WOMAN'S PROHIBITION PARTY LEAGUE OF KINGS COUNTY.

One of the pleasantest and most profitable entertainments given in Brooklyn for some time was the banquet in the hall of the No. 2 W. C. T. U. on the evening of November 6, by the members of the Woman's Prohibition Party League. Although the League is composed largely of members of the W. C. T. U., still it is an independent organization, its members being banded together for the purpose of helping the Prohibition party carry forward its work. It has ninety-six members.

The tickets sold at fifty cents each, and we had about one hundred and fifty present, who did ample justice to the elegant and bountiful supper provided for them by the ladies, who cooked everything with their own hands. The music was furnished by the two daughters of the Rev. Dr. Leonard, Mrs. Wells and Miss Leonard, who sang in a charming manner some Prohibition songs.

The feast of reason was the grandest, I venture to declare, ever given at one gathering in Brooklyn. Thirteen toasts were responded to in ten-minute addresses. The toasts were as follows:

First. From whence is the principle of prohibition?
Second. The value of a vote for prohibition.
Third. Our children; the to-morrow of our cause.
Fourth. The relation of the pulpit and the pew to temperance.
Fifth. What would the National prohibition of the liquor traffic do for women?
Sixth. The business man's foe—the liquor traffic.
Seventh. The greatest party.
Eighth. Woman's place in the temperance reform.
Ninth. The people's best friend—an independent prohibition press.
Tenth. The duty of Prohibitionists in regard to existing temperance laws.
Eleventh. The underpinning of the American saloon—what is it?
Twelfth. Our departed leader—General Fisk.
Thirteenth. The good time coming.

These toasts were responded to by the well-known orators: Rev. Mr. Corner, Rev. Mr. Carson, Rev. Dr. Leonard, Rev. C. H. Mead, of the Silver Lake Quartette; Rev. Dr. I. K. Funk, Hon. John Lloyd Thomas, Mr. Demorest, Mr. Geo. R. Scott, of the Witness, Mr. J. E. Ramsey, Mrs. L. C. Partington, Mr. E. J. Wheeler, Mr. John W. Pritchard, of the Christian Nation, while Rev. Dr. Darlington and Mrs. A. H. Brundage also made remarks. Rev. Mr. Woodruff offered prayer, and the president of the league, Mrs. H. S. Pritchard, acted as toast master. Quite a number of clergymen were in the audience, among them Bishop Riley, of Mexico.

The ladies have forwarded forty dollars to the Prohibition Party already, which they cleared after paying all expenses, while quite a number of ticket holders have not reported as yet.

The residents of Brooklyn are anxious for another banquet, and the league intends to gratify them at the beginning of the year.

ONONDAGA COUNTY CONVENTION.

The semi-annual convention of Onondaga county W. C. T. U. was held in the Methodist Church, Cicero, October 29, 30. There was quite a large delegation from our seventeen unions, and many visitors, though the distance by stage for many was from twelve to seventeen miles.

Miss Sarah T. Wilkinson, president, called the convention to order at 10:30. At 11 a consecration service was led by Mrs. A. S. D. Bates, who read I Cor. 13th chapter. This was one of the most precious hours of spiritual uplift and blessing, as we looked to Jesus for all needed help, and committed ourselves and our cause to Him, and closed with noontide prayer. At 1:30 p. m. devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. H. C. Merriman. Mrs. G. R. Allen gave a pleasing address of welcome to the hearts and homes of the good people of Cicero, and Mrs. M. B. Wright responded in an able address that was strong for home and humanity.

Wednesday evening, Mrs. M. L. Wiseman, of Pompey, gave a ringing address on the "Amendment," full of sound doctrine, to a crowded house. A quartette and choir echoed the battle cry of freedom. Our county has taken up fifteen departments of work, and the reports were encouraging. The department of franchise was added, after an earnest discussion, with only one dissenting vote! Social purity, narcotics, juvenile, scientific temperance instruction, literature and press, soldiers and sailors, Y work and fair reports, called out helpful hints and plans of work, and awakened much interest. Resolutions in favor of amendment work, using the plan of our state officers, vigorous literature and press work, and love and loyalty to our state and National W. C. T. U., were passed unanimously.

Thursday evening, the church was again filled with eager listeners. Mrs. Bates gave a brief Bible reading on Haman's high license to destroy the people, and Esther's petition for an amendment to the constitution, sealed with the King's ring. The victory was won in answer to prayer, Mordecai and Esther working together, and Haman utterly overthrown, just as the liquor traffic will be, as good men and women work and pray, and stand side by side in the battle "For God and Home and Native Land." Mrs. Wiseman, Rev. Mr. Wright and Rev. Mr. Andrews, all made thrilling speeches, full of logic and solid facts, in favor of the amendment. More than sixteen hundred pages of literature were given away, besides all that was bought from a well supplied temperance book table. So closed one of the most harmonious, enthusiastic and progressive conventions ever held in this county.

MRS. ANNE S. D. BATES.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. PHILENA EVERETT JOHNSON, superintendent of department of Legislation and Petitions for South Dakota, also special correspondent to THE UNION SIGNAL from that state, has removed from Highmore to Pierre, South Dakota. All local W. C. T. U. reports for this state should be sent promptly to Mrs. Johnson, that she may be able to keep fresh letters in "News from the Field." As Mrs. Johnson's residence will be at the Capitol, she will give her time largely to legislative work during the sixty days' session of the Legislature.

THE following important resolution, adopted by the recent National W. C. T. U. Convention, was inadvertently omitted from the resolutions in the convention number of THE UNION SIGNAL:

WHEREAS, We believe vivisection to be cruel, unnecessary, and demoralizing, tending to a deterioration of the human soul utterly out of proportion to any known benefit to the human body gained thereby, the practice of it thus reversing the teachings of Christianity,

Resolved, That we will do all in our power to develop sentiment against it, and because we do not believe in half measures, nor in licensing any evil, we will do this with a view to securing legislation for its total prohibition.

MRS. CLARA C. HOFFMAN, of Missouri, will give the first eleven or twelve days of January, '91, to Wisconsin and Illinois. Unions wanting her services should write to George A. Bain, Lexington, Ky., at once.

MISS ELIZABETH J. SCOVEL, the evangelist, has been ever since last April, occupied with the care of her beloved mother, in the family home at Nashville, Tenn. Mrs. Scovel's lingering illness ended December 9, and her saintly soul was wafted to heaven; the last words on her lips being, "Jesus, walk in Him."

MRS. JANE C. BATEHAM, superintendent of Sabbath observance department National W. C. T. U., will spend the winter in Asheville, 26 Charlotte street, North Carolina. All interested in this most important department, please notice.

THE eighth annual convention of the twentieth district was held at Cairo, Ill., September 30, and Oct. 1 and 2. Fifty or more delegates were in attendance. The first evening a gold medal contest was held. The house was well filled, good music was furnished, the contestants did well, and the audience seemed delighted. The convention throughout was harmonious. The time was filled with discussion, reports, papers, and two excellent addresses were given by Mrs. Emmons, of Chicago, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings. She also conducted a question-box, and gave helpful hints throughout the convention. Mrs. East, who has been the faithful president for four years, resigned, and Mrs. Wilkinson, of Murphysboro was elected. The convention was enthusiastic over the proposed Chautauqua and W. C. T. U. School of Methods to be held at Chester, Ill., next summer. The plan for the above, also a short address on Physical Culture, were given by Miss Holbrook, of Chester. A pleasant recreation enjoyed was an excursion of two hours on the steamer, "The Three States," on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. The invitation was from the Mayor of the city. The delegates remember with grateful hearts the kind, hospitable people of Cairo.

Official Communications.

To the Workers in the W. C. T. U.:

MY DEAR COMRADES AND FRIENDS:—Let me earnestly urge you to coöperate heartily with Mrs. S. F. Grubb, Lawrence, Kansas, superintendent Foreign Department, of the National W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Grubb is one of our ablest and most accomplished women; she has done more to enlist the foreign speaking population in the temperance reform than has any other woman living. She has devoted herself for years to this cause, translating the best temperance arguments into fourteen different languages, and circulating them where they were most needed. She has coadjutors in every state and territory of the United States.

This year she has induced the National W. C. T. U. to establish bureaus for the distribution of literature to emigrants at the points of embarkation, and to this end will need the coöperation of our comrades in the foreign cause. Any help that you can render to Mrs. Grubb, I shall consider as personal to myself, and hereby thank you in advance for the hearty response that I am sure you will give to my appeal.

Yours, for the great work for Christ and humanity in every land,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

OUR PRESIDENT'S YEAR OF REST.

To My White-Ribbon Comrades:

The Convention in Atlanta voted me a year of rest. When I heard of it, I was not well, and the idea formed the most pleasant picture for me after this fashion. I seemed to see an arch opening upon a cool and quiet vista of trees, the arch entwined with heavy festoons of the Cherokee rose for the South, and the hardy woodbine of the North. But returning to my wonted climate and equipoise, it was borne in upon me that while much worn, I was not ill, and while it may be better for me and the work that this year I should go about far less than usual lecturing and speaking to great assemblies, I can, perhaps, accomplish more by staying closely in the delightful Den with which you have furnished me, writing articles, and dictating letters to my stenographer; therefore, do not, I pray you, imagine me as in any wise an invalid, or a drone in the hive, for I trust never to be either.

Yours in the strength of divine grace and faith,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Evanston, "The Den," Dec. 9, 1890.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

We are earnestly desirous that each Loyal Temperance Legion Company in our land shall hold a special prayer meeting during the Week of Prayer. Let it be devoted to asking God's special blessing on our work for the coming year in raising up faithful leaders, in helping us to reach a greater number of children than ever before, and in giving us the needed equipments for our work. Also let us pray for a blessing on the new department of juvenile work in the World's W. C. T. U.

Let the exercises be so simple that the youngest child can understand them. Encourage the children to give expression to their desires to live true, useful lives in the service of our blessed Master.

That we may have the inspiration of knowing that our prayers are ascending together to the Throne of Grace, we would suggest that wherever practicable this meeting be held on Saturday, January 10th, at 3 p. m.

HELEN G. RICE, Nat'l Supt.
ANNA A. GORDON, Associate.

STATUS OF NATIONAL ORGANIZERS.

From several letters received, I am led to believe that there is some misunderstanding concerning the conditions under which the National W. C. T. U. Organizers are sent out, as provided by our late convention. It has been thought by some that the guarantee of $100 per month and expenses, was modified by a later motion by Mrs. Lathrap. To answer all questions I give the action of the convention as recorded by the secretary. After the corresponding secretary was made superintendent of the department of organization, the details of the work were placed in the hands of a sub-committee consisting of Mrs. Hoffman and Mrs. Fessenden, who reported as follows, which report was adopted:

"That all National Organizers be under the direction of the superintendent of the department, and that the National W. C. T. U. guarantee a specified sum to each organizer, covering expenses and salary when in the field, under the direction of the superintendent. That all collections and other money received by the organizers be credited to the National treasury; and, further, that all organizers send an itemized account of expenses and receipts, with number of unions formed, and where, and with full list of officers elected, to the superintendent of the department."

At a later meeting, Mrs. Lathrap moved that "the expenses of National organizers shall not come directly from the National treasury, but from the collections taken by them when in the field. An amount sufficient to pay expenses shall be taken from each collection, and the remainder sent to the National treasurer, proper receipts being given. Y organizers shall rank with other National organizers on the same conditions."

Mrs. Jones, of Pennsylvania, amended by the insertion of the words, "Under direction of the department of organization of the National W. C. T. U.," after the words "collections taken by them when in the field."

The amendment and the motion as amended were adopted.

The motion in no way modifies the report, but directs how organizers' expenses shall be met. One hundred dollars per month is the specified salary provided by the adoption of the report of the appropriations committee, and the foregoing report leaves the organizer to decide how much of the time she will be in the field, and thus what proportion of the amount she will receive. If meeting the prescribed conditions her whole time is given, she will receive from the National treasurer, $100 each month, if but one-half her time is given, $50; if three days $10, and expenses to be taken from collections from place to place. Heretofore, no financial provision has been made for these faithful workers, and we are filled with gratitude that a more plethoric treasury now renders it possible.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

ERRATA.

(Miss Willard's address was brought out hastily, and though excellent work was done by the proof-readers, it is important to make a few corrections.)

P. 21.—Should read, "Christ, not the man-made Paul of certain theologians, is the source of churchly authority." (Nota bene: This is not intended as the slightest intimation against the inspiration of St. Paul's utterances.)

P. 33.—"Ottawa, Kan.," not "Winfield."

P. 60.—"These are new days, and woman does not move with the rest of the procession," should read, "woman moves on with the rest of the procession," etc.

P. 63.—"Witch's booth" should be, "Witch's broth."

P. 70.—"Aught" should be "ought."

P. 89.—Should read,

"As a bird trims her to the gale
I trim myself to the storm of time."

P. 93.—"Lady Somerset" should be, "Lady Henry Somerset."

P. 94.—Last line, for "would" read "should."

P. 96—"Introspective" should be "introspection." (This "is the last infirmity of noble minds," etc.)

P. 101.—"Feb. 15-18" should be "Feb. 22-25, 1891. Albaugh's Opera House, Washington, D. C." This is a correct statement of the time and place of holding the Woman's Council.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

In a letter just received inclosing $3.65, contents of a mite-box, the writer says: "This seems but a trifle where so much is required, but years are made up of days, and enough of them form centuries."

The application of this fact is, that if each white-ribboner and L. T. L. boy and girl would either give or secure a penny a day for a year for the building fund of the Temple, the entire building would be more than paid for in twelve months. Surely this is not too much to ask from any woman or child for our beautiful Temple. The new year is rapidly approaching. Let all who have not yet sent for a mite-box do so at once, and commence with the dawn of 1891 to collect their pennies. A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, will secure a Temple bulletin, descriptive card and mite-box.

On the day of laying the corner-stone of the Temple, when the great procession had marched from the Second Regiment Armory to LaSalle Street where the ceremony was to take place, a wonderful sight presented itself, the streets for blocks were packed with people. The windows of the surrounding buildings were filled. On the platform around the corner-stone stood many of the greatest leaders in the temperance reform, as well as many of the leading divines of the city. From the enormous derrick, high above the foundation, draped to the very ground hung the American flag, and below it were grouped over a thousand children holding aloft beautiful silk banners.

Those of our friends who could not be present to see the glorious sight, and those who were there, will equally be glad to learn that a photographer sketched the scene; the result lies before us, a beautiful photogravure of the historic occasion. The faces are wonderfully distinct. Those upon the platform are easily distinguishable.

In an ingenious manner, high up above the multitude on the blank wall of an adjoining building, the artist has hung a picture of the Temple as it will appear when finished. Thus is united in one picture the laying of the corner-stone and the completed building. The picture is mounted on a plat 20x22 inches, making a fine large picture for framing. We have purchased five hundred of these photogravures which we will sell for $1 each, for the benefit of the building fund.

The last dollar for the Thompson memorial has been subscribed. The Hillsboro, Ohio, W. C. T. U. sends $5. (They sent $6 before for the same purpose.) Kate S. Dean, Bloomington, Ill., $1, and the Central W. C. T. U. of Chicago, $1; this completes the necessary $100. There are other true and brave white-ribboners who should have their names engraved in Willard Hall. Mother Stewart is the next one on the list—quite a sum has been subscribed already towards it; notably by little Ethel Stout, of the Delaware Midget; she has just sent another $4 for the fund. She is rapidly gathering in the children's dimes for this purpose. Mrs. S. B. Shank, Enon, Ohio, sends $1 to the Stewart memorial. Surely Mrs. Zerelda Wallace's name should be among those that are to grace its walls. We learn that the state of Indiana is raising the needful hundred dollars for this purpose—this is as it should be. It would be a graceful and fitting act if the South should undertake to raise a like sum for Mrs. Sallie Chapin who has done so much for the temperance cause in her sunny south-land. We hope our English sisters will also raise a fund to place the name of their noble departed leader, Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas, in the Memorial Hall of the Temple.

One of our gifted speakers, Miss Anna H. Shaw, of Evanston Ill., sends a check for $100. Mrs. Mary J. Rowan, Trenton, N. J., also sends a check for $100. C. B. Miller, San Francisco, Cal., sends a check for $100. A noble white-ribboner, Miss Alice Bond, of Evanston, Ill., has taken the diamonds from her ears and sold them so she might have the money to use in good works; she sends $60 of the amount to the Temple on a pledge of $100. Helen T. Scammell, La Fayette, N. Y., has been a teacher for many years; she is a true white-ribboner; she has been at work for a good while raising $100 for the Temple among teachers in small sums, dimes, quarters, half dollars, just as she could get it. She has just sent a check for $50 of the amount as a "Teachers' gift" from Cortland, Madison and Onondaga counties, N. Y.

At the Atlanta National W. C. T. U. convention, several little boys and girls acted as pages. One day during the convention, they each took a mite-box, and while attending to their duties collected for the Temple. One dear little fellow, we are sorry we do not know his name, got $8.37; when his box would not hold the change, he filled his little pockets. McNeil Potter got $3.19 in his box, and Lucy Abbot had $2.62 in her box.

It is wonderful what children can accomplish when they set about it. Who can refuse the dear, earnest little souls when they ask for a good cause?

Marianna Gifford, Fall River, Mass., sends $10.75. She writes, "This is the result of the collection by mite-boxes, Nov. 1st and 8th, by the L. T. L. The children were much enthused. 'Rise, Temple Rise,' has been a great inspiration to us in our work." Minnie McFarlane, superintendent L. T. L., Seneca, Ill., sends $10.51. She says, "The amount my Loyal Legion soldiers solicited within one week." Lillie Pond, Coeymans, N. Y., collected under a good deal of difficulty $5.75 for the L. T. L. for the Temple. We wish we had more room to tell of the brave deeds of the dear children in raising money for the Temple.

Faith and Works.

"We must not use our prayer and physic both together; and so, no doubt, but our prayers will be available, and our physic take effect." Here, doubtless, lies the secret of the frequent failures of the "Faith Cure" practitioners, if that is the proper word. In the above quotation, which, by the way, is from a very high authority, physic is used in a general sense. It means a remedy. Now, we beg you to read the following testimonials from those upon whom the "effect" has been most satisfactory.

DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—"I suffered from muscular rheumatism and nervous prostration. It seems to me that I used all the medicines ever compounded without finding relief. I abandoned the whole and commenced the use of your Compound Oxygen Treatment. And the result is perfect health." R. B. THOMAS, 90 Chambers St., New York City, N. Y. DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—"For thirty-five years I have suffered every September from hay asthma. I ast August I began the use of your Compound Oxygen Treatment, and passed through September very comfortably, and I have been considerably invigorated by the remedy." REV. J. W. T. CAPERS, Camden, S. C.

But it is all written in our brochure, hundreds of testimonials, records of cases cured, a history of Compound Oxygen. It is an interesting book. It is sent free. Write for it. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter Street, San Francisco, California.

Where did the editor of our paper get his information (?) about the W. C. T. U.? It's all wrong, anyhow!

See here, my friend, did you take any pains to give him the right figures as to our membership, amount of money raised, etc., etc.? Isn't that the more important question, after all?

BETTER THAN GOVERNMENT BONDS.

The ordinary living expenses of a family of five persons, living in the customary manner of American people, amount to not less than $1,500 per year. It would require nearly $40,000 in government bonds to produce this income. Ten acres of land in the Willamette Valley planted to prunes, with an ordinary crop, at ordinary prices, will net more than $1,500, after paying for all labor placed thereon. You can buy this land of the Oregon Land Company, of Salem, Ore., in tracts of ten acres or more at from $55 to $75 per acre.

We insist that if your neighbor knew all we send for the small sum named, your neighbor would subscribe. Give the matter a moment's thought. You have a lot of perplexing Christmas presents to make?

1st. Make us One!
2d. Make your neighbor One!
3d. Make yourself One!

Think a bit. You will see how all this can be done in deciding to visit your neighbor and telling about this offer. January 1st is so near at hand that it won't do to "sit and sing yourself away." Be a nice, good Santa Claus for us and for your neighbor? The gift you make is your services. Thank you very much!

A Unique and Enjoyable Plan to train W. C. T. U. and temperance workers, convince the undecided, make interesting mothers' meetings and render easy the work for the children, can be found on another page of this issue. It is not to sow the country with literature, and leave people to read at random and not always with profit. It is not to refer them to some source from which information can be secured, if they take the trouble to make necessary inquiry and put forth sufficient effort to secure it. It is not anything impractical or out of reach. It is, on the contrary, plan by which a general knowledge of facts relating to temperance work may be placed in your hands in convenient form for practical use.

Knee Deep

A Well Arranged

What Is It?

It is a prepared course of reading embodied in a carefully arranged program for meetings of local unions, mass temperance meetings, mothers' meetings, etc., to be issued monthly from this office. The selections will be made with care, and will include something beautiful, something spiritual, something wise, drawn from the most reliable sources, and besides, a letter from or some other one of our National leaders.

Miss Willard

These programs will answer the oft-repeated question,

What shall We do?

to make our meetings interesting, which comes from local unions located where a sparse population gives less active work than larger cities demand. More than this, it will prepare for more intelligent activity, open eyes to necessities now unseen, and lead to the perfecting of methods yet undeveloped.

If needed, a three-fold course will be arranged:

1. For temperance workers and temperance meetings.
2. For mothers' meetings and home helps.
3. For juvenile temperance work.

There will be a separate course of reading for each, all to be known as the Home Protection Reading Course,

because it touches every home interest. This course of reading should be immediately adopted by every local union and used for all it is worth. At the next meeting a leader should be chosen (she should be the best you have for the service needed) who should report at once to Mrs. J. C. Fernald, 108 West Front street, Plainfield, N. J., and all information relative to her part as leader will be furnished. These programs will be a in public meetings, where people of all ages and both sexes can be reached and benefited.

The expense will be very slight. An assortment of W. T. P. A. leaflets could be intelligently used, and a very few books would be needed. For the first year, only two, aside from you already own. These two books are Senator Blair's

The Bible

Conflict Between Man and Alcohol, and the autobiography of Miss Frances E. Willard, known as Glimpses of Fifty Years.

Every union should own these books, and in no way can they be secured at so low a rate as on the terms offered in connection with this course of reading. A special edition of Senator Blair's book can be had for the exceedingly low price of $1.50, and we will furnish Miss Willard's autobiography to leaders chosen by W. C. T. Unions for $1.75. This is $1 per volume cheaper than any offer yet made. All leaflets necessary for unions in pursuing this course of readings would be covered by 75c, making a course of readings for the year for an organization of any size not to exceed $4.

For sample program see page 5. You may rest assured that they will grow more interesting as the students advance.

Who will undertake the course? Who commend the plan? Send a card of inquiry or commendation, or to announce that you are ready to begin, to

Money-Making Entertainments.

The list is worth your attention, as it comprises all sorts and kinds, and if your union seeks to occasionally make some money by amusing the people you will find here ample material. In many instances the entertainment will result in not only making the coffers heavier but in silencing the scoffers! Why? Because the planning has been not only to amuse but also to arouse thought while being amused, and a new idea that comes to you on the wings of a hearty laugh has a good-natured way of settling down quite at home in its new quarters. Here is the list:

INTERSTATE MILKMAID'S CONVENTION.

Price 5 cents. By Laura J. Rittenhouse. An amusing and witty "take off" on a woman's convention. The amount of learning (?) displayed on the cow business is funny.

Prohibition Program. Price 10 cents. By Anna A. Gordon. Song recitations and exercises of the brightest and best kind. High license is fired at in a way that tells. A dialogue by Mr. E. J. Wheeler on "Sense vs. License," is full of vigor, fun and education!

Platform Voices. Price 25 cents; compiled by Miss Julia Ames, editor UNION SIGNAL. This is a collection of unusually good temperance poems and recitations. Great care has been taken in the selections, and we cordially recommend this book to all who need "something in the line of recitations" and don't know exactly what. This book fills the vacuum completely.

Crusader Programs. Price 25 cts. A book of 188 pages, full of the best of Sunday-school and general temperance exercises, largely from the Sunday-school Young Crusader, given in its columns from time to time. All are good; none need costumes or any such outside helps. An admirable book in every way. Twenty-four numbers or exercises in all are given.

HINTS FOR Y. W. C. T. U. ENTERTAINMENTS.

Price 10 cents. Explaining the mysteries of Oriental Tiffin, Kaffee Klatsch, Mother Goose, etc. Candy recipes are added to sweeten things generally.

YE HATCHET PARTIE.

Price 15 cents. By Miss Mary H. Mather, superintendent department of entertainments National W. C. T. U. The most successful shekel winner we have ever printed for young ladies' use. Other good entertainments are also given, "Mistress Mary and Her Flower Garden," "Silhouette Social," etc.

Do you want an investment FOR small savings which will make you a valuable income-producing property in a few years?

Do you want an investment FOR capital which is absolutely safe, and which depends for enhancement of values on development, and not on speculation and "booms"?

The John Brown Colony of Madera, California, has a tract of 3,000 acres under cultivation in raisin grapes, sold in small tracts, the purchasers of which pay only the expense of cultivation, the price of land being taken from crops until paid, when land is deeded to colonist, costing him but a trifle.

John Brown Colony, No. 2 is now on the market on the same plan, and we are also handling property for immediate settlement.

Signal Notes.

UPWARDS of 30,000 women of various ages and social conditions are to be found in the lunatic asylums of the United Kingdom.

THE Sanitary Board of Vienna (Austria) has declared against the establishment of asylums for inebriates, and in favor of all drunkards being, as public dangers, sentenced to periods of hard labor.

THE order of Rechabites, a large temperance society of England, rejoices in the returns given at its late annual conference, showing an increase of 10,610 members during the year 1890. This is all the more encouraging as it is a benefit club, as well as a total abstinence society.

DR. PARKER, of London, in his recent address on "Individualism," stated his own plan for making General Booth's scheme an almost perfect success. It was to "shut up the public-houses;" for permanent reformation is impossible while the present state of things exists in this respect.

AN Irishman remarked about Scotchmen in Ceylon: "They never were at home but when they were abroad; and when they came out to Ceylon they ate and they drank; and they drank, and they drank, and they died, and after that they had the audacity to write home and blame the climate."

G. W. BAIN says: "The difference between a high licensed saloon and a low licensed doggery is—one is the inlet to rivulets of moderation; the other the outlet to the river of drunkenness. I would rather vote for the low doggery, through which the drunkard escapes to the grave from the demon on his track, than for the gilded gateway which opens the road to destruction for young men."

ATTENTION is again called by Mr. William Livesey to the appalling figures of the Irish annual Drink Bill. During the past twelve months there has been an increase in the consumption of 486,938 gallons of spirits and 113,963 barrels of beer, in Ireland, the total revenue from excise being £4,693,116, which does not take in illicit stills. Public houses are by far the most numerous in the poverty-stricken localities.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR, in one of his temperance addresses, remarks: "Cruikshank, the artist, offered £100 for proof of a violent crime committed by a total abstainer; and the money remains unclaimed to this day. I offer as much for proof of any one case—either in the church or out of it—where drunkenness has been cured without total abstinence. Under present circumstances, the only safe way of drinking—as an Irishman put it—is to 'leave off before you begin.'"

CRIME and drunkenness have increased in terrible proportion in Germany and France during the past twenty years. This fact disproves the oft-repeated false assertion of anti total abstinence people that the consumption of beer and wine—light alcoholics—tends to sobriety. The report of the last International Congress for the suppression of alcoholism, which was held in Paris from July 29 to August 1, 1889, affirms that criminality and mental aberration follow a march parallel with the consumption of alcoholic beverages.

THE Cincinnati Times-Star gives the following instance of a saloon closed by knitting: "'Never had but one saloon in our town, and the ladies knit that one out,' said a gentleman who lives in Moor's Hill, Indiana. 'What!' exclaimed the astonished delegate; 'knit it out?' 'Yes; when the saloon was started, the women formed in relays, and went and took their knitting to the saloon. Of course that knocked business higher than a kite. It was not long before that saloon had to be closed, and since that time no man has ever had the nerve to start another.'"

"I HAVE carefully watched the effect of drink upon the wage earning portion of our fellow citizens, and I unhesitatingly say that alcohol is too strong for Christianity. Until we can get the drink out of the way, our efforts to Christianize and uplift the mass of the people will be in great measure abortive. It is a strong statement to make, but years of temperance work has convinced me that, in England, at least, Christianity goes down before alcohol. Beer and spirits are too strong for the Bible." This statement from one of England's prominent Band of Hope and Sunday-school workers—Mr. Samuel Watson—is a strong one and worthy of earnest consideration.

LAST week might be styled Free Kindergarten week in Chicago; each of the score of these beneficent institutions had its closing exercises, in which the little ones took part and each received some gift, and most of them made one, the product of their own little fingers. Through these kindergartens nearly one thousand children are taken from the vile associations of the street and of their cheerless homes into the brightness, warmth and Christian influence of these blessed child gardens. Friday evening Central Music Hall was well filled with a cultivated audience that greatly enjoyed an illustrated lecture given for the Free Kindergarten Association, by C. Wharton Jones, on Russia, Turkey and Egypt. The lecture was very fine and a handsome sum must have been realized from it.

THE W. T. P. A. world has been made aware of the recent failure of S. A. Kean & Co., who have been our bankers for the last three years. It is impossible to say at this writing what our loss will be, or whether there will be any loss. If a deposit of $1,700, made on the day of the assignment, shall be ordered paid to us, as we have good reason to believe the court will so order, our loss will be trifling. In any event we will not be in the least crippled nor our credit impaired. If any of our friends have checks of ours on S. A. Kean & Co., will they kindly send them direct to us? We will replace them with checks on the First National Bank of this city. We make this request as many of the city banks are protesting all the checks drawn on S. A. Kean & Co. that come into their hands for collection, thus putting the drawers of checks to an expense of $1.25 to $2 on each one. Many sensational reports have appeared regarding the losses of the National W. C. T. U. and the Temperance Temple. While these interests may suffer a temporary inconvenience, their work will in no way be impeded by this failure.

THE offices of the National W. C. T. U. have been removed to Evanston, the leading suburb of Chicago. Inasmuch as the National Convention in Atlanta requested Miss Willard to take a year's rest (which does not to her mean any cessation from work, but will involve her remaining more steadily at home), and since Mrs. Buell has her home in Evanston, it was thought best to locate the offices there for the present, Miss Pugh having come to reside in that classic suburb, thus making practicable at short notice, the presence of a quorum of the General Officers. Miss Willard's office, secretaries, etc., having been in Evanston ever since she became President of the National W. C. T. U. in 1879, this arrangement is the more natural. The Executive Committee in Atlanta unanimously approved it, and it will probably continue in force until the completion of the Woman's Temperance Temple, where it is expected that the officers of the National W. C. T. U., the W. T. P. A., the Illinois W. C. T. U., and the Chicago local union, will all find ample accommodations within a year or two.

THE Supreme Court of South Dakota has rendered a decision in the celebrated Original Package case from Pierre against the defendants, who are sentenced to pay each a fine of $150 and be imprisoned for sixty days. The court held that in order to receive immunity under the Original Package decision, defendants must show that they are foreign importers of beer or liquors; second, that as such agents they received an importation of beer or liquor from any other state or country; third, that they are as such importers or agents selling this, importing by the original unbroken package in which it was imported; fourth, that they are not making their house of business a tippling concern or rendezvous of persons bringing it within the police power of the State to declare it a nuisance. The court further holds that when bottles of whisky or beer, each sealed up in a paper wrapper and closed and placed together in uncovered wooden boxes furnished by the importer, and these wooden boxes are marked to the address of the agent and shipped from one State to another, the wooden boxes and not the bottles constitute the original package within the meaning of the decision of the Supreme Court. The court finds that the defendants failed to establish such facts as will entitle them to any immunity from the penalties of the State law, and orders that the judgment of the court be enforced.

MOST of the leading papers come out with special Christmas numbers. It is a gratifying fact that in many of them the Christly part of the festival is made so prominent. The Independent celebrates both Christmas and its own forty-second birthday by issuing a number enriched by contributions from more than twenty leaders of various denominations who give their choicest thought and teaching on the Christmas festival. Here is one of these teachings from Dr. Gunsaulus: "Whoso needs me most, him do I need most. Solutions for social problems lie here. Power to accumulate wealth and guide the labor of men into achievement, in any social state, will ultimately depend for its sinew upon those whom it bears up. Politics has its day of illumination, in the new method of personal and public life in Christ. Permanence of party strength, greatness of national life, healthfulness of civic vitality depend not upon being ministered unto but upon ministering. As Christmas dawned upon the decaying throne of Cæsar, and supplanted the vision of universal empire through love of power, by a dream of world-wide sovereignty through the power of love, so to-day, over all the din of social discontent, the Christmas truth, as to what power is and as to what power must feed itself upon, has the sole promise of a civilization at once true and safe."

Our Christmas Song.

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON.

NOT only by lips of prophets with the word of the Lord aflame,
Not only by echo from heart to heart of the great Messiah's name,
Not only by vision of sages, bearers of gold and myrrh,
Was lifted the veil of the ages with the breath of God astir;
But a star went wandering earthward, guiding the pilgrim feet
Where loving God and sinful man in perfect childhood meet;
And there was the Shepherd's vision of shining silvery wings,
And the song that should ring and echo until the whole world sings,
'Peace on earth, good will to men;"
Hear it rise and fall again,
"Peace on earth, good will to men—"

There's a glimmer still in the darkness, a shining athwart the gloom;
There's a whisper of God in human souls, "Make for the Christ-King room."
There are hearts that faint for the tokens of His coming from afar,
And feet astray—for the hiding—of Bethlehem's guiding star;
There are souls with gifts to bring Him—treasures of love unpriced.
They look for God, but see Him not, in the tender and sweet Child-Christ.
The guiding star is shrouded in the age's sorrow and wrong
And the heavens have lost the chiming of the shining angel's song,
'Peace on earth, good will to men;"
Shall it not be heard again?
"Peace on earth, good will to men—"

There's a message out of the star-land. The voices that must ring
Are thine, that can echo the angols, and herald our Lord the King.
With never a hush nor a silence should the Christmas melody rise,
Till hearts of the lowest and saddest uplift to the Bethlehem skies,
Till the sad world makes it ready—freed from its strife and sin,
Each heart a sacred temple—for the Christ-Child's entering in;
Till even the souls in prison are tuned to the angel's chord,
And ye set the whole world singing of the coming of the Lord.
"Peace on earth, good will to men;"
Raise the Christmas song again;
"Peace on earth, good will to men."

A CHRISTMAS LETTER.

BY EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

I.

Molly was going on a journey, and starting, of all times in the year, on a Christmas morning. The sun was doing his best to brighten things up, but it looked bleak and gusty outside, and Molly lingered over her leave-taking, and was still drawing on her gloves when the carriage drove up. The driver pulled the bell impatiently, and stood stamping his feet and swinging his numbed arms vigorously.

"It's too bad, Molly," said her sister, turning up the collar of her coat, and tucking in a stray corner of her veil, "but you must certainly come back next week; this isn't half a visit."

Somebody bustled out with the wraps and satchels; there were half a dozen hasty kisses, and the procession went down the steps just as a small maiden caught up a letter from the carpet.

"Aunt Rachel's Christmas letter! she's pulled it out of her satchel! Well, here, give it to me quick; I'll tuck it into the lunch-box; she'll find it at noon."

In went the letter through the smallest possible crack, sandwiching itself snugly between the folds of the morning paper that had also been added as an afterthought, and the belated box was at last settled on the lap of its owner. The driver who had been making irrelevant remarks in the depths of his muffler, slammed the door with unnecessary vigor, and the carriage rolled away, the wheels creaking coldly on the frozen snow. Molly had started on her journey.

II.

The train was not crowded with passengers. If the rest of the world went journeying on a Christmas day, evidently they had chosen some other road over which to travel.

Molly had a whole seat to herself, and she settled herself comfortably, opened her new book and her box of bon-bons, and was as blissfully happy as blithe young girlhood can manage to be even under adverse circumstances. The conductor came and went. The friend who is commissioned to torment the traveling public called upon his victims at regular intervals with his perennial supply of peanuts, pop-corn and prize packages, but Molly only glanced at him, or smiled without glancing, and read on till her eyes were tired. Then she closed her book and looked about her, amusing herself in a fashion of her own by imagining histories for her traveling companions. That benevolent looking old gentleman, with the big knobby carpet-bag on the seat beside him, was Grandfather Cheeryble going to take dinner with John's family, and set the children wild with the delightful surprises crammed into those bundles with which the bag was bursting. And that pale young girl who looked so tired about her eyes, and so smiling about her mouth, was a clerk in Gripall's notion store, and had been kept on her aching feet until ten o'clock by tardy customers. She got the one day off, but that was all, and she looked as if she might have come away without any breakfast, and here it must be nearly noon. Molly looked at her watch and thought of her lunch-box, and then she looked again at the young girl, just in time to see that she was also looking at her. It was not an envious glance. Her eyes, with a keen appreciation of what was dainty and pretty, took in every detail of Molly's handsome dress, but the sigh with which she turned her face away was only one of weariness.

"I'll speak to her," thought Molly, picking up her book and crossing the aisle.

It was not hard to open conversation. They two were the only young folks in the car and Molly was soon pouring into a sympathizing ear the story of the freak of fate that had taken a letter a thousand miles away from its proper destination, and made necessary this Christmas journey. There was genuine regret in the "too bad," with which her listener responded to the story of the Christmas dinner left behind, and the merry party whose pleasure would be lessened by her absence.

"But I've got a lovely lunch," she added enthusiastically; "Marion was so sorry for me she packed everything that would go in the box, only there isn't much fun in eating a Christmas dinner alone. Oh, won't you come over and eat with me? do, please."

"Why, I've got a lunch," said the girl hesitating, and thinking of the cottony baker's roll, and the fragment of fried ham in her bag, the breakfast she was in too great haste to eat.

"Oh, never mind; save it for supper; you'll want it at the rate this train runs. I'll go and see if I can get a table, though I don't suppose they have them in day-cars, do they?"

The best they could do was to turn two seats together and spread the lunch on the box cover, and the newspaper so fortunately at hand, which still kept Aunt Rachel's letter between its folds without in any way betraying the secret. Molly was right in calling it a lovely lunch, for love itself had prepared it, and now love had bidden a guest to sit down and share it. Molly was really hungry, but in her anxiety lest her new friend might be too timid to display an appetite, she nearly destroyed herself with eating. And then she learned Jennie's story, and found she was not a clerk but a dressmaker's apprentice. She might have gone home the night before but a dress had to be finished for a grand reception, and the customer had insisted upon some alterations that kept her too late to get her train.

"I wouldn't mind," she said patiently, "but they'll be so disappointed at home, Ted and Susy especially; I've got the sweetest Tam-o-shanter for Susy."

"And I'll send Ted these almonds and macaroons and the rest of my chocolates; boys never get enough sweeties, at least I know they never think they do."

Molly gathered up the bones and scraps and shook out the crumbs upon the paper, then raising the window tossed the whole outside. The wind caught at it, shook it roughly, and tumbled it into the ditch, but something clean and white fluttered out at the first touch and fell almost at the feet of an old woman who was walking slowly beside the track. She had stepped back a little, drawing her fluttering cloak closer, not to be too near the roaring monster that was slackening its speed for the bridge just ahead, and stood looking up at the windows as they glided past. She wore a handkerchief of dull red drawn over her hood and tied under her chin, and she made a striking picture against the blackish green of the firs loaded with masses of snow. The sweet, placid face brightened at sight of Molly's fresh beauty, and the girl smiled and gave her a friendly nod as she closed the window.

"Such a dear old lady; I wish you had seen her," she said to Jennie, "she looked as if she might be waiting for somebody."

But to the old lady who picked up the letter and carefully shook the snow from it, it seemed beyond a doubt as if Molly had tossed it to her with a smile and a nod.

III.

The letter was sealed but not directed. It was a beautiful mystery, but a faint trace of color showed through its face, that made one guess some sort of a picture was enclosed, and a strange, sweet odor seemed to exhale from it.

"I won't open it till I get home," thought the old lady; "I'll tell father about the pretty girl and all, and let him open it. It'll be something to cheer him up, poor father; to think of a girl doing such a kind-hearted thing. I can feel that it's a Christmas card."

She put it carefully away in the bosom of her dress, and it seemed to make a little warmth about her poor old heart, whether it was the letter itself, or the thought of having a pleasure to take home to the monotonous life of the bedridden invalid who was waiting and watching for her. She had something else for him; blessed words from the Christmas service she had walked a mile to attend. There were those who had yawned and fidgeted, thinking the service dull and tiresome, and the singing out of all harmony. But to Mother Lamborn it was like heavenly manna. Her heart gave grateful assent to prayer and hymn and sermon, and though it was beyond her attainments to guess what the choir might be saying in the anthems, she never doubted that it was some sort of praise and thanksgiving. She may have gotten off the track occasionally, or been left behind in her conscientious attempts to follow, but she was making melody in her heart unto the Lord, and she came in quite heartily on the "AMEN!"

But, the service over, she came back to an uncomfortable consciousness of the small, the very small provision there was in the little old house for a Christmas dinner, only tea and crackers, and some soup that had been diluted and extended by so many ingenious devices that it had lost all legitimate claim to the family name. And she was compelled to acknowledge to herself as she walked along that it had been a real disappointment to her that Mrs. Gregory was not at church, the old-time friend who never forgot to give her a kindly word, who always insisted that she should come in and rest awhile, and who was sure to slip into her bag some nourishing thing for her crippled old husband. None of the family were at church, and by some perverse chance the lonesome old soul came and went without a word of Christmas greeting from anybody. Still she was not utterly cast down. There was always hope that Dominique might turn her mind to business and lay an egg. Her occasional feats in this line were an unspeakable benefit to the invalid, and had saved her own life in some very pressing crises, but if Dominique had been susceptible to mental impressions she would have realized that fate, in the shape of a very determined old woman, was traveling towards her, and her day of grace was about over.

It was a tired old body that came in at the gate, and numbed fingers that fumbled clumsily at the latch, but the small house with its two rooms was still home, and snug and comfortable in spite of its bareness. Everything was exquisitely clean, from the white floor, that showed between the braided mats, to the blue and white coverlet on the bed where a tidy-looking old man lay propped up by pillows scarcely whiter than his own glistening hair.

"Beat out, ain't ye, mother?" he said compassionately, as his wife dropped rather heavily into a chair.

"Well," she said with a smile, "'tis a middlin' long walk to town, and I find I don't get much spryer as I get on in years."

She was still weighing the case for and against Dominique in her own mind, and so for the moment forgot the letter, and began laying away her cloak and hood, talking as she moved about of the service and the people whom she had seen.

"None of the Gregorys were out; I reckon they must have gone down to William's for Christmas; don't half seem like goin' to church without seein' some of 'em."

"Did ye have to go round the pike, or could ye git through the cut?"

"I come through the cut; they've been drawin' wood, and the sled-road is pretty well broke. The train come by just as I turned in, and just see here, father."

She drew the letter from her bosom, and came close to the bed, holding it in her hand.

"I was just turnin' down the sled-road when the train come along, and I stood one side to let it pass; I know it can't come onto me, but I always feel better when it's gone by, and then I like to see it same's the children do. Well, 'most the last end, a girl, jest as pretty as a pictur, threw up the winder and tossed this out to me, smilin' and noddin' as if she knew me, though I didn't know her no more'n the man in the moon. It's all sealed up, and I fetched it home jest as it was, so's you could open it."

She laid the letter on the bed, brought a pair of worn old shears that hung by the window, and waited with a look of eager excitement while the old man cautiously cut a narrow shred from one end of the envelope. He drew out a beautiful card, a handful of wild-flowers dropped carelessly upon the open pages of a book, as if to call attention to the words inscribed there, "Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you." With the card was a letter written in a fine hand, and containing only these words:

"My Dear Old Friend:—I send you a Christmas message from our Father and our Elder Brother; 'Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me.' May the peace which He sends abide with you.

"Rachel."

The old man held the letter in his shaking hands while they read it with their gray heads leaning together, and then they looked at each other with tears and wonder, for pinned to the letter was a ten dollar bill!

"It's too wonderful," he said in an awe-stricken tone; "and you say you didn't know her?"

"I never laid eyes on her, I'm certain of that, for 'twant a face to forgit, and jest to think if I hadn't gone to church, or if I'd stopped a spell at the Gregorys, I'd a-missed her."

"Well, I dunno," said the old man slowly; "I guess the Lord would have sent it some other way then; He ain't straightened for ways and means when He sets out to do anything. I most wish you had a-opened it so's to got a little suthin extry for dinner."

"You're going to have something extry," said his wife energetically; "you're goin' to have fricasseed chicken."

"Goin' to kill Dominick? Well, she is a kind of a aggravatin' creetur, but I sort of hate to have anything killed on a Christmas, especially after this."

But there was no relenting in his wife's face, and he leaned back again and feasted his eyes on the lovely picture and his soul upon the comforting words of the blessed Christmas letter. Suddenly came a sound of bells, and a pair of spirited horses were driven up to the gate.

"There's Mis' Gregory this minute," said the old lady going to the door.

A bright-faced woman, with her arms full of parcels, came breezily into the room followed by a man with an immense basket.

"How did you manage to slip away without my seeing you?" she asked after her hearty greetings; "I meant to bring you out home."

"But you were none of you at church."

"No, we are quarantined; all three of the children are down with the measles, and here am I with a dinner all ready for ten people, and nobody dares come near us, so you must just help me dispose of it. I'd stay and eat with you, but the children are just sick enough to be cross, and they'll drive their father distracted."

All the time she was transferring the contents of her basket to the oven of the stove, the table and the cupboard, and then she sat down to warm her feet and listen to the story of the wonderful letter. She took the letter itself in her hands, and regarded it with almost as much reverence as did the old people.

"There's a society somewhere that sends out Christmas letters to people that might be forgotten, but this can't be one of them, because it's written—and then the money. Oh, I'll tell you, that girl must have been one of the King's Daughters, and you see she was going on a journey on a Christmas day, and she took this along."

Mrs. Gregory spoke in a convincing fashion as if sure that her explanation would be perfectly satisfactory, but the old lady looked at her doubtfully and said:

"But she couldn't have meant it for just anybody because it says, 'My dear old friend.'"

"Oh, no, of course not, she meant it for you."

"But she didn't know I'd be there—"

"No; but you see the Lord knew, and so it was just the same, and now I must get back to my poor little miserables."

She bustled away, leaving cheer and gratitude behind her, but the old lady was very quiet as she arranged her husband's dinner upon the tray, and pinned a great clean towel about his neck as if he had been a baby. Her own dinner was on the little round table close beside the bed, and a tear crept out upon her cheek as "father" gave thanks for both. Before her eyes was a vivid picture of the bright young face that had flashed for a moment upon her and gone on into some world of its own.

"Father," she said presently, "whatever Mrs. Gregory may say, I know that girl threw the letter just to me."

"I believe it," said the old man. "She may have been a King's Daughter—I dare say she was, whether she called herself one or not."

A week afterwards Molly knew that the Christmas letter which Aunt Rachel had sent to Grandma Newland, one of her proteges at the Old Ladies' Home, contained, besides the usual enclosure, a ten dollar bill, and after much speculation, she decided that the missing letter must have been thrown out with the debris of the lunch. But though she often speculated on its probable fate, she never once thought of the old lady whose day she had brightened by a smile, or guessed that in that brief moment she did an errand for Providence.

THE ENCHANTED THICKET.

BY FRANCES E WILLARD.

"And the thorns sprang up and choked them."

To the Readers of our World's and National W. C. T. U. Paper:

It was in my heart to send some Christmas message to those with whom I have sat at the same wholesome table all through the year, with The Union Signal as our wise and helpful host. But some one else has just been speaking to me, in words so earnest and significant they have driven all others from my mind. So let me pass along these keen, heart-searching words to you. For though we who read The Union Signal are not rich, as a class, we live in great comfort and some luxury, for I know your homes and what a lovely home you have made out of mine. And though we do sincerely try to help

"The great humanity that beats
Its life along the stony streets," it remains true that there is much territory yet to be possessed in our hearts for whatever human creature beside us crawls or creeps or clings or climbs. More and more do I meditate upon that divine example "who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor;" upon that giving of ourselves which is more than all other sacrifice and more than all words, even though they all be prayers. To dwell among the lowly, to share their surroundings, and personally to mitigate their sorrows seems to me the acme of the Christlike life. And it is coming! Its spirit stirs in the heavenlier air of this new time. Those "College settlements" where women of the higher education establish their own warm, household hearths among the poorest and invest their own lives and skill for the uplifting of the lowest, are forerunners of a better evangel. The movement in New York and London, of the rich and cultured toward Salvation Army work, the drift of the white-ribbon women toward making common cause with those less fortunate, predicts the revival of that "enthusiasm of humanity" which will yet solve the temperance, the labor and the woman questions, enthroning Christ in individual hearts and lives, and incarnating His spirit in the customs of society and the laws of the land. My Christmas wish and prayer for those who read these lines is, may we learn this year, in a more practical sense than we have before known, that nearness to the neediest which explains why it is said of One whom we call "Master," that "the common people heard Him gladly."

Listen, now, to the helpful words of our friend:

I would fain say a word by way of appeal to you, the specially wealthy and respectable classes. The situation is so grave, the crisis hastens so, all over the civilized world—what are you going to do? what part are you going to play in the great drama on which the curtain is just rising?

As one walks through the vast polite wildernesses of the West End of London, or upper New York, and the endless suburban villa-regions of all our great towns—in extent and wealth and standard of luxury visibly and rapidly increasing from year to year—as one sips one's tea in the drawing-room, or listens to the after-dinner conversation over the wine and walnuts, there steals upon one I know not what sense of antediluvian slumber of, strange and may be fatal lethargy. All is so elegant, so easy, so finished—one dreams on as in an enchanted palace, and the noise of the actual world dies out at last from one's ears. And yet, when a man comes to look into it, he sees that it is just here, in these enchanted palaces, that the danger and the disease of modern society lies. He cannot help feeling that these who live here are really, as William Morris calls them, the dangerous classes. Not the poor half-starved wretches, puny and stunted in person, and empty in purse, who mad with rage are belched forth in their thousands and hundreds of thousands from the slums of our great cities—not these, terrible as they are, are the real danger. They are only the reaction, the protest, the necessary outcome, and perhaps after all the hopeful ending of a great wrong. It is in these great clotted and congested centers which call themselves "society," but through which the true life-blood of society does not circulate—in the slow poison and paralysis of the life there—in the fatal mortification of these centers, which with their vast wealth and influence spread claws of contagion all through the vital organism in which they occur, that the dangerous peril lies, which perhaps only a serious convulsion may avert.

In truth the very extent of these congested regions is already a difficulty. For they are so vast that you who live within them have hardly a chance to know what is going on in the real world. The cry of the starving children, the price of whose maintenance for a week is consumed by you in a single ordinary meal, reaches not your ears. It has too far to travel. Sometimes indeed a tale of suffering may penetrate, but it sounds far off like a dream. How can you do anything? A thousand shackles, worse than any tangled thicket, have grown up round the sleeping soul.

You sit in rooms crowded with knick-knacks, elegant trifles from all parts of the world. They are beautiful; I have not a word to say against them. And in the next house the rooms are crowded with similar trifles, and in the next, and the next; and for miles round the same. The servants have to dust them every day, the owners never look at them—hardly know what they are. For whom do they exist? If in a plainly furnished cottage one such thing were seen, it would actually be examined—it would be a delight, a real curiosity, a bright suggestion of form and color, an adornment of work-a-day life; but here it is so gratuitously useless that it enfeebles the mind that gazes on it; it is no adornment, for there is no real life to adorn.

And through this maze of congested life—of interests which have ceased to be interesting, of enjoyments which have become bores—to pick the way, what an art it has become! Visitors call in the afternoon and visits have to be made. The long day has to be eked out—now a cup of tea, now a five-course meal, now a little coffee, and now a turn at the piano. (And all the time what poor girls are pining, what mothers are dying for want of a little help, a little sympathy!) And even the smallest crumbs of incident to be worked up into "conversation." Some get quite clever at this. They always say the right thing at the right time, are sympathetic, bright, entertaining. Yes—while Nero is fiddling, Rome is burning. Have you no other use for that sensitive heart, that ready tongue, which nature has given you, than to perpetuate this Fool's Paradise of polite trifling?

A Paradise truly. The hot water arrives so punctually at the bedroom door, the carpets are so soft and warm, the spoons so bright and clean—surely there can't be much amiss in the world. If only these demagogues would keep quiet, these few crack-brained reformers—and the faint wolf-howling there far down in the conscience.

Do you not attend church on Sunday, and are you not very philanthropic? Do you not tell each other sad stories about the poor over your ice pudding, till your lips are pursed with pity? (or is it the pudding?) Do you not undertake excursions to the East End, and get deeply interested in the general question of slums? Is it not all very nice, and just as it ought to be, and wouldn't the poor soon get their wrongs redressed if instead of naughtily rioting they were to wait for you to come in your fur cloaks like good fairies, and turn their wretched dens into pleasant palaces?

And yesterday a woman that I know died—died washing—washing rich folks' clothes—at twelve cents a dozen. It was a good thing, wasn't it, that she died quietly, poor thing, so gentle and loving—without any fuss or rioting in the streets or making comfortable people uncomfortable? Of course our clothes are not washed at that price—no blood on them. We all know that. At any rate, we pay fair enough; if the people whom we employ put the washing out on scandalous terms that is their fault, not ours. We have so many things to attend to, so many big philanthropic schemes, we can hardly be expected to know all about our laundress.

And to-day a hundred porters and signalmen have been discharged from one of the large railways, so as to effect a saving of $25,000 a year in expenses. It would have been a pity, wouldn't it, to reduce the dividend in order to save those hundred good, industrious folk and their families from being turned into the streets? The diminution of dividend would have very nearly amounted to five cents (this is a fact) on every $500 share. Think of that! Five cents. It was a good thing those hundred families were turned off, or you might have actually had to go short of a box of chocolate next Christmas.

Is there no sense of sympathy, of responsibility, of mere duty even, in these matters? Has the cry of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" become stereotyped upon the lips of the wealthy? When the shareholder comes for his dividend, when the bondholder comes for his bond, is it nothing to him that human flesh has to submit to the knife in the process, as long as he gets what the law allows him to claim? Is all humanity dead out of the world, and are you rich going to continue forever this practice of living out of the degradation and death of the poor, which has already become so familiar to you that it seems the most natural thing possible?

And yet after all has been said, do I not know well enough the tender heart that beats within you, for all that the enchanted thicket has grown so strong and tall? You men of the upper classes—numbers of you—so devoted, chivalrous, honorable, attending to the welfare of servants and dependents, conscientious on committees, indefatigable in generosity towards the needy, fairly perplexed night and day in the study how best to distribute your wealth; yet has it never occurred to you that it would be better once for all to abandon this everlasting game of robbing Peter to pay Paul—this Sisyphus labor, this rolling of stones uphill only that they may roll down again? What a relief surely it would be! Here on the one hand, with infinite labor in your profession, with infinite care and anxiety in your trade, with infinite trouble even in keeping account of all your rents and dividends, are you gathering a heap together, only to cause yourself fresh labor, fresh anxiety and care, in distributing it again, perhaps to the very people you got it from. Why not sav this double labor from the beginning? Let the two minuses obliterate each other, and make once more a plus in your life. Here is a circular lying on my table addressed to railway shareholders, and asking subscriptions for a benefit society for the men. What is the good of my first taking a part of their earnings from the men, and then giving the same back to them in a benefit society? What is the good of first depriving the people at large of the means of clothing and feeding themselves, and then coming back to them with clothing clubs and soup kitchens? What is the good of forcing them to work for me under filthy and harmful conditions, and then building hospitals to cure them of the diseases and injuries that I have caused? I might have saved myself the trouble and them the insult. Or do we of the upper classes constitute such a special providence in relation to the working masses that unless their means of livelihood all passed through our hands it would not get properly distributed? You men—educated men as you purport to be—surely you must see the contradiction which is involved in your mode of life, the absurdity; if, above all things, you are practical, do not let this waste and misapplication of your social labor continue.

And you, women of the same class, who have such capacities of love and sympathy—this life that you lead, with its perpetual denial of humanity, cannot satisfy you for long. You mothers, we plead for the thousands of mothers who, loving their children like you, have to see the little things almost starving before their eyes. You young women! think of the girls in back courts and alleys, or even in rude country villages or mining districts—gentle creatures, full of capacities for gaiety, romance, beauty, like yourselves, but too soon to be hardened into spiritless drudges—think! to know you, to have you for a friend, would be a dream of splendor. How much you might give if you would only come nearer these! Think, if you only lived in a place where these could run in and out freely without fear—some simple little cot, where the tide of humanity would wash right up to the door. How they would love you! How that bright gift of tact and sympathy would cheer them; how your ornaments and acquisitions would then become real adornments and curiosities; how you could find a hundred uses for them, and for your books which now lie congested on your shelves. What a busy life; how much of interest, possibly even of love! But now you are shut away—you are in prison. An impenetrable chevaux de frise of aimless, heartless conventionalities and luxuries forbids the entrance of any natural human being.

Ah! I know how your heart bleeds in silence over these things; how you curse the fate which brought you into this world. But how can you move? A thousand chains detain you; round you in every direction stretches the web of polite society; attractive, certainly, in some respects, but oh, how poisonous and paralyzing. In this you were born; every fiber of it has entered into your body. How can you escape from it?

In conclusion, and to look at the matter quite practically, there seems but one immediate step that the wealthy despoiler can take—which at the same time is a most obvious step—and that is, at once or as soon as ever he can, to place his life on the very simplest footing. And this for several reasons. First, because if he must live by other people's labor—and in some cases doubtless his "education" will leave him no other alternative—it is clearly his duty to consume as little of that commodity as he possibly can—(and anyhow experience shows that it is impossible to live very luxuriously on one's own labor alone). Secondly, because only by living simply—that is, on a level of simplicity at least equal to that of the mass of the people—is it possible to know the people, to become friends with them, to gauge their wants, etc.; and here I may say that I do not see that it is the least necessary for a well-to-do person to trouble himself or herself about big philanthropic schemes, or even to join committees of any kind (unless having a special turn that way)—if such an one will only go and live quite quietly in town or country in such an unpretending manner that all, even the poorest, will have ready access without shame, he (or she) will soon find plenty of use for their surplus, and with a certainty of not being imposed upon which they cannot possibly have under other circumstances. Thirdly, because by such a simple life the cares and anxieties of a luxurious household—the innumerable fidgets and worries and obstacles to all true life, together with the dread about being able to maintain it all in the future, are once and for all got rid of. A great load drops off, and the Rubicon once crossed the difficulties attending the change are seen to be nothing compared with the increased happiness which it brings. Fourthly, because it is only on the knowledge and habits gained in a self-supporting life that the higher knowledge and the fine arts are really founded, and it is as impossible for a statesman to look after a nation properly unless he is acquainted with the first elements of social life as it is for an artist to paint properly who does not realize the value of homely details, or for a capitalist to do justice to his works and workmen who is ignorant (as is commonly the case nowadays) of the rudiments of the industry which he professes to organize.

And so on. In every department, of morality, good taste, common-sense, private and public expediency, a change in the lives of the rich is called for. It is not necessary to know or to argue about all the changes that will follow. This first step is obvious, and if you take that, the next will become clearer.

A "SCHEME."

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

Part II.—The Deliverance.

At this season the thought of Christendom turns upon the world's Deliverer, and it is specially fitting now to study how best we may become practically co-workers with Him in the great deliverance. Man is the unit and epitome of "the world" Christ came to save. Monasticism has held its vigils and said its thirty hour prayers; let us be just; it has also built orphan asylums and hospitals; it has had its holy orders of Brothers and of Sisters who gave alms. But the monk, by himself turning mendicant, put a premium upon pauperism, and beggary grew to the proportions of a profession in Catholic countries. The pilgrim priest, evading the responsibilities of family and the manly duty of building a home, furnished a type of selfishness rather than of saintliness for common humanity to build upon. Not so the Salvation soldiers, who marry and are given in marriage in healthy, hearty, human fashion. The Salvation Army has fought no better battle than that against asceticism—the highest order of selfishness. The Salvationist does not court privation in this world that he may have greater riches in some other world. He does not practice self-denial for its reflex benefit to himself. He has a better motive, the simple, Christly one of desiring to help others. As he tells you, in the vernacular of the slums, from whence he possibly came, "There is no penance in his; he wants to get men to Jesus, hallelujah!" and he proposes to get the whole man there.

General Booth's plan of deliverance touches every necessity of life, not with alms but with opportunity. Yet it improves surroundings not as an end but as a means. It is not a substitute for, but rather an adjunct of the old-fashioned salvation by faith.

"The supreme test of any scheme for benefiting humanity lies in the answer to the question, What does it make of the individual? Does it quicken his conscience, does it soften his heart, does it enlighten his mind; does it, in short, make more of a true man of him? because, only by such influences can he be enabled to lead a human life."

In the broad, unsectarian spirit which characterizes all his utterances, the author says: "I have nothing against those who are endeavoring to open up a way of escape without any consciousness of God's help. . . . In so far as they are endeavoring to give bread to the hungry, clothing to the naked, and above all, work to the workless, they are to that extent endeavoring to do the will of our Father which is in heaven, and woe be unto all those who say them nay! But to be orphaned of all sense of the Fatherhood of God is surely not a secret source of strength."

For himself, his "only hope for the permanent deliverance of mankind from misery, either in this world or the next, is the regeneration or remaking of the individual by the power of the Holy Ghost through Jesus Christ. . . . No doubt it is good for men to climb unaided out of the whirlpool on to the rock of deliverance in the very presence of the temptations which have hitherto mastered them, and to maintain a footing there with the same billows of temptation washing over them. But, alas! that decisiveness of character, that moral nerve which takes hold of the rope thrown for the rescue, and keeps its hold amidst all the resistances that have to be encountered, is wanting. The general wreck has shattered and disorganized the whole man. . . . And in providing for the relief of temporal misery, I reckon that I am only making it easy where it is now difficult, and possible where it is now all but impossible, for men and women to find their way to the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. . . . I propose to go straight for these sinking classes, and in doing so, shall continue to aim at the heart. I still prophesy the uttermost disappointment unless that citadel is reached. In proposing to add one more to the methods I have already put into operation to this end, do not let it be supposed that I am the less dependent upon the old plans, or that I seek anything short of the old conquest. If we help the man it is in order that we may change him."

Many plans have been offered for bettering the condition of the worthy poor. General Booth takes the unusual position that no scheme of social salvation is worth discussion, unless "applicable to the thief, the harlot, the drunkard, and the sluggard. As Christ came to call not the saints but sinners to repentance, so the new message of temporal salvation, of salvation from pinching poverty, from rags and misery, must be offered to all. They may reject, it of course. But we who call ourselves by the name of Christ are not worthy to profess to be His disciples until we have set an open door before the least and worst of these who are now apparently imprisoned for life in a horrible dungeon of misery and despair."

Not help, but chance for self-help, is the watchword. The nerveless and unnerving charity which simply feeds from day to day, with nothing more in view, is scarcely better than doing nothing at all.

The great scheme aims to raise the "two-handed worker to the four-footed standard of the London cab horse." That enviable animal has at least two points in his favor. He has work allotted him by which he can earn his corn and stall, and if from any fault of his own or another's he is down, he receives the needed help to get him on his legs again.

The machinery by which it is proposed to operate the derrick for raising the great body of men who are down, consists of a city colony, a farm colony, and an over-sea colony.

"The social problem presents itself before us whenever a hungry, dirty and ragged man stands at our door asking if we can give him a crust or a job. That is the social question. What are you to do with that man? He has no money in his pocket, all that he can pawn he has pawned long ago; his stomach is as empty as his purse, and the whole of the clothes upon his back, even if sold on the best terms, would not fetch a shilling. There he stands, your brother, with sixpennyworth of rags to cover his nakedness from his fellow-men, and not sixpennyworth of victuals within his reach. He asks for work, which he will set to even on his empty stomach and in his ragged uniform, if so be that you will give him something for it, but his hands are idle, for no one employs him. What are you to do with that man?

The city colony spells the first word of the answer.

Its letters are the cheap food depots and shelters; the labor bureau and labor yards; the Rescue Homes and harbors. A number of these are already giving earnest of the practical value of the scheme. The Household Salvage Brigade, an important feature in the forecast of the perfected city work, is yet to be tried.

At the cheap food depots a quart of soup is furnished for a penny, or a basin of soup with bread for the same. Consulting the bill of fare we find a comfortable variety of meats and vegetables, and that a meal can be obtained for three pennies—six cents! It seems impossible that these places are anywhere near self-supporting. But the table shows that the sales for last year were computed by the ton. Twenty-five tons of sugar, 140 tons of potatoes, 192½ tons of bread, are some of the figures. This is a wholesale business; then the service is done as unto the Lord, by soldiers enlisted to take the world for their Captain, and the sanitary department has an important place in the campaign. Four pence gives the wayfarer the freedom of the Shelter, including bread and tea, coffee or cocoa, bath; place to wash his shirt, and bed.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Next to His unspeakable gift, the best gift of our Father to the world is a man or woman filled with the Christ Spirit, and doing His work. And such gifts He has ready for every time of need. With each decree of Ahasuerus He presents one fit to come to the kingdom for such a time as this. When He took from the British Women's Temperance Association and the world Margaret Bright Lucas, our hearts were heavy with sorrow, and our tear-dimmed eyes could not see who would fill her place. But even in that hour of darkness, God's love shining on those teardrops was transforming them into a bow of promise, a promise nobly fulfilled in bringing Lady Henry Somerset into the vacant place.

She is, as Hannah Whitall Smith says, "a deeply taught Christian," who received her election to the presidency of the British Women's Temperance Association as "a divine call into a wide sphere." This she said when, amid the waving handkerchiefs of the Chautauqua salute, the deep, glad welcome of women's eyes and hearts, she was escorted to the platform of the association at its fourteenth anniversary last May, and introduced as president.

In accepting this grave responsibility, she touched the keynote of her life by saying, "Christ has to will and to work in us according to His good pleasure, then we shall become workers in Christ." "The true way to spell Christian is Christ-in-us. In His sublime faith we should know no obstacles." "After all, the great question that will come home to every heart will be, 'How have I presented Christ to this world?'"

Whence came this woman so taught of God, so fitted for the kingdom at such a time as this? One year ago we had not heard her name; to-day she is enshrined in our hearts' inner sanctuary.

Isabella, Lady Henry Somerset, was born in 1851, and is the eldest daughter of Earl and Countess Somers, of Eastnor Castle, Ledbury, Herefordshire. Ledbury is a quaint old market town, where John B. Gough spoke for temperance thirty years ago, and where now a strong branch of the B. W. T. A. flourishes under the presidency of Lady Elizabeth Biddulph. Three miles from its railway station is Eastnor Castle, on the Herefordshire—that is, the western side of Malvern Hills. It is beautiful for situation, majestic in character, and historic in its surroundings. In sight is Herefordshire Beacons, the highest point in the Malvern range, one of the strongest hill fortresses in Britain. For ages the summit of this hill has been used for beacon fires whose heats have charred its rocks. At the approach of the Spanish Armada,

"Twelve counties saw the blaze
On Malvern's lonely heights."

Thus, Eastnor Castle is a fitting home for one who to-day stands as a beacon light, not only for England, but for the world.

Having no brothers, Lady Henry Somerset succeeded to the inheritance of the vast estate of her father. The family had been land owners in county Kent, certainly as far back as the thirteenth century, and numbers many illustrious men and women in its line of succession; Among them is Lord Keeper Somers, of whom Macaulay says, "In some respects he was the greatest man of his age, uniting all the qualities of a great Judge—an intellect comprehensive, quick and acute, diligence, integrity, patience, suavity."

Born thus to an inheritance of culture, refinement and wealth, married in 1872 to Lord Henry Somerset, second son of the Duke of Beaufort, receiving the crown of motherhood in 1874 by the birth of her only child, her cup was full to the brim of the richest draughts the world can furnish. Her life was passed in the gayest of England's most aristocratic society, and with it she seemed content until 1885. What heaven-sent breezes swept her soul's heart-strings then, we know not; we only know the results. Amid all of life's gayety she had felt deep spiritual longings; now these spoke to her soul imperatively; she listened to this inner voice, turned her back upon London and its gayeties, and went to Eastnor Castle to spend some months alone with her God. Here He taught her those lessons unspeakable which only God can teach to willing souls, and from this, His university, she graduated into service as daughter of a King.

The duty lying nearest her was the care of her large tenantry. Her clarified vision recognized her responsibility concerning them in regard not only to physical, but to spiritual interest. At the very threshold of her work for her tenants she was confronted with the terrible drink problem. This made her a temperance woman, and a temperance worker. The first temperance meeting she ever attended was in December of that, to her, ever memorable year, 1885; it was in the little village of Eastnor, at her castle gates; then and there she signed the temperance pledge, with forty of her tenants.

She has large possessions in the heart of London, as well as in the beautiful hill country of Herefordshire, her tenants there numbering nearly one hundred thousand. Over them she felt her heart stirred with the yearnings of spiritual motherhood. She who had been the light of West End aristocratic drawing rooms, now went to West End missions to seek and to save them that are lost.

A picture stands out fair and clear; it is St. James' Hall, the West London Mission, where Mr. Price Hughes and his devoted wife, with the "Sisters of the People," are bringing the sweetness and the light of the gospel of Christ into London's dark places. A lady, evidently a stranger, walks quietly into the meeting one day, and at the close of the service comes to Mr. Hughes saying, "I will gladly receive into my country home some of the destitute poor in the slums of Soho." He asks her name and she responds, "Lady Henry Somerset." From that day to this she has been one of the strongest supporters of that mission, giving to the poor women who are its especial charge, the most precious gift of sisterly sympathy and uplifting.

Last month occurred the anniversary of this mission, and Lady Henry Somerset presided at the afternoon session. In introducing her, Mr. Hughes referred to their first meeting. Her response is characteristic and gives us the beautiful obverse of the picture I have faintly limned. "I shall never forget the feelings with which I walked away from St. James' Hall three years ago, after attending the first meeting I ever went to in that place. I did not go home, but I went away into St. James' Park and sat down on a seat, while my heart overflowed with thankfulness, for I felt that not only would the love of God be told out to the great throbbing heart of West London, but that the gospel would be lived out in the Christlike lives of those who, by their tender sympathy and healing touch, would take of the things of God and show them to poor, weary, sin-sick, struggling souls."

There, on that bench in St. James' Park, sprang into life the ideal of a most Christlike "Fresh Air" mission.

Can you imagine a greater contrast than the slums of Soho, with their reeking filth, physical and moral, fetid air, sufferings, sorrow, crime,—and Eastnor, sun-crowned, heaven-kissed, with its lake and woods, its terraces and fountains, its gardens and conservatories, and its glorious outlook? And this physical contrast only typifies the contrast in life as lived in the two places, and the change Lady Henry Somerset has introduced into dreary lives. Ever since she sat on that bench in St. James' Park "with heart overflowing with thanksgiving," that thanksgiving has expressed itself in service for her less fortunate sisters. The lovely grounds of Eastnor have new visitants; queenly women still frequent them, but to their accustomed eyes the beauty cannot bring the thrill of rapture which fills the hearts of sad-eyed women and forlorn children to whom a growing flower or a stately oak are alike miracles, fresh from the hand of God. These are the ones she brings out there from Soho, giving to their lives such an uplift through this companionship with Nature as was not imaginable while in the slums. Yet this is only the beginning, for Lady Henry Somerset is a Macedonian giver, she gives herself; the love of God is translated into language they can understand by the tenderness of this royal-souled woman. For these and for her tenantry she sustains four missions on the estate, each equipped with its own chapel and minister.

Hannah Whitall Smith seems to have been the connecting link between Lady Henry Somerset and the British Women's Temperance Association. They had never met when Mrs. Smith went to Ledbury to give a series of Bible readings. Lady Henry attended and invited her to Eastnor Castle. Here they communed concerning the things of the kingdom, and each discovered in the other a kindred spirit. After Mrs. Smith's return to London, as she sat with the committee that was discussing the difficult question of a successor to Margaret Bright Lucas, it "was borne in upon her mind" that Lady Henry Somerset is the woman for the place. She announced her conviction, all agreed that it would be a blessed thing to have Lady Henry Somerset for President of the B. W. T. A., but not one believed she would accept the position.

"I will go and ask her," said Hannah, and she went. At first her ladyship positively declined; Mrs. Smith presented her arguments, and then they two prayed earnestly for guidance from God. It was granted; Lady Henry's eyes were opened to see that this way lay duty, and she promised to accept if the position was offered her. When the Association met she was unanimously elected, and in response to a telegram announcing the fact, came to the convention and accepted the onerous honors so unexpectedly accorded her.

When God led Lady Henry into this wide sphere He touched her lips with a coal from off the altar, baptizing them with the fire of eloquence. On whatever occasions she is called before the public, and they are many, fitting words seem given her. There is something delightfully fresh and unhackneyed about her expressions; she comes into the philanthropies from another sphere and has not grown into the stock phrases, which slip unconsciously from our tongues. For example: It seems as if we have exhausted the English language in expressing our loving appreciation of Miss Willard; yet no one on this side of the water has thought to say as Lady Henry does: "Miss Willard has bewitched the women of America and of the world into a wonderful coalition against sin."

She takes broad views of the situation, as shown in this extract from one of her addresses: "It seems to me that there never was a time when the voice of God spoke more clearly to the hearts of men, and His new commandment, that 'ye love one another as He has loved us' comes to us as a fresh revelation, as though a new light had been shed on the infinite extent of that love which bids us embrace the sorrowing, the sinful, the outcast, with the outstretched arms of Him who gave His life for every poor, storm-tossed soul."

She does not shrink from bringing temperance into politics by laying responsibility upon the conscience of voters. In her address to the thousands assembled at Eastnor Castle last September she said: "At the cost of sacrifice, of toil, of willing, loving, unflinching surrendered lives must the great victory over here be won. When the political struggle is hot, and your opinions run high in favor of this party or that, consecrate that vote of yours to this one great question, and the riddle will be solved that includes many others. My friends, in this great cause we want God's honor remembered at the ballot box, and we need not be afraid that He will not watch over the best interests of our nation."

In every strand of every rope of Britain's all-conquering navy is intertwined a thread of red. That rope may be stolen and put to other uses; it may be thrown by the waves upon foreign shores; it may be cut and torn till only minute fragments remain, but in every fragment the red thread tells the story of its origin and ownership. This is a fitting simile of Lady Henry Somerset's character; whether in her ancestral castle or in London's slums; whether speaking of philanthropy or of politics, wherever she is, whatever she does or says, reveals the red thread of her undying devotion to Him whose blood redeemed her, and who works in and through her. It is for this reason, even more than because she so ably fills the place of the loved Margaret Bright Lucas, that Lady Henry Somerset will receive such full-hearted welcome when she comes to the National Convention at Boston next autumn.

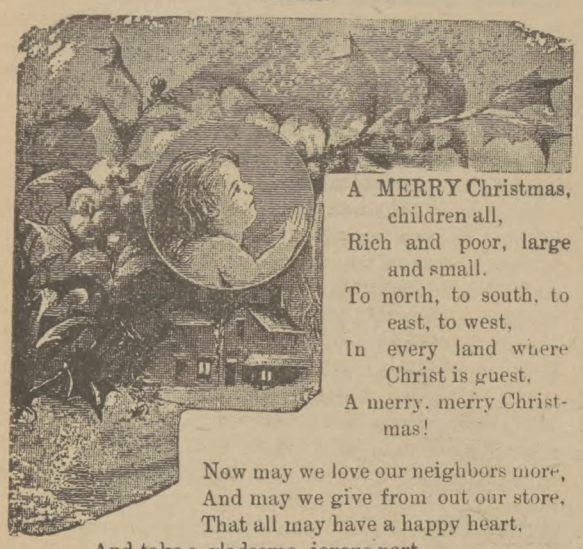
Our Children.

A Christmas Greeting.



A MERRY Christmas,
children all,
Rich and poor, large and small.
To north, to south, to east, to west,
In every land where
Christ is guest,
A merry, merry Christ-

Now may we love our neighbors more,
And may we give from out our store,
That all may have a happy heart,
And take a gladsome, joyous part
In our merry, merry Christmas!

For when dear Christmas Eve draws nigh
Be it the time when you and I
Shall put away all wrong and sin,
And bid the holy Christ-Child in
To bless our merry Christmas!

SANTA CLAUS ON THE TRAIN.

On a Christmas eve an emigrant train
Sped on through the blackness of night,
And cleft the pitchy dark in twain
With the gleam of its fierce head-light.

In a crowded car, a noisome place,
Sat a mother and her child;
The woman's face bore want's wan trace,
But the little one only smiled,

And tugged and pulled at her mother's dress,
And her voice had a merry ring,
As she lisped, "Now, mamma, come and guess
What Santa Claus'll bring."

But sadly the mother shook her head,
As she thought of a happier past;
"He never can catch us here," she said,
"The train is going too fast."

"O, mamma, yes, he'll come, I say,
So swift are his little deer,
They runs all over the world to-day—
I'll hang my stocking up here."

She pinned her stocking to the seat,
And closed her tired eyes,
And soon she saw each longed-for sweet
In dreamland's paradise.

On a seat behind the little maid
A rough man sat apart,
But a soft light o'er his features played
And stole into his heart.

As the cars drew up at a busy town
The rough man left the train,
But scarce had from the steps jumped down
Ere he was back again.

And a great big bundle of Christmas joys
Bulged out from his pocket wide;
He filled the stocking with sweets, and toys
He laid by the dreamer's side.

At dawn the little one woke with a shout,
'Twas sweet to hear her glee;
"I knowed that Santa would find me out;
He caught the train, you see."

Though some from smiling may scarce refrain,
The child was surely right,
The good Saint Nicholas caught the train,
And came aboard that night.

THE BEST GIFT.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:

On this merry, merry Christmas day, let us take just a little time to think of what makes Christmas the brightest, gladdest day of all the year. Take your Bibles and read the beautiful story as told in those two second chapters, of Matthew and of Luke. Think what it must have been to those shepherds keeping watch over their flocks by night to have the glory of the Lord shine about them, and an angel stand before them, saying, "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people." This is the joy that should fill all the Christmas time, and fill our hearts through all the days of the year. God's unspeakable gift! More precious than rubies or diamonds, or anything the whole world can give; yet I am afraid that sometimes when Christmas comes we are so delighted with the skates and sleds, the books and dolls our parents give, we forget all about the Unspeakable Gift our Heavenly Father gives us. Oh, don't let us do this, for the dear Jesus who is always near us, it seems to me must be particularly close to every child at Christmas time, and how it must grieve Him to see we have forgotten all about Him!

Another thing I have often tried to imagine, but could never quite make out, is how the angels must have felt to see the Lord of Glory before whom they were accustomed to cast their crowns and worship—to see HIM as a little baby wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger because there was no room for Him in the inn. They could not understand it, but they trusted Him so fully that amid their wonder they could sing, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will toward men!" Let us never forget this song, and let us never forget that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

I hope many of you will have Pansy's lovely book, "The Prince of Peace, or the Beautiful Life of Jesus," given you for a Christmas present; but whether you have it or not, I wish you would read the story in the Bible; that is where God tells it, and nobody can tell it so well as He can.

A dear lady wrote me begging me not to make much of Christmas in this paper, because we do not know just the very day Christ was born, and because so many people keep Christmas in a bad way. There was no Christmas in my childhood because our parents and teachers felt just as this lady does. But I do not feel so now. No matter if we are not certain sure that Christ was born on the twenty-fifth of December, the great fact that HE WAS BORN we are sure of. It is a fact we ought to celebrate; we ought to give one day in the year to glad thanksgiving to God for His Unspeakable Gift; it is better to take for this day the one on which the Christian world for centuries has settled, rather than for each of us to study out a day for ourselves.

And as for people's not keeping Christmas in the right way, I am just as sorry as I can be about that, but it seems to me the best way to help it is not to give up Christmas, but that you and I and every one of us shall make up our minds to keep it just as much in the spirit of the Christ-Child as we can, and by and by another and another and another will learn from us to keep it so, too.

CAPTAIN MARY.

ELLIE'S CHRISTMAS.

BY LINHOLM.

"Hurrah! No school to-morrow! Santa Claus coming on the air-line straight down our chimney to-night! My! what fun!" and Launce swung his book-strap around his head, cutting a caper at the same time.

"What does Launce mean by 'Claws' in his chimney?" asked a pale little girl, wearing an old calico dress with apron faded to match.

"Why, nothing, only Santa Claus is coming down all our chimneys with lots of nice presents to stuff in our stockings," answered Lucy Macks, and she hummed,

"The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hope that St. Nicholas soon would be there."

"Really, don't you know about Santa Claus, Ellie?" asked Jennie Price.

"No," said Ellie simply, as she parted from her companions and turned towards home. A poor home it was, but better than it had been, for little Ellie's father had signed the pledge, and meant, "by God's help" to keep it. He had kept it for three months and the worn and scanty furniture was assuming a more comfortable air. Every day now there was something in the pantry to eat, and Joseph Moore had resolved that his Ellie should have "a chance at schoolin'."

She was rather a shy little girl accustomed to amuse herself, until at school she found pleasant mates. Going home she pondered upon that which she had heard Launce and Lucy say. What sort of a creature could Santa Claws be? Good and kind of course, for he brought presents. How could he get into all the chimneys in town? How wise he must be to know where all the children lived, so as not to make mistakes in the presents! And smart, too, to manage all the chimneys!

Would he come to her house? Wonderful thought! It made her heart beat fast. But suppose he should—there was no chimney! Tears started to Ellie's eyes at that thought. The stove-pipe was made to go through a window. And then, no stockings! Papa had promised some in a week or two, but that was not to-night. The good shoes he had bought protected her feet for the present, but how could she expect Santa Claws to stop at her house where there were neither chimney nor stockings!

Ellie made tea ready for her father, all the time thinking of the wonderful Santa. She was sorry that there would be no school the next day for she loved both study and companionship.

After tea her father went out, and Ellie washed the few cups and plates with many a meditative glance at the stove-pipe. Finally, she said to herself:

"If he should come here he'd think it awful strange I had nothing ready for his presents. This paper bag is better than nothing, and I'll tie it on the door. Of course he'll find it!"

Then Ellie went to bed determined to keep awake in case he came, but the harder she tried the sleepier she grew, so it was not long before she was far away in Shut-eye-Town.

Jennie Price, the older girl, to whom Ellie had acknowledged that she knew nothing about Santa Claus, had interested the other girls in their poor little schoolmate, and proposed that all should make up a basket of Christmas gifts.

"I'll give a hood."

"And I a dress."

"And I a cake."

"And I a pie."

"I don't care if she has that lovely picture-book that came to me last Christmas. I almost know I shall have another."

"I will give all my popcorn."

"I can spare a lot of hickory nuts."

"I have a dolly laid by that I would like to give."

"Bring all the things to my house. Have everything there before eight o'clock," said Jennie, "and I'll get them around to Ellie's."

All were prompt, and Susy Morley's brother Tom brought a chicken deliciously roasted, that Mrs. Morley had added to Susy's pie.

Mr. Price said, "A bushel of Baldwin apples would be acceptable to Mr. Moore, and he ought to be encouraged," so when Jennie walked over to Ellie's her brother Maurice walked beside her pushing his hand-cart full of presents for Ellie and her father.

Mr. Moore had not returned, but Ellie had left a lamp burning "for Santa Claws to see by."

"Well, I declare!" exclaimed Maurice. "Look here!"

"Hush! What?" cautioned and questioned Jennie under her breath.

"This brown paper-bag is for Santa Claus, or else I can't count two!"

"Dear little thing!" said Jennie. "Let's put in the pop-corn and nuts, and the dolly on top."

"Yes, and one of the Baldwins. Leave the other things here."

"Let's go."

They went even more quietly than they came, for the hand-cart was now so light that Maurice carried it in his arms for a rod or two.

Scarcely had they turned the corner when Mr. Moore reached home with extras for a Christmas dinner in the shape of cabbage and onions in addition to the potatoes and butter already purchased. He had also a pair of bright red stockings "to make a bit of Christmas for the child."

It might take too long to tell all the rest, but you can guess that our story had a good ending when Ellie awoke early on Christmas morning—only it did not end then, because it lasted all day, and many more days; and all the school children from this time loved poor lonely, little Ellie; and when in the course of a few years her father built a neat house of his own—with a chimney from the cellar to beyond the roof—and furnished it comfortably, Ellie Moore had hoods and pop-corn with which to make a happy Christmas for those who needed.

TOMMY is very hard on shoes and trousers. His mother understands this, and governs herself accordingly when she goes shopping.

One day, while out with another lady, she was buying cloth for a pair of pantaloons for Tommy, and ordered a good deal more than seemed necessary.

"Why do you get so much?" asked her friend.

"Oh," was the reply, "this is for reserved seats!"

The Household.

Gifts.

BY ADALINE HOHF BEERY.

OUT of the solemn night-time, voiced
by the choral stars,
Stealeth a sky-born cadence down from its lattice bars:
"Gloria in excelsis! peace and good will on earth;
Out of His great heart's pity cometh a Christ to birth!"

Gift of all time and nations! sacrifice wide and free!
Sum of all thought unselfish, more than all loves that be;
Infinite wealth of comfort, treasure of joy and rest,
Fair as the heart of heaven, warm as the Father's breast.

Labors of all creation loyally serve God's will;
"This is my law forever; giving shall all fulfill."
So, from the gray-spun rain-cloud, streameth its own life down,
Filling the golden wheat-ears, washing the dusty town.

Rivers the rain-pearls gather, sending their freight to sea;
Back to the sky's pale fleeces climbs the blue spray in glee;
Trees for their gracious baptism, blossom and fruit bestow;
Flowers for crystal kisses buried in perfume blow.

Over the soft blue concave poureth a great gold light,
Life of the world-old day-god, riding with strength bedight;
So giveth every star-point gladly its meed of grace;
Sweetly the pale moon follows, benisons in her face.

Out of a human loving springeth full many a gift,
Seeking, perhaps, to gather some hopeless soul adrift;
And there's a heartless bounty, currently told of men,
That, though their purse gives grandly, much they expect again.

Oh, for the sense of nature! always to give our best,
Solely for God's dear glory, leaving to Him the rest;
Sacrifice fills the measure; happiness waits the deed;
Thus shall the Christ-Child's kingdom over the earth make speed.

MRS. MARINER'S MINCE MEAT.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

The pleasant, motherly face of plump little Mrs. Mariner wore a serious air quite unusual to it, that bleak, cold December day, as she sat by the well-scrubbed kitchen table chopping apples.

A new tub more than half full of chopped beef, and great yellow bowls of currants, raisins, preserved citron and orange-peel told plainly that some of Mrs. Mariner's famous mince-meat was in course of preparation.

"I'll just own up, I feel blue, Huldah. First, the drought burnt up half the corn crop and spoiled a chance of Irish potatoes, then them three big hogs up and died, and that meant good seven hundred pounds of pork lost, that we'll need before spring. And right on top of everything else, the colt must needs go and break his leg and have to be shot, and your father was to a-got a hundred dollars for him from Dr. Arter, so's he could pay the interest on the money we borrowed to send Tom to college."

"Yes, it does seem discouraging, mother, but after all, things might be worse. Selim and Queeny are left, and if we can't raise the money any other way, we can sell one of them," said Huldah, the only daughter, and the sunshine of the Mariner homestead.

"Sell Selim or Queeny! Why, Huldah Mariner, I'd a-most as soon sell one of the family. It'd be a sin and a shame to sell one of them faithful old critters," Mrs. Mariner said reproachfully.

"Of course, we'd not do it, mother, unless the very worst should come, and I hope and believe it will not."

Mrs. Mariner smiled a little. "What a child you are to see only the bright side of things, Huldah. Well, land knows I'm glad Mr. Sampson wanted to buy so much of my mince-meat, at any rate. It'll help out wonderful, for we was beginning to need sugar and coffee and sech like, and with Tom comin' home for Christmas, and bringin' his high-toned friend with him, I don't know what we'd a-done. There! I'm through choppin' apples, and I'm not sorry, I can tell you. I'll dump all the ingregiences in the tub and mix 'em up."

Silence for ten or fifteen minutes, while Mrs. Mariner poured raisins, currants, orange-peel, citron, suet and odorous spices into the tub of chopped meat, and Huldah vigorously stirred the cake she was making.

"Hand me the vinegar jug, Huldah, please. My hands are too sticky with molasses to touch anything. Seems like this mince-meat won't be fit to eat without cider to mix it with. If only the apple crop hadn't been so scarce, we might have had plenty of it, same as usual."

"Well, I'm glad we haven't. I've never felt right about using cider since Mr. Saxton preached about it last summer. I've seen Tom drink more of it than was good for him several times," said Huldah.

"Well, he'll not do it this winter, because there ain't any. My! if this vinegar don't spoil the mince-meat, it'll be a wonder. It don't smell one bit like my mince-meat. Oh! I'd most forgot the brandy. Give me the decanter, Huldah. It's in the pantry on the middle shelf, in the right-hand corner," said Mrs. Mariner, intent upon mixing the mince-meat, which almost filled the tub.

Huldah drew a little, quick breath. She had hoped her mother would forget the brandy, and now that she had not, the girl was at a loss what to do.

"Mother, don't put any in this time, please," she said coaxingly.

"What! not put any brandy in my mince-meat? Huldah Mariner, are you stark crazy? Why, it wouldn't be fit for anything then, sure enough."

"Oh! yes, it would be, mother. Let me open three or four cans of grapes and pour their juice in, instead. They say it is finer than brandy, and no danger of making any one want to drink intoxicants afterward."

"Nonsense! You needn't tell me grape-juice could give the snap to it that brandy does, and if nobody ever gets to drinking till my mince-meat makes 'em do it, I guess they'll all die sober," Mrs. Mariner said sharply.

"But, mother, some man who is trying to stop drinking might be tempted to begin again, if he got a taste of brandy in your mince-meat. Suppose, for instance, Tom, or some one else we loved, were trying to begin a new life after he had fallen, wouldn't you be afraid to let him taste a drop of brandy, no matter how much it might be disguised in other things?" asked Huldah, her sunny face growing serious."

"I declare I never thought of it that way before, Huldah. Maybe I'd better leave the brandy out, after all. You may get the grape-juice, but I know the mince-meat 'll taste flat as a pan-cake, and like enough Mr. Sampson won't take it. He's awful fond of his brandy, you know," said Mrs. Mariner, reflectively.

"Another good reason for not using it, then," Huldah said cheerily, greatly relieved that her mother had been so easily influenced.

So the mince-meat was finished, and to any unperverted taste would have seemed almost perfect in quality. The two women carried it out and placed it in the light spring wagon, and Huldah drove briskly down to Mapleton to Mr. Sampson's grocery store.

That gentleman saw her and came out and carried the tub of mince-meat inside, where it was deposited on the counter with a flourish.

"I'm glad it's come," he said to Huldah. "I've had at least a dozen orders for it, already. Everyone knows what splendid mince-meat your mother makes, and they all want some for Christmas. Only a hundred pounds," he said, as he weighed it. "Pity there isn't more. Do you want the money, Miss Huldah, or is there anything you'd like to buy to-day?"

Huldah gave him quite a list of things needed, and he bustled around to fill her order, pausing however long enough to taste the tempting mince-meat.

"Why——Miss Huldah, there's something the matter with it, isn't there? It doesn't taste one bit like your mother's mince-meat," he said in blank surprise.

Huldah's face turned crimson.

"We hadn't any cider, and mother used vinegar," she said, "but we put in grape-juice instead; we thought that would make it quite as good."

Mr. Sampson took another taste and shook his head disapprovingly.

"It lacks something besides cider. Oh! I know what it is—it's brandy! There isn't any in it, is there?"

"No!" she answered simply.

"Didn't you have any? I can give you some, and you can stir it in right here."

"No, thank you. We've concluded it isn't right to use brandy in mince-meat, and we never shall again," she said firmly.

"I thought you and your mother were too sensible to get such cranky notions in your heads," he said, making an effort to speak pleasantly, though any argument for temperance always angered him.

Huldah said nothing.

"I don't want to hurt your feelings, Miss Huldah, but you'll have to put some brandy in this, or my customers won't buy it," he said decisively.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Sampson, but indeed I can't do it. My conscience will not allow it."

"Very well, then, you can take the meat home and eat it yourselves. I'm not going to palm it off on my patrons as it is," he retorted, angrily.

Huldah's heart sank within her. There was no other place where she could sell the mince-meat, and they were really in need of the groceries she had ordered. The family purse was empty, and Tom and his chum would be there next day. She glanced down at her shabby shoes, too, and thought of the sorry appearance they would make before the young man, and for a moment a sharp little struggle went on in her heart.

After all, it might be no harm would come of it if she put the brandy in. No harm ever had come of it before, so far as she knew, but—but there was only one right way, and that was the sure one.

"Very well, Mr. Sampson, I'm sorry to have displeased and disappointed you," she said, looking at him steadily, the color dying out of her face, and leaving it very pale.

Without further words Mr. Sampson picked up the tub and carrying it outside, put it into the wagon with a bang.

Huldah climbed in and drove homeward with a heavy heart but a clear conscience, while Mr. Sampson went back into the store grumbling.

"If the old lady doesn't come to her senses and send the girl back here with that mince-meat well brandied as it should be, I'll miss my guess. They're in a bad fix just now, I know, because the old man has been laid up a month or two, and they had hard luck all summer. I wouldn't be afraid to wager they're clear out of groceries, and will have to come back and ask me for credit."

This was said half to himself and half to Judge Dougherty, who had been looking over a paper as he waited for Mr Sampson to have leisure to make out his bill.

The Judge did not reply, but sat for a few minutes looking intently at his paper without seeing a word. Presently he went over to his office and wrote a note to a friend living in the city, who was a temperance man, and also a dealer in groceries.

As a result, Mrs. Mariner received a letter next day, ordering all the mince-meat she had for sale, and as much more as she chose to make during the winter.

This lifted a great load from the hearts of the two women, and with the mince-meat that Huldah shipped that day, went an order for necessary groceries, much to the chagrin of Mr. Sampson, whom Judge Dougherty had delighted to inform of the transaction.

When Tom and his friend got off the train at Mapleton that evening, and had to wait a short time for Huldah, who had been unavoidably delayed, the Judge repeated with great gusto the whole story of the mince-meat.

"I tell you, Tom, Huldah's a sister any man might be proud of. I saw her looking down at her little half-worn out shoes, when Sampson said he wouldn't take the meat unless she put the brandy in it, and I thought sure she'd give up then, but she didn't. Principle before either shoes or groceries for her every time. I tell you she's a plucky little thing, and she melted my old heart up so completely, that I resolved then and there, neither cider nor brandy should ever go into any cooking at my house again, to tempt me or mine, or any other man at my table."

Tom listened with a heart swelling with brotherly love and pride.

"It's just like Huldah. She'd wade through fire and water before she'd go back on her principles," he said with glistening eyes.

"Wait till you know her, Ned, and you'll stop your cynical nonsense about the shallowness, selfishness and insincerity of women, won't he, Judge?"

"He will if he has half as much sense as he looks to have," said the old Judge bluntly.

And so it proved. Before the two weeks of vacation had passed away to Ned Oakley it seemed as if the whole world had changed.

The simple, wholesome, cheerful atmosphere pervading the old farm-house, the kind, motherly heart of Mrs. Mariner, the cheerful, uncomplaining spirit of her suffering husband, and Huldah's steadfast earnestness and sunny unselfishness had revealed a phase of home life of which he had had no previous conception.

And when the glad Christmas day was ushered in with whirling flakes of feathery snow that transformed the old homestead into a winter idyl, Huldah first helped her mother to prepare the bountiful dinner, the crisp vegetables, the plump big turkey, and delicious temperance mince-pies, then with Tom and Mr. Oakley snugly tucked up in the sleigh, drove down to Mapleton to join in singing the joyous anthems, and to listen to the old, sweet message of "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

And in her life a new star had arisen, for she had read in Mr. Oakley's loving eyes as she fastened her pretty hood upon her head, that

"Tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within."

THE PROMISE AND ITS FULFILLMENT.

The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. He shall not strive nor cry; neither shall his voice be heard in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break; the smoking flax shall he not quench, he shall bring forth judgment unto truth. He shall not fail nor be discouraged until he have set judgment in the earth.

But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Israel, yet out of thee shall come forth unto me he that is to be a ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.

And Joseph went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth into Judea, unto the city of David, because he was of the house and lineage of David, to be taxed, with Mary, his espoused wife. And she brought forth her first-born son and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger because there was no room for him in the inn.

Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For behold the darkness shall cover the Earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee.

And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field keeping watch over their flocks by night. And lo! the angel of the Lord came upon them and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not; for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour which is Christ, the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will to men.

And kings shall come to thy light, and princes to the brightness of thy rising. Now, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the King, behold there came wise men from the East to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews, for we have seen his star in the east, and have come to worship him. Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared. And he sent them to Bethlehem and said, Go, search diligently for the young child, and when ye have found him, bring me word again that I may come and worship him, also. When they had heard the king they departed, and lo! the star which they saw in the east went before them till it came and stood over where the young child lay. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary, his mother, and fell down and worshiped him; and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh.

And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word; for Herod will seek the young child, to destroy him. When he arose he took the young child and his mother by night and departed into Egypt, and was there until the death of Herod, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my Son.

He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment. He shall save the children of the needy and shall break in pieces the oppressor. They shall fear him as long as the sun and moon endureth, throughout all generations. He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass, as showers that water the earth. In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace as long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the Earth. He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy. And he shall live and to him shall be given the gold of Sheba; prayer also shall be made for him continually, and daily shall he be praised. There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon, and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth. His name shall endure forever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun, and men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed. Blessed are they that do his commandments that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates, into the city.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE AGE.

Christ is the discoverer of childhood. Not that children were unknown before His day; they were known as appendages of their parents, as the future men and women, but not as having a distinct individuality of their own, a value in the present as well as in the future. Study history and you will find that all idea of the value of a child, as a child, clusters around the manger-cradle of Bethlehem. Toward it the Old Testament ideals of childhood pointed, and this had made the condition of the child among the Hebrews so immeasurably superior to what it was among other nations.

But though Christ's coming as a child, and passing through all the years of childhood sanctified them, although His treatment of childhood taught the world a reverence for it before undreamed of, it has taken centuries to learn this teaching as it has to learn many other lessons of the Great Master.

As the London Daily News says: "The fact remains that, as a person to whom not merely individuals but also the community, the state, owe a sacred obligation—as a person whose rights outweigh his duties, and who claims reverence as well as love—the child is a discovery of the modern age, and almost of our own day. There is the pretty story of the Arabian sage who, by putting his ear to the desert sand, could hear the sound of the feet of children playing in the streets of Bagdad, and distinguish their joyous voices. The Jews of old are credited with a saying—one of the finest ever uttered—that even the building of the Temple should be stopped for the sake of the education of the children. And in Greek literature, especially in the 'Iliad' and 'Odyssey,' are to be found many charming references to the habits and characters of children. But granting all this, the broad fact remains that in the antique world the child had no rights—that the sentiment of compassion for childhood, to which this nineteenth century is growing so delicately sensitive, scarcely existed at all. The idea of the child's rights—as the modern world is learning to conceive them—had not emerged in the mind of antiquity. The only recognized rights were the male parent's; and, indeed, we have only to read the decisions of certain metropolitan magistrates, in prosecutions by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, to realize how strongly the idea of the Roman patria postestas has survived even to these humane times. Infanticide was, generally, the father's right in the ancient world; and deserted children had no status whatever; whoso found them had the right to enslave them. Such was the general theory and practice even among the two greatest, most humane, and civilized nations of antiquity. So much for paganism. And what of the Christian world?"

Mediæval Christianity was immeasurably more humane than the systems it dispossessed, and even secular ournals account for this fact by the manger of Bethlehem. Yet up to the present century this interest in childhood was more reflexive than active; it threw a halo around the Christ-child which so dazzled the eyes they could not see the wretchedness of the child of to-day. But all this was leading upward to the realization of Christ's ideal. Milton's sublime "Ode to the Nativity," gives us the highest conception of the child the world had then attained; but it has in it little in common with human childhood; it is the God who slumbers there where

"The Virgin blessed, Hath laid her Babe to rest," while

"Heaven's youngest-teemed star
Hath fixed her polished car,
Her sleeping Lord with hand-maid lamp attending;
And all about the courtly stable,
Bright harnessed angels sit in order serviceable."

How different the picture called up by this finest of human conception, from that evoked by the Divine historian speaking through Matthew and Luke! His story links the Babe of Bethlehem to every other baby ever to be born; while Milton fixes a great gulf between them. This linking of the Christ-child with the childhood of to-day gives the new conception which is profoundly moving modern society, and is being wrought out in innumerable ways, sometimes by those who do not acknowledge its origin. As the writer before referred to says: "The poets and the prose writers—Elizabeth Barrett Browning, with her 'Cry of the Children'; Dickens, with his David Copperfield and Little Paul Dombey; Victor Hugo, with his Gavroche and Cosette—have sown their thoughts in the seed field of time, and we of to-day are seeing the fruits thereof, in societies for the protection of children from cruelty, for supplying them with toys and pictures, for giving them half-penny dinners, and a week or two by the sea, or on the hillsides and moors, away from the stifling slums, and in the light and air of heaven."

In a sermon lately preached in Boston, Rev. Louis A. Banks, D. D., thus gives the genesis of a peculiarly Christlike charity. "A few years ago an invalid woman, whose home was in the country, visited a large city near which she lived, on a hot summer day. She had business in some of the smaller streets and alleys, and was appalled at the number of pale, puny and sick babies in their mother's arms, who were literally dying for a breath of fresh air. What could she do? 'I cannot save all,' she said, 'but I may save one. There is room for a mother and her child at home.' She took the one mother and her child out to her farm-house, kept them for a fortnight, and then took them home and brought others. Some of her neighbors followed her example. The next summer the number of children entertained amounted to hundreds, the next to thousands.

"Another woman, who lived in the city, and had neither money nor farm-house, was sadly grieved that she could not help this most gracious charity. 'I can at least tell others of it,' she said. She wrote an account of it for a New York newspaper. A third woman, possessed of great wealth, on reading her article, sent a thousand dollars to the editor, with the request that he should open a fund for this noble purpose. The Fresh Air Charity was the result. The various organizations throughout the United States for the removal of poor children from the poisonous air of the cities to the country have grown out of this first attempt of a single, half-sick farmer's wife to save one dying baby. If the woman who thought of it on that sultry day, as she passed sick and weary through the slums, had decided, 'I cannot save all, why should I trouble myself with one?' how many lives that have been saved would have been lost!"

This Christly conception of the value of childhood has led the W. C. T. U. into many fields of work—temperance teaching in Sabbath and day schools, Loyal Temperance Legions, kitchen gardens, kindergartens and day nurseries, in all of which the child is brought nearer the Christ. A new department is this year organized, one that shall bring motherless children into the circle of motherly love by adoption into Christian homes. Lucia Kimball has already taken into her heart and home one of these little ones, in Christ's name and for His sake. This department encourages others to follow her example.

The greater attention being paid to the science of motherhood and preparation for its duties is another proof of increased appreciation of the value of childhood. Mother-hearted women all over the land are uniting in this study, and mothers' meetings are becoming real mother-gartens, doing for mothers what kindergartens do for the children, being true gardens in which mother-souls grow. All these things point to the coming of a brighter day in which childhood shall come into the kingdom to which Bethlehem's manger was the open door, and shall be in truth the preparation for noble Christian manhood and womanhood.

WILLING VS. GIVING.

An anonymous correspondent writes, saying she is anxious to make a will, and to will something to the different interests the W. C. T. U. represents; also to make it a part of her will that all relatives and others receiving property by her shall be legally bound to give ten per cent of all income from it to some charitable purpose. She adds: "I wish to give to some of my relatives a certain amount during their life-time and at their death to be used for some good purpose. Now I write this to you believing if you make the matter known through your paper you can get forms and suggestions that may be of much good to persons making a will and to the world in general. I spoke to a lawyer, but he could make no suggestions, but would write down what I could tell him. I would also like suggestions as to the best way to use money now for the best interests of community."

As no address is given and no clew to the state, we cannot give any directions, for state laws differ in respect to wills. We give the letter as requested and shall be glad of any suggestions which will aid in solving the problems it presents. Yet, when we remember how the very best lawyers in the land have failed in making wills that would hold, especially when they included bequests to benevolent objects, we cannot advise risking it. We should much prefer to do as Col. Charles G. Hammond and other wise philanthropists have done, bestow the property designed for certain causes while living. If you desire an income from it during life, insert a clause in the transfer papers that the recipients, whether individuals or societies, shall pay you stipulated interest, quarterly or semi-annually, as long as you live.

As regards suggestions concerning how to use money now for the best interests of community, we fear that we cannot give unprejudiced advice. Community's worst foe, in our opinion, is intemperance; hence, we think you could make no better use of money than investing it in temperance work. This work may be sustaining a W. C. T. U. missionary, if you live in the city; sowing your neighborhood "knee deep with temperance literature," if you live in the country, helping on the work of the Loyal Temperance Legion, or of temperance in Sunday-schools, the foreign work, indeed, any department of W. C. T. U. work. Personally, we have great faith in the W. T. P. A. stock as an investment by which money will work for the best interests of community. It helps publish this paper which carries the gospel of temperance to 300,000 souls each week, and the millions of pages of literature which our presses send forth for the healing of the nations; then it yields a personal income while it is doing good to others.

TOPICS FOR THE WEEK OF PRAYER, JANUARY 4-11, 1891.

The Evangelical Alliance for the United States suggests the following topics:

Sunday.—"The Glory of the Triune God." Jer. 10: 6, 7; Hab, 3: 3, 4; II Cor. 4: 6, 13 and 14.

Monday.—"Confession and Thanksgiving." For the nation, community, church, family and the individual. Confession: Hosea 14: 1, 2; I John 1: 8, 9; Psalm, 32: 1-5; II Sam. 12: 13. Thanksgiving: I Thess. 5: 18; Psalm 100; Psalm 103; Neh. 12: 43.

Tuesday.—"The Church Universal." Prayer that the power of the Holy Ghost may rest upon it, Acts 2: 1-18; that the disciples of Christ may be one, John 17: 21; that the Church may gain a truer and broader conception of her mission, Matt. 22: 35-39; Matt. 20: 28; John 17: 18. Prayer that the International Conference at Florence, next April, may be crowned with special blessing.

Wednesday.—"Nations and Their Rulers." Prayer for all in authority; I Tim. 2: 1, 2; for peace, Isa. 2: 4; for the abolition of the slave, opium, and strong drink traffic; Exodus 21: 16; Psalm 72: 4; for all needed reforms—temperance, Hab. 2: 15, 12; Sabbath, Neh. 13: 15-22; industrial, Jer. 22: 13; social, I Cor. 6: 18-20; political, I Sam. 2: 36; and 8: 3.

Thursday.—"The Church at Home." Prayer for a sense of personal responsibility and for coöperation in the evangelization of the city, country and frontier. Matt, 10: 5-13; Mark 13: 34; Acts 8: 4.

Friday.—"The Church Abroad." Prayer for increased missionary spirit, coöperation and enlargement. Joel 2: 28-32; Eph. 4: 11-16; Psalm 67.

Saturday.—"The Family." Prayer for sons, daughters and servants; for Sunday-schools and all Christian associations for young people; for schools, seminaries, colleges and universities. Prov. 4: Deut. 6: 4-15; Mark 10: 13-16; Eph. 6: 1-4.

Sunday.—"The manifestation of Christ in His people." John 17: 21-23; Col. 1: 27; II Thess. 1: 12; Eph. 3: 10-21.

The topics for Wednesday fully accord with the petition so patiently and persistently circulated by Mrs. Watson for many years, and hence afford cause for thanksgiving, as does the recognition that industrial, social and political problems have a place in the Week of Prayer. No other questions lie nearer Humanity's heart than these, and in none is the guidance of Humanity's Christ more needed. We trust that every local union in the land will make this a day of earnest, united prayer, in lowliness of mind, waiting on God for the baptism of His spirit and for guidance. The topics for Saturday are also closely connected with our work.

Our Book Table.

The first exposition of the Sabbath-school lessons for 1891 comes from A. S. Barnes & Co., New York and Chicago. It is volume IV. of Dr. Pentecost's valuable Bible Studies, and fully sustains the high standard of the preceding volumes. ISRAEL'S APOSTASY and STUDIES FROM THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN is its title. The first half year's lessons are in I and II Kings, and the third and fourth quarters' lessons are in John. Three temperance lessons are given.

THE ECONOMICS OF PROHIBITION, by Rev. James C. Fernald. Funk & Wagnalls, New York. $1.50.

This is one of the most valuable books for reference on matters connected with the great reform that has recently come to our table. It is largely statistical, and its facts are vouched for as having been gathered at first hand from Governors, Judges, Prosecuting Attorneys and other officials who know. But it is more than a book of statistics; the "packing" for its tables consists of bright, interesting matter, showing just what Prohibition is doing, and what the liquor traffic is doing for the home, the church, the farmers and other hard workers. Atlanta furnishes an interesting chapter, including a significant table of replies from business men in that city to questions concerning amount of sales, ease of collections, bad debts, and other tests under license as compared with prohibition. Another interesting chapter of fresh news is that on "The new Lands," the Dakotas and Oklahoma. Taken as a whole, the book is a powerful argument for prohibition.

Rev. Edward A. Rand, that favorite story-teller, has three books for the holidays. DEEDS WORTH TELLING, published by Hunt & Eaton, New York. $1.50.

UNDER THE LANTERNS AT BLACK ROCKS, a capital story of a light-house, from the same publishers, ($1.25), and TOO LATE FOR THE TIDE MILL, of the Look Ahead series, published by Thomas Whittaker, New York, sent by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago. All these books we can heartily recommend, being bright, true to life and of sound moral tone without "preachiness."

From James H. Searle, publisher, 178 Washington street, Boston, comes A PARISIAN IN BRAZIL, translated from the French of Mme. Toussaint-Samson, by Emma Toussaint, $1. This is a fresh, piquant account of an interesting country seen through Parisian eyes, told in a way to make its readers feel they have seen what it describes with their own eyes.

THE NEW RELIGION, A GOSPEL OF LOVE, by E. W. Gray. The Thorne Publishing Co., $1.50. This is a book to awaken deep thought, and to reward deep study. Its argument is quite out of the commonplace order, and its deductions, logical. As Dr. Thomas says, its author stands on the broad and safe middle ground between the extremes of distinctive radicalism and dogmatic conservatism; he takes truth for authority, not authority for truth. Through all the argument he never swerves from the sure foundation, "the Rock, Christ Jesus."

"L. B. E.," the author of "Lessons of Trust," whose readers are numbered by the hundred thousand, is one of the superintendents in the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., and has a new book out. It has the suggestive title of LIGHT ON THE PATHWAY, and is likely to prove her crowning work so far. "L. B. E." writes with the clearness and invigoration of a fresh mountain spring. Every line seems born out of the clearest thinking and most definite experience. Handsome 16mo, 277 pages, cloth, red edges. 75 cents. James H. Earle, publisher, Boston.

THE DEMAGOGUE, a political novel, by David Ross Locke (Nasby). Lee & Shepard, Boston; A. C. McClurg & Company, Chicago. $1.50. This powerful novel comes as a voice from the grave, a posthumous volume with all the life and fire of Mr. Locke's best days. It is a finished study of the worst element in politics, the demagogue, and to our shame as a people it must be confessed, it is true to life. From the hour when Caleb Mason was ushered howling into life in a log cabin in the woods, through his boyhood when he sawed the plank bridge in two that Sarah might break through and he rescue her from drowning as a way to the father's favor, down to the hour when a shot from his own pistol ended his life, he is the same scheming, shrewd, unscrupulous demagogue. And he was a successful one; from vanquishing two "deestricts" in spelling school, he went on conquering, first the printing office, then the law, the bank, the Legislature, Congress; but in every step he made upward he trod some one down, relentlessly, pitilessly; no political trick was too low for him, yet every one was played with the "odor of sanctity." Many pages of the book might be transcripts from the diary of a Chicago or a New York politician, if such men dared keep diaries, so realistically true to life are their descriptions. "The mills of the gods ground slowly;" all the demagogue's plans prospered, and though lying, ingratitude, treachery, embezzlement, robbery, even murder blackened his soul, he smiled serenely, as villains can, and the world smiled on him. But they "ground exceeding small," and in this grinding taught a needed lesson and gave a fearful warning against political corruption.

MISS WILLARD writes: Mrs. Mary F. Lovell, Bryn Mawr, Pa., our capable superintendent of Band of Mercy work, has generously volunteered to add to her cares and duties, the work of securing signatures for the Siberian Exile Petition, concerning which THE UNION SIGNAL has had much to say within the last year. We are confident that something practical will come of this new effort, and heartily commend our local unions to correspond with Mrs. Lovell, securing copies of the petition, that they may thus add themselves to the great ladder of human sympathy by which the walls of those well-nigh impenetrable fortresses of cruelty in the frozen North will yet be scaled.

The Watch-Tower.

I heard the bells on Christmas Day
Their old familiar carols play,
And wild and sweet
The words repeat
Of "Peace on earth, good-will to men."
And thought how, as the day had come,
The belfries of all Christendom
Now roll along
The unbroken song
Of "Peace on earth, good-will to men."
Till ringing, singing on its way,
The world revolved from night to day,
A voice, a chime,
A chant sublime,
Of "Peace on earth, good-will to men."
But in despair I bowed my head—
"There is no peace on earth," I said;
"For hate is strong,
And mocks the song
Of 'Peace on earth, good-will to men.'"
Then pealed the bells, more loud and deep
"God is not dead; nor doth He sleep!
The Wrong shall fail, the Right prevail,
With peace on earth, good-will to men."

A valued contributor writes: Suggest to our women to read faith verses at the opening of their meetings. Mrs. Pleasant Bond did so at Indianapolis with great effect. It keys a meeting to a high altitude. It is an admirable idea to close our temperance meetings with "Home, Sweet Home."

A great shock comes to us in the death of Mrs. Keyes, formerly president of Southern California. She attended the National Convention at Atlanta, where her bright face and abounding enthusiasm were an inspiration to all. One week after her return she was dead. But her memory and her work live; in Iowa where she did grand work while that state was her home, especially during the amendment campaign, in Southern California, in the National W. C. T. U., on whose executive committee she served long and well, everywhere she leaves the aroma of a life of loving service for God and humanity. The deepest sympathy of thousands goes out to the bereaved family.

Mary Hartwell Catherwood, in writing in the Chautauquan on "The Housekeeping Student," says: "I would love to hear the testimony of all the housekeeping students in this country. There are women who are making days' marches in special studies, hampered with kettles and brooms and sewing-machines—yea, even with invalid chairs. Little by little these courageous souls are making mental muscle. And they are not the women who whine for opportunities and complain of monotonous life. Moreover, do you suppose the Father can see them thus building little by little and not reach down to them special blessings? They learn that it is a grand thing to stand on the pinnacle of the everlasting Now, and have work swarming to them out of the future to be moulded by their completing hand into the past." Of all of which she is a beautiful example.

Mrs. Rastall copied this from the blackboard at Moody's Institute on Sunday last:

Women—
Ministered while men scouted.
Relieved while men doubted.
Preached while men pouted.

Lady Henry Somerset says: "There is no truer test of the life of any nation than its literature, no pulse by which to gauge the moral status more surely. Till this century, our poets had tuned the lyre to songs of love and the passions of human hearts, the whisper of the forest swept the strings, and Nature inspired the poet; sweetest themes and war songs roused the souls of men, and led them on to victory, or death. But only in this age have the sordid, squalid, struggling lives, lived out in the ceaseless grind and toil of our great cities, been surrounded with the halo of the ideal. Tom Hood found in the starving seamstress a picture more pathetic than the lamentations of a disappointed lover, while Elizabeth Barrett Browning gave to the world that cry of grief with which she poured out her beautiful woman's soul, and drew to her heart the blighted lives of weary, working children. Let us read these things aright; they are signs of blessed change which make us look up into the face of Him who lived and suffered and died, and say truly, even now in the midst of all the sadness that still surrounds us: 'Mine eyes have seen the salvation which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people.' 'Help me to heal the heart-break of humanity.'"

Christmas Morning.

BY LUELLA CLARK.

THE bells ring out from the steeple
To tell to the listening people
Once more the glad message of old;
Of peace—peace and good will unto men;
Oh, repeat it again and again,
The "good tidings" the angels told.

Surcease, then, to-day from sorrow,
And conjure no fears for the morrow
For God will take care for His own.
The "good will" of the Father above,
Whose heart and whose purpose is love
In His gift of the Christ-Child was shown.

And the sweet truth forever and ever
Shines out in each earnest endeavor
To show forth that strange life among men
In the faith that endures and that dares;
In the trust that uplifts from life's cares,
And abides in the glory unseen.

In the love of the generous giver
Who reaches His hand to deliver
From hunger and peril and cold;
In the sympathy tender and true
That heartens the halting anew
With the cheer that is better than gold.

In kind help to the groping seeker,
In the strength of the strong to the weaker,
In the love of the high to the low;
In the wanderers homeward won,
In all good deeds in secret done,
And which only the angels know.

So ring, ye blithe bells in the steeple,
And tell to the listening people
Once more the glad tidings of old—
Peace, peace and good will upon earth
For Messiah has come to His birth,
Messiah so long foretold.

THE MAJESTY OF LOVE.

BY AMBER.

A Merry Christmas! Since I last lifted the latch of the garden gate the season has swung nearly twice round on its floral dial. The violets have twice heralded the rose, and the roses have, in their turn, cried Hail! to the golden-rod, and the golden-rod has stood on tip-toe in the wind to watch the first snowflakes circle slowly down against the background of the hills. And here it is Christmas again! Is it a tear that rises to the nib of my pen, I wonder, to write these words? Surely the little steed of steel, wont to gallop away so blithely with my thoughts, is strangely loth to carry them to-night. There is a sadness mingled with these Christmas merrymakings as we leave the years of our childhood behind us, which is like a leaf of rue in a garland of holly, or like the pensive shadow that softens the beautiful eyes of the Madonna.

Year by year adds new memories of by-gone days, when life was a song, unbroken by any discord, when eyes were bright, and faces fair and fresh that to-night are dimmed with the shadow of many tears, and deeply traced with the relentless finger of time. The children, yonder, athrob with Christmas joy, blindly credulous of Santa Claus, and pattering off to bed with a chuckle and a kiss, are not gayer than we were once. To them, as it has to us, must come the fading of the ideal into the real. Heaven grant them braver hearts and nobler patience than ours.

A year ago "mother" was with us—her grave lies white and still to-night in the glimmer of the moon. And the baby—don't you remember how cunning he was? Shut your eyes a moment and recall his dainty ways and his wise little look of wonder! Oh, will patience never, never come? Can we never lift these empty arms to Heaven in resignation to God's will? The madcap brother who for so many Christmas days gave to frolic its greatest zest, the sister whose smile was the sunlight, as her voice was the music of the old home, we think of them to-night in distant lands, the wintry sea lashing between us and them, its leagues of stormy billows.

But stop, we will have no more such dreary thoughts. Let us think rather of the cheer Christ's natal day has brought us; of the full stockings in the chimney-corner, and the big pudding in the larder, for what would Christmas day be without a stuffed stocking and a plum pudding! Give me Fourth of July without a fire-cracker, or Thanksgiving without grandmother, but don't expect me to get along on Christmas day without the ante-sunrise romp with the children to discover the miracle of the filled stockings, and the old-fashioned black pudding afterwards to adorn the dinner table. There have been dark hints of wonderful gifts for many a day in the air, and behold the time of realization has come! The new cloak to replace the shabby one; the jeweled ring or the chain of fine gold, gazed at so long from afar with never a dream they could ever by any possibility be our own, here they all are ready to enhance the charm of beauty!

The nose, that, up to Christmas eve, 1890, has found the service of common hemstitch quite adequate to its needs, shall after that date, nestle in perfumed linen, trimmed round with filmy lace, at a dollar a square inch. Books with rare secrets of wisdom and wit folded within their costly covers, await our bidding to disclose their blandishments. Pictures fair and dainty are all ready to hang upon our walls.

Ah, well, as the ebb tide of reaction sets in, who shall say that we are not all of us a little disappointed in our expectations of Christmas! Another and still another of the radiant days are folded away upon the shelf of Time, yet each one leaves a yearning unappeased for something better than we have known. Those who lay large plans and build high hopes, shall never be satisfied here. Only those who expect little shall seem to themselves to have much. Of all the gifts the fairies might send us to make our Christmas days happy, the gift of a contented spirit and a pure heart would be the surest to bring peace. Diamonds are glorious things to look at and to have, but the lustre of a sweet, gentle, and loving spirit makes two eyes that outshine the Kohinoor's self in splendor.

So many things in this world that were intended to be joyful, become mere drudgeries, or degenerate into rivalries. We lose sight of the true significance of Christmas in the desire to make a greater display than our neighbors do. "Peace on earth," sang the angels; we wrangle among ourselves like Kilkenny cats. "Good will to men," rang out the clear chorus under the white Judean stars; we hardly wait for the opportunity to start the ball of scandal, or aim the arrow of malice. Methinks when this solid old ball swings out into an atmosphere of true and abiding peace and good will, when we learn the full and mystic meaning of Love, the great clock of eternity shall have struck millennium time.

The true significance of Christmas is love. Any day that is filled with love is Christ-mas day, whatever its mark upon the calendar. When we get to think of what we shall do to manifest love most royally, of how we shall carry love into every act and deed as one picks a rose and carries its perfume, unwitting, wherever he goes, then only shall we arrive at the true celebration of Christ's birthday. No unkind thought, no spirit of competition, (save as to who shall do the sweetest things!) no effort at mere display, no gift-making on the low debit and credit system, shall find place in the observance of Christmas day. On that day, if upon no other, there should be an effacement of self and its needs, and a very festival of Love and its most royal service. If you are aware that you have an enemy in the world, on Christmas day heap coals of fire on his head, according to Christ's methods. If you feel unkindly toward anybody, forget it for at least that span of consecrated hours. Let the angelic mandate, "good will to all," ring through your heart like a chime of golden bells. Forget to be critical, or cross, or ungracious, and for one day try the experiment of living very close to the precious One, whose life and example through all these centuries stand forth the one perfect flowering of the Godlike gentleness and majesty and love.

News from the Field.

OHIO.

A SERIES OF AGGRESSIVE CONVENTIONS.

Longfellow, or some other poet, might have said:

These conventions wake our wonder;
Never mud-bound, nor snowed under.
To each great occasion rising
In a manner most surprising!

Our late annual at Chillicothe, like each preceding one, "the best," has been duly reported, but "there's more to follow." W. C. T. U. camp-fires are aglow from border to border of our beautiful Buckeye state.

Lake, Franklin and Morrow counties have held semi-annual conventions; the first-named in Willoughby, Mrs. L. E. Lanphear, county president, in the chair. The address of welcome by Mrs. Genevra Taylor, and the response by Mrs. S. A. Hickson, were meritorious and well received. The unions of the county were well represented by delegates. Miss A. Young conducted an impressive memorial service for a dear, departed sister, Mrs. St. John.

The Temperance Wheel, an idea borrowed from Miss Willard, was finely presented by Mrs. Jane Dobbs. An immense wheel, the hub, Temperance, from which radiate forty spokes, each representing a department of W. C. T. U. work, all bound together by a spotless tire, the Love of Christ, who "is not willing that any shall perish." Each lady representing one of the spokes, arose and quoted some appropriate Scripture text. The "idea" is beautiful; make a note of it, sisters.

Miss Sara Winthrop Smith spoke on "Franchise." May her prediction, ballots in the hands of women in 1893, be verified. Her thoughts were indorsed by her hearers, as also those on "Equal Rights," by Mrs. M. G. Williams, whose original poem delighted all. The Y's presented a fine program for the evening, Miss Olive Reeve presiding. The paper on narcotics was especially good. Miss Blanche Ellen won the medal at the Demorest contest. The Willoughby ladies are hospitable entertainers.

Franklin's semi-annual was held at Columbus and was well attended by delegates and visitors. Miss Henrietta Moore, of Springfield, gave an excellent address to an appreciative audience. The people of Franklin county are beginning to wake up to the fact that real dangers threaten their own loved ones. The brothers, many of them, are coming to the front. Why should we not work hand in hand for home and state, since our interests are one? Department work is being pushed, and the outlook is hopeful. Miss West's parliamentary drills at the state convention were much appreciated; our ladies are determined to profit by them.

Morrow county's convention was held at Sparta. The M. E. Church was tastefully decorated. An arch of green and white, flowers in profusion, and the pictured face of our beloved National President, looking down with its loving benediction, made all feel sweetly at home with the Sparta white-ribboners. Mrs. Meeker presided. Every local union in the county sent delegates. Superintendents reported aggressive work. Social purity and Loyal Temperance Legion departments received special attention. Sixty-seven UNION SIGNALS and thirty-two state Messengers are taken in the county. The following interesting papers were read: "Influence of Young Women in Reform," Miss Phebe Wood; "The Christian's Influence in Regard to Card Playing and Dancing," Mrs. Fry; "Mothers' Meetings," Mrs. Hammond. Miss Borserman led the noontide prayer service. Mrs. Trego, in her happiest manner, addressed the Loyal Temperance Legion. Excellent papers on practical subjects were presented, also resolutions pledging support to every movement having the prohibition of the liquor traffic for its object; to work for the right of suffrage, municipal, state and national, believing that the shortest way out of the toils of the rum traffic; also that Demorest contests be held as much as possible throughout the county. An address by Mrs. Trego closing the proceedings was heard with close attention, as were all her utterances during the convention. Fresh courage for the conflict against sin was the result of this convention.

Cuyahoga county quarterly convention, just held in Cleveland, was enthusiastically ushered in by the East Cleveland Y's whose evening entertainment merited and received the highest praise. Mrs. Marsh, who drilled the children to sing the Anna Gordon Marching Songs with such fine effect, presided. Strong prohibition recitations were given. "The Cry of To-day," by Miss Kate M. Lawrence, of Berea, was especially well spoken. Little Master Stevens repeated the original address which he gave at Atlanta, to the delight of all. An interesting feature of the evening was the presentation of a beautiful blue satin banner to the Y's by the gentlemen members of the organization. This stirring band, recently organized with twenty-four members, now numbers seventy-nine, and is already planning to build a reading-room.

The church of the Epiphany (Episcopalian) cordially opened its doors for the W. C. T. U. county quarterly, which proved from first to last a grand success. Mrs. H. E. Hammond, county president, just the one to "work up" a convention, is a fine presiding officer. Eighty-seven delegates, elected and visiting, were present. Reports of secretary and treasurer were encouraging. Miss Esther Pugh, whom Cleveland white-ribboners still [illegible] conducted a school of methods and a parliamentary drill which were pleasant and profitable. The following topics were discussed: "Loyal Temperance Legions," by Mrs. H. B. Wisner; "Sabbath Observance," Mrs. Donsereau; "Evangelistic," Mrs. Thompson, who is engaged in mission work for fallen women; "Prison and Reform," Mrs. T. K. Doty; "Narcotics," Mrs. Merrill; "Franchise," Mrs. D. W. Gage, whose arguments were simply unanswerable; "Flower Mission," Mrs. McCroskey. It was easy to see where the members of the convention stood on the Sabbath Observance question. Reference was made to the shameless desecration of the Sabbath by the saloon element and to the efforts being made to open the Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath. Mrs. Zerelda Wallace spoke to the point; she said: "I will not put a foot in the city of Chicago if the Columbian Exposition is open on the Lord's day, or if liquor is sold upon the grounds. Unless our convictions are respected in this matter, not a single member of the W. C. T. U. should set foot on the ground." The following resolution, presented by Mrs. S. M. Perkins, was adopted:

Resolved, "That we as Christian women will not attend the Columbian Exposition if it is opened on Sunday, or if liquors are sold on the grounds."

In the evening Mrs. Zerelda Wallace addressed a large audience—many being called in from the "regions beyond" by the fame of the distinguished speaker. Her theme, "Woman Suffrage," was handled in her own masterly manner. She was followed by Rev. Olympia Brown, in a brief, telling speech on the same subject.

All convention expenses were met by an admission fee of fifteen cents. Mr. P. Bilhorn, who wrote some of the music for the Temperance Temple dedication, sang two solos; "it was grand" was the verdict. This county union is growing—has gained thus far this year one hundred and fifty members. East Cleveland union, too, is building up—new members every meeting. Is it any wonder we are encouraged?

A Social Purity Conference under the management of the state superintendent of that department, Miss Jennie Olmstead, has been held in Berea. Dr. Link, Mayor of Cincinnati, talked to the mothers and daughters the first day and gave a fine public address in the evening in the Methodist church, subject, "Physical Culture." Miss Olmstead, Rev. Mr. Collom, Congregational, Rev. Mr. Kemble, Methodist, and Rev. Mr. Pool, of Baldwin University, addressed the people Saturday evening. Dr. Kate C. Bushnell spoke to a full house Sunday evening, as none else can speak; "I know these facts are not pleasant to hear," she said, "but you shall hear them." And we did. Dr. Bushnell won the confidence and esteem of her hearers, and awakened an interest in the minds of many who before had never given the subject a thought. Miss Olmstead is an heroic and efficient worker; we bid her Godspeed.

GRACE, GRIT AND GUMPTION.

Good word comes from Ross county. The wide-awake local option town of Kingston has had an "experience." It is graphically told by one who was in the fight. When Mrs. Estelle Purdum, district president, sought to organize a local W. C. T. U. here about a year ago, there seemed no necessity for such an organization, but a vigorous one was organized, and none too soon. Just over the border the saloon traffic proposed starting up business, which was the signal to arms for the W. C. T. U. Two saloons opened up just outside local option limits. Our city fathers were helpless; their extremity was our opportunity. Immediately we declared hostilities. We canvassed the township and secured the names of one-fourth of the electors to a petition asking that local option be submitted in the township. The petition was presented to the trustees, and an election was called according to statute. The following three weeks were spent in campaigning. We prepared a circular signed by the representative mothers of our township, which we sent to every voter asking them, for the sake of us mothers, our children and theirs, in the interest of all hearts and homes, to vote against the saloon. Meetings were appointed, widely advertised, in school-houses and churches throughout the township, addressed by our pastors, Methodist, Presbyterian and German Reform, closing the night before election with a grand mass-meeting at the rink addressed by Dr. J. C. Jackson, of Columbus, and our president. Maybe the other side didn't work! not according to our methods, however. When we had done all we could we betook ourselves to prayer all that election day. Three minutes after the ballots were counted we had a praise meeting. At the end of thirty days, the allotted time according to law, those two saloons "silently stole away."

Oh, for a baptism of courage all along the line!

SOUTH DAKOTA.

RENEWED CONFLICT FOR SUFFRAGE AND PROHIBITORY LAW.

The members of the W. C. T. U. of South Dakota gave almost their whole strength to the suffrage cause during the recent campaign, and though the amendment was lost through trickery in the wording (many voting against who thought they were voting for it), also through prejudice, and the foreign vote, still, the women are not discouraged. A great educational work has been done that can never be *un*done. The inconsistency and injustice of giving more votes to enfranchise "Indians who sustain tribal relations or are supported in whole or in part by government," than were given to enfranchise the Christian wives and mothers of the commonwealth, are teaching a lesson that the campaign failed to do. Could a vote be taken again to-day, the majority against would be nearly or quite wiped out.

From all parts of the state come letters from the ablest and most influential men and women, begging that petitions be circulated at once, and presented to the Legislature asking for re-submission of the suffrage amendment. The Legislature will be asked to give full suffrage if it can be done constitutionally; if not, then suffrage with a property qualification, or municipal suffrage. Some of the ablest lawyers of the state claim that the Legislature can grant women of the state full suffrage if they wish. There is no doubt about their being able to grant municipal suffrage, or suffrage with a property qualification.

The unions generally, after election, took a brief rest, but are now rallying for a renewed conflict along the various lines of work, and especially in the line of enforcement of the prohibitory law. Every W. C. T. U. woman is looking with faith and prayer to that Boanerges in prohibitory reform, Rev. Wm. Fielder, president of the State Enforcement League, for help at this time. The demoralizing contest for capital location, coming as it did along with the suffrage campaign at the general election, absorbed the time and energies of good men and women to such an extent that little attention was given to the enforcement of the law, and consequently it was almost a dead letter in some of the larger towns at the time of election. Now, however, law-breakers are being brought to grief in most places, and in Sioux Falls, the largest city in the state, there is not an open saloon, thanks to their celebrated "committee of one hundred," and the W. C. T. U. Huron is moving in the same line, and Pierre, the capital city, will soon follow.

Minnehaha county W. C. T. U. met in annual convention at Garretson, November 12, with a good attendance. Mrs. Beardsley, president of Garretson local union, presided, in the absence (through illness) of the president, Mrs. J. E. Riley, and there was an earnest, devoted spirit manifest throughout all the proceedings. The program as published was carried out with few changes, and the discussions were spirited and full of enthusiasm. The program included fine addresses by Rev. Mr. Watson, of Valley Springs, and Rev. Mr. Dyas, of Garretson.

Among the resolutions passed was the following:

Resolved, That the W. C. T. U, women, in every practical way, work to secure equal franchise for women with men, believing that the ballot in woman's hand is needed to help purify politics, and make it impossible to use money to corrupt legislation; to give us better laws for purity; also believing that only through the ballot will we be able to cope with intemperance.

A resolution of sympathy and regret for the illness and absence of the president, Mrs. Riley, was also passed.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. J. E. Riley, Valley Springs; vice-president, Mrs. S. E. Young, Sioux Falls; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. K. Davis, Sioux Falls; recording secretary, Mrs. Alta Buzzell, Valley Springs; treasurer, Mrs. Coon, Garretson.

The Yankton union is foremost in the line of parlor meetings, being under the immediate direction of the efficient state superintendent of this department, Mrs. Julia M. King. The Huron union, directed by their president, Mrs. Caroline S. Cummings, is making a specialty of jail work with the most gratifying results, and has also again taken up the Working Girls Industrial School, putting it in charge of Mrs. Emma Smith De Voe, who gave it up last spring for suffrage campaign work.

The Sioux Falls union is doing a good work in the line of narcotics, paying special attention to the enforcement of the new law against the sale of tobacco to children under sixteen.

The new state superintendent of jail and prison work, Mrs. Emma S. Young, has entered upon her duties with great earnestness, and the inmates of the penitentiary—ninety-seven men and one woman, and the boys and girls of the Reform School, are especially receiving the benefit of her prayerful thought and time. Her work at both the penitentiary and Reform School is warmly seconded by Warden Kanouse and Superintendent Ainsworth, whose humane and Christian treatment of law-breakers and wayward children offer a rich reward to the faithful worker in this line. All local superintendents of jail work will please address Mrs. Young, at Sioux Falls, for instructions concerning the work.

White-ribboners of South Dakota will regret to learn that Mrs. Minnie Barker Horning, the successful superintendent of Demorest contest work, is about to leave the state. At this writing it is not decided where her future home will be, but many prayers and well wishes will follow her and her husband, wherever they may go.

NEBRASKA.

CAMPAIGN NOTES.

The Nebraska campaign has come and gone, and will long be remembered by its friends as well as its enemies. The women did well their part, and having done all they could do are not discouraged at the outcome of the election, for no "blood rests upon their skirts," or will be demanded of them, and as I speak in their praise I also have a good word for the workers that came to help us from other states. Miss Willard, Miss Gordon, Mrs. Lathrap and Mrs. Hoffman are too well and favorably known to need a single word of mine to recommend them, but I must say in this public manner that we are very glad they came to us, and words fail to express our appreciation of the good they did in Nebraska.

There were many others that perhaps are less widely known who did valiant work in the campaign, among which are Mrs. Eugenia St. John, who delighted her hearers with her sound logic and practical views of the politics of the country; Mrs. Balch, of Indiana, of whose worth I heard nothing but good reports; Mrs. Benjamin, of Michigan, who made many friends during her short stay; Major and Mrs. E. T. Scott, who were with us eight months, and in their quiet, pleasant way, changed public sentiment in favor of Prohibition wherever they went; Mrs. Barker, state president of Dakota, and Dr. Nettie Hall, also of Dakota.

David Tatum, the "Friend," was listened to with pleasure, and we were sorry to have him leave the state; Rev. J. R. Dill, with Frank Odell, his singer, did grand work, and the organization of the "Association of Prayer" will live to help other states that carry on amendment campaigns. C. J. Holt held the fort and filled a place in this work that no one else could. He has been in Nebraska for nearly five years, the most of the time. The children will bear him in loving remembrance for the interest he took in them, drilling them to march and organizing them into Loyal Temperance Legions.

I would like to speak of many more if space permitted, who worked just as kindly, with just as much earnestness and zeal as the others whose names are honored, and whose good works and words will be written by the Master-hand, who makes no mistakes, but puts the credit where it belongs, and where no intimidation can deter, or false returns change the result; no stuffing of ballot box or false registration can there avail, for God is God, and right shall prevail. To all the good brothers and sisters, and also the little children that sent their offerings; to the young lady that sent us her watch and chain, out of which we made $86, then returned the watch to her, engraved, "'She hath done what she could,' Nebraska, November 4, 1890"; also to the one who gave her chain, another her ring, and still another a set of point lace, most exquisite, the work of her own hands—to one and all I wish to express my most sincere thanks. For your prayers and sympathy, I can only say God will reward you, and I shall ever hold you in loving remembrance, and feel that my courage was greatly strengthened by the constant assurance of your interest.

It was like the "shadow of a great rock in a weary land," for the flesh would grow weary and the brain tired sometimes, and just then a kind, loving letter would come, and, in the reading of it, the weariness would be forgotten, the head would cease to ache, and, in the sweet fellowship of kindred hearts the work was quickly resumed; and so the days went by, the work was done, and the result left with Him who "doeth all things well." Our unions are in good heart, not dismayed or discouraged; some disappointed, but all willing to take up the regular lines of work and bide our time, which will be God's time.

MARY A. HITCHCOCK, State Pres.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

A NARCOTIC CAMPAIGN.

The nation's capital has recently been blessed by a three days' visit from our beloved sister, Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, National organizer, and superintendent of narcotics of the state of New York. She stopped with us en route from the National Convention, and her visit is one long to be remembered, and lovingly treasured in the hearts of the white-ribboners of Washington.

On November 21, Mrs. Bullock addressed a mothers' meeting at the headquarters of the District W. C. T. U. On Sunday afternoon she spoke to a Band of Hope meeting in the Christian Church, and Sunday evening addressed a crowded house in the same church. All these meetings were under the auspices, and in the interest of the department of narcotics, and Mrs. Bullock's talks were of the evils attending cigarette smoking; and children and grown people, alike, listened to her with the deepest interest, and all were led to feel the urgent necessity for legislation by Congress, on this subject. A bill to prevent selling tobacco to minors is already before Congress which provides for the punishment of both the dealer and the boy who violate its regulations.

Mrs. Bullock's talks were straight to the point, and though she did not hesitate to declare the whole truth regarding this dangerous habit, and the responsibility of parents in the matter, yet that truth was so well seasoned with love that no one could take offense, and many were aroused to the urgent necessity of earnest measures and renewed effort in the work of saving our boys from the deadly habit, and helping them to a pure and vigorous manhood. At the close of the meeting about twenty-five signed the pledge, most of whom will become members of the W. C. T. U. When Mrs. Bullock next visits Washington she will find many warm friends to greet her.

MRS. EMMA F. SHELTON, Supt. Narcotics.

NEW MEXICO.

[At the request of the National superintendent of prison work, we admit the following touching letter into these columns.—EDITOR.]

We, the inmates of the New Mexico Penitentiary, request admittance into your columns, that we may thank the many kind (but unknown) friends who have donated books to our prison library. The reading matter so kindly presented is an unfailing source of enjoyment to the prisoners, and could the generous contributors be present and listen to the encomiums bestowed upon them by the recipients of their bounty, I am sure they would feel amply repaid.

Most of the books presented are well suited to form the nucleus of a library for a reformatory institution: history, biography, biblical commentaries, science, and a little good fiction forming the major part. They are admirably calculated to create a taste for the higher kinds of literature, and with a great many have already supplanted a passion for the yellow-backed puerility called "Popular Fiction."

The credit of making our wants known, and thus inducing others to contribute books, is wholly due to Mrs. Mary E. Teats, of Las Vegas. This gentle and truly Christian lady, whose efforts to better the condition of prisoners in this territory well deserve the sobriquet of "Mother" to which she so proudly responds, visits the prison on the last Sunday of each month; and these Sundays we account as the brightest days in our prison calendar. Her faithful and untiring ministry has drawn to her many hearts utterly invulnerable to anything except such patient, sympathetic kindness as she ever shows to the unfortunates with whom she comes in contact. The amount of good accomplished by this most estimable lady during her two years of work in this place, is not easily to be calculated. The work of the W. C. T. U. is to many here a theme of constant interest, because we know that our "Missionary" is a member of that noble organization of Christian ladies; and surely, if their company includes many such as we know her to be, victory eventually must crown their battle against intemperance and its kindred evils.

Mrs. Teat's little daughter Fannie, a member of the Y's, always accompanies her mother on her visits to the prison, and, by her presence and example, contributes in no small degree to the efficacy of that lady's work. Fannie is familiarly known to us by the sobriquet of the "Prisoners' Friend," and the more extended our acquaintance with her, the more certain do we feel that the title is well bestowed. Her gentle, innocent manner is the delight of the prisoners; and her smiling, happy face brings tender and regenerating memories to many a heart in which worthy emotions have been long dormant.

PRISONERS, N. MEX. PENITENTIARY.

IOWA.

AGGRESSIVE WORK OVER THE STATE.

Iowa has not been heard from very often through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL, but the women are not asleep for all that.

Soon after the state convention, the union at Aurelia held a meeting and effected an equal division of funds, books, etc. One union held the original books and records. Money was taken from the common treasury to buy a similar set in which the records were to be transferred and given to the other union.

Dallas county, at a recent convention, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we indorse the policy of the National union in granting liberty to each individual and to all the unions to indorse the action of any political party that may take a favorable stand for prohibition, or to indorse no political party.

Resolved, That we do not indorse the action of the Iowa delegation last year in seceding from the National union, nor the decision of the last Iowa union in expelling delegates who remained loyal to the National union, neither do we approve the action of the majority so illegally organized in severing their auxiliaryship from the National union.

A call was issued by the district president and secretary of the W. C. T. U. ("Non-partisan") to the Executive Committee of Dallas county, to meet December 11, to take some action towards putting the county in harmony with the state policy!

The Stuart union has been the means of having the Sunday law enforced. These ladies visited the "City Fathers" and informed them that they would have each official fined for not doing his duty if the law was not enforced. Result: every business man has one day in the week to spend at home, and the streets of the city are quiet.

On December 10 a convention was held at Dexter, of the women in the seventh district, who wish to continue auxiliary relations with the National, through a state organization. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. M. A. McGonegal, 406 Center street, Des Moines; corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. J. Bellanger, 1326 West Ninth street, Des Moines; recording secretary, Mrs. M. J. Morrow, Dexter; treasurer, Mrs. H. F. Parlin, 1436 West Sixth street, Des Moines.

A pleasant and profitable meeting was held and plans laid for future work. CLARA A. STEPHENS, State Reporter, Des Moines.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. FRANCES E. W. HARPER, of Philadelphia, has been speaking in Maine for several weeks with great success. December 1st she spoke in Bridgewater, and the president, writing of the address, says: "Her eloquent address before a large audience was highly appreciated and impressions were made which will not soon be forgotten. A silver collection was taken which paid all necessary expenses."

THE Austin, Ill., W. C. T. U. have fitted up the upper story of their headquarters as lodging rooms for working women. Terms are very reasonable, and include the use of the reading-room when desired. Address Mrs. R. J. Race, Austin, Ill.

THE New England delegates and visitors enjoyed a most unique excursion to and from Atlanta. A stop was made at Washington, both going and returning, and ladies, under Mrs. La Fetra's direction, arranged a reception at the White House, a visit to the capitol and other public buildings, and a drive about the city. Mrs. La Fetra entertained nearly one hundred at tea at Hotel Fredonia, the party going from there to a reception at the rooms of the "Wimodaughsis," and later, taking the cars in waiting, which Mr. Hansom, of the Richmond & Danville road had named "The white ribbon special." To the management of this road the party is under great obligation for the perfection of arrangements which secured such a delightful excursion. Every possible comfort was provided on the train, and arrangements were made at all the eating stations whereby, at a reduced rate, luxurious and bountiful meals were provided and fruit urged upon the ladies to take to the train. On the return the W. C. T. U. of Charlotte met the travelers, as they stopped to sup there, with words of welcome and quantities of beautiful flowers. Special bouquets were given to Mr. Demorest, Mrs. Fessenden and Miss Greenwood, each of whom made fitting responses. A handsome souvenir containing the names of the party was given each traveler.

World's W. C. T. U.

To the Members of the World's W. C. T. U.:

BELOVED SISTERS AND FRIENDS:—It was voted at the Convention of the National W. C. T. U. in Atlanta, Georgia, November 14–18, 1890, that we would suggest to all the auxiliaries of the World's W. C. T. U. the desirableness of holding a session of that society next November in Boston, when the next session of the National W. C. T. U. is held.

Lady Henry Somerset, president of the British Women's Temperance Association, will then be with us; also Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, who from the first has been so devoted to the interests of the world's white ribbon movement.

Thus far we have had only the constitution and by-laws drafted by a few leaders and tacitly accepted by the society as a whole, and if we are regularly convened next autumn, this constitution, etc., should be voted upon and modified in any way that the majority deems wise. In all new movements it is necessary that a few who grasp the situation should exercise whatever power is needed in order to set the wheels of such new movement in motion; but delegated authority is the surest basis of a successful and long enduring effort.

Those who have been obliged to stand forward as leaders, greatly desire that the power hitherto exercised by them shall be placed in such hands as may be deemed safest and strongest in the future; therefore, will you announce as widely as possible through the newspapers of your respective countries, the intention and desire herein expressed? Please elect your representatives in any way that seems to you best and send such other members as you may find it practicable to secure, commissioning them to meet in Tremont Temple, Boston, November 13, 1891.

Other things being equal, you will probably choose your leading officers who would be received undoubtedly in their ex officio capacity as full delegates to the World's W. C. T. U. convention.

It is exceedingly desirable that the great petition should be more carefully circulated this year than ever before, that we may have an encouraging report at the coming convention, and may choose the Commission of women who will carry this petition against the legalized sale of alcoholic stimulants and narcotics, to all civilized countries of the globe.

Miss Anna A. Gordon, Evanston, Ill., has been made superintendent of work among the children for the World's W. C. T. U., and is already moving, with her accustomed intelligence and energy, to organize her department. She will, in the beginning, give special attention to building up a grand exhibit of the plans and work of temperance children in all countries for the Columbian Exposition. Her suggestions will reach you ere long.

We are hoping that Mrs. J. K. Barney, Providence, R. I., superintendent of prison and jail work in the World's W. C. T. U., may make the globe trip soon; also that Dr. Kate C. Bushnell, evangelist in the social purity department, and Mrs. E. W. Andrew, former associate editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, who, with Dr. Bushnell, has been made World's Evangelist in the white ribbon work, will visit the World's auxiliaries within a year.

We hear the best accounts of Mrs. Leavitt, who, having visited Scandinavia to overlook our societies there, is now in Italy and will go to South America in 1891.

Miss Jessie Ackerman writes us from New South Wales, where she is doing effective work. The outlook was never so bright. Our Convention in Atlanta called out from a distance an attendance of at least six hundred delegates and visitors, some coming thousands of miles, from Puget Sound, from Manitoba, and the Province of Quebec.

The world seems to us like a great human heart, the warmth of whose growing love and the rhythm of whose steady pulse is a dynamic power through which God works to make all things new, and pure, and brotherly. That you and I, who are like ruddy drops floating through this same heart should contribute our full fraction of this divine outworking, is the purpose and prayer of

Your affectionate comrade,
FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Evanston, Ill., Dec. 11, 1891.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

These are hallowed days, filled with memories of the Christ-child, the world's emancipator,—He who has shown us by His glorious example that to die unto self is to truly live. This Christmas time is surely full of golden memories and opportunities. While every heart is mellowed with loving thoughts and unselfish deeds, with the shadow of the old year falling around us, with its disappointments and shortcomings, and the roseate hue of the new full of hope faintly dawning upon our sight, let us all pledge to do more the coming year for the building up of Christ's kingdom than we have ever done before. This will bring to the thought of white-ribboners and the Loyal Temperance Legion the beautiful Temple they are erecting in His name and for His cause, the corner-stone of which the year 1890 has seen laid, and the cap-stone of which will be put in place by the close of 1891. Will not each one try, while the walls of the noble edifice are rapidly growing up, to lay aside a penny a day during this coming year for the building fund? The W. C. T. U. and Loyal Temperance Legion number over 400,000; if they would only carry out the above plan the building would be entirely paid for by the time the cap-stone is put in place. But alas, not a sixteenth part of our host will attempt to do anything; they will fold their hands and say, "I cannot." This is the history of the world, so the strong ones must bear the burdens of the weak, and do double duty.

A lithograph of the Temple in the exact colors in which it will appear when finished, with a portrait of its founder on the margin, has been used for the last two or three months by THE UNION SIGNAL as a premium with great success. It will be withdrawn the first of January from THE UNION SIGNAL premium list, and will be sent as a gift during the coming year to all persons who fill a Temple mite-box, viz: who put a cent a day in the box during the year 1891 for the benefit of the building fund. A two cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 145 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, will secure a Temple mite-box, bulletin and descriptive card. Send at once for a box so you can commence giving a penny a day with the advent of the New Year.

We are thankful that there are so many noble souls who are ready to say, "I will do what I can." One such is a sweet girl, Mana M. Monaghan. She has been banished from her Boston home on account of ill-health, and is seeking its restoration in the delightful climate of Southern California at San Jacinto. She writes: "There is a weak little society here in the mountains, and I am going to try to have them raise $100; of course I don't know yet, as I am only a girl, and a stranger. Do you think it would be nice to raise the money in memory of Helen Hunt Jackson? She made this place famous by her 'Ramona.' The people think a great deal of her here." Surely it would be a beautiful and fitting thing to have a tablet in memory of such a famous woman in the Temple, and we are certain that, stranger and girl though she be, Miss Monaghan will succeed in raising $100 for this noble purpose.

Lucy B. Mills, Evart, Mich., sends the names of thirty children and check for $4. She writes: "These are the names of children I have cared for at birth in the village of Evart." Miss M. E. Wright, a deaf mute at the Deaf and Dumb Institute, Berkeley, California, sends $4.25, the contents of her mite-box. She says, "I am glad to be able to help build so noble a building, and will fill my mite-box again." Mrs. Anna Beverage, Athens, Ohio, writes, "I am an old woman, very poor, but I want to give my mite to the Temple. I am seventy years old and earn a little change occasionally by making 'rick-rack.' I send ten cents." No doubt this gift from this loving soul, in God's sight is as great as a hundred dollars from those who are more able to give. Jane Fairchild Foley, Clifton, Kansas, sends $10 and says, "I have watched this movement for a long time with interest, have longed to help, and at last here is my mite." The pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church at St. Johns, N. B., Rev. A. J. McFarland, sends a check for $7.25, the gift of an old lady, one of his parishioners, Mrs. Rachel Stevenson, to whom he had shown the Temple number of THE UNION SIGNAL. She said to him, she would like to help build the Temple, although she should never see it.

The unions are coming up nobly to the work. The Boston, Mass., W. C. T. U. have paid their last $50 on their pledge of $100. The Akron, Ohio, W. C. T. U. has sent their last installment of $46.50 on their pledge of $100. The Milwaukee, Wis., W. C. T. U. sends a check for $101.80. Mrs. A. B. Ford, treasurer, writes: "This from Milwaukee union is sent so gladly and accompanied with so many prayers." The Chenoa, Ill., W. C. T. U. pays their entire pledge, $100, the Y's paying $25 of the amount. The Albion, Mich., W. C. T. U., through Mrs. Samuel Dickie, president, sends a check for $100. Our Y's are evidently waking up to the importance of helping their mothers erect the Temple. If the dear girls only knew their power they could raise a great deal more money than their elders. We think the Y. W. C. T. U. of Danbury, Conn., has found the secret of power. They send a check for $100, and evidently have interested their gentlemen friends in helping them to raise this amount, for their president, Emily C. Hawley, writes that H. B. Hawley, V. E. Patch and H. Wm. Kirby were the largest contributors. The Nashua, N. H., Y's send a check for $37.54 the result of a mite-box opening. The Y's of Fall River, Mass., pledge one hundred dollars, and send a check for $25. The Y's of Almada, Cal., have organized a Japanese union and they have decided their first work shall be for the Temple. They are aiming to have their name on a tablet in Willard Hall.

"No chronic tortures racked his aged limbs,
For luxury and sloth had nourished none for him."

In our land there is much luxury, and but little sloth. So we must find other causes for the "chronic tortures." It has been said that to have gout one must have ancestors, or, as they say in Philadelphia, "grandfathers." "This disease," says Dr. Da Costa, in his great work on "Diagnosis" "is rare in this country," but not so Rheumatic Gout. He adds: "Nor will it yield to the remedies usually administered in acute Rheumatism, nor to colchicum and the alkalies, so beneficial in gout." However, remarkable cures have been effected by the Compound Oxygen Treatment of DRS. STARKEY & PALEN. If you wish to convince yourself of this, send for our Treatise on Compound Oxygen, a book of 200 carefully written pages, or write us, giving your symptoms, and we will give our opinion, free of charge. No other genuine than that of DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa., or 120 Sutter Street, San Francisco, California.

Publisher's Notes.

A Personal Word of Thanks.

With this issue of Dec. 25th I lay down the managerial pen, but I have asked for space in this truly Christmas number of THE UNION SIGNAL to personally return my heartfelt thanks for the large number of letters received from readers of the paper expressing regret for the change in management, and full of the kindest possible words, prayers for my future well-being, and cordial good wishes, such as are given only where a true spirit of friendship exists. At first I undertook to personally acknowledge these messages, but the number sent makes it an impossibility, hence I desire here to express my sincere gratitude to all these friends who have thus remembered that a change was to take place. I do not need to ask that the same hearty coöperation given me may come to my successor—that is an assured fact. Thank you, one and all, for the many, many responses to my numerous calls upon your time, your effort and your pocket-books! I have always said, and always will, that the White-Ribbon Army constitutes the grandest, bravest, and most self-sacrificing body of women that the world has ever known. As Tiny Tim said on his Christmas day, so say I now, "God bless us all—every one."

At the National Convention at Atlanta it was demonstrated that the Y. W. C. T. U. has become an important factor among us. A large increase in membership and constant activity can only result from corresponding intelligence in method, and prove the fact of a growing circulation of the as reported, at the same time. But we desire a still larger list. And the paper deserves it. It is a charming, eight page monthly, especially published to aid the Y unions, and edited by one of them,

Oak and Ivy Leaf,

Miss Margaret A. Sudduth.

If you have not seen it, send for sample copy, and then you will be able to recommend it to the young women who are enrolled in the white ribbon army, and their friends. The December number publishes a report of the National Convention from the young women's standpoint, giving items of interest that do not appear elsewhere. Every Y should have it.

The social lines of our work have special attention in this paper, and members of the W. C. T. U. who are not Y's, but who give thought to providing entertainments for the public in communities where the young people have not become enlisted, would do well to subscribe for this sheet. It is so full of suggestions and helps.

Distances to Washington.

From St. Louis to Washington the distance is 894 miles: from Cincinnati to Washington 553 miles; from Chicago to Washington 813 miles. This is via the bee line followed by the B. & O. Railroad, the most picturesque as well as the most direct route from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Seaboard, stretching across level and fertile prairies, amid hills and valleys, over mountain crests, along banks of historic rivers, through teeming cities and bustling towns. The through B. & O. trains, with full Pullman equipment of Sleeping, Parlor and Buffet cars, run from St. Louis to Washington in 29 hours; from Cincinnati to Washington in 18 hours; from Chicago to Washington in 25 hours. Sleepers from all points run through to New York from the West without change. At Washington connection is made with the B. & O's matchless Royal Blue Line for Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York. These Royal Blue trains consist of the staunchest and finest Coaches, Parlor and Sleeping cars ever built by the Pullman Company; are vestibuled from end to end, and are protected by Pullman's improved anti-telescoping device, which makes every car as safe as it can be made by man's ingenuity and skill. All the cars are heated by steam and lighted by Pintsch gas. They are the fastest trains in the world, placing New York and Washington within five hours' reach.

What Mr. Norton Says.

DEAR READER:

Having read Mr. Morehead's experience plating with gold, silver and nickel, I feel it my duty to inform others of my success. I sent for a Plater and have more work than I can do. It is surprising the spoons, casters and jewelry that people want plated. The first week I cleared $37.10, and in three weeks $119.85, and my wife has made about as I have. By addressing W. H. Griffith & Co., Zanesville, Ohio, you can get circulars. A Plater only costs $3. You can learn to use it in an hour. Can plate large or small articles, and can make money anywhere. I now have a nice home and bank account, all the product of $3 invested in a Plater.

Started late in 1889 with no population or improvements, the development already made is surprising. Five factories are building, and several companies organized to build others. No booms, but steady, substantial progress. A knitting factory company is organized, the stock to be all owned, and entire business managed by women. It will pay large profits. THE YOUNG CRUSADER

Is the paper for the children. It is rapidly growing in popularity, and at this there can be no surprise. It is published semi-monthly at the small cost of 50c per year. For some time past a supplement has accompanied it bi-monthly, containing a senior grade lesson on civil government. These will be continued for the present. This paper is just the one to aid the

and interest the pupils. We have been so much impressed with this fact that we were led a short time since to offer special rates for public schools. The time limit of this offer has expired, but the appreciation is such that we have decided to continue the same indefinitely. So for the present the

will be sent, for

PUBLIC SCHOOLS ONLY, in quantities of five or more to one address for

TWENTY-SIX CENTS PER YEAR EACH.

In ordering, state that the papers are for use in school, and give name of teacher.

The

SUNDAY-SCHOOL YOUNG CRUSADER

is published monthly, and contains quarterly an outline for Sunday-School teachers on the Temperance lesson. It already has a large circulation in Sunday-Schools, and is growing in favor. The

SUNDAY-SCHOOL JOURNAL

the teacher's periodical for the M. E. Church, has published the highest commendation of this valuable paper; the Cumberland Presbyterian Board of Publications has practically adopted it; it has received very favorable mention from schools of all denominations in all parts of the country. It is published at the small cost of

The New Rate.

For several years there has been a growing desire that the subscription price of THE UNION SIGNAL might be placed and maintained at $1 per year to all subscribers, and none have more desired to see this done than the publishers themselves. The expense of producing such a paper is so great that it is impossible to supply it at that price unless a very large subscription list is secured. The advantage of such increased subscription is enjoyed by publisher and patron alike, when it can be made to result in reduced rates. So the attempt to raise our list to has not been entirely for our own good. Although we have not yet reached that number, we believe we will, and are so well convinced that the year 1891 will bring this long-desired result, that we have decided to reduce the rate of subscription and have it uniformly

One Dollar a Year in Advance.

Just think of it! One dollar a year for a sixteen-page weekly, filled to overflowing with the very best thoughts of prominent literary men and women, editorials of ability, reports and suggestions from all over the field, which is now world-wide.

Look at the following partial list of contributors as a guarantee that all this will be given for so small a sum, and note the variety of literary ability represented:

Lady Henry Somerset, President of the British Women's Temperance Union.
Frances E. Willard, President of the World's W. C. T. U. and the National W. C. T. U.
Mrs. Mary A. Livermore,

And, besides all these noted contributors,

Foreign Correspondence

from our missionaries abroad will be an interesting feature. These include Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, Miss Jessie Ackerman and Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, now in foreign lands, and Dr. Kate Bushnell, who starts on a round-the-world trip next month.

Is this not enough? Then add

News from the Field,

which is growing more interesting and readable each year, as our unions realize the privilege extended to them, and, through their state correspondents, avail themselves of the same. Full of suggestions and hints the columns devoted to this department will prove.

Now can you not show your appreciation of this exceedingly low price to renew at once, if your subscription has expired, and induce your neighbor to subscribe, too?

By the way, what a nice New Year's gift a year's subscription would be. It would not grow old or defaced or be forgotten during the entire year. And if you want to do the most good, induce your children to give it as a New Year's gift to their teacher. She will find many ideas to help her in her effort to mold character aright. Let us see if we cannot reach the 100,000 mark during the first three months of 1891.

Don't Forget

That every phase of the temperance question has been provided for, and all arguments are answered in our publications. We have just the thing for the Christian, the business man, the voter, the mother, the young man, the young woman, the child, the teacher in public schools, the Sunday-school teacher, the minister, the doctor—everybody. Do you know any one who entertains wrong views? Look over our catalogue, and you will find something to suit the case, at very trifling cost. Do you know mothers who need suggestions? Call a mothers' meeting and send for our leaflets for mothers' meetings. Is your minister out of sympathy with the W. C. T. U.? Send him THE UNION SIGNAL for a year, and he will be converted. And there is nothing better for schools of all kinds than we can furnish. But we will speak of that elsewhere.

Did You Read

the plan outlined last week for a course of reading, or rather three courses, from which you can choose? And did you read the program? And were you interested in the plan? Do you desire to take up one of them and learn all you can of the reasons for the temperance movement, and how to accomplish best results? It is just the thing for the winter months, when it is so pleasant to meet and study together. And have you appointed your leader? Then let us hear from her Of course you will order the programs sent to you as they are printed, and at least one of the two designated books as soon as you are ready to begin In fact, the order should reach us some days before you desire to meet for the first time to carry out the program, so that you will not be disappointed by one of the vexatious delays which will occur in spite of the greatest care Such a thing as Senator Blair's valuable compendium of information called "The Temperance Movement, or The Conflict Between Man and Alcohol" being for sale for $1.50 is surprising. Compare it with other new and popular books at that price, and see how much superior; or price books of equal size, value and originality, and see the difference in cost. Every temperance worker should secure a copy while it can be had at this low rate. We have only 3,000 copies, and if you fail to secure one, the opportunity to get a copy at that figure will be gone.

Miss Willard's autobiography, "Glimpses of Fifty Years," is also ridiculously low at $1.75.

If you have not sent in your order, send at once, to

BETTER THAN GOVERNMENT BONDS.

The ordinary living expenses of a family of five persons, living in the customary manner of American people, amount to not less than $1,500 per year. It would require nearly $40,000 in government bonds to produce this income. Ten acres of land in the Willamette Valley planted to prunes, with an ordinary crop, at ordinary prices, will net more than $1,500, after paying for all labor placed thereon. You can buy this land of the Oregon Land Company, of Salem, Ore., in tracts of ten acres or more at from $55 to $75 per acre.

Signal Notes.

An old northern saw runs thus:

He that buys land buys many stones,
He that buys meat buys many bones,
He that buys eggs buys many shells,
He that buys ale buys nothing else.

At the annual meeting of the King's Daughters and King's Sons held in New York City, in November, 165,000 members were reported, with "Bands" in twenty-eight states. The Silver Cross, organ of this order, has a circulation of nine thousand.

Recently a vessel sailed from a Belgium port for West Africa, having on board fourteen missionaries, four hundred and sixty casks of gunpowder, eleven cases of gin and ten thousand casks of rum. Verily civilization (?) is a puzzle of inconsistencies! Is there not a question here for the foreign missionary societies, as to how far they lend their sanction to rum and gunpowder tactics by sailing in vessels bearing such a cargo?

The Salvation Army has a grand total of 2,874 societies, 896 outposts. The Army occupies thirty-four countries, and preaches in twenty-nine languages. It holds vested property to the value of four million dollars. Balance sheets are issued monthly, quarterly and annually, and all business of the Army is conducted on the most methodical plan. At the head of this vast enterprise stands General Booth. Is he not capable of carrying out his great "Scheme"?

A paper on Heredity read at the annual meeting of the American Social Science Association credited forty per cent of drunkards directly to inebriate ancestry, and twenty per cent to insane and mentally diseased parentage, so that sixty per cent of all inebriates are "launched into existence freighted with diseased tendencies and impulses which burst into activity from the slightest exciting causes." What a legacy for more than one-half of our children!

The great "Scheme" of General Booth, who has undertaken to pioneer the way out of "Darkest England," has met with a most enthusiastic welcome in Great Britain. The reception of the book and practical indorsement of its plans, testify to the undeveloped benevolence among the well-to-do classes. The sum contributed up to December 1, two months within the issue of the book, was $315,000. Many of the large amounts have been contributed by persons who seldom give toward such charitable objects.

The London County Council has set about the work of "sweetening the slums" in earnest. At an estimated cost of £300,000, fifteen acres of over-crowded pestilential houses in the Shoreditch district are to be destroyed. The narrow alleys and fever-breeding courts are to be replaced by good, wide streets lined with buildings fit for people to dwell in. This is excellent from a sanitary and from a moral point of view. It is all but impossible for men and women, packed together in small tenement houses, with scarcely any provision for the common decencies of life, to lead respectable lives, or to save their children from the taint of their vicious surroundings.

Dr. Kate C. Bushnell, of Evanston, Ill., has been made World's evangelist of the W. C. T. U., as has also Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, formerly associate editor of The Union Signal. Both ladies are among the most endowed and successful white-ribboners in America. Mrs. Andrew is already in England, and Dr. Bushnell will leave America about February. She is a specialist in Social Purity work, and her powerful addresses are most effective in winning friends to that great cause. Miss Willard, President of the World's W. C. T. U., earnestly bespeaks the hearty coöperation of white-ribbon women in England, and in all countries which these ladies will visit.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, in an address to saloon-keepers, closes with this strong paragraph: "I tell you plainly that you will meet your customers one day when there will be no counter between you. When your work is done on earth, and you enter the reward of your business, all the souls of the men whom you have destroyed will crowd around you, and pour their bitterness in your cup. They will show you their wounds, and say, 'You made them;' and point to their unquenchable thirst, and say, 'You kindled it;' and rattle their chain, and say, 'You forged it.' Then their united groans will smite your ear; and with the hands out of which you once picked the sixpences and the dimes, they will push you off the verge of great precipices; while rolling up from beneath, and breaking among the crags of death, will thunder, 'Woe to him that giveth his neighbor drink!'"
